In order to demonstrate most conclusively the fatality of the epidemic during the past season, I have taken the trouble to sum up the total mortality, since the outbreak of the fever, commencing on the 1st of August, and ending yesterday, which comprises a period of twelve weeks and five days. The result is as follows:

Weeks.	Total.	Yellow fever.

Showing an average weekly mortality of 211, of which 135 were of yellow fever. On comparing our summer population (80,000) with that of your city, (20,000), it will readily be perceived how unusually the past season has been. The average number of deaths in New York is about 200 per week, while in this city, with a population one-fourth of yours, the above figures have succeeded for thirteen weeks in succession.

TENNESSEE.
The reply of Mr. Foster to the Van Buren senators of the state has elicited from them an address to the people of the state, and this in turn has called forth again a reply by card from him.

LEGISLATURE. The resolution to go into the election of senators was rejected on the 2d in the senate, by a majority of one (13 to 12)—and thus the matter stands.

Mr. Crockett, recently a member of congress, has been elected by the legislature of this state, Deputy Attorney General for the judicial district of this state.

The hon. WILLIAM C. DENLAP was, on the 22d ult. elected judge of the eleventh judicial circuit of this state by the unanimous vote of the legislative convention.

GOV. POLK'S VALENTINE.—The two houses of the general assembly of Tennessee met at the Methodist Episcopal church at Nashville, on the 15th, where Governor Polk addressed them and the citizens there assembled as follows:
Gentlemen of the senate and the house of representatives, and fellow citizens:

It may be regarded as the chief excellence of our free system of government, that it establishes a perfect equality of rights among its citizens, and that the people rule. Their will is the supreme law; and of it, when expressed in the constitutional forms, there is and there ought to be no appeal. In retiring from their service, as I do with all cheerfulness, I avail myself of the occasion to express to you my gratitude for the repeated manifestations of their confidence, which in past life I have received at their hands. In retiring from the service of Tennessee, that proud commonwealth which occupies so lofty a position among her sister states, I can have but one desire, and that is that her interests, her prosperity, her honor, and the happiness of her people, may be preserved and advanced in whatsoever hands her government may be placed. She does indeed, occupy an enviable reputation, among her sisters of the confederacy. Her fame in our military annals is unsurpassed by that of any other state. She was the first of the states, after the old thirteen, that furnished a chief magistrate to the Union—a chief magistrate who has left the indelible impress of his character and of the patriotism and wisdom of his administration upon his country; and to whose fame and eminent public services, but imperfect justice can be done until after he shall have been gathered to his fathers, a bourn to which full years and full of honor, he is rapidly tending. In the number of her population she is the fifth of the states. In the intelligence of her people she may justly claim a high rank.

In serving the people of such a state, in various public trusts, for a period of near twenty years, it is a source of gratification to know that I have honestly maintained, and upon all suitable occasions publicly avowed the doctrines and opinions upon which I have acted. I have deceived no man by a concealment of sentiments which I entertained, nor professed opinions in which I was not sincere. If I am in error now, I have lived in error during the whole period I have served the people.

The present is neither the time nor the occasion to revive the discussion of political questions upon which we stand divided, and nothing certainly is further from my intention. I will only add, that I have an abiding and undiminished confidence in the patriotism, intelligence and capacity of the people to maintain, preserve and perpetuate this most perfect model of well-regulated self-government among men ever devised by human wisdom.

In leaving the public employment, I carry with me into retirement the consciousness that I have constantly endeavored to discharge all my public duties faithfully; and I trust that the public interests which have at any time been committed to my hands, have suffered no detriment by any agency of mine.

INDIANA.

The hon. RICHARD W. DUNSMITH, of this state has addressed a letter to his constituents of the second congressional district, in which we regret to see that he announces it as his intention to retire from public life at the close of his present term. We regret this, not only on account of the high promise of general utility which Mr. T. has evinced during his short service in congress, but because we shall lose by his retirement an able and zealous friend of our local interests.

AN INDIAN TREATY-GROUND.

For the following interesting narrative of proceedings, connected with the late attempt on the part of the U. States government to make a treaty with the Sac and Fox Indians for the purchase of the lands on which they reside in the territory of Iowa, we are indebted to the editor of the Burlington Hawk, who, was among the number of citizens of the territory who visited the Indian country on the occasion.

Sac and Fox agency, Oct. 16, 1841.

We were fortunate in having arrived at this place on Monday last, before any business had been transacted. Governor Chambers and Mr. Crawford, two of the commissioners, having arrived the day before, the several bands paid their respects to them shortly after our arrival. The Indians were clothed in their best, and being well mounted presented a most imposing appearance. The usual ceremony of shaking hands being ended, they had a talk with the governor and Mr. Crawford, the burden of which was that they were very much gratified at their visit, and expressed themselves much pleased at the happy issue to which the governor and agent had brought their long standing difficulties, so that now the several bands could be united in the most amicable feeling towards each other. Directly after this interview we learn that Poweshieck's and Keokuk's bands were about to go through the ceremony of "smoking for horses." This being new to most present, excited considerable curiosity and as our readers may be equally curious, we shall attempt to give them a description of it.

Poweshieck, with his band, assembled on the beautiful lawn in front of the agency house, and commenced the ceremony by ranging his followers in a sitting posture on the ground. Keokuk and his band took their position about twenty paces immediately in front. These remained standing. Presently one of Keokuk's men crossed the plain, and, coming abreast with one hand and carrying a pipe in the other. Having selected his man, he handed him the pipe; after it was taken and smoked, he then placed the bridle in the smoker's hand and presented him with the horse. The horse was then led off to the rear of Poweshieck's band by the man who had received it, the donor of the pipe, and was treated by him as kindly—and perhaps more so—as an only son. It is known that the Sioux are the most deadly enemies of the Sacs and Foxes, and the tenderness with which this child is treated may appear strange to those who are not aware that it is a custom among various tribes so to treat the children of their enemies who are taken in battle. Several have offered to take this child, and Mr. William Phelps promised to bring it up and educate it with his own children, if Keokuk would give him up; another offered two horses for the child, but all these propositions were peremptorily declined by O. K. as Keokuk is now called.

It is surprising to see the excitement this "smoking for horses" produces among the Indians. They not only gave away horses, but blankets, whole pieces of calico, every article of dress, and one Indian, who had on a handsome military coat, for which he probably acted as the trader, who was not at all, at one hundred dollars took that from his horse, and presented it to the Indian who had smoked for it. Another absolutely stripped off all his clothing, saving his leggings, breech-cloth, and moccasins, and gave them away in the same manner. When the above ceremony is conducted between two distinct tribes, the whole of the proceedings are watched with requisition at this time. It is this, the Indian who makes the present starts off with a bridle and pipe in one hand and a common Indian whip in the other. The receivers or donees sit in a row, with their backs all bared. He approaches, and, after selecting his man, lays on the whip with all his might. If the man does not flinch under two or three "licks" on his bare back, the pipe is handed him, and, after taking a "whiff," he receives the horse, or whatever else it may be. If, however, he should make the least movement, or appear to writhe under the lash the present is withheld from him, and he is called a "coward."

We have been thus particular in describing this ceremony, supposing many of our readers unacquainted with its details, and because nothing of more novelty has transpired since our arrival. Directly after the "smoking" was over, Keokuk made a speech, and the Indians dispersed.

The dragoons, who are stationed here to protect the Indians, then turned out and went through various evolutions, exhibiting a precision in all their movements which reflected credit on their commander, and a state of discipline which can hardly be found out of the regular service. This company is composed of five companies. They are commanded by Lieutenant McGrath, who is a noble gallant officer, and by his modest, gentlemanly deportment in the private circle has endeared himself to all his acquaintance. The manoeuvrings of this corps greatly delighted the Indians, who, while they care little for infantry, stand in great awe of mounted soldiers. Even now a talk with the Indians, who carried sabre, pair of pistols, and a "carbine," or short musket, with a very long bayonet. Since they have been stationed here, which is about a fortnight, they have done considerable service. It is known that all trespassers on the Indian lands were warned by the dragoons, in pursuance of instructions, to leave the country, and that the Indians are now in the country. Several left, and among them one man had secreted his household effects under the floor, with the evident intention of returning as soon as the dragoons had gone, which he thought would be as soon as the payments and treaty were over. Not knowing any thing of what was under the floor, the dragoons set fire to it, as they had done to fifteen or eighteen other cabins, and burned it up, with all its contents. It was reported in the settlements that Smith's house had shared a similar fate, but it is not so; he gave up the keys and the house was spared. Public sentiment, we are glad to find, seems to accord with the action of the government, and the dragoons, and it certainly has given the Indians confidence in their protectors. Infringements on the Indian territory will not be tolerated by the administrators of the government in these parts, depredators may rest assured.

In the evening we visited Hardish's encampment. Before, however, mentioning the circumstances of our visit, we shall endeavor to give some general localities. As you approach the agency from the settlements, the whole landscape is most beautifully interspersed with prairie and delightful groves of timber. Within a few miles of it two of these groves nearly meet, as if disposed to kiss each other. The prairie is just rolling enough in all this region to make the country agreeable to the eye. The agency is built in handsome style, is situated directly in front of an extensive grove of first rate timber, having a never failing stream suitable for stock, running within a few hundred yards of its rear; and in front, for about a mile in extent each way, lies a small prairie, made up of rich soil, and high state of cultivation, called the agency farm. Directly to the east, in an enclosure, is the encampment of the dragoons. As you go beyond the agency, and less than a mile to the southwest of it, you come to the encampment of Hardish. About two or three hundred yards to the south, near a branch, the Burlington encampment may be seen composed of about a dozen tents, all crowded with a set of as jolly fellows as ever "camped out." About half a mile west of the agency house, Poweshieck's band had made their encampment. Near the road, and directly south of this encampment, stands the new council house. These with numerous individual encampments, form the tot ensemble of the vicinity of the agency, including the interpreter's house, blacksmith's house and shop, and the old council house. About one mile west the farm is situated. It is highly cultivated; upwards of one hundred acres of wheat have been sown this season, which looks remarkably well. Large quantities of corn, potatoes, turnips and melons, besides stock, have been raised on it, the whole reflecting much credit on Mr. Carr, the government farmer.

Our visit at Hardish's tent was quite interesting. We found most of the squaws cooking, which added much novelty to the scene. To see upwards of two hundred tents with a large fire at the mouth of each on a dark night was quite inspiring. While the Indians were employed in cooking, some of the young men were engaged in dancing, others again were singing war songs in their tents. We visited Nash-caski's (young Black Hawk) tent, where we found him with his handsome young wife and child, more comfortably and neatly fixed than many white families in regular built houses. This young man evinces more interest than almost any other Indian. He belongs to this band. Next to his tent may be found a young man, who is still as polite to strangers as she was in the life time of the late great chief, Red Jacket.

On Tuesday, the commissioners met the several bands at the council house, for the purpose of giving them a talk relative to the manner in which they would receive their second annual payment, two of which were now due. They had at a previous council determined to receive their first payment through their chiefs. Gov. Chambers congratulated the Indians on the settlement of their difficulties, and hoped that they would now come to some harmonious conclusion among themselves, without the influence of the traders. He commented pretty severely on the influence of the traders, and told them he should leave a guard around the agency, in which place he would leave them to consult among themselves, without the presence of a single white man, including even the interpreters. He told them he should look for an answer from them the next morning.

On Wednesday, the commissioners and Indians again assembled at the council house. All the chiefs and head men spoke in the subject of the annual payment. The purport of their talk was that they had concluded to receive it by heads of families. It appeared, however, that the very men who were the most strenuous for this mode of payment from the first, and who had permitted this question to fester the longest, and which had produced the greatest evil, two years existed between them, were now most anxious that it should be made in the usual way. They could now see that by paying individuals, the traders were less likely to get their pay than by the old mode. It was anticipated that as soon as the heads of families accepted their share, instead of paying their old debts, they would secure their money fairly, and in the chase, whereas, if it was paid to the chiefs, they would pay it out for the liquidation of their old debts.

After the Indians had expressed their determination to be paid in the new mode, it was necessary before proceeding any further to take a census of the number of families in each band, and of each family. The agent (Capt. Beach) then informed the Indians about the order in which he should take the census, and required that all the chiefs should be present during the whole process, so that they might be a check on each other, and detect fraud if any should be attempted or attempted. Gov. Chambers also informed them that he had found a single family more than its actual number. He should deprive it of every cent of the payment. The agent commenced taking the census on Wednesday afternoon, and by noon the next day he had completed it. Such expedition and promptitude on this occasion is highly creditable to the agent. While the census was being taken, the Indians seemed to have much sport among themselves. As each representative head of a family would come up with his bundle of little sticks, to show the number in his or her family, numerous jokes were passed on both sides, either about the number of the question, or the interpreter spoke it, or about their families, children, &c. After the census was taken, it appeared that the whole nation of Sacs and Foxes only amounted to just twenty-five hundred. Mr. Mitchell, the superintendent at St. Louis, who is now here, says that at the last treaty at Rock Island, in 1832, he saw nearly fifteen hundred warriors on a horseback, and he is sure that the whole of the nation could not then have numbered much less than eight thousand people. What a melancholy difference nine years have made among them!

In the afternoon of Thursday the money was conveyed to the council house. The agent informed the Indians that he was now ready to pay them their yearly annuity in the manner agreed upon; but he proceeded to pay them, however, the governor advised them. It had been intimated to him that as soon as the individual payments were made the Indians would probably scatter, and thus frustrate the principal object of the commissioners in their attempt to hold a treaty. He informed the Indians that he wished the chiefs to pledge themselves for their several bands, that they would remain on the ground after the money was paid. When the money was paid, the commissioners had much of the money was paid, the chiefs required till the next morning to make up their minds as to giving this pledge. Forty-one thousand dollars were then distributed to the several chiefs. The chiefs handed the bundles of Missouri bank notes among their people, each headman taking them in his hands. When the money was passed about, a bundle containing twenty-six thousand dollars was handed to Kishkiskosh, who shrewdly asked if he might go away with it. On the breaking up of the council today we found Gov. Duty at the agency house, who had arrived a few hours previous, and of course the morning was now his.

On Friday morning, very early, the chiefs informed the commissioners that they could not accede to the pledge required of them, as some of their people might leave after the individual payment was made; moreover, they thought to have deceived the commissioners, that he did not give the pledge. This frankness and honesty on the part of the chiefs is highly commendable, and shows that they have some honor in their position, if they are Indians. This was good news for those who had been waiting for some time. Preparations were immediately made, and the commissioners were crowded at an early hour.

Mr. Crawford, superintendent of Indian affairs at Washington, in accordance with his instructions made a proposition to the Indians, which was briefly this: The Indians were to cede all their lands to the United States. The government on being assured of this, was to give the Indians a place of council north and give them a place of council south, and to be furnished with necessary implements; a schoolmaster was likewise to be provided and a school house erected.

The proposition was left with the Indians, and they were to meet again at 12 o'clock on Saturday. On Saturday they met, but the Indians gave notice that they were not prepared to give an answer. They met again on Sunday at 10 o'clock, and informed the commissioners that they could not accede to the proposition of government. Keokuk, since their reconciliation, has again become their chief orator. He objected to going north, and seemed quite eloquent, as he dwelt upon the claims his people had to the country, and upon the rights they had gained it fairly by conquest, and that they did not want to leave it. He spoke in the most ironical manner of the attempt to build houses and establish schools among them. They were free, and wished to remain free as ever. Of course, this broke up the treaty.

Thousands who are anxiously wishing for a new purchase of land, and who are now saying that the prospect of making a purchase between now and next summer is very fair. Few will be sorry to see the treaty was not made, on the terms proposed. To erect the forts and the large number of houses, and plough up the ground, and perform the other purchases proposed by government, would have occupied several years, as government had pledged itself that the Indians should not be removed until every thing was prepared for them, they of course would have left Iowa until government had complied with its engagements. We believe that representations will be made to government, and the people interested in the question, so as to induce the government to purchase in the proposition to purchase one-half of the Sac and Fox country, say as high up as the Racoon Fork, which place is upwards of one hundred miles west of our present boundary. We know from individual personal interviews with the Indians that they are willing to sell half. If such a purchase should be made, the Indians could move beyond the boundary at a moment's notice, and the government could come into immediate possession of a large and beautiful tract of country.

Thousands of those who have travelled several hundred miles above the Racoon Fork, that the country is not at all desirable after you get fifty or seventy miles above that point. The country abounds in elk and buffalo. Captain McCrate informed us that he saw about seven hundred elk in one drive, and Sunday he saw a herd of about a dozen or the trail of one drove of buffaloes. As we are leaving we shall speak on the subject more at large.

PRESIDENTIAL.

LETTER FROM GENERAL SCOTT.

WASHINGTON, OCTOBER 25, 1841.
GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to receive many letters from as many different parts of the country, on the part of the writer and his neighbors, nearly the same political interrogatories, to which answers are requested.

The scope of the inquiries is a flattering proof of the interest which some of my countrymen take in the opinions that I have formed on certain great principles of abiding importance to the success of our systems of government; and as I have nothing to conceal, if nothing of value to communicate, I shall, at a private, without policy or reserve, and in the form of a circular, comply with their several requests.

Party politics. Although from early manhood, I have, by the profession of arms, in defence of country, been thrown out of the arena of party politics, yet I have never ceased to be an attentive observer of public events, and thus, I believe, there has scarcely been a year of our present moment in congress, within my time, on which I did not form, and modestly, but firmly, express, a passing opinion.

A mere youth, I felt the liveliest joy when the alien and sedition laws expired in the triumph of Mr. Jefferson. From 1806 I was old enough, by speech and pen, to call for the energetic redress of our wrongs suffered from Great Britain under her orders in council, attack on the Chesapeake frigates, and long continued impressment of our seamen; and when the war of 1812 at length came, I was among the first and longest in the presence of the foe. The insults offered to our commerce, renewed the Napoleonic decrees, (Berlin and Milan), which followed the British orders in council, also largely shared in my indignant reprobation.

The administrations of Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe, like that of Mr. Jefferson, had in their respective periods, my countrymen, but largely reprobated; and I have since censured nothing in their policy, or in a part, and the dismantling of the remainder of our navy, the gun-boats system of defence that followed, and the indefinite embargo; which, crippling us for, by destroying our commerce and finances, and oppressing our agriculture, has long continued without redressing our outrage from Great Britain.

I give this little sketch of the growth of my party feelings or opinions, unimportant perhaps, except to myself and a few partial friends, to show that, if I have never been a federalist, in any party sense of the term, I have never been a Jacobin, an impracticable or abstractionist in any sense whatever; but always an old fashioned republican, devoted to the support of law and order; a democratic whig, just as all my family had been whigs in the great struggle for national freedom and independence.

The judiciary. From an early and long-continued study of the constitution, my mind has ever been imbued with a deep reverence for the bench; and as a federal—an independent department in our system of government, and which, holding neither the purse to corrupt, nor the sword of power to terrify, addresses itself to the mind force of persuasive reason to the intelligence, and to the sense of the whole community. By the federal constitution, every citizen is made, and is provided to shield its judiciary against fleeting prejudice, political rancor and party dependence, to which legislators and the executive are unavoidably directed, and constantly exposed. Hence, to the "one supreme court" is referred, by the appellate jurisdiction, "all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority."

Looking to this express provision I have always held that the double question, arising under either the constitution itself, or the laws of the land, under an act of congress, or a treaty, had been solemnly adjudicated by that court, the principle of the decision ought to be taken by all as definitively settled—unless, indeed, it be upon a rehearing before the same tribunal. This appears to me too clear for dispute, for the effect of a judicial decision, supreme, and hence there can be no appeal; but to congress is only given the power to constitute "inferior" tribunals. By appeals to the supreme court, a settlement was intended to be reached, and the law, through a long distraction of the public mind, or through the exercise of the executive power, thus rendered impossible. The practice, therefore, for the people, and especially their functionaries, to deny, to disturb or impugn principles thus constitutionally established, strikes me as of evil example, if not of a direct revolutionary tendency, except, indeed, in the exercise of a judicial decision enlarging power and against liberty; and any dangerous ex-ment of this sort can always be easily corrected (and corrected it is) by the law.

The law is the law, and the law is preserved by the instrument itself—by the organic law of the states and the people. A mere construction of law, other than the constitution, are yet more readily corrected by ancillary or declaratory acts of congress.

The executive veto. This, by the framers of the constitution, could only have been a right. To enable the president to defend his own rightful powers against usurpations on the part of congress; 2. To enable him to forbid other legislative infractions of the constitution; and 3. To guard the country against other acts of hasty or violent legislation.

It is hardly possible to conceive a case, under the first or second of those heads, against which the judiciary—the balance-power of the system—does not afford, of itself, all the security that the people can require.

But, without the protection of either the bench or the veto—would the executive department, so completely at the mercy of the legislature, be so super-judicial of late years? would it be so free from the strictly executive functions for which it was more particularly created? or rather—would not the department itself be the most powerful, for evil, in the government.

The president is, under the checks of the constitution and law, rightfully invested with the power of the sword and the purse. He again and again had that of the purse also. The houses of congress, it is true, lay taxes, fix imposts and regulate the sales of the public domain; but it is he (through his agents), who handles the proceeds. From 1833 to 1836 (to say nothing of the present) he alone nominated and appointed all the agents who kept, as well as those who collected, distributed and disbursed the public revenue. The apothegm—make us executors, we care not who our legates, has a frightful application to such agents and the immense treasure that annually passes through their hands.

The rapid increase and spread of population, the growth of national wealth, the amount of revenue collected and disbursed, the new relations (by the extension of commerce) with foreign countries; the additional appointments at home and abroad, the number and value of contracts—all constantly and necessarily on the increase—a general and increasing regard to economy in every department; the habit that we have seen prevail during several presidential terms, of filling public offices with but little or no regard to moral standing, have taken together, already opened to the head of the government elements of power and corruption, which it is difficult to regard as transient and trifling. The constitution to foresee or to conceive. Who, at that distant day, for example, ever dreamed of the spectacles which have recently disgusted every honest citizen—of postmasters, mail contractors, mail agents and census takers, covering the land with government pamphlets, handbills and gazettes, sufficient (if read) to sap the morals, public and private, of an entire generation? of the custom house mercenaries in the large cities, living on the public, neglecting every duty for party meetings and the polls, and rendering to power the most hire-worth services—of district attorneys and collectors—granting commissions, defending enemies of the state, and, in every way, endeavoring, in order to maintain power in the hands of their patron? All who have reflected on the foregoing facts must be ready to affirm—that executive patronage "has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished."

I hope, then, by an early amendment of the constitution, to see the law of the land made more perfect.

The regulation of patronage would properly follow.

There can be no good reason why the veto should not be overcome by a bare majority in each house of congress, of all the members elected to it—say, for the benefit of reflection, at the end of ten days from the date of its passage. An amendment to this effect would still leave the president—the general representative of every state and district—armed with the votes of all the members, absent at the moment, from the respective houses; and there will always be some members absent from both.

The law of office. The inquiry under this head is not definite in any letter before me. It, however, is presumed to refer: 1. To governors and secretaries of territories, and some of the judges thereof; district attorneys, collectors, surveyors and naval officers of the customs; marshals, postmasters whose commissions amount to a thousand dollars per annum; navy agents, district judges, judges of the circuit, judges, surveyors general of lands, and Indian agents—all of whom are, by law, appointed for a term of four years, but subject, by express enactment, (except the judge) to be removed at pleasure—2. To a high class of civil officers, (next to the chiefs) in the executive department, at which I allude to the judges of the foreign ministers, secretaries of legation and consuls; postmasters whose commissions amount to less than a thousand dollars per annum; superintendents of Indian affairs, and some of the judges of the circuit, who are appointed for a term of four years, but subject, in practice—not vis-à-vis law—to be also removed at pleasure; and 3. To the assistants allowed by law to the judges, who are generally called clerks—some of them deputies, appraisers, weighers, gaugers, sub-inspectors, store-keepers, light-house keepers, &c. &c.—all appointed and subject to removal, as under the second head.

I am asked—Whether (in my poor opinion) all the officers (amounting to many thousands) or any of them, ought to be periodically superseded by original appointments? If yes—When? And if a part only—Which?

We have seen that a great number of officers are filled for a term of years, and more without any limitation as to time. I, however, can draw no line of just distinction between the claims of the two classes upon the favor of country or government.

Premising that regular periodical changes in the subordinate servants of the country, merely for the sake of change, would necessarily swell executive patronage, already a much too great evil, I will, nevertheless, say a few words on the subject, on other grounds, the policy and justice of such changes—1. Because, for the able and prompt execution of public business, much official experience, in a great number of particular stations, is known to be necessary; 2. Because many office-holders, appointed under even reckless patronage, (such as will be seen), may, by appointment, after a time, find of tried integrity and of equal industry and abilities; 3. Because, again, some may be found in a state of honorable poverty, the result no less of stern integrity than of a long and exclusive devotion to the interests of the public; and 4. Because, to remove such servants, or to re-appoint them, from the term of a term, would not only discourage successors in a faithful discharge of duty, but could not fail to outrage the moral sense of entire communities. I speak on this head from what I witnessed in 1829-30, of the cruel experiments on a large scale then made upon the sensibilities of the country, and the mischiefs to the public interests which early en-

What I would, therefore, humbly advise is this: to turn out, not only on a change of president, but in any and every week of the year, all office-holders known to be deficient in either honesty, capacity or industry, and to appoint in their stead men known to be honest, capable and industrious. Without an appeal to this rule, a government of the people, resting on virtue and intelligence, cannot long be successfully maintained; for a blind or vicious distribution of enormous patronage would soon, by the force of the highest example, beat down all that is taught in the schools and colleges.

Our presidential term. Of the eight chief magistrates that presided General Harrison—who a nation yet mourns—the first, third, fourth, fifth and sixth presided over this union, respectively, two successive terms; the other three, but four years each; and every one of the eight, whilst in office, became a candidate for a second term.

Our country has, since the example set by the father of his country, in declining a third election—which has been duly followed by four popular presidents, and would, no doubt, have been observed with equal good faith by the other three, under like circumstances—as establishing a barrier against a third term, as impossible as it is to be applied to the constitution itself.

But I do not consider it respectful to the people, nor otherwise proper in a candidate to solicit favor on a pledge, that if elected, he will not accept a second nomination. It looks too much like a bargain tendered to other aspirants—yield to me now; I shall soon be out of your grasp. Too much like the interest of the electors governing the candidate in the choice of a paper—many voting for themselves first, and if without success, finally for the most superannuated, in order that the election may the sooner come round again. I am, however, in favor of an amendment of the constitution, in one of the forms prescribed—declaring that the electors shall be entitled to re-elect to the presidency; and also, as an extension of the term, to that of a senator—a period of six years.

Agency of the president in legislation. 1. I am persuaded that this should be strictly limited; 2. To the veto, qualified as suggested above; 3. To the command on the constitution, "he shall, from time to time, give to the Congress laws which shall be necessary and proper, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient;" and 4. To furnishing through the appropriate executive departments, such details for bills as any committee of either house of congress may specially call for.

Leading measures of the late session of congress. If I had had the honor of a vote on the occasion, it would have been given in favor of the land distribution bill, the homestead bill, and the second bill for creating a fiscal corporation—among long been under a conviction, that, in peace, as in war, something efficient, in the nature of a bank of the United States, is not only "necessary and proper," but indispensable to the successful operations of the treasury, as well as to many of the wants of our commerce and currency.

Secret, or oath-bound society. I have not been a member of a masonic lodge in thirty odd years, nor a visitor of any lodge since the above. I have, however, been six years a member of the Academy, but, in many academies and colleges, as is well known, associations of students, tutors and professors, for purely literary purposes, and their meetings, generally, for aught that I know, may be secret. Twenty-eight years ago, I was once present with such an association, and never since, and I have, within five years, received many flattering notices of my having been enrolled as an honorary member of as many such associations. I am sorry to be reminded that, by some strange neglect, I have failed to accept one of those honorable distinctions.

Finally, I am asked, if nominated as a candidate for the presidency, would you accept the nomination? I beg leave respectfully to reply, yes; provided that I be not required to renounce any principle professed above. My principles are convictions.

Hopeing that you, who have done me the honor to invite this general reply, with the millions, be enabled in a year or two to fix on some other citizen as your candidate more worthy, and, therefore, more likely to conciliate the majority of popular suffrages, I remain, gentlemen, your friend and fellow citizen.

WINFIELD SCOTT.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

SPEECH OF MR. RAYNER, OF N. C.

ON THE QUESTION OF THE RECEPTION OF ABOLITION PETITIONS.

House of representatives, June 15, 1841.

MR. RAYNER said he was aware he should be met with the same charge from a certain quarter, which was made in the case of Mr. WISE, that he was "too wise," that his object was to produce agitation. But he took the distinct ground, in the outset of his remarks, that he, and those who were battling here for the rights of the south, were fighting strictly on the defensive. We are guilty of no aggression, (said Mr. R.) We abuse neither house nor individual members of the constitution. All we ask of you is, that the house may be organized according to the parliamentary practice—according to the usage which has existed here since the origin of the government.—We call upon you to adopt the rules of the last congress till new ones can be reported—that we may immediately proceed to the business for which we are assembled. We know we did not meet here for the purpose of blowing the embers of sectional strife. The patriotism and the intelligence of the nation demand something more at our hands. The eyes of a suffering country are upon us. I then call upon the members of the house, in the name of our common country, to organize the house for the purpose of adopting the old rules till a committee can have time to revise and report new ones. But no, the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS), and those who sustain him, must first obtain a triumph over the unoffending south. The feelings of every southern man have been outraged before the committee was assembled. We have seen the great task for which we were convened. This is a question on which we will yield nothing. We will contest every inch of ground; and, if we fall, we will fight lightning with our faces to the foe. If we come off it, we are not responsible. We have the advantage of struggling with a man who is fighting the battle of the whole nation, and on your heads let the consequences fall.

I shall vote against every proposition, (said Mr. R.) which recognises the reception of abolition petitions, which is to place them in the possession of this house, or which tends to confer upon them any consideration whatever. I shall vote against that reception because they ask us to violate the constitution—because they are calculated to obstruct the regular course of business here, and to foster discord and dissension throughout the country. As the constitution has given congress no power to "take private property from one section of the country, and give it to another section." Such legislation as they call "just compensation," I will not even consider a proposition which asks us to take away the private property of the citizens of the District, not "for public use," unless "public use" consists in gratifying the whims of agitators in one section of the union at the expense of the rights, and the peace of the whole nation. Such legislation as they call "just compensation," I will not even consider a proposition which asks us to take away the private property of the citizens of the District, not "for public use, but for the and objects for the exercise of the power which they seem with blasphemy against the God who overlooks and protects us—suppose they breathe that sin and pollution, amid scenes of which I learn these abolition petitions have their origin—according to the doctrine insisted on, we can exercise the power which we are bound to exercise, and to bestow upon them the most gracious consideration. Suppose we are petitioned to dissolve the union, why we must immediately set about and calculate its value. According to this construction of the constitution, it contains within itself the elements of its own destruction. It has, by very means by which it may be cautiously approved, successfully assailed, and inevitably destroyed. These agitators pretend that it is a sacred grant for the rights secured by the constitution that actuates them; yet, in the excess of their devotion, in the fervor of their affection for the constitution, they stab it to the heart, as Jacob did Amer, when, pretending to embrace it. Why, sir, it is ridiculous, it is absurd, to talk about the constitution imposing on congress the duty to do that which must inevitably work a destruction of the constitution itself.

I presume the house has the power, if it thought proper in its discretion to do so, to receive petitioners in person at the bar of the house, and hear their grievances verbally explained. Well, are petitions drawn out on paper, and subscribed by the petitioners, entitled to more respect, or more binding in their obligation on us to receive them, than if the petitioners were to present themselves here in person, and to state in a loud and angry tone, the house in the latter case would have power, and be fully justified, in driving the petitioners from our doors, if they addressed us in abusive or disrespectful language? And the house would, and must of necessity, be the judge, in its discretion, whether the petitioners presented in person, or in a loud and angry tone, or in writing, must result from the inherent and necessary right of every legislative body to protect itself, and preserve its own dignity, in the exercise of its legal functions. Then, if the house would have the right to drive from its door for improper conduct, or disrespectful language, or an angry tone, the petitioners, and the members of the house, and the union, the petitioners themselves, it must have the right to refuse to receive their petitions for like cause, unless pen, ink, and paper can impart a sanctity to petition, which it does not possess when orally made. This house must have the power to protect itself from insult, and from abuse, if it must exercise its own discretion; and in the exercise of this discretion, a sound and enlightened public opinion will always secure for petitions that are respectful, and within the limits of our constitutional power, a calm and dispassionate consideration. And this point being yielded—that congress may have the power to protect itself from insult and abuse, of which it can be the only judge, and in its discretion—and every thing is yielded; and all the sophistical arguments that are built upon the assumption that congress is bound to regard the right of petition without any qualification, must tumble to the ground. For all the pious advocates of the doctrine, that we are bound to receive and refer those petitions, are compelled to take the ground that the right of petition is sacred, inviolable, and obligatory in its nature, and that it leaves congress no discretion on the subject; and that we are bound, without regard to the character of the language, to receive and refer those petitioners, to receive all petitions, respectfully refer and report upon them, even to the neglect of other pressing and important business of the nation.

But, gentlemen tell us, it is the sacred right of petition those people are contending for. Very good, sir, no one denies them the right of petition. Insulting and vexatious words will do to us, to say that we deny them the right to assemble together, to interchange their views; to listen to the hypocritical rant and rhymed appeals of their priestly impostors; to shed its many crocodile tears as they please over the imaginary wrongs of the poor slaves of the south, or to be far happier than to be in company with the wretched who need their charity at home. We are willing that they should abuse us of the south as tyrants, and deserving of massacre, as much as we choose; we are willing to all this; but we are not willing that their vile petitions, which ask us to violate the constitution, be put in, to deprive the peace and happiness of the people of this country, should receive any countenance from this body, the members of which are sworn to support the constitution, and who ought to be the guardians of the rights and liberties of the people of the states. We insist upon the petitioners themselves would deserve to be treated as they would treat us, if they were to present themselves in person, disturbing our harmony and interrupting our proceedings—that our doors should be shut against them, and they driven with indignation from our presence.—

When petitioners are presented here that are respectful in their language, praying for a redress of the grievances of those who petition, and which relate to a subject within our constitutional jurisdiction, the spirit of our free institutions requires that we should, the imaginary grievances of others, which we should, us to throw the country into disorder and confusion, and to violate the constitution, which is the very soul of the union; so far from being received, they should be rejected with scorn and contempt.

But, sir, what is the right of petition, in the constitutional meaning of the term? Is it the right of the people to assemble together, without molestation, and to express their wishes to the legislature; or is it the right to have their petitions unqualifiedly and unconditionally received, referred, and acted on? It certainly cannot mean the latter for the same process of reasoning which would establish the right of the people to receive all petitions that are presented, of whatsoever character, would also prove it to be their bounden duty to grant the prayers of the petitioners, when received. Because the duty of congress to receive them is an inference only, to be drawn from a latitude of construction; and the same latitude, if constructed by going a step further, could as easily prove that the power petitioned is bound to grant the applicant's prayer. If the right of petition means anything more than the right to assemble—to subscribe, if you please, and offer the petition—how much more does it mean, and what, and where, is the rule by which you apply its meaning? Do you derive your rule of construction from the constitution, or from the law? If so, where is it? If the right of petition does not necessarily include the right to have the petition granted, what is the difference between rejecting it at the threshold, on account of its unconstitutional and illegal character, and its doing so afterwards, on account of its inexpediency? If it does include the right to have the petition granted, why then there is an end to the government, for there is no act of legislation to which some factious spirit would not object, and thus the action of this house might ever be kept suspended between petition on the one hand, and refusal to grant the petition on the other. I again ask, what is the right of petition as provided for in the constitution? If my recollection of history is correct, it grew out of, and is intended to guard against, the dangers and difficulties which beset the friends of liberty, during their struggles against the despotism of the latter Stuarts. It is well known that the peaceable assemblages of the opponents of power in those times, were frequently annoyed and dispersed by military force, under the pretence that they were collected for treasonable and seditious purposes. And this right of assembling, to consult together for the purpose of laying their complaints before parliament, or the great council, was afterwards conferred by and recognised in the bill of rights, signed by the 3d William, when he was called to the English throne in 1688. This right of petition, so much talked of, is secured to the English citizen as well as to ours; yet who will contend that parliament is bound to receive and refer every petition, or a petition praying for the expulsion of the house of Brunswick, and the restoration of the Stuarts? Does any one here believe that such a petition would receive countenance from the commons of England? So far from it, it would place in peril the petitioner's head.

This right of petition, secured to the people of England, was the bill of rights, which was passed before the revolution, by these colonies, a component part of the British realm. And the grounds upon which its violation was complained of, during the early struggle of the colonies against the tyranny of the mother country, was, not that their petitioners were refused, but, that armed bodies of trained troops were quartered among them, for the purpose of overawing their deliberations, and of interrupting their peaceful assemblages, when quietly convened for the purpose of consulting for their common good. This is one of the grievances set forth in the declaration of independence, a protection which is secured to the people of this country, by a fundamental law. Judging, then, from the history of this question, and the probable motives which caused its insertion in the constitution, it has reference to the rights and personal security of the petitioners—their right to assemble together, to consult for their common good, and to present their petitions to the legislature, and not to any obligation on the part of the petitioned to grant or to receive the prayers of the applicants. As to the course of action on the part of the legislature, it must be regulated by sound discretion, by a prudent policy, by an enlightened public opinion, and by the provisions of the constitution, in regard to the subject-matter of the petitions. For if there is an unlimited and unqualified obligation, on the part of congress, to receive and consider all petitions, then we would be bound to receive and respectfully entertain petitions praying us to abolish the constitution, and to return once more under the colonial dominion of England. Gentlemen may say, this is an extreme case. I know it is—but still this is a hawker, over which the District must exercise its well calculated power, to expose the absurdity of the principle contended for.

I believe the power of congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia is usually claimed under that clause which says that congress shall have power "to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular states, and the acceptance of congress become the seat of the government of the United States," &c. I believe the abolitionists admit—I know I have heard the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. SLADE) admit that the constitution gives congress the power of "exclusive legislation," then slavery in the District is not a grievance for a redress of which the people of the north have a right to petition. Now, what is the meaning of exclusive legislation? Does it mean absolute and unlimited legislation? Certainly not. The word exclusive is an adjective, and signifies that it is a power of congress, over the subject to which it is applied, it has a negative relation to other or different influence than that of the preceding power to which it refers. Exclusive, in its derivative sense, means the shutting out or casting off of any other. It is intended to denote the quality, and not the quantity or amount of legislation to which it may relate. And the quality which it denotes is, that it shuts out all legislation by any other power. Webster, in his dictionary, defines exclusive as meaning "having the power of preventing entrance—debarbing from participation—possessed and enjoyed to the exclusion of others." The legislature of the United States, and the exclusive legislation of the territory included within the limits of that state, except so far as it has granted it to this government, and yet that legislature has not the power to abolish slavery in that state, because slavery is an institution recognised by her constitution in the appointment of her representatives, and in the guarantee of the right of property which it guarantees to the citizen. The master in the south has the exclusive right of property in his slave; still he has not unlimited power over him as had the ancient Romans over their slaves. He cannot put him to death, and, in my state, he is not allowed to mutilate or maim him, to feed him and treat him humanely. The constitution has left to state legislatures the exclusive right of choosing their senators in congress; still they have not an unlimited and absolute control of the matter—they must select them from within the state for which they are chosen, and cannot select persons under forty years of age, or who have not resided in the state and Baltimore rail road have the exclusive right of transportation on that road; yet they have not the absolute and unlimited power to transport the person or property of any man against his will; neither have they the right to wantonly run their engines over any track, or to exclude any who may happen to struggle across their track, or to exclude any person, as mentioned in the constitution, while it excludes legislation by any other power, still does not grant to congress an absolute and unlimited control over those subjects on which it is authorised to legislate. If exclusive legislation means unlimited legislation, then congress has the power to establish a confining religion in this District, or to establish therein a religion by law.

I have frequently heard it said that this matter would not have been left so vague and indefinite, if Virginia and Maryland had not intended to restrict the general government in its legislative action; but that they would have inserted a provision that would have secured to the states the exclusive right of legislation. I attempted to show that this case was fully provided for in the deeds of cession, and that the restriction is entire and complete. But, if there had been no express restriction, it would not have altered the case. No one believes that either of those states would have intended to put the territory in question which they have supposed to be the property of the government ever so far violate every principle of faith and justice as to convert this District into an asylum and a refuge for their runaway slaves. The cession, however, was made in the purer days of the republic, when its decisions were controlled by the same men who advocated its liberality and its principles of freedom and patriotism, beat high and bounding in their bosoms. Those states could not then have supposed that, in fifty years, faction and fanaticism were to shake this union to its centre; and that a boon which they bestowed from the purest motives of patriotism, was to be used as a means of their destruction. And the warlike of those generous impulses they are to be used to the destruction of the nation, they should have been as exacting as Blyhook, or as accurate as a miser when counting his gold. If no provision of restriction had been inserted, the general government could have exercised the power, without being guilty of an act of perfidy, disgraceful to the government, and disreputable to the American character. It is cruel at all times to deceive the credulous and unwary, even when no fatal injury is to be the result; but to take advantage of confidence reposed, to plot disaster and ruin against the innocent and confiding party, is crime unpardonable, and unpardonable by a nation is a reproach to any people. Yes, sir, in the absence of any provision, if this government were to violate the faith reposed in it by Virginia and Maryland, then American faith might well become a by-word and a reproach in modern times, as Punic faith was among the ancients to denote the perfidy and insincerity of the Carthaginian character.

I presume no one will deny that the abolition of slavery in this District, by this government, would be an act of perfidy towards Maryland and Virginia, who ceded the territory. And will gentlemen yet insist that we should receive and consider petitions which call upon us to commit a gross and wilful act of perfidy? Now I presume it is unnecessary for me to undertake to prove that a proposition to commit an act of perfidy ought not to be entertained in this house. If an honest and conscientious man in private life would reject such a proposition with scorn and indignation, ought not the assembled representatives of a Christian people to do so? Perfidy, which is a violation of confidence, of trust reposed, is a crime which, in all ages of the world, has been stamped with the deepest reprobation, and which untutored savages even look upon with horror. The wild Arab of the desert, who roams in quest of plunder, and whose mind has never been illumined by the rays of civil light, not only observes, but he promises with scrupulous idleness, but looks upon the way-worn traveller who enters his tent as inviolable in his purse and person, and would risk his life in defence of the guest who relies upon an implied assurance of his protection. And shall it be said that a Christian people, who boast of their civilization, and who are bound by all the obligations of morality and justice, are guilty of an act of perfidy which would bring the blush of shame to an Arab's cheek? Will this government legalize treachery? Will it knowingly and wilfully violate the confidence which has been reposed in it? Gentlemen who favour the views of the faction talk of great debt about moral right and justice. Here is a case which affords them an opportunity of showing their sense of moral right: for there is a great moral principle involved in this issue; it is, whether plighted faith is hereafter to be regarded among men, or whether it is to be treated as a jest. If it is to be regarded as hereafter to be observed, or doubt and suspicion to prevail in its stead. Why, sir, what sort of a spectacle would the human family present if all confidence were destroyed between man and man? Banish confidence from the world, and you produce a social chaos. Governments exist by confidence; society is maintained by confidence; and the very basis of all enduring relations of life would lose their charm without it. Destroy confidence, and then indeed is friendship —“but a name,

A claim that lulls to sleep.” and a still more tender relation yields its power to “The green-eyed monster, which doth mock
The meat it feeds on.”

Establish the principle that plighted faith is not to be regarded, and you convert man into a being without any other tie than appetite. Destroy confidence between nations, and intercourse must be suspended; and where commerce now spreads her canvass to the breeze solitude will brood over the bosom of the deep. Destroy confidence, and you dissolve the cement that binds the union together; slavery in new states is to be admitted into the union, would be equally unconstitutional, and violative of good faith, as the interference with slavery in this District; but, having occupied the time of the house so long, I cannot now go into either of those questions.

Mr. Speaker, I had intended to attempt to show that the interference of congress with the sale of slaves between the states, the abolition of slavery in the territories, or the prohibition of slavery in new states is to be admitted into the union, would be equally unconstitutional, and violative of good faith, as the interference with slavery in this District; but, having occupied the time of the house so long, I cannot now go into either of those questions.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) remarked, in quoting the language of another, that there was not one of the attributes of the Almighty on the side of those who tolerate slavery, or who would attempt to end the servile insurrection by force. Here the gentleman has chosen to forget the constitution and the law, and to place this question upon the great principles of moral right and of the divine law. I will not stop to look at the direful consequences growing out of the loose application of such doctrines to the affairs of human legislation. It sweeps away, in a moment, all the laws, all the order, and subjects all social compacts, all conventional agreements, all legislative enactments, to the capricious and factious construction which a blind and infuriated multitude might place upon the principles and requirements of the moral law. It is disorganizing, it is revolutionary, and lets loose upon the world all the tumultuous impulses of human passion. So far as relates to human government and to temporal institutions, these must be a matter of conventional arrangement, of plighted faith. As to the abstract and inherent behests of the divine law, they rest only upon the bosom of the great Being who created the world; and He, in his appointed time, will mete out justice in due proportion to the offender and the offended. And will the gentleman from Massachusetts and his abolition friends presume to assert one of the attributes of deity itself? Will they undertake to avenge what they call their fancied wrongs, or to accumulate wrongs of an injured race? How dare they be guilty of such impious presumption? “Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord,” says that Book which we are all taught to reverence. In their wild rant about justice, they should recollect that injunction of the Lord which says, “Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor’s man servant, nor his mail servant, nor any thing that is his.” We also demand nothing but justice. We claim to be let alone, to be left free to the enjoyment of those rights that are guaranteed to us by the constitution of our country; and as to any right of justice or of the moral law, we are responsible to that Being before whom we must all appear in judgment.

The gentleman from Massachusetts told us that this movement on the part of the abolitionists was in accordance with that progress of public opinion which is pervading the world. He referred to the emancipation of the slaves in the West Indies, and to the progress of the moral and moral improvement even in China itself. I was really surprised to hear of his reach and power of understanding advance an argument on this subject which a pigmy in intellect can overturn in a moment. What does he put the power of this house on a level with the power of the British parliament? Has he quite forgotten the constitution? Does he not know that our power are limited, while those of parliament are said to be omnipotent? If the governments of England and France have seen fit to abolish slavery in their dominions, they had an unlimited right to do so; but I have never yet heard of that nation which has ever advanced the right of the United States to the institution of slavery within the jurisdiction of another country. The gentleman from Massachusetts spoke with much apparent pride, of the emancipation by England of the slaves in her West India possessions. If he is willing to know the workings of this system, I refer him to an article in the Edinburgh Review for January,

“This misapprehension, (between the managers and laborers), though the term is too mild adequately to represent the existing relation of the parties, has arisen from the unwise endeavor of the planters to compel labor by the exercise of the species of force, and to force every purpose but annoyance and exasperation. It has been attempted to make the dwellings and the provision grounds of the negroes the instruments of compelling them to work for the land owner on whose plantation they reside, and to force their weary and wretched slaves, as has been, ‘if you will not work for me, you must quit immediately your house and land,’ (so the latter of which the laborer has given up his principal means of subsistence), so much as to force him to demand so much for rent, or rather so much for each member of your family, without reference to the actual value of the tenement and its appurtenances; and the one, the other, and the third, are all equally unjust and oppressive. The strong arm of the law has been liberally invoked to carry on the contest commenced on such grounds; legislation has not been spared to render it stronger. The law has been made so strong, that the most experienced instructors of the laws, enactments of the most heterogeneous description have been brought to bear upon the unfortunate laborers. There are the contract acts, the hire acts, the labor acts, the apprenticeship acts, the petty debt act, the police act, and the vagrant act, all of which (except the first, which he does not mention) Mr. Gurney designates as ‘local laws’ opposed to the general principle of the law. The petty debt act, he says, ‘binds the free laborer to the land, and thus creates a new system of oppression, of penal and fictitious rents which is now the very bane of Jamaica.’ A police, arm-

1841, entitled “Wrongs and Claims of Indian Commerce,” from which it will be seen that the present degraded and unhappy condition of the emancipated slaves there needs his sympathy much more than do the slaves of our southern states. If slavery be evil, it will be the same to all the races of men; and we need not the mawkish sensibility of those who are unacquainted with our situation to teach us our duty or our interest.

This attempt to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia is false and deceptive in its character; for it cannot be concealed that the object is to gain a foothold, wherefrom to assail slavery more effectually in the states. This was for a long time denied; in fact, at the commencement of the agitation, we were told that they did not contemplate any legislative action whatever, but that their only object was to exercise a moral influence upon public opinion. But they have changed their position. My friend from Georgia, (Mr. Kixie), who, the other day, threw himself so gallantly in the breach, has proved from the record, from their own published documents, that the object of these agitators is general abolition. And if it is to be commenced by legislation, will it not be continued and consummated by legislation? The first only appeal to southern men, but to northern men, and I think I need not entertain a proposition which carries deception and falsehood upon its very face, and which is only intended as an entering wedge to the attainment of an end which no man here will now have the hardihood to advocate? Disguise it as they may, it is a covert and base design to abolish the institution of slavery throughout the entire south. We all know the insidious progress of power, whether veiled under the forms of legislation or exercised by the absolute will of one man. Its approach is slow and cautious, but it gains strength as each successive step is taken. I need not allude to the “mighty Colossus”; and, when it is too late, we must either appeal to the ultima ratio of revolution, or “find ourselves dishonorable graves.” Now, now is the time to arrest this evil; we must resist it in the outset; we must outcut this incipient cancer by the root. We must not wait until it has reached the Hydra, but, like Hercules, we must apply the strangling iron, to prevent its return with still more horrid features.

Sir, I will not attempt to discuss the isolated question of slavery as it exists in the states, or attempt to prove on this floor our right to our own property. We have said, on this subject, is, if you want our slaves, “seize and take them.” I dare you to enter upon this mad crusade, I would advise you to outwell the cost of your undertaking. Before you accomplish your purpose you must march over hecatombs of bodies; you must convert every one of your swelling fleets into a camp, you must beat every one of your ploughshares into swords, you must long before you reach the banks of the Ronco, every vessel will run red with our blood, every bill will whiten with your bones. Attempt this wild project when you will, and, if there be any truth in heathen story, the banks of the Styx will be lined with your shivering ghosts a hundred years to come. And the battle will not be fought by the descendants of the Cavaliers alone, as intimated by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Marshall.) When your myriads, after conquering them, shall reach the borders of the old north state, they will find the bravest souls congregated of our northern brethren, who will form a rampart with our bodies, over which you will never pass till you have planted your feet upon our graves. I say not this in idle bravado. We shall never leave our homes to make war upon you; but I warn you to leave us unmolested. Do let us alone.—You may kill as many of us as you know nothing of, but the names of our people, determined to maintain their rights by their own firesides, at the sacrifice of every comfort, at the risk of every danger.

And with deadly weapons, is always, to say the least of it, a dangerous expedient; and in country districts where there is confessedly scarcely any crime, it can be regarded only as a needless source of irritation and alarm. Too many may also become an instrument of oppression and cruelty. Finally, in a country where there is scarcely to be found an instance of real vagabondism, but where laborers are often compelled to leave their homes in search of new labor, and where the law is so strong, that the denial of a law which subjects every poor fellow who may be found sleeping under a hedge, or in an out house by the roadside, to a long term of imprisonment, with hard labor, or to a fine, or to a term of imprisonment, or measures have been taken to enforce labor, or to revenge its being withheld: “Cocoa-nut and bread fruit trees have been felled; cottages have been unroofed, and sometimes the lives of the poor have been sacrificed; and the earth uprooted by the rude hand of violence, or trodden under foot by execrable.”

So far as regards the mere question of slavery in the abstract, I am not one of those who believe it to be a blessing. I believe it to be an evil. And when I say an evil I do not mean that its toleration is a crime—a political sin—but that it is a misfortune to a people among whom it exists. But if it were ten times greater an evil than it is, we will never suffer those who are uninterested in the matter to interfere with us. There is a natural repugnance in man against the idle and insolent interference of others; and we never will be driven to a misfortune in the matter of time, or of money, or of power, or of policy, or from interest. And I can assure northern gentlemen that the course of the abolitionists has riveted the chains of slavery with double and triple bolts of steel. It has thrown back the cause of non-slavery in the south at least a century. Since the people of the north have taken this matter in their keeping, we no longer contemplate the time, in advance, when slavery is to cease amongst us. We had rather bear this evil than that our enemies should claim as a triumph that which future policy might have dictated to us to do of our own accord.

We are told by gentlemen from the north—and I am sorry to see gentlemen from the south (Mr. BOWEN of Virginia) has taken the same ground, in a cable lately addressed to his constituents—that, if we wish peace and quiet on this subject, we must receive and entertain these petitions. Then we must purchase peace by what we conceive to be a surrender of our rights. Can we be expected to remain passive in the face of an attack upon the rights of our countrymen surprised at our excitement and impatience at being thus harassed? Do they insist that we must not only submit to an invasion of our rights, but that we must not be allowed to complain? As well might you blame the victim at the stake for his cries, or the man at the gallows for his groans. The discussion on our part is of a defensive character. We want no discussion; we call for no action; but we simply ask to be let alone. We are blamed for the tone of defiance and temper with which we speak on the subject. Gentlemen insist—and I am sorry to see some from the north take up the same ground—the matter—that we should refer and report upon these petitions, and reason with the agitators upon the impropriety of granting their requests. For one, I cannot consent to do it. I put in a plea to the jurisdiction of the court. You have no power over the subject. And as to reasons—that reason is false. I have already dissipated every question with those who are under the influence of prejudice and passion! You might as well attempt to reason with a madman upon the cause of his malady, or with a lover upon the folly of despondency. Such a tenacious grasp has fanaticism upon the mind, that all passions it is the most difficult to shake from its hold. It is the only influence under which the human heart may not distrust itself. The poet beautifully expresses this idea when he says:

"The lover may
Distrust the look which steals his soul away;
The babe may cease to think that it can play
With heaven's rattle, and the cleric of martyrdom
The shining gold that crumble gives out;
But faith, fanatic faith, ever weddeth fast
To some dear falsehood, hugs it to the last!"

And so with these abolitionists—they are wedded fast to falsehood, and will not be parted from it. We are frequently told that these abolitionists, though deluded, are a respectable class, and conscientious in their views. Gentlemen may think so, but I doubt it. If their efforts proceed from a feeling of benevolence, and their real object is reform—if they are following the dictates of duty, why do they say so themselves? Do they not condemn their doctrines in person, like true and faithful missionaries should do? If they were really sincere and conscientious in their course, they would not, like dastardly cowards, assail us from their retreats; but they would preach their doctrines to a deluded people (as they say) and would shake the world from its foundations itself. The assurance of truth and the consciousness of innocence always embolden the advocates of reform; and "the righteous are always as bold as a lion." Why do they not come amongst us in the south? Perhaps they may convert us over to their cause. Are they afraid that if they come their foot-prints will all tend in one direction, like those of the beasts, to the sick lion's den? The fear of that did not intimidate the apostles of our holy religion, it did not frighten the great reformer of our church, to whom this fanatic banditti are frequently compared, and who, when he heard the great martyr from Vermont (Mr. SLADE) compare them. The apostles, instead of a martyr, were a martyr.

even when he knew that martyrdom awaited him.—What was the reply of Luther when warned of the danger of going to the Diet at Worms? Said he, "if there were many dead there as there are living in the roofs and cellars of my house, I would go on." Tell me of the sincerity, the valor, or the patriotism of these incendiaries. If they possess those qualities in the degree that has been attributed to them, they would risk something for the promulgation of their doctrines. As they have abandoned their duties in their desire to come, I ask, and attack our crimes and our errors fairly and openly in the field of argument—instead of skulking, like Scoundrels, attacking us from the everglades and the thickets? Now, I do hope that gentlemen here, who approve of their course, will come to the south, to come amongst us and enlighten us on this question. I advise the gentleman from Massachusetts (MR. ADAMS), from Vermont, (MR. SLADE), from Ohio, (MR. GORING), from New York, (MR. GATES), and the old gentleman over the way (MR. MARCROSS) who talked the other day about the damning sin of slavery—I advise them, when they return home, to persuade some of the leaders of abolitionism in their districts to take pity on our ignorance in the south, to come and teach the people of my district what a great curse slavery is. They will gain much glory and credit by so doing, and will vindicate us of their sincerity. And although I cannot answer for the number of converts they may make, yet I will promise them one thing—they shall be treated with the highest consideration.

Sir, there is another consideration connected with this subject, which is not at all respectable to the country, but is a reproach to the age, and a vitiated state of moral feeling that threatens to revolutionize society itself. It is, that this crusade against the institutions of the south is, in a great degree, carried on and sustained by men professing to be the ministers of the gospel of Christ, and by men who are disinterestedly and sincerely in the world of that holy religion that was taught by the Saviour of the world and nothing but an assurance that these men are believing their religious professions, could induce me to speak of them with the freedom which I do. I make no pretensions to piety, yet, from my soul, I have always entertained a profound reverence for that holy religion, the truth of which was sealed with the blood of God himself. And, sir, I had always thought that the tendency of this religion was to expand and elevate the soul; to lift its aspirations far above the perishing objects of time and sense; to point the eye of faith to Heaven, and to subvert the consolation of a well spent and an offensive life in the hour of death. And it is this bright vision of my youth to be dispelled, "to fly like fancy's dream" before the sad realities of the times? No, it cannot be—it must not be. These men are believing their sacred professions; they profess to be the followers of Christ, and to be true to his teachings in this world; and yet they are mingling in the turmoil, and fanning the fires of political strife. They know not, and I suppose they care not, how much they are injuring the cause of religion by violating its injunctions, while pretending to be actuated by a zeal for its success.

These do not know me well know that I am incapable of any disrespect to the fairer portion of creation. No man bows with more sincere devotion to the power and majesty of woman. And it is my great regard, my inexpressible veneration for the female character, my elevated conception of its dignity and its worth, that cause me to look with such reverence upon the conduct of the female portion of abolition petitioners here. At least half of the signers to these petitions, breathing venom and denunciation against the entire south, are women. Sir, women have no business interfering where men are contending for power. They are unfit to teach us our political duties as they are to lead us in the way, or to conduct our councils in peace. The scenes here are too exciting, the conflicts too bitter, for their tender and delicate natures. Their business is to soothe the impetuous and hardened nature of man, instead of exciting it into still more violent commotion. I have said already one of the

"Who never a tear is shed, a wounded heart

There is woman's sphere, there is the proper theme for her action. But when they will usurp themselves, by thrusting themselves into scenes for which nature never intended them, they must expect their conduct to excite the indignation of criticism for a reprobation of their course is a duty which we owe to others of her sex, whose modesty and sense of propriety restrain them within their own sphere. It always denotes a distempered state of moral feeling, to see women busily interfering in the political affairs of a nation. English history reads us many a lesson in this respect. The plans and intrigues that led to the elevation of Cromwell, the most finished hypocrite of modern history, were originated and matured at the pretended meetings for prayer, in which the women of the time not only participated, but exercised an important influence. What sort of an administration could be expected from such a state of things? Ministers ever held seals to-day, and were expelled from office to-morrow, as one favorite or another happened to predominate in the sovereign's affections? The revolution in France was hurried in its progress by the fish-women of Paris; and many of the horrors of that bloody time were perpetrated by female hands. And all the hypocritical cant of the days of Cromwell, all the disgusting intrigue of the court of Charles II, all the horrid excesses of the French revolution, proceeded not from a more fanatical spirit than that which hurries on, in their course, the abolitionists of the present day; for they are not only regarded as the human solution which may result from their course, but the inevitable tendency of their measures is to overthrow the government itself, and thereby extinguish forever the hopes of freedom throughout the world.

Now, sir, I think the time has arrived when the north and the south should understand each other on this question. I wish the south to know who are their friends and who the enemies of their constitutional rights. The gentleman from Massachusetts (MR. ADAMS) has said this is the great question—that it is a question between the north and the south, between liberty and slavery. He has said that the adoption of the 21st rule in the last session was a then substitution measure, and spoke with apparent pride of the abrogation of this rule, being the first measure of the whig administration. And this speech of his will be printed and sent abroad to the world as having received the tacit sanction of the members from the north and the south, and gentlemen will be endeavoring to prove that it is the only one which they have not disclaimed it! Now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts is right, and the reception of abolition petitions is the great question which supercedes all others—if northern gentlemen are to annoy us eternally on this subject—if all political and party differences are to be merged in one great issue of sectional feeling—the sooner we know it the better. For no matter what political differences may have existed amongst us heretofore, yet, my word for it, on this question the south will stand firm as one man—not for the purpose of offence, not for the purpose of aggression, but for the purpose of defending our rights. We are not to be intimidated by the threats of a lawless and insolent interference with our rights. And according to the position of the gentleman from Massachusetts, we are bound to consider the rescinding of this rule at this time, if not as a direct attack upon us, as a tacit sanction of the mad measures of those who have for years been endeavoring to excite the passions of the south for our wrongs, and to sharpen the knife of the assassin for our throats.

We know no party differences at the south on this subject. And if any portion or party in the north attempt to deprive us of our rights, they whig or they democrat, we shall regard them as our enemies, and deal with them as such. And, on the other hand, any man who attempts to deprive the south of her rights, or to change their constitutional duty, come to our relief on this question, we are bound, not only on the principle of gratitude, but of self-preservation, to consider them as friends, and to unite with them as such. And, sir, I will take this occasion to tender my sincere thanks, in the name of my state and of my constituents, to the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. SLADE) who voted with us on this question—of my constituents who voted with us of their faiths.

The course of northern gentlemen who have acted with us on this matter presents an instance of high moral sublimity—of noble self-sacrificing devotion. They are ready to lay down their lives for us, and to leave home, and yet, in discharge of a constitutional obligation, they have come to the relief of the unoffending south.

Mr. Speaker, let it be recollecting, we of the south did not commence this controversy. We wish no excitement on this subject; all we ask is to be let alone. We are not to be harassed by the north, and we are not to be harassed by the south. We are not to be harassed by the north, but the gentleman from Massachusetts (MR. ADAMS) and those who sustain him objected to this; they refuse to move one step; they refuse to organize this house till they have triumphed over the feelings of southern men; and when we complain, they turn upon us with scorn and insult, and accuse us of agitation—agitation. We know our position here. Although we are but defending ourselves, yet we are taunted with creating excitement. I call upon this house and this country to witness that we of the south are not responsible for the consumption of time and excitement of feeling growing out of this discussion. We know that we came here for a different purpose.—We knew that we came here for the purpose of trying to heal the sufferings, and to relieve the currency and arteries of the country. I call upon the faintest of us with this delay are the ones who suffer, because they are diverted from the great purposes for which we assembled—who neglect the important interests of the country merely for the purpose of pandering to the prejudice and bigotry of those whose very element is mischief, and the success of whose schemes must inevitably result in disunion.

The 21st rule was not originally passed for the purpose of enabling the south to oppress the north, as contended by the gentleman from Massachusetts, in the fury of his temper and the wildness of his imagination, but it was passed for the purpose of defending the south against the north, who were then the theoretical philanthropy of a band of fanatics at the north, who are urged on and instigated by a few political discontents, who hate us and our institutions on account of some political policy. The gentleman from Massachusetts said the object of southern gentlemen, in voting for this rule, was to open themselves from the charge of abolitionism at home. Is this all the charity that gentleman has learnt in a life of nearly fifty years of public service? What right has he to impugn the motives of others? Who made him a judge of the hearts of men? By what authority does he condemn the motives of men who act under the sacred responsibility to their country and their race? He does! It is as illiberal and unkind in him to make the charge he does, as it would be in me to say that his motives, in pursuing the course that he does, is to create an insurrection among the slaves in the south.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says the reason why we are unwilling to give to our country the prayers of the abolitionists is, that conscience makes cowards of us all." Which is the most cowardly, to defend our rights on our own soil, or to take advantage of our position to assail with impunity the rights of others? According to the code which prevails in this land of "cowards," as the gentleman would call us, it is the greatest evidence of cowardice to stand by for any one to take advantage of age or station to cast his insults and denunciations upon his unoffending neighbors. "Cowards" as we may be, we have magnanimity enough to spare those who are shielded by their irresponsibility.

We of the south, I repeat, are not responsible for this discussion, and the excitement growing out of it; we were content with the rule of the last session; we were opposed to agitating the subject. But, sir, if the issue must be made, if the war must come, we are ready to meet you, if you will come out and take your position in a fair field. Do not send your missiles from your secret retreats, but come out boldly, and we are ready to meet you—first, in argument; and, after that is exhausted, we know by what we are to stand. Gentlemen may call this mere declamation—idle gasconade; I have no doubt they will; that is the usual answer that right and justice usually receive from the cold heartless wiles of arrogance and false reason. But, sir, we mean to stand by, and let us alone, to leave us unmolested in the enjoyment of our undoubted rights.

If you are resolved to force this issue upon us, I repeat again, for I for one am ready to meet it. There are others here who are ready to meet it—others whose voices have been so often raised in support of constitutional right—who have not yielded before attack at home, and who are not likely to yield to it from abroad. I was placed at the gallant banner in which the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. JOHNSON), the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. WISE), and the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. KING), met this question at the threshold. They have given warning that they are ready to meet the enemies of our institutions on the ramparts. There are others here who are ready to stand by them. We have taken our position. We stand on the defensive. We plant ourselves on the platform of the constitution. We ask for nothing but the enjoyment of those constitutional rights and privileges guaranteed to us by the fathers of the republic. From this position we will not be driven. Gentlemen are mistaken if they suppose they are to crush us, and to trample our that there is a moral power in being in the right, which will defy all their assaults. Men, yes, they who know their rights, are not to be deterred from the exercise of those rights by a band of fanatics who are attempting to wield a rod of terror over this hall, and who, I am sorry to say, do exercise an influence incompatible with the dignity of this house, and the character of the members of it. It is not because we fear the assaults of this seditious clan; it is not that we doubt our ability to protect ourselves against their machinations—that we are opposed to the reception of their abusive memorials! No, sir, it is because we do not choose—no, sir, we do not choose to be annoyed by this insolent interference with our course;—and because we believe further that it is calculated to sow the seeds of discussion and disunion throughout the land.

The gentleman from Massachusetts remarked that these incendiaries were actuated by the same principle as that depicted in the immortal language of the state of Virginia—which is a beautiful woman trampling on the neck of a tyrant, with the motto, She never tyrannizes. Yes, sir, and as long as Virginia remains true to that motto, she will deluge her borders in blood, sooner than suffer her rights and privileges to be trampled upon by the tyrant who attacks them. It is an unjust and unlawful interference with the rights of others. Why was George III denominated a "tyrant" in the Declaration of Independence? It was because he dared to infringe upon the rights of the colonies—rights which were guaranteed to the subjects of the British empire by the oaths of ages, and the laws of the realm. And whenever you, the north, attempt to encroach upon the constitutional privileges of us of the south, we shall regard you as attempting to play the part of tyrants, and we will treat you as such. We oppose to your assaults the same motto as the Virginia arms—She never tyrannizes—and we will stand by it to the death. If our rights, you will find, not a beautiful woman, for we do not call upon women to fight our battles, as your incendiaries do, but—men, yes, men with stout hearts and strong arms, trampling upon our feet, and your crown and sceptre trailing in the dust.

The gentleman from Maryland says the danger to the north, although this government might not disturb, in the first instance, the institution of slavery in the states of this union, yet it might interpose as the treaty-making power, in case of a servile insurrection, even to the extent of universal emancipation. This is the boldest ground I have ever heard advanced against most ardent abolitionists. Is such language as this to be proclaimed on this floor, and to be passed over without notice—especially when we consider the high source whence it comes? And are we to be charged with creating "agitation," when we rise to protest against it? When such language is used, we will speak our minds, and we will shout, and bid me hold my peace." Interpose as the treaty-making power? Between whom? Between the slaves and their masters? Does the gentleman from Massachusetts pretend to say that, in case of a servile insurrection, the slaves would maintain the position of an independent belligerent power? How can this be, when slaves are recognized as property in the constitution—virtually property, as much as our lands, and the stock that grazes them. How can this government constitutionally interfere for the purpose of securing political privileges to our slaves, when they are not recognized as citizens in our constitution? Is it to be said that we are to do whatever we please? Does he not see to what an absurdity this argument would lead him? Suppose the agrarian mobs in your northern cities were to raise in commotion, and attempt to appropriate to themselves the property of the wealthy, and the proceeds of the honest man's industry. Suppose they were to bid defiance to the laws, and to threaten to overthrow the authority of the local government, against which they might be in arms. Will it be pretended that this government might interpose in such case as the treaty-making power to the extent of satisfying the morbid desire of the lawless and revolutionary mob to obtain the property which they had taken by violence? Such argument is based upon the supposition that the constitution provides for enforcing a violation of its express provisions.

Mr. Speaker, the scene exhibited in this house for the last few days must be humiliating to every high minded American citizen, not only because it would reflect dishonor to result from it, but on account of the spectacle afforded by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ARMS). Here is a man who has filled the highest office in this land of freedom passion unbearing the ardor of youth, and scattering his denunciations with an unswerving hand against the very men, many of whose lives, as political martyrs, for their devotion to his cause. Here is a man who instead of attempting to uphold the institutions over which he once presided; instead of trying to cement that union, without which liberty itself is an abstraction, and has inflicted the blood-red flag of insurrection, and has ordered the slave to obliterate the brand of his servitude with his master's blood. He has virtually said to our slaves—and his declaration has gone abroad on the wings of the wind—if you wish the interposition of this government, you must first make the standard of revolt. He has virtually said to them, "If you are the slave of man, be the master of the slave; spread desolation and dismay throughout your land; apply to us with your hands reeking with slaughter, we can then interpose, and, for the purpose of restoring peace, we will come in as the treaty-making power, and will stipulate for your 'universal emancipation.' The spirits of the departed were allowed to revisit this world, such language would have been sufficient to exorcise from their graves the ghosts of our revolutionary fathers, and cause them to stalk in gloomy consternation through this hall. But, sir, they are gone, gone to enjoy the rewards of the faithful; the fruits of the virtue and patriotism of their names seem to have departed. But that I know any advice I might give the gentleman from Massachusetts would be treated with sullen contempt, I would advise him to curb his untamed temper. I would suggest to him that all the learning of the schools, all the experience of years, all the honors of station, in the absence of temper and discretion, without a due exercise of charity for the opinions and feelings of others, are but "as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal." I would advise him to read again a poem which I presume he has forgotten the very foundation of his political faith. I mean Haley's "Triumphs of Temper," and especially these last four lines:

"Virtue 'as 'n apt of Peruvian gold,
Some the bright ore Potosi's mines unfold,
But virtue's image must that ore refine,
And stamp these precious ores with soaring wing."

Mr. Speaker I would make an appeal to our northern brethren here, but that I know the complaints of the injured are always treated with scorn by the oppressor. I would appeal to them, in the name of justice, not to attempt to rob us of our acknowledged rights. I would appeal to them, in the name of the Christian benevolence, to cease this warfare against their own brethren, the descendants of a common ancestry, the participants of one common inheritance of freedom. I would appeal to them, by the expended blood and treasure of our fathers, by the example which they set us, and the precepts which they taught us, not to destroy by faction, the work of their common hands. I would appeal to them, in the name of the constitution, not to overleap those barriers which the sages of past crested around the rights of the states. Above all, sir, I would appeal to them, in the name of this glorious union, without which I cannot conceive liberty except as an illality, which is the terror of tyrants, and which is identified with the hopes of freedom throughout the world—which imparts to the star-spangled banner its glory, and to the American citizen his port of noble bearing in every land—which is fast sending the blessings of free government to the millions of the Christian faith through the trackless forests that stretch towards the shores of the Pacific—by this union I would appeal to them, to arrest the progress of faction before it shall be too late to stop the march of fanaticism before it shall have undermined the very foundation of our political edifice. Sir, we are apt to undervalue those blessings to which we have been accustomed from childhood, and whose deprivations we have never felt. We never know the value of health till we are prostrated by sickness—we never appreciate the blessing of friendship till we are bereaved of its aid—or, as the poet beautifully expresses it—

"How blessings brighten as they take their flight."

And so it is with this happy union. We never shall know how to estimate its value until it shall be severed by discord and faction. We of the south love this union, because it secures to us our liberties; but we shall hate it in turn, when it is converted into an engine of tyranny. And when the cloud of civil war shall obscure the political horizon, and strife and discussion shall stalk through the land—when the pillars of this fair fabric of freedom shall begin to crumble, and the citadel of our national glory is toppling into ruin—when brothers' arms are raised against brothers' arms, and the

CHRONICLE.

ANTICA. The governor issued a proclamation on the 27th September, setting forth that in consequence of the alarming scarcity of provisions in the island, such stocks of provisions as are remaining in store shall not be exported from the island until further notice. We were almost in a similar state the other day, when five or six vessels arrived from America laden with provisions.

Philadelphia Globe, October 9.

BOSTON. Coasting trade. It is to be regretted that there are no official reports which show the amount of the coasting trade. That of the city of Boston has been for many years rapidly increasing, in a greater ratio than stocks of provisions. According to a statement in yesterday's Transcript, it appears that the import of cotton at this port, from the 1st Oct. 1810 to 1st Oct. 1841, amounted to 141,592 bales, of which 101,264 bales were shipped to cotton manufacturers or their agents. The import of last year was 117,294 bales, and of 1850, 104,263.

BANK ITEMS. The official return of the quarterly averages of liabilities and assets of the Bank of England from July 20 to October 12, was, circulation, 217,592,000; deposits, 47,529,000; securities, 423,428,000; balance, 4,173,000; being an increase compared with the corresponding quarter of £111,000 in the circulation, and a diminution of £523,000 in the deposits, of £139,000 in the securities, and £262,000 in the balance.

Mr. JAMES, in behalf of the Bank of the U. States, has been authorized to issue $1,000,000 of currency, contracted at Paris 26th December, 1839, that the United States Bank of Pennsylvania will not be able to reimburse the half of that loan payable according to contract on 15th October. He therefore asks Congress to authorize any law, making bonds of 45,000, or 1 percent on the amount payable. Security for this amount, in the shape of debentures withdrawn from circulation, were deposited with Messrs. Rothchild, and as the creditors have no option in the matter, the offer would doubtless be accepted.

The Richmond Express says: "We understand that, in the case of the Bank of the United States against St. Nicholas and its alleged associates, (Col. Andrew Berne), in the court of Rockingham county, before Judge Smith, judgment has gone in favor of the defendant. The suit in question was very large."

There was a report that the presidents of the different banks in New Orleans on the 1st instant, the subject of which is stated to be to consider the subject of a resumption, and to bring about, if possible, such an event.

A correspondence has passed between a convention organized by public meetings of the citizens and the officers of the banks of the city of Baltimore, with a view to the resumption of the bank, to receive the orders of Baltimore and Ohio rail road orders, of which about $1,500,000 are in circulation and which constitutes all the entire currency under five dollars, of the Maryland community. They have been gradually increasing in current value until Wednesday the brokers asked 11 per cent. to exchange banknote paper for them. The bank-brokers declined to receive them. During the evening the following extract of the condition of the Maryland banks was elicited:

The Jacksonville bank of Florida has resumed specie payments and is now issuing its notes in gold and silver. It has also, made arrangements for the redemption of its notes in New York, at one and a half per cent. discount.

COTTON MARKET. A number of items of interest will be found under our foreign articles.

Cotton in Georgia. Towards the close of last month the cotton market experienced a decline, but since the arrival of the overland mail, prices have improved and purchases have been made on an extensive scale. The Georgia cotton is highly valuable, favorable accounts of the weather having been received from all districts.

Texas cotton. The honorable A. Hutchinson, in a letter to his excellency, Mr. B. Lamar, president of Texas, describing the growth of cotton from the western part of Texas, which has been placed to form the silk cotton, owing to its superior fineness and whiteness. It is said to be of luxuriant growth, and is generally raised as early as the 1st of September. It is said, as well as our own observation, that the cotton crop of that section of Georgia will yield at least one third more than any crop within ten years past; in fact, that the present crop is by far the best ever known in that country.

The cotton crop. We press, in our paper, through the courtesy of Dr. Early, Lieut. Randolph, Stewart, Sumpter, Meach, Dufer, Palske, &c. and we take pleasure in stating that authority of our numerous individuals, as well as our own observation, that the cotton crop of that section of Georgia will yield at least one third more than any crop within ten years past; in fact, that the present crop is by far the best ever known in that country.

It would make fifteen times to the land this season. Any person who in the U. S. is disposed to doubt this statement can be furnished with names, testifying to its authenticity, by calling on us. Sanderson (S. C.) Telescope.

WISCONSIN COTTON. The common ancestor of all this country who bear that name, came from Brixton, county of Derbyshire, England, in the year 1642, settled at Salebury, and thence removed in 1662 to Nantucket, where he died October 2, 1631—one hundred and sixty years ago. In the year 1691 his descendants were estimated at 740; in 1722, at 1,580; and in 1827—105 years—about 10,000. He left a family of 100 persons, of whom, at least, were inhabitants of Nantucket, "the nucleus of the Coffin family."

DEATHS. Amongst the deaths of which we have received accounts during the week, was that of Capt. S. B. Griffing, master of the N. Y. packet ship Montreal, who was found dead on the deck of the boat, lying in St. Katherine's dock, supposed to be occasioned by an asthmatic disease to which he was subject.

At Washington, on the 6th inst. Thomas Dungan, esp. of the treasury department, aged about 65 years.

ENTRONS. Queen Victoria has no surplus with regard to the question of office to high station of honor. Immediately after the late political struggle, she conferred a baronetcy on John Easthope, esp. the able and distinguished conductor of the London Morning Chronicle, and a baronetcy on liberal politician in England.

ELECTIONS. The Massachusetts election took place on the 7th instant. We have sufficient of the returns to ascertain that Governor DAVIS, (Whig), is re-elected by a considerable majority—and that there will be a Whig majority in each branch of the legislature. The full returns are not made in Baltimore on 20th and on 21st.

The Michigan election took place on the 3d instant, and has resulted in a decided Van Buren victory. The Van Buren candidate for governor will have a large majority, and each branch of the legislature will have a majority of Van Buren members.

Kentucky. The special election for a representative from Henry county, results in the choice of Elijah H. Nutt, esp. Van Buren, by about 150 majority over his Whig opponent.

In Nelson, Mr. Wickliffe, who has been elected over Mr. Howell, also a Whig, by 2 or 300 votes, in place of J. P. Hardin, esp. resigned.

FLOUR. The information by the steamers from England has had the effect to improve the prices of flour very slightly. Tuesday before receiving the new sales were made in Baltimore at 55 1/2 and on 20th at $5 81 and 55 71. The inspections of last week amounted to 13 180 barrels and 695 half barrels.

Liverpool, Oct. 15. The duty upon foreign wheat has been raised to 20s. per quarter, or 3s. per quarter, on flour to 12s. 5d. per barrel, and upon all other foreign grain is increased one step over the rates payable in the week ending yesterday. The import on English colonial wheat is 300,000 bushels, and on flour 35,000 barrels.

Liverpool, Oct. 20. The stocks of foreign wheat and flour, which were liberated here on and since the 23d of September, have gone rapidly into consumption, and we have now no great choice of samples of either; still prices have not advanced more than 1s. per barrel, and only the former and about 3s. per barrel on the latter since the 1st instant.

The crops continue very firm as the secondary quality and inferior condition of a part of the crops, and the very damp state of a great part of the Irish, with the well ascertained deficiency in the yield, will go far towards speedily clearing off stocks of old, and render a large importation not only necessary, but also in the coming year, as supplies can be made available.

ROBERT MAKIN & SONS. A correspondent of the New York American writes from London, Oct. 10th.

The corn market has been tending upwards, owing partly to the advance in duty on foreign corn, and to the reports of injury to the remainder of the crops in Ireland.

Flour is now selling at 35s. 6d. 31s. per barrel. There were 80,883 barrels flour and 41,893 bushels wheat delivered from the Erie canal during the first week in November.

MR. SECRETARY FORSTAY. We have heard two characters of this department since the 1st. That he has been pronounced by British diplomatists to have been the only public man in his administration on whose word the slightest reliance could be placed. 2d. That he was the best man in the Union, and that England had sent the worst tempered man to the United States (the present ambassador) to be in daily communion with him. (Toronto Patriot.)

Wool. Large supplies of live wools are arriving at our markets—prices range in Baltimore from 31 1/2 to 33 1/2 per 100 pounds. Furk by wagon 55 75.

HERBERT LAMERS. When President Tyler's proclamation from the city of England, it gave the best of news—merriment and panic markets quite a fast of things. They have 55,000 members of Hanter's lodges enlisted and organized for us. The London Morning Herald of the 24th October, insists that an extensive league has been formed in the United States, for the purpose of invading and robbing Canada, and murdering its inhabitants; that it is headed over by Col. Johnson, vice president under Mr. Van Buren, and a Mr. Scott, nephew to the recently assassinated president of the United States army, that the grand eagle of these lodges is Mr. Caleb Cushing, the chairman of the committee of the house of representatives on foreign relations, a gentleman who was appointed to that responsible position in consequence of his concurrence in the general views of Mr. Tyler's cabinet—a position too, which necessarily procured a degree of confidence from the secretary of state, so that Mr. Cushing may, in a qualified, convert that confidence into a tool for carrying out the secured and diabolical schemes of his alleged confederates.

Among others charged with being engaged in these lodges, are the names of Mr. Smith, of St. Albans, Gov. Fairbank of Maine, Gov. Briggs of Michigan, and I. Gov. Bradish of New York. No wonder was seemed inevitable.

The verified London Journal, after making these fearful disclosures, proceeds to read the president's lecture as to what he must do in the exigency; which will, no doubt, have all due weight whenever the contingency in question shall arrive, meantime we must all feel grateful for such timely disclosures.

NEW ORLEANS. The New Orleans Bee of the 3d inst. announces that the yellow fever has disappeared. The reports of the board of health may show now and then an isolated case of death from this cause; but as an epidemic, or even as a source of danger to the new corner, its terrors have departed.

PRESIDENTIAL CONVENTION. A correspondent in the St. Louis Globe says the holding a national convention of the Van Buren party, in Baltimore, on the first Monday in November, 1842, for the twofold object of nominating a president and vice president and taking into consideration the expediency of a radical reform in the entire banking system.

PRINTERS IN LONDON. There are at present in London 1200 unemployed compositors and pressmen; many of them with large families, and in a state of absolute starvation. This present calamity is caused by the depressed state of the book-selling and publishing trade, by the little business done by parliament, and by the substitution of mechanical power for human labor.

(London Times.)

STREET. According to a table published in the New York Express of Saturday, the export of specie from the 1st to the 27th of October, amounted to $1,263,181, of which $1,125,032 was silver, and $134,129 gold.

Mexican dollars are quoted in New York at 24 fl. The value of the dollar is 20 cents. The exports of Philadelphia last week, shipped between sixty and one hundred thousand dollars in specie to New York. Large sums have also lately been drawn from St. Louis, (Missouri). These shipments, from points so remote, indicate the important character of the foreign demand for coin, and is equally demonstrative of the minute nature of the trade in which the country is engaged.

STOCKS. London Oct. 20th. American stocks remain without any improvement, and indeed the apprehensions concerning them have increased. Some New York state stocks have been sold at 72 to 75 per cent. Ohio is offered at 85 per cent. Louisiana at 72 per cent. United States bank shares find buyers at 11 25 to 64.

Sales at New York on the 18th inst., 5000 New York state bonds at 85, 3000 Ohio stocks of 36, 90, 1000 Kentucky state bonds at 100, 1000 Tennessee at 90, 4000 United States dollar bonds at 12 1/2, 3000 do. do. at 100, U. S. Bank 43. Bucknell's Reporter says that the money circles in Philadelphia last week were somewhat feverish, although the important character of the foreign demand for coin on first rate paper. Several of our banks declined semi-annual dividends. In no instance was higher than nine per cent. declared, while the Guard, in order to meet the demand for the foreign demand for coin, sold its stock at 100, and the City at 100. The United States has gone down to almost nothing, having in several instances sold as low as 35. The Bank of Pennsylvania is quoted at 200 to 250, and the Bank of Philadelphia at 60 to 60—or 40 per cent. below par. The truth is, we are in a way in Pennsylvania, with regard to money and bank matters.

Toronto. London, October 20. Some parcels of very low Virginia have changed hands at 2 1/2 to 2 1/4 per lb. but the market is generally kept from the market; there is, however, little disposition to purchase, and the market can hardly be said to have opened as yet.

In our market, the following former quotations—receipts at Baltimore, light. Inspectors of the last week 470 lbs. Maryland, 77 Ohio, 10 Virginia and 2 stems total 560.

Where advanced in prices in Baltimore, on receipt of the following: 100 lbs. Maryland red, to 81 25 to 82; Pennsylvania 1 1/2; prime Illinois red (via New York) 81 33.

CHRONICLE.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

TEXAS.

The Austin Sentinel of Sept. 30, gives an account of a Mexican foray made in Kinlego county and on San Patricio, about the 15th of September.

SOCIETY. It appears that Shelby co. (Texas) is divided into two violent parties, termed Regulators and Moderators. The former are two to one, and a history of bloody fights have occurred. After giving a history of the party and some of their deeds, the San Augustine Register of the 21st ult. adds: "While in this state of party organization, several persons were killed and wounded on each side among them some valuable citizens, and some whose lives were especially sought, as offenders against the laws. The colonel commandant of the militia of San Augustine county has received orders to draft two hundred men to quell the traitorous factions."

By the arrival of the United States revenue cutter Jackson, Lieutenant Grover, from Galveston, late intelligence has been received from Texas and the Santa Fe expedition. The cutter left Galveston on the 31st October. At the time of her departure, the Texian navy, consisting of the sloop of war Justin, and the brig Archer, by Hartson and Zavala, were fitting out for an expedition against Mexico to be carried on in concert with the government of Yucatan. We shall probably soon hear of the two parties having come to blows.

The news of the safe arrival of the Santa Fe expedition received per Galveston papers of the 26th ult. will be gratifying to the citizens of New Orleans, several of whom have friends and relatives engaged in that enterprise. The Galvestonian says that the commissioners and volunteers had been cordially received by the citizens of Santa Fe. The trade in that place was brisk and tranquillity prevailed.

MEXICO.

The schooner Waterwheel, Capt. Arnous, which arrived from Vera Cruz, brings confirmation of the intelligence published by us a few days since.

ANOTHER REVOLUTION IS EFFECTED. Santa Ana is at the head of the government, and Bustamante has, probably, by this time, left for Europe. It appears that a convention has been held in the city of Mexico, and had deposed Bustamante and given supreme power to Santa Ana in his stead. The New Orleans Bee says: We have no doubt the convention acted upon the principle of supporting the strongest party, and it is altogether likely that had Bustamante vanquished Santa Ana, he would have retired from the convention those marks of favor which are now extended to his rival. Success renders most things lawful. Still the convention appears to have acted with some discretion in appointing Santa Ana president pro tem. only—at least, so say some of the letters we have seen, though others state that he was simply proclaimed president. Whatever be the title given to this crafty intriguer, there is little question he will manage to retain it and its substantial power, as much as he possibly can.

Much is said of the important reformations to be established by the new government. The change of administration is complete. Tornel has been chosen minister of war, Gomez Pedraza, secretary of the navy, Castillon minister of the interior, and Garcia, minister of finance.

CENTRAL AMERICA.

Honduras papers to the 2d ultimo, contain an account of an attempt to assassinate Gen. CARRERA, the virtual head of affairs in Central America, by a player named Chepillo ANDREA. CARRERA was slightly wounded; but drew his sword and sabred the assassin on the spot. A political farce has been played off in offering the presidential chair to CARRERA, by whom it was refused. It has been accepted by senior VIVANCIO LOPEZ, a lawyer.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

APPOINTMENT BY THE PRESIDENT.

CHARLES DAVIES, late professor of mathematics in the military academy at West Point, to be a paymaster in the army, in the place of major Donald Fraser, resigned.

CONSULS.

The president has recognised James B. Behen as consul for Hanover, and Charles Christian Hohenberger for Austria, both for the port of New Orleans.

MINISTER TO CENTRAL AMERICA.

General Murphy of Ohio, who has been appointed by the president, minister extraordinary to Central America, sailed for his destination, on Tuesday, from New York, in the brig Florida Blanca, bound to Balize.

PRESIDENT TYLER AND HIS NEIGHBORS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To his excellency John Tyler, president of the United States.

SIR: Your friends and old constituents in New Kent, beg to avail themselves of your visit to their county, to tender you a public dinner to be given at New Kent court house, on any day that it may be your pleasure to name, as a manifestation of their long cherished love and respect for you, both as a man and politician, which, they trust to be pardoned for saying, have been greatly enhanced by the firmness of purpose and devotion to principle, which you have recently exhibited under circumstances of a greatly embarrassing nature.

We hope, sir, that it may suit your convenience, and be entirely compatible with your views of propriety, to accept this invitation, and we flatter ourselves that we can give you a reception at a festive board in old New Kent, that will in some measure, we trust, compensate you for the incentive you have received at the hands of another portion of your old constituents.

With wishes for your long continued health and happiness, subscribe ourselves, truly, your personal and political friends.

ED. G. CRUMP,
GEORGE WILLIAMSON,
JOHN G. CRUMP,
W. R. C. DOUGLAS,
CHESTLEY JONES,

Committee.

Color Hill, New Kent county, Nov. 8.

GENTLEMEN: Few things would afford me more pleasure than to meet my friends and old constituents of this county at the festive board, in pursuance of your polite invitation; but the necessity which exists for my speedy return to the seat of government, prevents me from my power to do so. I can, however, do no less than return to you, and those you represent, my grateful thanks, for the kind sentiments of regard and confidence, which you have been pleased to express towards me. Still I am justified by the people of this ancient county, in the declaration, that, when as long ago as twenty-five years, they did me the honor to confer their almost unanimous suffrages upon me, as their representative in congress, the political principles which I then avowed, have been the same, which, since my accession to the presidency, I have dared to vindicate and maintain, at the expense of the bitterest denunciations which have heretofore assailed a public functionary.

The same opinions as to the power of congress to charter a national bank, which I then avowed in the presence of your fathers, and of many who still survive among you, and which, as your representative, I strenuously urged in 1819, are still maintained with abiding and undiminished conviction. I was then sustained by the people of this district, with almost entire unanimity, and I therefore take leave to say, that if any of them are converts to new opinions, they might, at least, have granted to me, as the chief magistrate, the right of oath to support the constitution, the benefits of the new light of reason which have been shed upon them, before they parted with others, in a spirit of unqualified denunciation. What would they have me to do? Would they have me sacrifice the consistency of my past life, for party ends? Or, what is of far more importance, both morally and politically, would they require of the chief magistrate of this glorious union, to surrender all claim to their respect, by violating his oath of office, in order gratify the mobocracy of party? If they would have so great a sacrifice, then I am proud to say, they will not receive it at my hands. I censure no man for his opinion on this or any other subject—but while I award to him the right to think for himself, should he not exempt me from his denunciations because I cannot think as he does?

I beg you to be assured, gentlemen, that the invectives to which I have been subjected, have in no degree, disturbed my equanimity. Amid the torrents of abuse, no matter by what motives dictated, which have been uttered against me, "my pulse has kept as healthful music as if no such thing had occurred." The light reflected from burning engines has only served to render the path of duty more plain. In that path I shall walk, my confidence being placed in the patriotism, discernment and intelligence of the American people, whose interests are always best sustained by a firm observance of constitutional requirements.

I tender to you, individually, assurances of great personal regard. JOHN TYLER.
To Edward G. Crump, George Williamson, John G. Crump, W. R. C. Douglas and Chestley Jones, committee.

SINGULAR CIRCUMSTANCE.

The National Intelligencer says: We recently announced the appointment of Judge A. S. Ford, of New Orleans, to be judge of the United States for the district of Louisiana, in the place of Theodore H. McCaleb, deceased.

As extraordinary impositions appear to have been, in this matter, practised on the president, as it appears from the last New Orleans papers that Judge McCaleb is not only alive but has not been sick—of course Mr. Crump's appointment is a nullity.—The New Orleans Bulletin of the 2d instant says:

"The most astounding announcement of the day has been that officially given out in Washington, to the successor to Judge McCaleb, of this district, on account of his decease. Our citizens do not need to be informed that the judge is not only alive but in good health. There is a mystery in this matter that requires unravelling."

The Madisonian, professing to derive information from the highest source, states the facts to be— "That the secretary of state received positive assurances of the fact of Judge McCaleb's death, from a gentleman of the highest character;

"That in consequence of this positively asserted death, another person was thereupon recommended to fill the vacancy;

"That the immediate appointment of a successor was urged, on the ground, that, as the recently appointed marshal could only qualify to his commission before the district judge, the instructions which had emanated from the state department and the solicitor of the treasury could not be executed, until a successor to Judge McCall was appointed; and the great hazard was said to be incurred in the completion of the census of the district, (by the 1st of December); which, failing, the state of Louisiana might be deprived of her just rights, for ten years to come, in the congressional representation."

"Upon this representation of facts and reasons, the president, as was obviously most proper, supplied the supposed vacancy by the appointment of Mr. Crawford."

"Mr. Crawford was of course no applicant for the office; but the state department possessed strong evidence of his qualification for a judicial station, and the president promptly appointed him."

"To add to the facts, and the facts and circumstances of this painful and untoward case; reflecting no discredit upon the president for want of foresight, but lasting reproach upon those who have thus made a mockery of death! when death within the passing year has caused so many to mourn!"

SPECIAL ELECTION. Messrs. Banks and Smith have both resigned their pretensions to a seat in the house of representatives from the Spotsylvania district. Mr. Banks was returned by a free vote, and Mr. Smith contested his seat at the last session. The acting governor of Virginia has since appeared indicating that JAMES Q. ADAMS will decline to be a candidate for re-election to the house of representatives after the present term.

CONGRESSMEN.—RUMORS OF RESIGNATION. &c. Without having any thing official upon the subject, various publications have appeared indicating that JAMES Q. ADAMS will decline to be a candidate for re-election to the house of representatives after the present term.

The New York Tribune says: "It is now morally certain that the hon. HENRY CLAY will feel constrained, by the state of public opinion, which is impaired by his intense labors and anxiety at the extra session, to tender his resignation upon the assembling of the Kentucky legislature, with a view of spending the winter in a more southern climate. Mr. CLAY is expected to spend the winter in Cuba or some other of the West India islands. If the fervent aspirations of our countrymen could be realized, it would be a pity we were not that the service of this peerless statesman would not soon be lost to his country."

The Express says that Mr. CLAY's particular friends in New York profess to be ignorant of the intention attributed to him.

The National Intelligencer adds, "that the report has not reached this city by any authentic source, so far as we have heard."

The Baltimore American of yesterday says, "the rumor of the intended resignation of this distinguished statesman is probably unfounded. We have seen a letter from Mr. Clay to a gentleman of this city, of the date of the 11th instant, in which no allusion is made to any intention of resigning his seat in the U. S. senate.—It is altogether likely that if any such cause of retirement had existed, or any such purpose been entertained, some reference to both would have occurred in the letter. We have reason to believe that the patriotic services of this country's ablest friend will not soon be withdrawn from the public councils of the nation."

A report similar to the above is also contained in several journals, that Mr. CLAY, of Alabama will be induced by the state of his health to resign his seat in the senate.

Mr. Dawson of Georgia, it is stated, intends resigning his seat in the house of representatives.

THE CAROLINE AFFAIR. We extract the following from the Toronto Herald: "A CARD.—Sir Allen McNab requests all persons who are directly concerned in the capture and detention of the privateer cutter "Caroline" will forward to him, at Dandurth with the least possible delay, their address, place of residence, profession or calling, and age; and if they had suffered any loss in consequence of their share in that exploit, to be good enough to state the same; and also to furnish any other particulars they may desire to communicate relating thereto."

October 29, 1841.

THE GROGAN AFFAIR. The Montreal Gazette says: "We understand that in pursuance of the directions of Sir Richard Jackson, the administrator of the government, and commander of the forces, a court martial was lately held at New Rochelle, an officer, Colonel Dyer's corps, for participating in the capture of Grozan, in the territories of the United States, and that having pleaded guilty, and after addressing the court, in mitigation of punishment, he was sentenced to be discharged from the corps."

SUIT AGAINST COLLECTOR HOYT. The New York Express states that in the year 1839 Mr. Hoyt, the late collector of the port of New York, caused the flight of a number of foreigners for alleged frauds on the revenue, and subsequently suffered them to return, on the payment of what we denominated, then and now, "hush money." We then believed, and asserted in our columns, that there was no ground for the extension of the exemption, and we understand that evidence of the correctness of this opinion has been fully substantiated. There were then mercantile houses who refused to compromise or to leave the country; and they were held to bail, by Mr. Hoyt, in such various sums as suited the caprice of the revenue collector, acting upon the advice of the then district attorney, to judge the authorities in Washington. The destruction of their business followed this attempt to destroy their good name; but they steadfastly refused to compromise. We understand that, failing to exact money, the United States have discontinued these suits; and that one of the houses, through their counsel Messrs. Dutcher, Reynolds, and Platt, have held Mr. Hoyt to bail, in the sum of thirty thousand dollars, to answer for his conduct."

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE, between Lord PALMERSTON the retiring minister of foreign affairs, and Mr. STEVENSON the retiring American minister in London, relative to the dormant question of the "right of search" which was the main point of dispute that led to the last war between the two countries, was conducted no doubt with the utmost talents of each of those statesmen, with a view of vindicating the rights of the one country and the pretensions which are resorted to to justify the measures of the other. It is a delicate and exceedingly important topic, but susceptible without doubt, of amicable adjustment by a treaty, in which mutual arrangements may be made to effect an object not less desirable in one country than the other, and yet by which no national right shall be compromised. The responsibilities of preserving harmony will be more deeply imposed upon those who are about to assume, than upon those who are leaving official stations to their respective political opponents, and it is fervently to be hoped that they may bring conciliatory dispositions with them to the consideration of the subject.

A previous correspondence had between Lord Palmerston and Mr. Stevenson on this same subject will be found below.

THE RIGHT OF SEARCH.—SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

THE UNITED STATES. The following are extracts from correspondence with foreign powers, not parties to conventions giving right of searching vessels suspected of slave trade, recently presented to both houses of parliament by command of her majesty: MR. STEVENSON TO VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. 32 CRYSTAL GARDEN, NEW YORK, Nov. 13, 1840.

(Received November 14.)

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States, has been instructed by his government to transmit to Lord Palmerston, her majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, the accompanying papers, containing the evidence of another unsatisfactory search, of detention and ill usage of an American vessel and her crew, on the coast of Africa, by one of her majesty's cruisers, employed for the suppression of the slave trade, and which, in the opinion of the president, forms a proper subject for complaint and satisfactory redress.

The following are the prominent facts of the case. The American brig Douglas, of Duxbury, Massachusetts, of 200 tons burthen, and commanded by Alvin Baker, master, and Wm. Arnold, mate, sailed from Havana on the 5th August, 1839, laden with a cargo of merchandise, and having sundry passengers on board, sailed for the port of the river which was then under the command of the American vessel.

That on the 31st of October, this brig, whilst pursuing her voyage, was boarded by Lieutenant Segram from her majesty's brigantine cruiser, the Terwagant, with some of crew, who proceeded forthwith to overhaul the ship's papers and passengers' papers, ordered the hatches, which were closed, to be broken open, and the cargo, which was then lying, to be hauled down, and the vessel seized as a slave.

That the captain's papers and log book were then demanded, and taken on board the Terwagant, and the Douglas committed to the charge of a master and crew, from the British cruiser, who immediately ordered the vessel to be restored and proceeded to sea.

At 6 o'clock, P. M. ten men were sent on board with arms and provisions, and the passengers taken to the Terwagant, and both vessels then made sail and stood to the westward.

That on the 23d of October, about daylight, the Terwagant came alongside the Douglas, with the purser and one of her passengers, for stores and provisions, and then returned to the cruiser.

That from the 21st to the 26th October, the American brig continued in charge of her cruiser, when they parted, and lost sight of each other, the brig, however, still continuing in possession of the officer and crew of the Terwagant.

That on the 29th, and to the westward of Popoe, on the African coast, the Terwagant again appeared alongside the Douglas, and here to; sent the supercargo and purser on board, ordered Captain Baker on board the cruiser, and Lieutenant Segram then delivered him his papers, with permission to proceed on his voyage.

The passengers were also permitted to return to the Douglas, and the Terwagant having taken her prize crew and officer on board, the Douglas, made sail for the river Braz.

That on the 6th November, the Douglas anchored in the Nym, a river on the African coast, which she left on the 14th of December, and proceeded in ballast to Curacao, where she arrived on the 23d Jan. 1840.

That on the 6th February, she sailed from Curacao with a cargo of salt for the Havana, which she reached on the 21st of that month.

That in the passage from the pestilential coast of Africa to Curacao, the Douglas lost three of her crew, two American seamen, viz: Hamilton Day, of Providence, and Andrew Clough, of Boston, and Frederick Walton, a British subject, who were taken ill and died.

That the Douglas, at the time of her sailing from the Havana, was light, staunch and strong, had her hatches well caulked and covered, and was well and sufficiently manned, and provided with all things needful for her voyage, and was in that state when she was boarded and literally captured by the British cruisers.

That the facts detailed in the protest of the captain and mate, herewith transmitted, and which, it is presumed, can leave no doubt as to the unprovoked and flagrant character of the proceeding, or the reparation due to the rights of the United States, and the honor of their flag.

In presenting the subject to the notice of her majesty's government, it cannot be useful that the undersigned should do more than refer Lord Palmerston to the correspondence which has heretofore taken place between the two governments, and more especially to the three notes which the undersigned had the honor of addressing to his lordship under date of the 11th, 12th, and 13th of August last, and to express the painful regret which the government of the United States feels that the remonstrances which have been heretofore made should have proved unavailing in preventing the repetition of such abuses as those which have so repeatedly been made the subject of complaint against her majesty's naval officers.

Her majesty's government cannot be insensible of the strong desire which the government of the United States, and the nation at large, feel in the complete annihilation of the African slave trade.

The course pursued for the last 30 years is best calculated to mark the feelings and opinions of the government of the United States, in relation to a traffic now properly regarded by most civilized nations as alike repugnant to justice and humanity, and which, in relation to the U. States, is not the less so to all the dictates of a sound policy.

It is true that the American government have declined to become a party in any of the other arrangements for the suppression of the slave trade. Although repeatedly urged by her majesty's government to do so, the United States has been forced to decline all conventional arrangements by which the officers of ships of war of either country should have the right to board, search, or capture, or carry into foreign ports for adjudication, the crews of such other ships engaged in the slave trade. Indeed, it may be well doubted, apart from other considerations, whether the constitutional powers of the American government would be competent to carry into effect those portions of the existing system so indispensably necessary to give it the character of just reciprocity. The government of the United States have been repeatedly and frankly made known to her majesty's government, and are doubtless well understood by the British cabinet; and the more especially so, as it was an obstacle proceeding from the same principle which it is presumed prevented Great Britain herself from becoming formally a party to the holy alliance. It will not, however, be understood that the United States have been insensible to the friendly spirit of confidence with which these applications have been made on the part of her majesty's government, or that the United States have ceased to maintain a strong and decided solicitude for the course of the traffic, which has distinguished them from the course of their policy. On the contrary, having been the first to abolish, within the extent of their authority, the transportation of the natives of Africa into slavery, by prohibiting the introduction of slaves, and by punishing their own citizens for participating in the traffic; and having, moreover, taken the steps which it deemed proper to prevent the abuse of their flag by the subjects of other powers, the government of the United States cannot but feel sincere gratification at the progress made, by the efforts of other nations, for the general extinction of this odious traffic, and, consequently, the undiminished solicitude to give the fullest efficacy to their own laws and regulations on the subject.

They cannot, however, consent that the provisions of the treaties in force between Great Britain and other powers for its abolition, and to which they are a party, should be operated upon by the commerce and citizens of the United States. It cannot but be apparent to her majesty's government that these treaties are of a nature which cannot, and ought not, to be applied to the United States, under any restrictions or modifications whatever, and the more means of carrying out these measures of maritime policy and surveillance which form the basis of these treaties are so indispensably necessary to their execution.

In withholding its assent, therefore, from the existing system, and abstaining from all conventional arrangements yielding the right of search to the armed vessels and cruisers of each other, her majesty's government must be sensible that the United States have been influenced alone by considerations arising out of the character of their institutions and policy, and that having taken the measures which it deemed expedient and proper in relation to this subject, the government of the United States can only leave to other nations to pursue for the basis of their policy, their judgment or policy may dictate, and in relation to which the United States certainly can have no disposition to interfere.

The undersigned has therefore been instructed, in pursuance of this course, to Lord Palmerston's note, again in the most earnest manner to assure his lordship that these continued violations of the flag of the United States, and unprovoked wrongs inflicted by British cruisers upon the rights and property of its citizens, under whatever color or pretext, cannot longer be permitted by the government of the United States; and that he is accordingly been instructed to express to his lordship the confident expectation of the president of the United States, that the undersigned's government will not only at once recognize the propriety and justice of making prompt retribution for the unwarrantable conduct of Lieut. Segrain in efficient naval force, but that it will take suitable and efficient measures to prevent the future occurrence of all such abuses, involving, as the future occurrence of great private wrong and consequent injury to property and life, but calculated to intercept that harmony, which it is for the advantage, and it is no doubt the desire of both governments to preserve.

The undersigned prays Lord Palmerston to accept assurances of his distinguished consideration.

A. STEVENSON.

The right hon. Viscount Palmerston, G. C. B.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON TO MR. STEVENSON.

Foreign office, 19th Nov. 1840.
The undersigned, her majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, has received the note which Mr. Stevenson, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States, addressed to him on the 13th inst. complaining, on the part of the United States government, of the conduct of Lieut. Segrain, of her majesty's brigantine Tergant, in having detained the United States brig Douglas.

The undersigned has to assure Mr. Stevenson that her majesty's government will at all times be desirous of repressing and preventing any violation of the flag of the United States by officers of the British navy.

Previously to the receipt of Mr. Stevenson's note of the 13th inst., had, on receiving from Lieutenant Segrain an account of the transaction referred to, called upon that officer to explain more fully and particularly the ground upon which he had considered himself justified in detaining a ship under American colors, and with papers showing her to be American property.

Her majesty's government have now directed a prompt and searching inquiry to be made into the facts of the case, as stated in Mr. Stevenson's note and the undersigned will not fail to communicate the result of the inquiry to Mr. Stevenson as soon as her majesty's government shall have learned the result of the inquiries instituted.

MR. STEVENSON TO VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.

32, Upper Grosvenor-street, Nov. 20, 1840.

(Received November 20.)

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note which Lord Palmerston, her majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, addressed to him yesterday, in reply to that of the undersigned of the 13th inst., complaining of the conduct of Lieut. Segrain, of her majesty's brigantine Tergant, in relation to the American brig Douglas, of the coast of Africa, and will take the earliest opportunity of transmitting it for the information of his government.

The undersigned derives, in the meantime, much satisfaction from the prompt and friendly assistance furnished by her majesty's government, in the receipt of the note of the undersigned, Lieut. Segrain had been called upon to explain fully and particularly the grounds upon which he had considered himself justified in detaining a ship under the American colors, and with American papers, and that her majesty's government had further directed a prompt and searching inquiry to be made into the facts of the case.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON TO MR. FOX.

Foreign office, December 3, 1840.

SIR: With reference to my despatch of the 12th of June 1840, relative to a vessel, named the Pilgrim, which had been taken on board at Rio de Janeiro, under the flag of the United States, laden with slaves, and in pursuance of the act of the 3^d of March 1820, for the coast of Africa, I herewith transmit to you, for communication to the government of the United States the accompanying extract from a despatch from her majesty's commissioners at Rio de Janeiro, stating that the Pilgrim had returned to that port in ballast, after having landed a cargo of slaves.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON TO MR. STEVENSON.

Foreign office, Dec. 8, 1840.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, together with its enclosures, on the subject of the African slave trade, and I beg to express my thanks to you for that communication, and for the information which it contains.

With reference to the suggestion contained in the paper which accompanied your letter, that a blockade should be instituted at the Gallinas and along the coast, as an effectual means of putting down the slave trade, I have much pleasure in acquainting you that a blockade has for some time past been regularly maintained at the Gallinas by her majesty's ship Wanderer, and by other vessels under the direction of its commander, and from New Cess by her majesty's ship Forester.

With reference to the supposition of the writer of the paper which you have sent me, that British cruisers abstain from taking vessels before they have slaves on board, in order that, by capturing such vessels after they have taken their slaves on board, the cruisers may get more prize money, I have to explain to you, that it is only since the passing of the act of 1838 that there has existed any legal authority to condemn Portuguese ships, detained for being equipped for slave trade, and not having slaves actually on board; and therefore, until that act came into operation on the coast of Africa, her majesty's vessels could not detain Portuguese slave vessels until they had actually taken their slaves on board; but with regard to Spanish vessels, the treaty of 1835 between Great Britain and Spain gave to the mixed British and Spanish commission a power to condemn slave vessels under the Spanish flag, if found equipped for the slave trade, even though they might have no slaves actually on board; and during the period which has elapsed since that treaty has been in operation, her majesty's cruisers have taken, and sent in for adjudication, 85 Spanish slavers without slaves on board, and since the year 1835 her majesty's cruisers on the coast of Africa have detained and sent in for adjudication 14 Brazilian vessels without slaves on board, and only two with slaves on board.

You will see, therefore, from these facts, that the writer of the paper in question is entirely mistaken in supposing that the British cruisers on the coast of Africa look to profit instead of the performance of their duty; and I have further to state, in proof of the zealous activity of the British cruisers, that all the slave vessels sent in for adjudication before any of the mixed commissions, whether in Africa, the West Indies or Brazil, have been detained and sent in by British cruisers, not one of those vessels having been detained by the cruisers of any of the other contracting parties to the treaties under the stipulations of which those slave vessels were condemned.

PALMERSTON.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON TO MR. FOX.

Foreign office, Dec. 17, 1840.

SIR: I received your despatch of the 1st of April last, and in compliance with the wish therein expressed on the part of the United States government, to be furnished with documents explaining the facts disclosed in the case of the United States slave schooner Rebecca, I directed her majesty's commissioners to furnish me with any evidence in their possession on the points referred to; and I now transmit to you, for communication to the United States government, a copy of a despatch from her majesty's commissioners, containing certified copies of papers connected with the case of the vessel above mentioned.

SOUTHWESTERN CONVENTION. We learn from the Cincinnati Gazette, in which paper we believe the proposition originated, that the call for a southwestern convention, at Louisville or Cincinnati, though seconded, is so coldly received, as to induce the editor to think it will not be held this autumn.

There are so many adumatory facts in the items which have reached us since our last, in relation to the current of the cotton trade of the world, that a careful perusal of this chapter cannot but be useful to American statesmen as well as the southern planters. Read—Refect. There is something more than speculation to arrest attention—actual results are reaching us already that speak in an audible tone, and the time is not far off when they will come to us trumpet tongued. America will have to meet Great Britain in the contest for trade, and it is time to prepare for the struggle—not with arms—but with wise and prudent countervailing measures.

During the six months it appears, that the decrease in imports was not so great as the decrease in quantity taken by the trade. For the coming year the supply will be much greater in proportion to the consumption. The usual blue and grey is now raised from the south as to injury sustained by the new crop. There is in some sections a little tith in the matter, but under any circumstances that can now arise, the crop will be fully equal to that of last year.

The cotton holders are very desponding, but they do not yet make up their minds to submit to the large reduction demanded by shippers.

From the Bombay Times, June 23, 1841.

Proportion of cotton in 1840. On examining into the supplies of cotton brought to this market during the twelve months ending the 31st of May, we find that the result is well calculated to astonish those who have not been marking the progressive increase of this product, but have been dwelling with fancied security on the recollections of what used to constitute a large supply for us, viz—200 to 250,000 bales. It appears, then, that from the first of June, 1840, to the first of June, 1841, the imports of cotton into Bombay have amounted to 174,212,755 pounds; or, on the previous average, of 37 cwt. to the bale, 478,066 bales, little short of half a million of screwed bales. This is a larger quantity than America produced in England during the same year. In 1825, the entire product of the U. States amounted to only 169,860,000 pounds, though twelve years after it had reached 444,214,537 pounds.—Vide McC's Diet.

As a further encouragement to the cultivators, we may state, that the consumption of cotton in India and in Great Britain has increased in a greater ratio than that of any quality whatever. In 1816, at which period the average of American upland was 18½ d. and Surat at 15½ d. all the consumption of American was 4,036 bales, and E. Indian 207 bales per week. In 1839, when the average price of uplands was 18½ d. and Surat at 5½ d. the consumption of American was 15,644 bales, and East Indian 2,112 bales per week; the increase, in twenty-three years, of the last mentioned, being in the ratio of 1 to 18. In the same period, the consumption of Egyptian, Brazil and West India varieties has not doubled.

From the London Literary Gazette, Sept. 11, 1841.

INDIAN PRODUCTS AND MANUFACTURES. Connected with this subject, we rejoice to see that measures are being successfully taken to form a national intimation of valuable products and manufactures between England and her mighty eastern empire.—This has been long and most strangely neglected; and it would have been well worth while to establish a board of commission, with government influence and authority, to direct and superintend so important a concern. As it is, the stimulus appears to have been given by the committee on trade, &c. emanating from the Royal Asiatic society, whose proceeding has had a most beneficial effect both at home and in India. We now learn that experiments on the cultivation of cotton are promising the greatest prospects, and that other branches of industry are all being improved and promoted by European skill and encouragement. The Himalayan fine has been acclimated, and found extremely useful; and the "prodigious" lucerne, and other nutritious grasses, of which travellers have spoken in such high terms of praise, are also introduced with every prospect of adding much to our agricultural prosperity. Tea, coffee, silks, hundreds of fruits, gums, dyes, medicines and other precious articles of commerce remain yet to be cultivated, and interchanged in abundance, to the incalculable advantage of both countries.

THE BOUNDARY. It would appear from the following article, which we copy from the St. John's Courier of the 6th ult. that our neighbors in New Brunswick regarded with dissatisfaction the ex-parte survey of the United States government, to determine the due north line—and anticipate difficulty, provided the line should be continued beyond the St. John.

"The boundary and the new survey. We believe it is generally known that an ex-parte survey of the due north line from the monument, as claimed by the American government, has this year been going on under Major Graham and other officers of the United States topographical engineers, the line is hereby the mode of carrying on the survey is not yet fully understood. We therefore have to state that the American surveyors are running and marking the line by the transit instrument, or, as we understand it, making an astronomical survey, they laying found, on trial, that such would give them a considerable advantage, by carrying a new line, line is hereby the eastward of the line established by the joint survey of the boundary commissioners many years ago.

A short time since we learned that this new line had been extended as far north as the Aroostook river, where it was 780 yards (nearly half a mile) to the eastward of the former line, and the line is now being surveyed seriously with private rights. In one instance, it was said, the owners of the land had resisted the survey, thrown down the observatory, and driven off the commissioner and his surveyors. We now hear that the line has been extended nearly to the St. John, and that it will cross the river more than half a mile below the former line, but a very short distance above the military post at the Grand Falls.

We cannot refrain from expressing a decided disapproval of allowing the American surveyors to continue their line north of the St. John.

On this point we feel certain that we merely express the universal feeling of the people of this province. There is another view of this matter which should not be overlooked. The general government of the United States say that this line is run by the ex-parte only, and more so, and more so, and more so, the state of Maine treats it very differently, and appears to consider this survey as establishing the line by which they mean to abide. It is generally understood, if not already avowed, that when Gov. Fairfield is sworn into office next January, he intends to take possession of the new line, and sell and settle the lands with the least possible delay. Such a course would produce an instant collision, from which we hope long to be spared, but it can hardly be avoided if this survey, which Maine is fully disposed and quite determined to consider final, is allowed to proceed.

THE ARMY.

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 70.

Head quarters of the army, Oct. 6th, 1841.
Washington, Nov. 6, 1841.

With a view to the rebuilding of the arsenal at Charleston, South Carolina, on a square of ground purchased from the city, being the square of which a portion has been occupied as an ordnance store-house, a board of officers, consisting of Capt. J. M. Williams, commanding, Capt. J. M. Hill, or the assistant quartermaster of the station; and assistant surgeon J. M. Cuyler, will assemble in Charleston as soon as Dr. Cuyler shall reach that place.

The board will consider and report—
1st. Whether the site will probably be healthy.

2d. Whether it is sufficiently accessible for the receipt and issue of military stores; and if so, in what manner.

3d. Whether it may with safety and propriety be occupied as a depot for gun powder.

Together with such other points as the board may deem necessary to be brought to the notice of the department.

By order: R. JONES, adj. gen.

Buffalo, N. Y. A detachment of the U. S. troops consisting of companies A, E and I, 4th artillery, has arrived per steamer Illinois from the vicinity of Detroit, their place having been supplied by the 5th regiment from the Mississippi station. Two of the companies, A and E, moved immediately eastward via the rail road for Sackett's Harbor, while company I, Capt. Scott, remains.

The steamboat Marietta arrived at St. Louis on Oct. 27th from Pittsburgh, and on board arrived 120 men of the 1st regiment of dragoons from Carlisle, Pa., and destined for Fort Leavenworth.

FORTIFICATION ARMAMENTS. The Alexandria Gazette states that three hundred tons of heavy armament are now shipping from the arsenal, near Washington, for fortifications at Newport, Rhode Island. Nineteen 32 pounders are also shipped for Fort McHenry near Baltimore. The work of arming the fortifications has been vigorously prosecuted by the present administration.

A writer in the National Intelligencer urges the merits of Elizabethtown, the county seat of Hardin county, (late McDaniel's ferry), opposite the lower point of Hurricane Island, on the Ohio river, ninety miles above its mouth and on the Illinois shore as a suitable site for the western army.

FLORIDA. Captains McLaughlin and Burk have recently passed through the everglades. They entered a port at Key Biscayne and Indian Key, and came out to the north of Cape Roman. In their course they visited Che-ki-ka Island, discovered a lake with several islands in it, destroyed a field of corn of about forty acres, and saw five or six Indians. [St. Augustine Herald.]

By the capsizing of two boats in Indian river, Florida, Mr. U. Ashlock, seven United States soldiers, five men and a boy were drowned.

DEATH. Died at St. Augustine, on the 30th of October, Dr. Richard Wightman, of the U. S. army, a native of Fairfax county, Virginia, but for more than twenty years past a resident of Florida.

THE ARMY, THE NAVY AND THE CHURCH. From The Army and Navy Chronicle. It is an interesting fact, and perhaps not generally known, that within a few years past, as many as twelve or fifteen officers of the army, and it is believed some from our navy and navy, and that military profession for the more peaceful, but not less arduous, vocation of the Christian ministry, and are now usefully employed, in various portions of the United States, in preaching the gospel. It is natural that the portion of the clergy should take a deep and peculiar interest in the moral and religious condition of our army and navy, and that they should be among the first to concert measures for the spiritual improvement of these important branches of the public service. Accordingly, it appears that the incipient measures have already been taken, by a portion of the clergy above alluded to, in reference to this subject. A meeting was held in the vestry room of the Episcopal church, in the city of N. York, on the 29th October, at which were present the following clergyman, viz:

The Rev. Leonidas Polk, bishop of Louisiana.
The Rev. N. Sayres Harris, rector of the church of the Evangelists, Philadelphia.

Rev. Amos A. Phelps, rector of New York.
Rev. Lewis P. W. Balch, rector of St. Bartholomew's church, New York.

The Rev. M. P. Parks, chaplain and professor of ethics in the military academy.

The Rt. Rev. Bishop Polk was called to the chair, and the Rev. M. P. Parks appointed secretary.—Whereupon, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Whereas, in the Providence of God, as we believe, we have been called out of the army of the U. States into the gospel ministry, we regard ourselves as being, in a peculiar degree, debtors to our former brethren and associates in arms, to do them service, according to the measure of our ability and opportunities; therefore,

1. Resolved, That, for the purpose of adopting some system of measures, in reference to the spiritual improvement of the army and navy of our country, we will (God willing) meet again at the vestry room of St. Bartholomew's church, in the city of New York, at 11 o'clock, A. M. on the 4th Thursday of June, 1842.

2. Resolved, That such of our brethren in the ministry as were formerly identified with us in the military or naval service be invited, and we do hereby invite them, to meet with us, at the time and place above specified, and assist by their counsels in furtherance of the object above directed.

3. Resolved, That such officers of the army and navy, and those, now in civil life, formerly connected with either arm of the service, as are interested in the foregoing object, be also invited to be present, and cooperate with us in promoting the same; and that such as cannot be present be requested to communicate with us by letter or otherwise, furnishing us with such facts and suggestions as their observations and reflections may supply.

4. Resolved, As the most eligible means of circulating this information, that it be forwarded to the Army and Navy Chronicle for publication, and that such periodicals as feel an interest in the subject be requested to copy.

LEONIDAS POLK, chairman.

M. P. PARKS, secretary.

NAVY.

The Norfolk Beacon says: We learn that the finding of the court in the case of purser Bridge, who was tried before the naval general court martial which convened on board the United States ship Pennsylvania, in June last upon charges preferred against him by commander W. K. Latimer, has been disapproved by the secretary of the navy, it not being in his judgment, justified by the evidence in the case. The sentence which was a reprimand in general orders, has therefore been set aside, and Mr. Bridge relieved from his arrest.

We see, with much pleasure, that proposals are issued this morning for supplying timber to build a schooner vessel for the U. States, in the navy yard at Southwark. [Phila. U. S. Gaz.]

The United States ship Ontario, at the Brooklyn navy yard, has been ordered to be repaired immediately, and will sail shortly for New Orleans. She is intended for a guard-ship off that port. [Sun.]

REVERSE OF SENTENCE. The secretary of the navy has reversed the decree of the court martial, held on board the United States ship Pennsylvania at Norfolk, sentencing Dr. Hunter and Lieutenant Goden to suspension and acquitted those gentlemen of the charges made against them, in the most creditable manner. The secretary in his official capacity those officers, has redacted with merited severity both upon Captain Bolton, who preferred the charges against them, and the captains who composed the court. He has asserted, in the most unequivocal terms, that there was no ground for complaint against them, much less for a conviction and sentence by court martial. [Norfolk Daily Advertiser.]

It has been stated in several of the public journals, that in disapproving certain of the sentences of the late general court martial at Norfolk, the secretary pronounced censure on the court itself. We are fully authorized to say that this is not the fact. The secretary thought it due to the officers that the sentences should not be approved, which, of course, implies that he thought them wrong; but the proposition of censure on the court was, and is, a very unjust implication, beyond the mere expression of his opinion that they had erred in judgment. [Madisonian.]

THE FRIGATE RARITAN. A meeting was held recently in Philadelphia for the purpose of urging the propriety of having this frigate now on the stocks at that place completed for service. The reply of the secretary of the navy has been published, and it is most agreeable fully in the views and opinions of that meeting. Convinced that we can rely on our navy alone for the defence of our seaboard during war, and for the protection of our commerce, both in war and peace, I feel the strongest desire for an immediate and great increase, both in the number and the efficiency of our vessels of war. Acting upon this conviction, I had determined, before I heard of any movement on the subject at Philadelphia, to give the requisite order for finishing the Raritan, which order will be immediately issued.

NAVAL COURT OF INQUIRY. The court of inquiry into the conduct of Capt. Bolton closed its investigation on Saturday last. When the evidence was concluded, Capt. B. (according to the report in the New York Herald) rose and said:

GENTLEMEN: In explaining my conduct in relation to leaving the Mediterranean with the United States ship Brandywine, and returning to this coast in last May, I have very little to say, as a detailed statement has already been placed before you. The facts are all in your possession, and I therefore confidently leave the matter with you. I may simply say, that in returning I was actuated by a belief that a war between this country and Great Britain was inevitable. That opinion I distinctly expressed before the council of war, and I acted on it when I found myself on the ocean. My only aim was to get the earliest information upon this point, and I wished to be the first to turn to the honor of our navy, and to its advantage. In my opinion this could not have been so well accomplished as by my appearance on our coast. The English papers stated the sailing of ships of war for our coast, and it was only there that I could render myself useful. Under this impression I acted; my motives as well as any acts are before you. If I have erred it has been in judgment only. This is my conscience, and I submit the facts to the consideration of the honorable the secretary of the navy. As much stress has been laid upon the contents of the letter of Mr. Sprague, I ask that it may be borne in mind that the relations between the two countries continuing unseverely, it did not warrant me to justify me in submitting to his judgment, instead of the American minister—as I consider that commercial channels of news are not always to be relied on. I confidently expected that my movement would have been approved, if not applauded. Had I doubted this, I would have gone back without reporting, by my presence on the coast, absence from an assigned station.

In coming into the harbor of New York I was only actuated by a desire to render the ship, if possible, more efficient, by introducing new approved gunnery improvements, which I did. I retired from the ship on account of ill health, and only when I felt quite sure that war would not soon occur. All I did was done in good faith for my country and my commanding officers; and I argue that the subsequent more particular orders to commander Voorbees resulted from the idea that he would, under existing circumstances, on leaving Mahon, proceed also to this coast. The American flags exhibited at the Rock of Gibraltar might have been hoisted to deceive me, and they were not seen when I entered the Rock. On making the coast in a fog, the report of a gun induced all the officers of the Brandywine to suppose, and indeed to say to the pilot, that the Ohio was off the coast or harbor. I sought our shores, not to get home, as that word is familiarly used, but to defend them. And I did not enter the port till all doubts were settled as to the existence of peace. If war had existed, all my dexterity would not have availed me to get in, for you all know the difficulties and risk. Great misfortune has existed in the public mind, but my actions have been fairly judged of by my professional brethren. The present investigation will, I trust, entirely exonerate me.

Captain Bolton then read a copy of a letter to the navy board, and then sat down. Commodore Stewart then asked the judge advocate if he had got through. He replied that he had. Commodore Stewart then said, "clear the court," and the court was cleared. On being readmitted we found that the papers had been sealed up to be forwarded to the proper department at Washington.

We also learn that the court considered that in the case of the Fulton's gun, it was fully proved that the gun was defective. It was also stated, but did not appear directly in the evidence, that so strong was the belief of the officers of the squadron of a war, that when, soon after the Freble left them, they heard a cannonading, they concluded she had been caught, and was having a fight with the British, although it turned out that her commander was only exercising his men at their guns.

The United States ship Cyane, Commander Stirling, bound to the Pacific, got under way yesterday morning, between nine and ten o'clock, and proceeded down the river in due style, with the wind from the south.

We understand that the frigate United States Capt. Armstrong, destined for the Pacific, will be put in commission this morning, and will host the broad pendant of Commodore Jones.

LEGISLATURE. The general assembly has adjourned after a session of three days and a half. The business transacted was chiefly of a private nature.

MASSACHUSETTS.

ELECTION. We have not yet received the complete returns of the result of the late election.

The following table from the Boston Atlas, will show the result for representatives in the several counties.

Essex	17	7	5	6
Middlesex	18	21	9	2
Worcester	37	8	6	2
Hampshire	13	2	3	0

In New Bedford, after three days unsuccessful effort to make a choice of representatives, it was voted not to send.

A NEGRO LEGISLATOR. They have had some queer doings at the late election in the Bay state. It seems that in the town of Townsend, Massachusetts, the whites, Van Buren men and abolitionists are equally divided, and each made a nomination for representative. As in that state a majority over all is necessary to an election, both parties urged the abolitionists to withdraw their nomination, and even proposed to unite with them on a man, who should represent either white or colored principles, or Van Burenism and abolition; but the abolitionists would run their candidate or prevent a choice. After two or three unsuccessful ballottings, the two parties, vexed at the obstinacy of their abolition brethren, determined to give them a full-blooded abolitionist, without compromise. They accordingly came to an understanding upon the subject, nominated a very black, but very respectable old negro, and marching to the polls in a body, elected him as a representative to the Massachusetts legislature by an overwhelming majority! In Massachusetts there is no disqualification as to color, and the negro had agreed to take his seat as a member if elected. It happened, however, that the polls were kept open longer than the usual time, and the election is therefore void. A new meeting is to be called, and if the abolitionists hold out, the negro will be elected.

[New York Express.]

ONE VOTE. Nearly a dozen members were elected by one vote majority.

SCHOOL STATISTICS. The amount raised for town taxes the last year, throughout the state, for school purposes, was $491,615 23, which added to the amount of income of the surplus revenue appropriated to the same object, of $95,239 48, makes an annual appropriation of $586,854 71, for the support of the number of children returned, between the ages of four and sixteen, is 153,492. The average sum appropriated to the instruction of each child, is $2 70.

VERMONT.

POLITICAL CONVENTION. A whig state convention has been held at Montpelier, which lasted three days, and resulted in the adoption of the following resolutions and address:

RESOLUTIONS.

Whereas, we regard the distinctive principles and measures which the people of Vermont have hitherto, in times of trial and triumph, perseveringly maintained to be principles in accordance with those of our fathers of '76, and measures essential to the liberty and prosperity of the country—

Resolved, That we will ever have these principles and measures, and comment them to the continued and constant support of the people, unswerving by the temptations of temporizing policy, and untroubled by the onsets of an infuriated opposition.

Resolved, That in adhering to those principles and measures, we must and we do, insist upon

The separation of the purse from the sword;

The reform of those abuses of the appointing power which have heretofore brought the patronage of the federal government in conflict with the freedom of elections;

The president to be limited to a single term;

The right of petition to be maintained unimpaired;

The national expenses to be regulated by a wise regard to the necessities and welfare of the country;

The right of the states to the public domain to be sacredly regarded; and

The protection of American industry against foreign competition, by a discriminating tariff—and against the ruinous effects of a depreciated and unstable currency at home, by providing a sound and steady national currency.

Resolved, That the acts of the late extra session of congress—in the repeal of the sub-treasury bill; in providing for the liquidation of the heavy national debt, which was incurred by a previous administration; in promptly furnishing means for the national defence; and in providing for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the several states—alone entitle the whig administration to the gratitude of the American people.

Resolved, That while one great measure of national reform and relief has failed, by a disagreement between the president and congress—a disagreement which we deeply regret—we yet confide in the wisdom and patriotism of congress and the president to agree upon some such substitute as will meet the necessities and the approval of the people.

Resolved, That the whigs ought not to be distracted by any considerations growing out of the present events. Differences between individual members of the party should not be permitted to create dissension, but ought rather to stimulate to renewed effort for the preservation of the party entire. A spirit of liberality is also needed to insure concert of action, without which no party can long sustain itself or carry out its principles.

Resolved, That by the open threat of repeal, made by the opposition in reference to the measures of a whig administration, we are forewarned; let us then be forearmed, to prevent the destruction of all the glorious fruits of the memorable victory of 1840, by henceforth ever routing the destructives.

Resolved, That we commend to the whigs of Vermont the full exercise of the spirit of union for the support of their principles and their country; and the maintenance of a firm and cheerful and cordial organization, as a means of securing to Vermont, beyond all contingency, for the future, her well earned and honorable reputation among the whig states of the union.

ADDRESS.

Whigs of Vermont: Inspired with the conviction that we have our country to uphold, one constitution to support, and one destiny to achieve, believing that these objects may be best attained by the ascendancy and development of democratic whig principles, a convention of your whig fellow citizens again urges upon you a renewal of the same zeal, a re-kindling of the same spirit, and an exercise of the same mutual forbearance that animated and encouraged, and sustained us, in the contest of 1840.

Entertaining no ill-tempered desire to hold up to view the errors, the follies, or the remissness of the late administration of the general government, we cannot forbear asking you to contrast the inebriety and inertness of the past administration, with the sagacity, the vigilance and the sagacity of the present. We have no desire to experience here, our warrant for saying, that in the short period of our whig history, the accession of the lamented HARRISON to the presidency, more great and patriotic measures have been concerted and matured, and more evil has been arrested in its progress, than during the whole four years that preceded it.

In the law for the distribution of the proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands, by the execution of which an income will annually accrue to Vermont fully equal to the ordinary expenses of the state in the revenue law, by which provision is made for the payment of the public debt contracted by the late administration, in the enlargement and re-organization of other measures, the establishment of fortifications and other measures, and in the law for the repeal of the sub-treasury system, by which we promise of abundant compensation for all the toil and sacrifices incurred in producing their enactment. Indeed, with a single exception, already do we find spread upon the statute book all the great measures which we expected from the extra session of congress; and in regard to that one exception, the compromise, arise, we are bound to indulge, and do indulge, the confident hope and belief, that at the approaching session of congress some general and acceptable plan will be devised, in which all the departments of the government will cheerfully concur. There is no other subject, which has been so long and so much a question, which has been, and must continue to be, made a question in our political contests. It is one vitally affecting the prosperity of our state, and as such demands our attention. By the provisions of the compromise act, the duties on foreign merchandise, in the production and manufacture of which American industry has attempted a competition, will be reduced to so low a point in 1842, that unless other measures be matured, the spirit of rivalry will be extinguished, and the country be again made dependent on the labors of the foreign agriculturist and artisan. In other words the same question, though somewhat in a varied form, will again be raised, whether the demand for American labor, and the wages of that labor, shall maintain the same elevated condition as heretofore, thus far made the subjects of it respectable, prosperous and happy, or whether, by diminishing the varieties of employment, the wages of labor and the demand for that labor shall be reduced to so low an ebb, that even the foreign artisan in his rags will mock the condition of our countrymen.

Upon us, in an important degree will depend the issue of this question. If our principles are worthy the effort that was made for their ascendancy, they are worthy of an equal effort to maintain and perpetuate them. And if we would realize the good which they promise us—if we would preserve the prudent counsels of the conservative and frugal policy, we must characterize our own state and ourselves, we must exercise a degree of activity and vigilance, and indulge a spirit of harmony and forbearance among ourselves, commensurate with the great objects to be attained. We have adversaries to contend with who give no shelter to their cyclists, and no rest to their laborers. With the cry of "REPEAL" on their lips, trusting to divisions among ourselves for success, and "counting all as lost" if they do not regain the spoils of office, they press forward with a hope that never flags, and a zeal that never tires. Let the whigs of Vermont borrow patience and energy from their example. Let them remember the evils they have borne under adverse national administrations, and learn to be content, while under whig administrations, their political "tyranny is easy and their burden is light." And even as a matter of pride, let it never be said that the whigs of Vermont, by their own negligence or internal divisions, have contributed, in any degree, to dim the brightness, or obscure the glory of "THE STAR THAT NEVER SETS."

OEL BILLINGS,

THE TARIFF.

The following resolutions, reported by the select committee on the governor's message, were adopted by the house of representatives of Vermont on the 3d, by the decisive vote of ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY FIVE TO THREE. Politically the house divides about 120 whig to 85 Van Buren.

Resolved, That labor, both mental and corporeal, is not only the most honorable means, but the only true source of wealth.

Resolved, That it is the duty of our government, at all times, to protect and encourage the domestic industry of our citizens, by making and enforcing such a tariff of duties as will secure our home markets from the desperate and disastrous floodings of foreign competition.

Resolved, That we regard the right to enjoy the products of our soil and labor as sacred and as valuable as the right to the soil itself, and that it is equally the duty of our government to repel invasions and encroachments upon the one as the other.

Resolved, That the farmer and manufacturer are alike vitally interested in such protection, and that the prosperity of all classes and occupations is mainly dependent on the success of our agricultural and manufacturing interests.

Resolved, That the tariff laws now existing are highly defective and insufficient, and by that part of the compromise act which is to take effect in July next will be rendered still more defective, insufficient, and unjust.

Resolved, That our senators in congress be instructed, and our representatives in congress requested, to use all honorable means in their power to procure the passage of laws which, while they shall guard against the atrocious frauds and evasions now practised upon us by foreigners and foreign agents, and while they shall raise a revenue sufficient only for the necessary expenses of government, and shall have a due regard to the particular interests of every section of our country, may give, by protective duties, such a preference to domestic over foreign products in our own markets, and may so discriminate between those articles which we can and those which we cannot produce at home as to give a just, sure, and salutary encouragement to the industry of every American citizen.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to each of our senators and representatives in congress.

NEW YORK.

PARTIES IN THE LEGISLATURE. The division of parties in the legislature of the state of New York, for the last seven years, has been as follows:

The years given above show the periods of election. The session in the legislature commencing in January of the following year.

POLITICAL. The native American party, N. York, who contended for a modification of the constitution in regard to the elective franchise, propose calling a state convention, with a view to an effective organization of that party throughout the state. The reform now in the school question is supposed to have prompted this action.

NEW JERSEY.

The governor has appointed the 9th of December as a day of thanksgiving.

The legislature adjourned on Friday, November 12th, to meet again on 11th January next. But little business of importance has been transacted. We learn from the Newark Advertiser that Isaac Southard, jr., was re-appointed treasurer of the state, and Mr. Haddis keeper of the state prison. The bill to compel the state banks to resume specie payments on or before the 5th of July next, was not finally acted upon.

IMPORTANT LAW SUIT. Mr. S. WADDEL, the former marshal, of this district, is litigating before the supreme court of the United States, a very comprehensive claim against the state of New Jersey. It embraces all the land under water in all the rivers of East Jersey, and for three leagues beyond the shore. No farmer can build a little dock even, if he succeed. All the fisheries, ferries and oyster beds in east Jersey, depend upon the result. It is the most important case that has arisen since the settlement of the colony.

Mr. Geo. Wood and Mr. G. D. Wall, are employed by the state to defend its rights; and so important is the matter deemed by the legislature, that before adjourning they passed this resolution:

Resolved, That in view of the great and immediate importance of this cause, in respect to the rights of this state and its citizens, his excellency, the governor, be requested, if he shall deem it compatible with his other public duties, to repair in person to the city of Washington, and attend the said argument, on behalf of this state.

Mr. Waddel sues in the name and in behalf of the east Jersey proprietors, and the appeal by the state to the supreme court, is from a decision in the circuit court, favorable to the claimants.

The issue of the suit will decide a similar claim by the west Jersey proprietors. [N. Y. Amer.

VIRGINIA.

SOUTHWESTERN ROAD. At a convention assembled on the 25th of Oct. at Christianburg which numbered about 150 delegates, the following resolutions were adopted:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to make application to the legislature of Virginia for the construction of a McAdamized road from the Tennessee line, near Abingdon, to the most eligible point on James river.

2. Resolved, That the legislature be applied to, to make such road wholly on state account, and that they be earnestly requested to commence the work forthwith.

3. Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed to draft a memorial to the general assembly of Virginia, in accordance with the foregoing resolutions, and that the members of this convention be requested to procure signatures to the same.

Resolved, That the best interests of the country demand the completion of the work entrusted to the James river and Kanawha company, and that it is expedient, in the opinion of the convention, that the aid of the state shall be freely given to this object, in manner and extent as the legislature may deem wisest.

Resolved, That the members of this convention, in their individual character, most respectfully and earnestly appeal to the legislature to give its early attention to the condition of our common schools, and to adopt such measures as shall in its judgment be deemed necessary to place them upon the most useful and efficient footing.

JOHN P. MATTHEWS, t Secretary.

JAMES W. SHEFFEY,)

GEORGIA.

The legislature of this state commenced its annual session at Milledgeville on Monday, 1st instant, and was organized by the election of Robert M. Echols as president of the senate, and Wm. B. Wofford speaker of the house of representatives—both members of the opposition party.

Of the business already introduced, we observe that bills have been reported in both houses proposing a considerable reduction in the salaries of state officers, viz: the salary of the governor to be $3,000; state house officers, $1,600; judges, $1,680; and members of the legislature, $4 per diem.

The message of Governor McDonald, which was laid before the assembly on Tuesday, is largely occupied with the vexed questions of banking and currency. It recommends a reform of the system at present in operation in the state, by the establishment of a new state institution, with branches to supersede the local banks as their charters expire, in the following terms:

As a means of obviating the causes which have led to the present emergency, a favorable change might be made in our banking system. The Central bank is the only institution which has diffused its accommodations to the people of every occupation and profession throughout the state. This should be sustained by all the means at the command of the legislature. But, besides this institution, I am satisfied that the public interest would be promoted if there were but a single bank, located at our principal seaport, with a capital adequate to all commercial purposes, and required to establish a branch at each point at which banking facilities are needed.—The many advantages which this would have over the existing system must be manifest to all. Every section of Georgia would have the same currency, not liable to loss by unjust exactions of unreasonable premiums on exchange, and of nearly uniform value throughout the state. By establishing a substantial credit at home it would acquire confidence abroad, and enable those who wish to use their funds in other states to dispose of the notes at little or no sacrifice. There would be but little probability that those who embark in banking with the view of fabricating money for their own use, could bring the institution under their control so as to execute their purpose.— This should be effectually provided against in the charter. That many banks have charters as yet unexpired may give rise to some difficulty in carrying this measure promptly into operation. If the act of the Legislature should be so framed as to provide that no other bank should be chartered, and that the charters of those in existence, except that of the Central bank, should neither be renewed nor extended, it would attract the attention of capitalists, and accumulate strength as the other institutions expired. I submit these views to your consideration. It is expected that they will encounter the opposition of many of those who are desirous of the expediency of those laws and cities ambitious of retaining banks. But the public interest alone should be consulted, and the recommendation is made under the firm conviction that it will be promoted by it."

A reformation of the state judicial system, by the establishment of a supreme court, is also recommended, as well as the propriety of so altering the state constitution as to allow a change of venue in criminal cases. On these subjects the governor says:

"The attention of the general assembly has been frequently called to the amended constitution, authorising the establishment of a supreme court for the correction of errors. I again commend it to your consideration. When it is considered that the principal object of government is the attainment of justice, it is a matter of surprise that we should rest quietly under the imperfection of our system of jurisprudence. It is a matter of surprise that we should acquiesce in the decisions of the circuit judge original and irreversible, except at his will. His power in cases involving the life, property and liberty of the citizen, is absolute and appalling; and, but that we have been so long accustomed to its exercise by a single individual, it would not be tolerated for a day.

has been said, by those opposed to this reform in our judiciary, that if one judge errs, three may err. This is true; but it is also true that three are not so likely to err as one, especially when there is a right to appeal. The better, therefore, to expect to find a full and thorough investigation. The principle is anti-republican; for the same reasoning would apply to the legislature, and lead to the concentration of the law-making power in the hands of a single individual. The objection arising from the alleged delay of judicial proceedings cannot be available, unless it should be shown that the delay is caused by the error of an erroneous decision than by, prosecuting his rights, attain justice at a slight sacrifice of time.—The great utility of such a tribunal strongly recommends its adoption. It will produce uniformity of judicial determinations; by the settlement of legal principles it will diminish litigation; and, from the published reports of its decisions, an opportunity will be afforded to understand the authoritative interpretation of the laws.

"The constitutional provision, that the trial of all criminal cases shall be in the county in which the offense was committed, has given rise to much difficulty, and, in some instances, flagrant injustice. From the law regulating the selection of jurors, an offender has been enlarged on his own recognition, and, from another source, has been subjected to imprisonment in the common jail, from the impossibility of procuring a jury who had not expressed an opinion on his case. It is due to public justice that an impartial trial should be had in every case, and for this purpose it is absolutely necessary that power be given to the courts to direct a change of venue, and that justice cannot be done without giving this jurisdiction. By your notice, that you may give it the consideration to which, in your judgment it may be entitled."

Another part of the message adverts to the misunderstanding between the executive authorities of Georgia and New York respecting a fugitive from justice, who was charged with the abduction of a negro woman, and whom the governor of New York refused to arrest and surrender unless proof of the facts of the case was first submitted to him. After stating the circumstances at some length, the message proceeds to recommend the adoption of a regulation to prevent a recurrence of the evil, as follows:

"The spirit of fanaticism, against which we have to contend, is ardent, untiring, artful and insidious.

has sent its emissaries into a neighboring state, and perhaps into our own, in incendiary prints and publications, concealed in packages of goods. Although, as a body, the highly respectable merchants of New York are not generally disposed to engage in such a course, may not engage in such nefarious business, it is essential to our safety and interest that no avowed should be left open through which we may be assailed. The open ground occupied by the constituted authorities of New York is not a subject for controversy to doubt that a great part of the population of that great state are hostile to the institution of slavery; and that, for the purpose of destroying it, would destroy us. In this state of things, our safety requires that a system of police should be adopted that would afford a guarantee against the introduction of goods would therefore be recommended that a law be passed subjecting to inspection every package of goods that shall be imported, either directly or indirectly, from the state of New York, or any other state manifesting the same disposition of hostility to our institution. That such a law should be enacted, to execute the law, with sufficient salaries to be provided by duties on goods imported from these states; and moreover, that all suspected persons coming from such states be required to find surety for their good conduct; and particularly that they within in no manner interfere with the execution of such a law by the population while within our limits.²⁷

Much as are to be regretted such unfortunate misunderstandings between the executives of different states as those which form the basis of the above recommendation by Governor McDonald, we think it scarcely possible that there can exist any diversity of opinion as to the unconstitutionality of the measure here proposed for the better protection of the interests of the people of Georgia in their relations with the non-slaveholding states. Such a law, in our judgment, would be clearly unconstitutional.

The above extracts appear to us to embrace those points in the message which may be deemed to be of general interest. Besides these, the governor seems disposed to aid the cause of education, and is in favor of biennial instead of annual sessions of the legislature. [N. Y. Intell.]

TENNESSEE.

According to a recent enumeration this state contains 119,824 legal voters. At the presidential election, the vote was 108,680; at the preceding governor election, 106,794; at the late election of governor, about 107,000. [Sun.

We have accounts from Nashville to the 6th inst. The legislature had been occupied most of the week in electing judicial and other state officers. The wilds had again called on the thirteen oppositionists to make time to take up the resolution offered them the time since Mr. Speaker Burney, in order to fix a day for the election of United States senators; but, the question being taken, it was again decided in the negative—ayes 12, noes 13. The speaker stated, in reply to an inquiry addressed to him, that he had not yet fixed upon, or thought of, any particular day with which to fill the blank in the resolution.

HOME INDUSTRY.

The following article, for a copy of which amended from the pages of the Northern Light, we are indebted to its author, is commended to the serious consideration of the advocates of free trade, as well as to the friends of American industry. It treats of a topic, which will be all absorbing in the approaching session of congress, and of which we are quite as anxious to see the opinions which President Tyler will avow, as we are to see his proposed project for a fiscal contrivance to obviate banks, sub-treasury, fiscal agents, and fiscal corporations.

FREE TRADE AND PROTECTION TO AMERICAN INDUSTRY.

BY ISAAC K. LARRINCOTT

BY ISAAC K. LIPPINCOTT.

Within the space of ten months, the act of congress, called the compromise act, will have completed its full operations, and discrimination in favor of American labor and production, in the adjustment of duties on imports, will come to an end, if not previously changed. As that period, now so near, approaches, I conceive it becomes our duty to pause and inquire what is to be the result of this new order of things on the different branches of industry, and the condition of our country under it.

"If it were conceded that perfectly free trade is best for all nations, still the fact that no nation grants it to us is an argument conclusive why we should not grant it to them." All prosperous civilized nations have all capacities in their power to produce, and are producing more than they consume, and should we alone attempt to carry out the principles of free trade, the nations of Europe would still then, as now, receive only our cotton and a few other articles of first necessity, except under enormous duties, amounting in most cases to prohibition, and in some cases to all their products, such as light revenue duties, which would stop our manufacturers, and pay the balance in specie, until our stock of money would be so much exhausted, that prices of labor and all our productions would come to be at such low rates, that we should be compelled to go again into manufacturing, under this new condition, to supply our necessary wants, and thereby reduce the prices of labor and all our products to the same or a corresponding low rate of prices, and our laboring population to near the same degraded state as the laboring classes of Europe; and this must be the inevitable consequence of such a course of policy, for if cloth, or any other manufacture is made there with labor at twenty cents a day, it cannot, with a duty of twenty-two per cent on the cost there, or twenty on the valuation here, be made here and come in fair competition with the imported (the cost of the raw material, machinery, &c. being about in proportion) until the same kind of labor comes down to twenty-five cents a day.

The statesmen of our southern states, who are generally gentlemen of fortune, learning and leisure, have studied and adopted the doctrines of political economy laid down by Adam Smith, M. Say, Dr. Wayland and others, by which it is contended that the duty on the importation of any foreign product is exactly that amount of tax on the consumer, and if this duty is necessary to sustain the domestic production of the same article, it is still a tax on the consumer and a bounty to the producer to the amount of the duty on the foreign, and adds no revenue to the treasury of the country. In this doctrine, it is held, this we admit to be true. But there is another doctrine of political economy of a more practical nature that should also be taken into the account, to wit, the individual or nation that sells more than it buys, becomes rich, while those who buy more than they sell become poor; and again it continues to be a true proposition, that "the rich man rules over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender."

It is another doctrine of political economy, and is a true proposition in the abstract, that if a nation exports one-half of its coin, and receives for it the products of other countries in exchange, it is enriched to the extent of the coin so exported; and if it imports the remaining half will be expended, or the value of it increased so as to supply the place of the whole, or rather, which is the same thing, prices of all commodities would fall one-half. When this is accomplished, on the same principle one-half the remainder must be exported with a corresponding advantage. This could only be accomplished, especially in a country where the circulation is in coin, where there is no credit, and where every man has his equal or relative proportion of money and property; and will any one say it could be carried into operation in this country without ruin to three-fourths of the people? And now in the present condition of our country, to adopt to our abandonment of our duties, and practically to carry out those doctrines of political economy would be like a disaster.

The positions of the members of the British and French parliaments are such as to afford them every facility and inducement to thoroughly understand all the principles and policy of political economy, and yet we find the policy of these nations so bountiful, and still is restrictive and protective to the fullest extent, and that they thereby make other nations tributary to their aggrandizement and greatness, and we are now their debtors to an immense amount.

The produce of the soil and labor are the foundation of all wealth and subsistence, and all values are composed chiefly of these elements, whether they are the products of the mine, the loom, the forest, or the field. The produce of the soil is the basis of the soil, and if we put a bale of cotton at ten cents a pound, worth thirty dollars, and this is made into cloth, and the value increased to three hundred dollars by British labor, sustained by British agriculture, and we again receive back the cloth so made, we pay $270 for the encouragement of British agriculture, and the more we import, the more we increase the goods had been made in our own country.

The question at issue between the north and south on the subject of the tariff, I conceive to be briefly this: The cotton growing states, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Arkansas, five in number, and the slave producing states, five in number, will be best protected by importation and consuming largely of the products of foreign manufacture, and their admission at the lowest rate of duty. The eastern, middle and western states comprising the six New England states, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky and Michigan, sixteen in number, on the contrary, believe that the interests of their agriculture are best promoted by creating a home market, by the establishment of manufactures among us, where we can exchange the products of our soil for our clothing, iron, glass and many other foreign articles, which we do not produce. As the products of foreign labor, sustained by foreign agriculture, for the West Indies and South America would not take and consume half our surplus produce if we had no manufactures, and Europe will not in ordinary cases take it for the iron, cotton goods, cloth, &c. which we would be compelled to receive for abroad in case we did not produce them ourselves. The five remaining states of Virginia, North Carolina, Louisiana, Tennessee and Missouri, being partly cotton and sugar planting and partly grain growing states, I apprehend, are about as much interested on one side of this question as the other.—Allowing then, for the sake of the argument, that the interest of the five cotton growing states would be best promoted by adopting free trade, or adherence to the compromise act, (which I do not believe), and allowing also that the other five named states, from similarity of institutions and contiguous location, go for the same doctrine, we then have ten states, with a population of 5,543,629, (including slaves), for the interest of the five cotton growing states, and ten states, with a population of 10,974,731, for the other course, or, including the District of Columbia and the territories, a population of 6,000,000 to 11,000,000. Now the question arises, shall the majority or the minority yield? If it should be said that we have bound ourselves by the compromise act, we reply that that was on our part a temporary concession for peace, and nothing more.

The duties on sugar and molasses are doubtless efficient protection to the cotton growing interest, and are the means of appropriating to the culture of these much land that would otherwise be used for cotton. To take the duty on the sugar and molasses, much more of that would be imported. The strong and avowed hostility of the English to slavery, and their selfish and exclusive policy lead them to give all the encouragement they can to the culture of cotton in other countries.

The serious considerations are, the additional loss of labor and capital which seek and obtain profitable employment; and that if growing of cotton is more profitable than the cultivation of other agricultural products or manufacturing, capital and labor will be diverted to it, until it shall be reduced to a level with other products of the soil and manufacture. The soil is the versatile character and migratory propensity of the cotton plant, the cotton states, that as soon as they cannot realize a profit from the spinning of cotton or wool, or forging of iron, they will be found growing cotton, or in any other employment that will yield the most profit, until the market for that and other southern products is so glutted, that the price of their article is so reduced to the same state of depression as the agricultural and manufacturing interests of the north and west would be brought by the adoption of this free trade policy, and the withdrawing of protection from our manufacturing interests, should induce our southern citizens to pause, and examine the subject, and inquire whether or not to allow their labor and capital to be so employed, and whether or not the country a living protection is not also for their interest.

In case of war with England or France, the supplies of their manufactures and that market for cotton and other southern staples would be nearly all cut off and destroyed; and this is a strong reason why all the states of the union should unite in encouragement to our manufacturing interests, and to the cotton states to give them a home market in case the foreign is destroyed by war, or much reduced in time of peace, as appears to me is likely to be the case, from the cause above stated; and with all the protection that is asked by the north, judging from our cables of imports and exports, we shall still receive from Europe full as much or more than they will take of us we will pay for; and should not this be the case, the $200,000,000 principal, and $12,000,000 annual interest, that we are their debtors, will absorb all the surplus and more than we shall send them.

Our present policy, under the compromise upon us under a system of reduction of duties on foreign imports under the compromise act, and is the consequence of a combination of causes, one of which is the want of a duty on foreign manufactures sufficient to enable us to produce our own supplies of manufactured iron, and woollen, and cotton goods, and some other articles, and the other is the fact that some of the articles heretofore given will show, which might a large portion of them have been made in this country, and which, with our extensive internal improvement system, has enabled the nations of Europe to bring us so vastly their debtors, from the effects of which we are now suffering so much.

It has been the policy of our government, from the adoption of the compromise act, to break down the tariff on our manufactures; and up to 1824 all united in this laudable object, and up to 1833 the policy prevailed. But the belligerent condition of Europe, and our neutral position prior to 1808, were such as greatly to encourage and stimulate our agriculture and commerce, to the almost total neglect of manufactures; and the cotton growing states, feeling that some manufactures were necessary to supply the wants of the country and provide for our comfort. This called into existence various manufacturing establishments, and on the return of peace, the duties necessary to pay the expenses of the war, gave them ample protection and increased their amount. These duties came into our own consumption, feeding and sustained by different enactments of congress up to 1833, when the compromise act was passed. The reductions under that act have been so small and gradual, that as yet most of our establishments have been sustained. But its operations in 1842 must be most disastrous to many of them, it shall hereafter show. It thus came into our own dominion, the ability of the country to consume foreign products, and adopting the maxim, that "those who do not buy cannot sell," as it will diminish the ability of the consumers of this country to consume foreign products, the demand for cotton must also be diminished.

There is a capacity in times of peace and prolific seasons in our country to produce more than is wanted for our own consumption, and the surplus would take as much for our surplus products as would pay for such articles as their abundant capital and cheap labor would enable them to send us at lower rates, and us to purchase with the fruits of our own industry with a less amount of labor than we can make them for here, then the exchange would be in their favor, and the result would be the destruction of the industry; for with light taxation and abundance of cheap and fertile lands, we might export sufficient to pay for our imports, even without degrading our laboring population to that condition of poverty and ignorance that prevails among that class in Europe; such however, is not the case.

But, proclaim the doctrines of free trade, abolish all duties, and the protection of duties, and what would be the consequences?

The first would be an effort on the part of foreign manufactures to break down our rival manufacturing establishments, which they would to a great extent accomplish. The low prices to which their manufactured goods would be reduced, would induce them to reduce the price of their raw materials of men's step to pay for the excess of imports caused thereby; stop the operations of rival manufactures in this country; deprive the workmen engaged therein of their accustomed employment; sink a large amount of the capital invested therein, and bring a general depression and distress on the country, and all the branches of agriculture would suffer, including the producers of rice, cotton and tobacco, for our interests are so connected and interwoven, that while part are depressed the others cannot be prosperous.

In this country agriculture is the natural resort of most persons who fail of success in other occupations, and especially so of those accustomed to agriculture, and the more the manufacturing laborer effect could be to drive many of our now engaged in manufacturing to be farmers; and to those who have the means of acquiring but a small track of our cheap lands, its low price and great productiveness may afford the means of subsistence. But there are thousands who are engaged in agriculture, and who are unable to who must submit to such reductions in their wages and means of subsistence, as will reduce them to a state, approximating to that of the operatives employed in the manufacturing establishments of old countries, who subsist on soups, oatmeal and vegetables, getting meat perhaps once a week as a luxury, and who seldom if ever take tea or coffee, which are now used by nearly all our laboring population as necessary comforts.

This would still further depress our already depressed prices of agricultural products,* for the number of producers would be increased without any addition to the number of consumers. Our fellow citizens of the south contend that these low prices of the necessary articles of their consumption, would promote their interests by lightening the burthen on their products, and give them better profits on their capital and labor; but let them remember that without protection to the sugar and molasses of Louisiana and Florida, these states would produce immense quantities of cotton; and that as long as the production of cotton is more profitable than the culture of corn, wheat and other productions of the soil and manufactures, capital and labor will be diverted to that production, by appropriating to it lands now occupied with other crops, and the result will be the proving of new lands, until it will be brought to the same or a corresponding rate of reduced prices and profits as other agricultural products, by greatly increasing its products beyond the wants of consumption.

It should also be borne in mind that, while theorists are disseminating their doctrines of free trade, the governments of Europe, and especially the statesmen at the head of the British government, understanding their true interests, and carrying out the principle of protection to their own industry, are exerting great efforts to extend the culture of cotton in British India, in place of the China heretofore smuggled into China, and to render themselves independent of us as far as they can. And shall we adopt no measures to counteract that policy, and provide for our own wants?

Different countries of continental Europe are rapidly extending their manufacturing establishments and manufactured products, by the introduction of new and improved machinery, and the prices of their labor and provisions being lower than in England, they too, will soon be more powerful rivals in our markets.

Another feature is the paramount interest of our country, employing probably more than half of our population, and is, consequently, that which is most entitled to protection and encouragement. Hence the question arises, what course of policy is best calculated to effect this great object? We answer, the constitutional exercise of those powers and duties assigned by the people to the general government, and denied to the governments of the respective states, by the passage of such laws and the adoption of such regulations as will give our manufacturers the supply of our own market, countervail the restrictive policy of foreign nations, and protect the industry of our own citizens from the injurious competition of other countries. And the protection that we would give, should be by laying sufficient duties on such foreign agricultural products as our country is fitted to produce; and on such manufactured goods as, with a moderate discriminating duty, would afford sufficient protection for the people to the general government, and our country to such a state of defence as may be necessary to protect us against insult and aggression from foreign powers, and sustain our domestic industry. As the foreign demands for our pork, beef, butter, cheese, grain and flour are of very limited extent, and they are not at all inadmissible in our country, except when they become duties, or in times of scarcity there, it heats our duty to provide some market for the consumption of these products; and how otherwise can this be done but by providing a home market, by sustaining the production of manufactures that we have no other means to pay for, and which we can exchange the products of our home for which there is no market abroad, and thereby give direct and effectual protection not only to the grain and provision growing, but also to the sugar, cotton, rice and tobacco producing interest, as has been before shown.

We have not to be alleged, that all this may be done without these protecting duties: our answer is, that this is comparatively a new country; that much labor is necessarily employed in clearing up our new lands, building our houses, making our roads, and establishing the means of intercourse; and that money and accumulated active capital are not so abundant as in the manufactures of the United States, but give a few in one state only, which will afford some idea of their vast extent. In the state of Massachusetts there are 309 cotton factories, with 612,276 spindles; 203 woollen factories, with 112,930 spindles; 88 iron works; 749 slitting mills and nail machines; 28 card factories; 99 paper mills; and 5 glass factories. The amount of capital employed in manufacturing in this country is very large, and probably exceeds two hundred millions of dollars, and it is believed that a considerable portion of this vast amount would be lost if the comparative set of duties were to be changed. The following statement will show the operation of that act on some of our prominent manufactures, and particularly on those of iron, woollens and glass. By the act of 1832, a duty of four cents a pound, and forty per cent ad valorem was laid on imported wool costing over eight cents a pound; on cotton three cents per pound; on Brussels carpeting fifty cents the square yard; ingrained carpeting forty-five cents the square yard; on flannels, baizes, and coach leasings thirty-five per cent ad valorem; and on cloths, cassimeres and some other manufactures of wool, and on ready made clothing, fifty per cent ad valorem. On all printed, stained or painted broad cloth forty-three cents a square yard. On iron in bars or bolts, not manufactured by rolling, ninety cents per 112 pounds; on bar or bolt iron made by rolling, thirty dollars per ton; on pig iron fifty cents per 112 pounds, on vessels of cast iron one and a half cents per lb. and on white lead one and a half cents per lb. On all printed, stained or painted broad cloth three-sixteenths to eight-sixteenths of an inch, on nail or spike rods, or nail plates, band sheet or hoop iron, three cents per pound; on iron spikes four cents per pound; and on cut and wrought nails five cents per pound; on steel $1.50 per 112 pounds; pig lead three, and white lead one and a half cents on window glass not above eight by ten, three dollars per 100 feet; not above ten by twelve $3.50, and above ten by twelve $4; and on other manufactures of glass high rates of duty. On all manufactures of cotton twenty-five per cent ad valorem; and provided that all cotton goods not colored, and costing less than thirty cents the square yard, shall value at thirty cents the square yard; and all colored cotton goods costing less than thirty-five cents the square yard, shall be valued at thirty-five cents a square yard, and pay duty accordingly, thus making the duties on many articles of cotton forty to fifty per cent.

By the same act the duties on pig iron were reduced on cooler goods has been reduced by five per cent, and by that act, a reduction of eighteen per cent. will be made in the first six months of 1842, or taking the home valuation at two per cent. sixteen; thus, twelve per cent has been granted on iron in oil in six months, and sixteen per cent is suddenly to come in six months, and the reduction of duty on imported wool is about at the same rate. If our woollen manufacturers depended on the foreign market for their raw material, and if the cost of the wool was one-half of the cost of the manufactured goods, and if the cost of the wool was reduced by twelve per cent, then the manufacturers lose the sixteen per cent, which is much more than their present rates of profit, and consequently they cannot go on until provisions, wool and labor are correspondingly reduced in prices. And so, too, with regard to some articles of the cotton manufacture.

The reduction of duty on cotton goods being twenty per cent, and that on a valuation of not less than thirty cents per square yard on white goods; if the cost was fifteen cents the square yard, the duty would be fifty per cent; and on colored goods costing seventeen and a half cents or less per square yard, the duty would be fifty per cent, and on white goods the duty would be reduced by deduction already made twelve per cent, and in the first six months of 1842 sixteen per cent; and besides the manufactures of cotton goods, which come in competition with the imported, will not have the advantage that may result to the woollen manufactures in a reduction of the cost of the raw material. Cotton stuffs for men's summer wear, muskies, calicoes and some other cotton goods are imported in large quantities under the present rates of duty, and with a duty of only twenty per cent ad valorem, doubtless much greater quantities of these and other articles will be imported.

The prices of pig iron in Liverpool in December last were from 45s 12s to 44s, and taking it at the best price, which was for No. 1 or best quality, and rating the pound sterling at $4 20, is $19 20. Add for freight and other expenses, say 3 80 Making the cost when landed here, $23 00

Duty of pig iron by act of 1832 is, per ton $10 00
The four biennial reductions, rating the cost at $19 20 2 46
Making the present duty $7 54
Twenty per cent. on $23, the cost here with freight, and expenses added 4 60

Making the reduction in first six months $2 94
Or about fifteen per cent.

The price of bar iron in Wales the 3rd of April last has been stated to the 47 5s. which is equal to $35 80
Allow for freight and other expenses 4 20

Making the reduction in first six months of 1842 $14 84
Or about thirty-seven per cent. reduction of duty on the cost in Wales on the present rates paid. The quotations of nail rods in Wales in April last, 1841, was 45s 10s and hoops 410s, the average of these would be 47 5s. 6d.; but we will take 49 10s. as the average price of these and sheet iron, rods and other iron subject to the duty of three cents per pound, and the calculation and reductions will stand thus: $49 10s. equal $45 80
Say transportation and other expenses 4 40

The duty of three cents per lb. amounts to $67 20
The four biennial reductions, the excess over 20 per cent. on the cost in Wales is 19 23

Leaving the present rate of duty $47 97
Twenty per cent. on the cost here in 1842 say on $50, is 10 00

Making the reduction of duty in 1842 per ton $37 97
Or on $45.60, the cost in Wales, of 85 per cent.*
On spikes, cut nails and some other articles the duty amounts to a prohibition.

The rates of reduction on window glass and pig lead, white lead, ready made clothing, shoes, boots, floor cloths, carpeting and many other articles will be very great. Of some of the above enumerated articles subject to these high rates of duty, large quantities have been annually imported. Of some, the home production has chiefly supplied the consumption, and of others entirely. The reports of the secretary of the treasury show the following amount of importations of some of the above enumerated articles:

	Value, 1836.	Value, 1837.	Value, 1838.	Value, 1839.
	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.
Cotton manuf. 12,536,187	11,139,513	10,639,390	11,197,407
Wool no ds. 12,758,130	14,243,348	6,767,500	10,616,067
Iron & steel 12,992,641	11,119,513	9,148,534	6,768,291
Wool costing over 8 cents per lb.			174,918
Leather			1,305,793
Glassware			659,474
Rice cotton 2,222,728 pounds, amounting to			287,435

In addition to the large amounts of these goods imported, the aggregate amount of the same articles produced in the country, is probably at least three or four times as much, and the effect on those branches of our manufactures by the great reductions of 1842 has already been stated. It is my opinion that on the articles of pig iron, bar iron, sheet, hoop and all sorts of rolled iron, nails, wire and steel, and on window glass, and white and other lead, and perhaps some other articles, which generally are of near intrinsic value, the duties imposed ought to be specific, and not ad valorem duties; because more easily ascertained, and not liable to be influenced by fraudulent or conflicting valuations or invoices, and also because it would prevent the fluctuations in the market here from being as great as under ad valorem duties, because the amount of duty being uniform, the duty paid, when low in the place from whence imported, will be the same as when high, and hence the difference in cost here would be only the difference in

*There is now, September 6, 1841, owing to the failure of crops, a great additional price in the price of pork is extremely low, with small demand, and also other provisions.

*I am informed that iron in Great Britain has recently fallen in price, so that the quotations here give a probably new about the prices in Liverpool; and I apprehend the allowance given for freight, &c. high enough.

price there, and not the fall in price there, and a corresponding fall in the amount of duty also.

I also believe that the duties on all articles imported into this country, and revenue duties should be paid, whenever taken into the possession of the importer or consignee to be brought into the market, as provided in the compromise act. This would have a tendency to check excess of imports, and to prevent fluctuations in the money market, and in the currency; for then, revenue duties should be paid, and be brought in, the demands for money to pay the duties would at once check such excess, and prevent those fluctuations which have so frequently occurred under the system of long credits heretofore given.

The peculiar state of the times which we are now experiencing, and which have been brought upon us by excessive importations, short crops and an expanded currency, have so diminished our national revenues, that some alterations or amendments in our tariff laws are required for the support of government. Hence the question arises, in what manner shall this be accomplished so as best to promote the general prosperity of our whole country? I am aware that there is a diversity of opinion on this important and difficult subject, and that our fellow citizens of the south believe that protection operates injuriously on them. But I am fully confident that if the principles of manufacturing, and the products of our manufactures, and particularly those of wool, iron and glass, and some others are not granted, many of them in the year 1842 will be compelled to cease operations and discontinue their business altogether, which will produce injury to the south as well as the north. Not can our revenue at any distant period unless the prices of labor and all the products of agriculture, partaking of the general depression which must follow, (without the occurrence of war or some unforeseen like cause), shall be so depressed that they can be reconstituted, and again put in operation under a new condition of our highly happy and prosperous country.

We have the best country, the best government, and the most intelligent and enterprising population in the world, and yet, by some wrong steps, we have got into some temporary difficulty, which, by pursuing the right course, may soon be retrieved; but before we do so, we must not let ourselves be voluntarily brought ourselves into still greater difficulty and distress, by running into the opposite extreme. Let us not adopt any plausible abstract theories in preference to tried and successful practice, and in grasping at a phantom lose a good and substantial one.

It has been found by experience, that in many cases protection diminishes prices by stimulating production and competition at home with the foreign, until the prices are reduced to lower rates than the same articles could be previously imported at from abroad.

In the articles of coarse cotton goods, shews, hats, and some other articles, the product of what is generally denominated mechanical labor, and perhaps cut nails and some products of our larger manufacturing establishments, I have no doubt but they are much cheaper, taking their superior durability into the account, than they would be if introduced into the market from the duties of the foreign, and our coarse cotton fabrics rival the foreign in foreign markets; and in many other articles, the competition of our own with the foreign, gives them to the consumer at cheaper prices than he would receive the foreign, with a revenue duty. But admitting that the articles come to the consumer at prices higher than they would be if the duties were taken off (which has been already shown is not the fact), yet the better market afforded to the farmer and planter for his products by the establishment of these manufactures among us, more than remunerates him for any small additional price he may have to pay in consequence of the duties. Hence the commerce of the country sustains our manufactures; our manufactures sustain our agriculture; and both contribute to our commerce; and when our agriculture, which is our greatest interest, is prosperous, it imparts its benefits to all other classes, by enabling them to consume more of the products of the country. If the farmer cannot sell he cannot buy; and when his crops are abundant, without a foreign demand, and prices are thereby reduced to one-half, the cities, towns and villages get their supplies of provisions for one-half the money they did before, and they have the other half on hand unavailable; and receiving but half as much money, can expend but half as much for the articles they would desire to purchase; hence the merchant and mechanic gets but half employment, and so it is with all the trades, and does not half as much money, for rents and foreign goods do not fall in proportion. This is no fiction, but has been in a measure the condition of our country; and will be again, if free trade doctrines are to prevail. And as the prosperity or adversity of the north, as already stated, is the basis of the south, and the more or less degree, the cotton, rice and tobacco growing states are now in common with us, suffering from the causes already assigned.

If our southern statesmen would look to facts and practical results, instead of abstract theories of political economy, which, although true in theory, are in practice applicable to our country in its present condition; and could they be able to lay aside all prejudice, I firmly believe that they would see this subject as I do, and discover that it is for their true interest as well as ours to be willing, nay, desirous to afford to our existing manufactures a living protection, which is all that we ask; and this we consider that in the interests of our commerce, equity and good faith; and we are fully aware that a stimulating protection is injurious to the true interests of the manufacturers themselves, and we do not desire it.

This is a question involving great national interests, nay, our national independence, and should be considered in a different manner than it is. I am fully aware with a feeling of patriotism and concession, I believe that it would be easy to reconcile conflicting opinions; and that it would be discovered that the interests of our country are one and the same; that the same course of policy that will give prosperity to the east and north, and the middle and west, will also confer it on the south; and that we should not trust for much of our necessary supplies to any country which may soon be in hostile array to our enemy.

A certain amount of revenue is required for the support of our national government, which we trust all will admit, should be raised by duties on our imports, and which is raised by such discriminating duties as will enable our manufactures, already established, to continue operations, or shall be laid on all alike, without reference to that object; if affecting the interests of the south at all, I apprehend, for the reasons already given, that their true interests will be promoted by the adoption of the former course of policy. The usual estimate of profit on manufactures is ten per cent. per annum on the capital invested. At least half of this is spent and absorbed in wear and tear of machinery, decay of buildings, the support of family, &c. so that if you take from the income on his capital, and thereby raise his business, and leave him with only a living and no clear income; and reduce it ten per cent. and his means of subsistence from income is also gone, and his buildings and machinery rendered of no value, for the value of property is measured by its income, and if yielding no income, it is of no value, and is of no use to other purposes; and is it not evident, from the statements already given, that in many branches of our manufactures, the reductions in the first six months of next year are much over ten per cent?

It is said that the manufacturers will receive efficient support from a system of cash duties and home valuation provided for in the compromise act. I would let it examine this subject, and see how it stands. I have no practical experience in the importing business, nor have I made particular inquiries into this subject, but will give what I consider a liberal average estimate and allowance for them; and first, the cost of the goods to be imported, and nearly all other expenses of domestic manufacture are the same, and are, as before the article is brought into market, and hence the importers should pay cash for the duties to put them on an equal footing with the American manufacturer in this respect. Suppose the freight to be five per cent. on the cost, which, taking light and local charges, would be about six per cent. on very low priced goods, such as iron, salt, &c. are brought at very low rates of freight as ballast. To this we will add five per cent. more for insurance, commission and contingent expenses, making on what cost in Europe $100, amount to $110 landed here, and leaving the manufacturer $10. If the tariff duty is $100, the cost there or an addition of ten per cent. to the twenty, or nominally twenty per cent. and really twenty-two per cent. as the average duty on importation, so that what in England or France costs twenty cents, must bring here twenty-four, four cents per cent. more than the cost. If the goods are not subjected, that exchange on England is generally eight to ten per cent. above par, and should be taken into the account, I answer that this is merely nominal and not real, for the true par of exchange on England is about nine per cent. for in giving the quotations the pound sterling is rated at $44.44, as fixed a long time ago, whereas its real value is about $4.84, and nine per cent. on $4.44, brings it to about $4.84, and nine gold sovereigns, being a pound sterling, sell for in our markets.

Our fellow citizens of the south complain that these protecting duties are onerous on them, and operate to our exclusive benefit. And that we are prosperous while they are depressed and suffering. If this last is so, I apprehend another and more correct reason may be given for the depression of the south, man, woman and child is employed in some kind of labor, and we work for and earn our own living and this being the case, and knowing how what we get for our labor comes, we are very economical, and take good care of our earnings; and hence we generally succeed in making ourselves a good living, getting some education, paying our debts, and have wherewith to be comfortable. How far these virtues are practised in the south, I have not so good an opportunity of judging. It is very common in this country to condemn the British and French corn laws, and to justify our protecting tariff on the ground of retaliation alone. I however conceive, that although this is a good example and ground of justification in us, and a confirmation of the policy of protection, and that we should follow it; yet I cannot see that the repeal of their corn laws would benefit us; for except in case of a failure of the crops on the continent of Europe, they will be supplied there from them; that is, the British grow wheat now stand, the bread stuffs of Canada are admitted with little or no duty; and ours going to Canada free of duty to supply its place, makes a market for some of our wheat, and to that may be chiefly attributed the recent rise in price here.

The repeal of British corn laws would change and unsettle the existing order of things there; and although I cannot by any means commend or justify that, yet I think it may be fairly questioned, in case the monarchy, hierarchy, and aristocracy are to be upheld and supported as at present, whether the repeal of their corn laws would operate more to good than evil for the nation; for it would be a great change, and might be injurious to them, and I cannot see that it would benefit us. It is true, there are thousands of people in those countries without steady and full employment, or means of subsistence, and ready to work at almost any rate of wages, and who might be put to work for the nation; for it would be a great change, so would the means, and the aristocracy and great land holders could not afford to consume as much, or give as much employment to labor, nor pay so much in taxes and poor rates, neither could the farmers, their tenants.

If we could act upon the principle of universal benevolence and philanthropy, and endeavor to benefit the suffering poor of Europe, then indeed should we lower our duties, and let the products of their labor come freely, and confer on them a benefit, provided their rapacious rulers did not lay additional burthens accordingly; but if we would prevent the poor and suffering population of our own country from sinking to a like desperate state, then give protection to the products of their labor. I therefore conceive "there is an urgent necessity" for an early alteration of the compromise act, and a general revision of the tariff at as early a day as practicable in the next session of congress; and if its details cannot be completed by the 1st of January, 1842, let the great reductions then to take place be postponed by resolution of that body.

The greater the variety and diversity of employments in a country, the better the opportunity for all persons to be profitably employed; and the more the variety of employments, labor is held out, the greater the amount of wealth, and the more the country is appropriated to manufactures that would otherwise lie unproductive or unemployed; and whatever poor females and children are employed in them, and the means of subsistence, by the products of their labor, education and industrious habits afforded them, is thereby secured to the country; and I believe that the amount of gain thus brought into the country is not less, and is more numerous, and almost incalculable; for in all communities that have become populous, there is some capital and much labor that is thus made productive, that without manufacturing establishments would be almost entirely lost to the community.

The question is not now whether we shall have manufactures or not, for we have them already, and cannot do without them; but whether we shall afford them such protection as will enable those we already have to go on now and continue their operations, or after the country is depressed to its lowest state, property sacrificed, labor deprived of employment, and property sacrificed, and other products reduced to the lowest rates, those who survive the shock shall resuscitate them under the new order of things thereby produced.

Let me inquire whether the country will be better off, independent of other considerations, by having 300 millions of dollars invested in foreign commerce, and our work shops 3,000 miles off, or with 150 millions in foreign, and 100 millions in domestic trade, and the other fifty millions devoted to production in agriculture and manufactures and released from the exchange of products? Is it not clear that the country has fifty millions more of productive capital, with a corresponding amount of productive labor for its own exchange? Its products are only made between the towns and adjoining country, or one town or state and another, much less capital and labor will effect it than if made with a foreign country.

A country that manufactures the articles of its own consumption, will support a much larger population and become more civilized, than a country that exports its cultural one; because then, not only the producers reside in the country, but the consumers also; and hence the population may be doubled, and a country that manufactures for export may sustain a still greater population.

There cannot be a doubt but that the high wages and full employment given to labor by our protecting tariffs, have been the means of greatly increasing emigration to this country, and have produced that result in three different ways: 1st, the high price for labor; 2d, the ready home market, and better prices given for our agricultural staples; and 3d, the diminished demand thereby caused for labor in Europe.

Will any one deny that emigration to this country has been one of the great sources of our power and greatness? and will any refuse to give encouragement to its continuance?

It is true, that many paupers and outcasts are thrown upon our shores; and it is also true, that hundreds of thousands of the best subjects of European princes, and the oppressed of all nations, yearly here find an asylum, and a hearty welcome in this land of peace, plenty, liberty and equality. Here the blessings of liberty may be enjoyed, and all may worship their Creator according to the dictates of their own consciences.

It is from emigration that we first became a nation, and from it we are rapidly adding to our national prosperity and importance.

My opinion is, that the whole tariff system requires a revision, and that a fair living protection should be given to our agriculture, and such of our manufacturing establishments as are already in existence; and can prosper with duties not to exceed the present rates paid; and that a fair protection should also be given to such other branches, if any, as are now carried out of the country. That the duties on spirits taxed high, and especially distilled spirits and wines. That necessary articles of consumption, now free of duty and not coming in competition with our own industry, shall, as far as is consistent with the requirements of the treasury, be left free; and those that must be taxed for revenue, shall be such as are not objected to by the rich than the poor.

Since the passage of the compromise act, it seems as though our manufacturers and farmers, who are most directly interested, have either lost sight of the actual condition of this subject under the slow and gradual reductions thereof, or else they have supposed that progress would be made, and never a revision of it hopeless; but I am of opinion that the great body of both have lost sight of it, and do not fully understand its operations, or the injurious effects it will produce on their business and the country in the first six months of the coming year, and a long time afterwards, if not changed.

I am aware that the same is some repetition in my statements and arguments, which in some cases are necessary to give different illustrations of the same facts, and have arisen in other cases from the fact, that the article was written at different intervals, as business engagements permitted. Gladly would I have been released from the labor bestowed on these subjects, but I conceive it to be a duty imperatively laid upon me; and if my feeble efforts shall be of any avail in bringing to it that consideration which it merits, I shall feel happy in having discharged my duty.

Freehold, N. J. Sept. 6, 1841.

THE McLEOD CASE.

Having registered the decision of Judge COWEN, of the supreme court of the state of New York, as to the jurisdiction of the state authority in this case we now insert a very ably written review of that decision, which is attributed to the pen of Judge TALLMAGE, of the superior court of the city of N. York, and has been universally admitted to be clear, precise and logical. It has elicited the concurring testimony of several of the most eminent jurists in this country and agrees with the position taken by Mr. WEBSTER in his correspondence, and by John Quincy Adams in his recent speech in the house of representatives.

It is so far as it may operate as a precedent, in questions between the authorities of the states and of the general government as to jurisdiction that might lead to a dispute or war with a foreign power, that this case remains of vital importance, an importance with which Alexander McLeod individually has now nothing more to do.

REVIEW OF JUDGE COWEN'S OPINION,

IN THE CASE OF ALEXANDER McLEOD,

The importance of the questions involved in the opinion delivered by Judge COWEN, of the supreme court of the state of New York, in the case of Alexander McLeod, and the erroneous principles of national law put forth in that opinion, seem to require that the true doctrines involved in the case should be placed in a correct light before the country. To that end, we have ventured to embody the result of our examination of the subject in the following review of Judge COWEN'S opinion.

The opinion is deficient in methodical arrangement of the several positions taken and maintained by the judge; and this confusion is increased by a badly arranged citation of authorities, and a rambling mode of discussing the subjects. It is also much defective in being nearly double the length required to discuss the matters really in issue, even in Judge COWEN'S mode of discussing them. Why, for example, go through with an examination of the question whether our courts have jurisdiction, and a right to try a foreigner for a crime committed within our state, and quote the authorities bearing upon the subject to prove the jurisdiction, when a person, lawyer or layman, ever doubted it and when the judge himself finally says, "want of jurisdiction has not been put on the ground that McLeod was a foreigner."

The other branch of the question of jurisdiction, discussed at great length by the judge, seems to us an equal waste of time and labor. It is not a question of jurisdiction. McLeod does not involve any question of jurisdiction; for it must be conceded that our courts have jurisdiction over all cases of murder committed within the boundary of our state. McLeod's case presents for consideration—not a question of jurisdiction, but a question of guilt or innocence; whether the homicide which he is charged be a crime according to the law of nations.

If a sheriff should, in pursuance of a sentence, hang a person convicted of murder, and after the execution it should be ascertained that the person executed was innocent, and a grand jury should thereupon impanel a verdict of acquittal, would the execution of the sheriff be null and void? No; for the execution of the sheriff would not interpose an objection to the jurisdiction of the court, but would rely for its defence and justification upon the fact of a conviction by a court of competent jurisdiction; thereby showing that the homicide in him was not a crime.

So also if a soldier should be tried by a court martial, sentenced to be shot; and, after his execution, those engaged in it should be indicted for murder; their defence would not be a want of jurisdiction in the state court, but a justification before that court, under a regular court martial, conviction and sentence, thereby showing that the homicide was not a murder.

Suppose after the peace with Great Britain, a British soldier had come within our state, and had been arrested and indicted for murder committed in the attack on Buffalo during the war; he would not think of raising a question of jurisdiction in the court, but would rely on the law of nations to justify the homicide, and relieve him from the charge of crime. It is a question of the jurisdiction of the state court raised, it necessarily admits the charge or claim preferred. The plea to the jurisdiction is one of confession and avoidance; surely the counsel of McLeod never intended to admit, for a moment, the crime of murder, with which he was charged, and seek to escape the consequences by alleging that the court had not jurisdiction over the offence! In this part of the opinion, therefore, we think the judge must have been fighting a shadow of his own casting.

There is, also, another part of this opinion, and no inconsiderable part of it, that appears to be a want of learning and authorities. It is that part in which the judge probes, beyond question, "that every voluntary entrance into neutral territory, with hostile purposes, is absolutely unlawful;" yet, after an elaborate discussion of this question, a citation of authorities at great length to prove the unlawfulness of the violation of our territory by England, the Judge says, "that the act was one of mere arbitrary usurpation, was not denied on the argument; nor has this, that I am aware of, been denied by any one except England herself."

We concede that the authorities cited show that the hostile attack upon the Caroline, and the violation of our territory, was unlawful; that is, without adequate cause; but not one of all the authorities which pronounce a violation of territory unlawful, denounce upon the military of the nation, under whose authority it is done, any personal penalty.

If we examine history, we shall find that quite as many wars have been commenced without, as with adequate cause, when tested by the general reason and sense of mankind; yet no one ever thought of making that the test of the impunity belonging to the military offence. Such a test can only be applied to controversies between individuals, where there is a common arbiter or judge to decide; never between nations, who admit no judge but themselves. The argument, therefore, on the side of McLeod, is not at all weakened by not denying that the attack was unjustifiable on the part of his nation.

In the examination of this subject, we shall concede what has never been denied, and what has taken so much of this learned opinion to prove, to wit: that a foreigner is liable to be tried by our courts for crimes committed within the state; that the courts have jurisdiction over all persons committed within the state; and for the sake of the argument, that the hostile expedition, in which the Caroline was burned, and Durlee killed, was an unlawful violation of our territory.

We proceed, then, to the discussion of the main question involved in this case, to wit, whether McLeod is entitled to the impunity of a soldier in time of war.

The points sought to be established by the affidavit of McLeod, are thus concisely stated by Judge COWEN:

"That the Niagara frontier was in a state of war against the contiguous province of Upper Canada; that the homicide was committed by McLeod, if at all, as one of a military expedition, set on foot by the Canadian authorities to destroy the boat Caroline; that he was a British subject; that the expedition crossed our boundary, sought the Caroline at her moorings in Schlosser, and there set fire to and burned her; and that the acts of our citizens, as it is lawful to do in time of war."

From such a state of facts Judge COWEN takes his position in relation to the rights and liabilities of England and her military, as follows:

"I deny that she can, in time of peace, send her men into our territory, and send them upon missions to our laws, by emboldening them and arming them in their hands. She may declare war if she elicits the benefit of peace, as both nations have done in this instance, the moment any of her citizens enter our territory, they are as completely obnoxious to punishment, by our law, as if they had been engaged in any crime against our laws."

"I will not, therefore, discuss the construction which counsel put upon the language or the acts of England. To test the law of the transaction, I will enquire that she had, by act of parliament, conferred all the power which can be contended for in behalf of the Canadian authorities, as far as she could do so."

This, we confess, is meeting the question boldly; and we accept, for the sake of the argument, and for the present, the concession of the sufficiency of the power conferred on the Canadian authorities. Before we leave the subject, however, we will dispense with this concession, and establish the sufficiency of this power, by showing that Congress has constructed it upon the question as before stated by Judge COWEN.

It applies to it the law of nations, as follows: "To warrant the destruction of property, or the taking of life, on the ground of public war, it must be what is called lawful war by the law of nations, a thing which can never exist without an actual Congress, or a Congress in session. This, on the part of the United States, is Congress; on the part of England, the quon. A state of peace and the continuance of treaties must be presumed by all courts of justice till the contrary be shown; and this is a presumptio juris et de jure, until the national power of the country in which such courts sit, officially declares the contrary."

Now the entire error in the opinion of the judge arises from the erroneous principle of international law which he here lays down.

All will agree that the war which affords impunity to those who violate the laws of a belligerent, is not by the term lawful war is not meant a defensive and formal war only; on the contrary, it comprehends every description of war, except hostile expeditions set on foot for purposes of plunder and pillage, without any apparent cause.

Kaufmann says: "If one nation seizes the goods of another nation by force, upon account of some dismage, &c., such contentions by force are reprisals.—There are by no means dicta of h. h. h. under the name of reprisals, such as the besieging each other's towns, or the sinking of each other's fleets, whilst the nations in other respects are at peace with each other.—These are public wars, because nations are the contending parties. But as they are confined to some particular object, they are of the imperfect sort, &c." B. iii. c. 9, s. 10.

In opposition to this authority, it will be seen that Judge Cowex starts with the proposition, that so long as the entire peace of the two nations is not broken up—in other words, until congress shall declare war against England, or the queen of England against us, there cannot be a state of war that will warrant the destruction of property, or the taking of life in conflict, on either side. To convert that proposition, we bring not only Rutherford, as above cited, but Vattel, in language it possible still more explicit.—B. iii. c. 9, s. 167.

"A war lawful and in form, is carefully to be distinguished from an unlawful war entered 'on without any form, or rather from those incursions which are committed either without lawful authority or apparent cause, as if the rights of the nations were at peace, for larceny and pillage. Grotius, b. iii. chap. 3, relates several instances of the latter. Such were the wars of the Grandes Compañias, which had assembled in France during the wars with the English; armies of banditti which ranged about Europe purely for spoil and plunder, and such as were committed without open commission and in time of peace; and such in general are the depredations of pirates. To the same class belong almost all the expeditions of the African corsairs, though authorised by a sovereign, they being founded on no apparent just cause, and whose only motive is the avidity of gain. I say that such wars are unlawful and unfair, are to be carefully distinguished; their effects and the rights arising from them being very different."

Here we have Vattel, distinguishing all the hostile collisions of nations into "two sorts of wars," the one sort being undertaken "without apparent cause, and for 'harve and pillage,' and all that do not come under the denomination of a proper sort. Having thus divided wars into two sorts, the one he calls unlawful war, the other lawful."

Vattel does not, like Judge Cowex, call all wars unlawful that are not formally and solemnly declared by the "war-making power" of a government, but he pronounces all hostile attacks lawful wars, if made with authority, and for "apparent cause," and not for "pillage and larceny."

Chancellor Kent, too, admits that a formal declaration of war is not essential to make the war lawful. All that is required to make a lawful war is, that the hostilities be authorised by the proper authorities.—1 Kent Com. 54.

"Since the treaty of Brinkershoek, it has become settled in the practice of Europe, that war may lawfully exist by declaration which is unilateral only, or without a declaration on either side. It may begin with mutual hostilities. In the war between England and France, in 1778, the first public act on the part of England was recalling its minister; and that single act was considered as a breach of the peace, and the peace between the two countries. There was no other declaration of war, though each government afterwards published a manifesto, in vindication of its claims and conduct. The same thing may be said of the war which broke out in 1793, and again in 1803. The first declaration was a breach of the peace, and a formal declaration of war in the unilateral style, was made in June, 1756, various hostilities had been carried on for a year preceding."

In the same explicit manner Rutherford speaks, denying the necessity of a declaration of war to make the war lawful:

"It is only a real effect of a declaration of war is, that it makes the war a general one, or at least, that the whole nation against another whole nation, whilst the imperfect sorts of war, such as reprisals, or acts of hostility, are confined to particular persons, or things, or places."—Ruth. B. 2, ch. 9, s. 8.

These questions do not depend entirely upon the opinions of celebrated writers on national law. They have been illustrated by judicial decisions, in cases of hostilities upon the ocean.—Dobson's Admiralty Reports, 247.

A declaration of war was issued by Sweden against Great Britain, on account of the encroachments of the latter upon her rights as a neutral nation. It was considered before Sir William Scott, that the two countries were not in a state of war, and that the declaration was unilateral only. "I am, however, perfectly clear," says Sir William Scott, "that it was not less a war on that account; for war may exist without a declaration on either side. It is so laid down by the best writers on the law of nations. A declaration of war by one country only is not, as has been represented, a mere challenge, to be accepted or refused at pleasure by the other. It proves the existence of actual hostilities, on one side at least, and puts the other party also into a state of war; though he may, perhaps, think proper to act on the defensive only."

Thus, it will be perceived, a lawful war may be commenced without any formal declaration, and it may be manifested by an act of hostility, without any previous notice, and whether it become a general one or an imperfect war, depends upon the extent to which hostilities are carried. It will always be a lawful war, if the hostilities are authorised by the proper authority, and are not mere waaton depredations, without any apparent cause.

Are the military engaged in such hostile attacks personally responsible?

The same principle of impunity applies to hostilities upon the land or sea. When they are waanton and malicious, and for plunder and spoils, at sea, they are called piracy. Hostilities by land, from similar motives, are called robbery. Hostilities, in general, therefore, in relation to hostilities at sea, and the impunity or liability of vessels and crews, furnish the rule of impunity or liability to be applied to the military, in cases of hostilities upon land.

Wharton, 41, Story says: "A piratical aggression by an armed vessel sailing under the regular flag of any nation, may be justly subjected to the penalty of confiscation for such a gross breach of the law of nations. But every hostile attack, in the time of peace, is not necessarily piratical. It may be by mistake, or in necessary self-defence, or to repel a supposed meditated attack by pirates—it is justifiable and then no blame attaches to the act, or it may be without just excuse, and then it carries responsibility in damages. If it proceed further; if it be an attack from revenge and malignity, from gross abuse of power and settled purpose of mischief, it then assumes the character of private unauthorised war, and may be punished by all the general laws which the law of nations can properly administer."

The same principle is recognized in 1 Kent's Com. 188: "An alien, under the sanction of a national commission, cannot commit piracy while he pursues his authority. His acts may be hostile, and his nation may be punished by all the general laws which the law of nations can properly administer."

How perfectly does this principle cover the case in question. The attack upon the Caroline was hostile and unlawful, and the British nation must be held responsible for it. It amounts to a lawful cause of war, but they are engaged in acting under lawful authority, can never be regarded as robbers or plunderers, or liable to be punished criminally.

This principle has been fully recognized in the judicial decisions of the English courts. We have not the case at hand as reported, and therefore avail ourselves of it as extracted by Chancellor Kent.—1 Kent Com. 190.

"In the English admiralty, in 1801, it was contended that the capture and sale of an English ship, by Algerines, was an invalid and unlawful conversion of the property, on the ground of being a piratical seizure. It was, however, decided that the African nation had the character of a nation of sovereign governments, and that though their notions of justice differ from those entertained by the Christian powers, their public acts could not be called in question; and a derivative title, founded on an Algerine capture, and matured by a confiscation, in their way, was good against the original owner."—Citing The Helena, 4 Rob. 3.

Shall it be said that an English court has held an Algerine capture lawful, because made under the sanction and authority of that government; and a title thus acquired valid against the original English owner of the captured vessel; and yet the supreme court of New York decide that a hostile attack upon a vessel had been engaged in, acting under the sanction of the British government, shall not protect the military engaged in it from the punishment due to cold-blooded murder? We regret to say it has been so said and decided.

The decisions of the courts of England and the United States, in regard to the impunity of vessels and crews engaged under the character of national governments, are decisions merely carrying out principles long since adopted by the most approved elementary writers upon national law, and giving to those principles the authority of solemn adjudications by the highest judicial tribunals of the world.

These judicial writers, who speaking of war generally, and more particularly in reference to hostilities upon land, hold that whenever the hostile attack is made under the authority of government, it becomes an affair between the two nations, and no individual responsibility rests upon the actors.

Thus, Vattel, speaking of war that is unjust on the part of the sovereign who waged it, but lawful, because not without apparent cause, and not for havoc and pillage, says:

"But as to the reparation of any damage—are the military, the general officers and soldiers obliged, in consequence, to repair the injuries which they have done, not of their own will, but as instruments in the hands of their sovereign? It is the duty of subjects to support the claims of their sovereign just and wise," &c. When, therefore, they have lent their assistance in a war which is afterwards found to be unjust, the sovereign alone is guilty. He alone is bound to repair the injuries. The subjects, and in particular the military, are innocent; they have acted on from a necessary obedience. "Government would be impracticable, if every one of its instruments were to weigh its commands," &c.—Vattel, b. iii. c. 11, sec. 187.

"Nothing of all this takes place in a war void of form and unlawful, where properly called robbery, being waanton. It is not productive of so much as apparent cause. It can be productive of no lawful effect, nor give any right to the author of it. A nation attacked by such sort of enemies, is not under any obligation to observe towards them the rules of war in form. It may treat them as robbers."—Vattel, b. 3, c. 4, s. 68.

Thus we have "these two sorts of wars, lawful and unlawful," carried through by Vattel to their consequences; and all persons engaged are entitled to have "observed towards them the rules of war," except those engaged in "incursions committed without apparent cause, and only for havoc and pillage."

The same position in regard to the immunity of soldiers is also maintained by Rutherford:

"The external lawfulness of what is done in a war, in respect of the members of a civil society, extends to public wars of the imperfect sort, to acts of reprisals, or to other acts of hostility, &c."—B. ii. c. 9, s. 15.

And again he says: "Neither for the reason of the thing, nor the common practice of nations, will give them any other impunity, or allow them any otherwise to obtain property in what is taken, where war has been declared, than in the less solemn kinds of war, which are made without a previous declaration." &c. "In the less solemn kinds of war, which the members do who let the parties contend in direction and authority of their nation, is by the law of nations no personal crime in them; they cannot, therefore, be punished consistently with the law, for any act in which it considers them only as the instruments, and the nation as the agent."—Idem, b. ii. c. 9, s. 18.

We here leave this branch of the case, believing that our readers, from our citation of authorities, must be satisfied that, if the expedition in which McLeod is said to have been engaged, was executed under lawful authority, he was guilty of no personal crime in the violation of our territory, the destruction of the boat, or the death of Durfee.

We now proceed to show that the hostile attack took place under lawful authority.

It should be borne in mind that Canada is separated from its mother country by an ocean of three thousand miles. That a revolution was attempted in Canada, and the disaffected of the colony had not only the right to resist, but were generally, but were, to a great extent, countenanced and aided by our citizens residing upon the borders.

Under these states of things, the British government gave orders and authority to the chief officer in Canada for his instruction and guidance in meeting the difficulties then presented and anticipated.

Not being then able to find force to take place, the authority was made as general as the nature of the case would admit, and the exigencies seemed to require; and was, no doubt, intended to vest in the chief officer in Canada power to do whatever the home government would have done under like circumstances. It was, says the British minister, "empowered to take any measures which he might think proper for this protection, and which might be necessary for the defence of her majesty's territory, and for the protection of her majesty's subjects."

This is a power most general and extensive in its terms. The object is, the protection of her majesty's territory and subjects. To insure this end, the Canadian authorities are authorised to do any act necessary for this protection, and this authority is given in the nature of things, depend upon the judgment and discretion of that officer. The authority does not limit the officer to any specified measures, or confine his defence to the Canadian territory. As England might, in defence of her Canadian subjects and territory, authorise her Canadian minister in Canada, under such circumstances as presented themselves to the Canadian authorities, it would seem to follow that the Canadian officers had power, under their orders, to do the same thing.

By saying that the sovereign of England might authorize such a hostile attack as was made on the Caroline, we do not intend to say it would be an attack that could be justified to the world. We only intend to say that it would be so far justified or excused as to be a British iniquity to the military acting under such an order.

But have we a right to scrutinize and limit an authority of this kind, whilst England sanctions the act done under it, and when the object and effect of such limitation is, to make murder of an act, which, under a liberal construction of the power, would render the accused innocent of the slightest guilt?

In a review of "Wharton's Elements of International Law," we find the following apt illustration of the right of a nation to give construction to its own commissions:

"If a state extended its protection to its lawless subjects, committing violence out of its local jurisdiction, there would be endless disputes with other states, and probably a great delay in settling them. On the other hand, if an officer duly commissioned in war by one state were to be punished by another for exceeding or deviating from the purport of his commission, the commissioning power could not be expected to rest satisfied with the judgment of the foreign court on the construction or execution of its own commissions. Cases of this kind which necessarily occur between the two powers would be embarrassed by a questionable punishment, in addition to the original cause of complaint." [British and Foreign Review, 11th vol. p. 158.]

We think the construction which we give to this power receives confirmation from Burlington, ch. 4, sec. 3, supra. In that case, the chief justice, in giving the opinion of the court, says: "They cannot lawfully undertake any act of hostility of their own head, and without a formal order of the sovereign, at least reasonably presumed, in consequence of particular circumstances."

But England approved this act, by not immediately disclaiming it, by knighting Mr. Nab, the chief perpetrator of it; and the British government, by not once embracing within the powers conferred upon the Canadian authorities. Mr. Fox, the British minister, in a communication to our government, says:

"The transaction on account of which McLeod has been arrested, and is now put upon his trial was a purely military character, planned and executed by persons duly empowered by her majesty's colonial authority to take any steps and do any acts which might be necessary for the defence of her majesty's territories and for the protection of her majesty's subjects; and that, consequently, those subjects of her majesty who engaged in that transaction, were performing an act of public duty for which they cannot be made personally and individually answerable to the laws and tribunals of any foreign country."

But Judge Cowen denies that an approval by the British government can, in any way, operate to screen McLeod from the punishment due to the crime of murder, for the part he is supposed to have taken in the attack. To maintain this position, the learned judge goes into an elaborate citation of authorities, which, to avoid the appearance of injustice towards him, we here transcribe:

"An order emanating from one of the hostile sovereigns, will not justify to the other every kind of transgression. The case of spies has been already mentioned. An emissary sent into a camp with orders to corrupt the adverse general, or bribe the soldiery, would stand justified to his immediate sovereign."—Fattel, b. 3, ch. 10, sec. 180; though even he could not legally punish a refusal. In respect to military orders, there could be no objection to the exercise of jurisdiction. The emissaries sent by Sir Henry Clinton, in 1781, to seduce the soldiers of the Pennsylvania line falling into the hands of the Americans, were condemned and immediately executed. 4 Marsh. Life of Wash. 366, 1st ed. Entering the adverse camp to receive for a traitorous purpose the general is an odious and every species of the sovereign and employee. Fattel, b. 3, ch. 10, § 181. Yet in the case of Major Andre, an order to do so was, as between the two hostile countries, held to be an excess of jurisdiction.

"These cases are much stronger than any which could be supposed to justify a nation at peace. In time of peace, every citizen, while within his own territory, has a double right to suppose himself secure; the legal inviolability of that territory, and the solemn pledge of the foreign sovereignty.

"Burlington seems to consider such an act of the subordinate officer approved, unless the sovereign officer disclaims it. Burl 4, ch. 4, sec. 19, quoted at length, herein et.

"The distinction that an act valid as to one may be void as to another is entirely familiar. A man who orders another to commit a trespass, or approves of a trespass already committed for his benefit, may be bound to protect his servant, while it would take nothing from the liability of the servant to the party injured. As to him, it could scarcely have the effect of adding another defendant, who might be made jointly or severally liable with the actual wrong-doer. A case in point is mentioned by Fattel, b. 3, ch. 2, § 15. If one sovereign order his recruiting officer to make enlistments in the dominion of another in time of peace between them, the officer will be hanged notwithstanding the order, and war may also be declared against the offending sovereign. Id. a like instance id. b. 1, ch. 6, § 75.

"What is the utmost legal effect of a foreign sovereign, approving of the crime his subject committed in a neighboring territory? The approval, as we have already in part seen, can take nothing from the criminality of the principal offender. Whatever obligation his nation may be under to save him harmless, this can be absolutely done only on the condition that he confine himself within her territory."—Fattel, b. 3, ch. 6, § 74. Then, by refusing to make an exception, that he confine himself to his own land from the injured country, or by approving the offence, the nation, says Fattel, becomes an accomplice.—Id. 5, 6. Blackstone says, an accomplice or abettor; (4 Com. 68.) and Rutherford, still more nearly in the language of the English law, an accessory before the fact; b. 1, ch. 3, § 12. No lock supposes that such an act merges the original offence, or renders it imputable to the nation alone."

The rights and duties of nations are not, in general, happily illustrated by reference to the rights, duties, and liabilities of individuals. In relation to matters of this class, public law judges, we are told, that the effect of another person's approving it might make him a trespasser also, and would not discharge the liability of him who actually committed it; and the reason is, that the approver had no more right to make the entry than the actual trespasser.

We think it cannot fail to strike every one, that the exercise of power by Judge Cowen, without the authorization or approval by the sovereign cannot protect the criminal, are all cases where the act done is unlawful in itself, whether committed by sovereign or subject. The enlistment of soldiers in the dominions of another nation, without their consent, is, by the law of nations, a crime, whether the enlistment is effected by a treaty in person, or by a recruiting officer.—Fattel, b. 1, ch. 6, sec. 75.

Spies also are not the less criminal because they are authorized by their sovereign, since the sovereign could not himself lawfully act the spy.

We cannot better answer Judge Cowen's objection to our head than by transcribing one of his examples, and annexing to it a quotation of his from Locke:

"Suppose a prince should command a soldier to commit adultery, incest, or perjury; the prince goes beyond his constitutional power." So says Mr. Locke (on Gov. B. 2, ch. 19, sect. 239) of a king even in his own dominions. "In whatsoever he has no authority, he cannot have a claim; and may be resisted; for where soever the authority ceases, the king ceases too, and becomes like other men who have no authority."

Examples to show that a subject may not do an act, with or without his sovereign's authority, fall far short of showing that the act he may do without the approval of his sovereign, may not receive equal publicity from a subsequent approval of the act by that government, as if it had directed it originally.

We have already, as we think, established the position, that the hostile violation of our territory, resulting in the destruction of the Caroline and the killing of Durfee, had the same legal effect as if the British government would have protected the military engaged in it from any personal liability. We now maintain that the subsequent approval of the attack, especially under the circumstances of the original order and the situation of the mother country in relation to her colony, and of Canada in relation to our border, furnishes equal impunity and protection to all concerned in it.

The authorities quoted by Judge Cowen on this head, as we have already shown, do not in the slightest degree impugn the correctness of this position; while the authorities we shall now produce will fortify it.

"Burlington, 4, ch. 4, sec. 18.—'A mere presumption of the will of the sovereign would not be sufficient to excuse a governor or any other officer who should undertake a war, except in case of necessity, without either a general or particular order. For it is not sufficient to know what part the sovereign takes, but probably act if he were consulted in such a particular posture of affairs; but it should rather be considered in general what it is probable a prince would desire should be done, without consulting him, when the matter will bear no delay and the affair is dubious.

"Now certainly sovereigns will never consent that their ministers should, whenever they think proper, undertake without their order a thing of such importance as an offensive war, which is the proper subject of the present inquiry."

Sec. 19.—"In these circumstances, whatever part the sovereign would have thought proper to act if he had been consulted; and whatever success the war undertaken without his order may have had; it is left to the sovereign, whether he will ratify or condemn the act of his minister. If he ratify it, this approbation renders the war solemn, by reflecting back, as it were, an authority upon it; so that it obliges the whole commonwealth. But if the sovereign should condemn the act of the governor, the hostilities committed by the latter ought to pass for a suus delictus, the fault of which by no means affects the state, provided the governor is delivered up and punished according to the law of the country, and proper satisfaction be made for the damages sustained."

§ Peters, 522.—Story, speaking of the seizure of an American vessel and cargo by a Spanish vessel, says:

"If she had a commission under the royal authority of Spain, she was beyond question entitled to make the seizure. If she had no such authority, then she must be treated as a non-commissioned cruiser, entitled to seize for the benefit of the crown; whose act, Calvo says, is not binding on the crown, or its competent authorities, become equally binding. Nothing is better settled, both in England and America, than the doctrine that a non-commissioned cruiser may seize for the benefit of the government; and if his acts are adopted by the government, the property, when condemned, becomes a droit of the government."

Upon these authorities, and for the reasons before stated, we have come to the conclusion, that the approbation of the attack by the British government has removed all doubt about the sufficiency of the original authority of the Canadian officers.

We have thus far discussed this matter, as if the question, as to the relation between the United States and Great Britain stands as the British government in the matter of this attack, was an open one—one in which the judiciary of the country is at liberty to decide by a direct application of the principles of the law of nations to the facts as they might be established by proof; and in this view of the matter, we feel confident that the result would be, the facts and the law, that the attack upon the Caroline was made upon sufficient authority from the British government; or, if the authority was in any respect equivocal, that it has been ratified by the British government, so as to require of the judiciary of the country, upon the facts as they are, an judgment in establishing the personal impunity of the military engaged in the expedition.

We now propose to show that the character of the expedition against the Caroline, and the relation in which the two countries stand in reference to it, has been settled and decided by our government to be that of blatant war;—the imperfect sort; and that acts of justice are not at liberty to pronounce a different judgment from that pronounced by the government of the country.

Has our government determined the relation in which the two countries stand to each other in reference to the impunity to which McLeod is entitled, as being a British subject?

In May, 1838, shortly after the destruction of the Caroline, in a communication to the British government, our minister, Mr. Stevenson, characterized the attack as "an invasion of the territory and sovereignty of an independent nation by an armed force of a friendly power; and Mr. Webster, secretary of state, in his answer to Mr. Fox, of the 23d. April, 1841, says: "the government of the United States has not changed the opinion which it has heretofore expressed to her majesty's government, of the character of the act of destroying the Caroline."

Can language be better adapted to define the first act of war by one nation against another, where there has been no previous declaration of war, than that employed by Mr. Stevenson to characterize this attack by Great Britain?

So long ago, then, as May, 1838, the executive department of our government determined that the attack upon the Caroline was an act of war, and as far as that act of hostility was concerned, placed the British government in that relation to our own.

In the letter of Mr. Webster, before referred to, he recites the ground upon which the British government placed the hostile attack, so far as the military engaged in it are concerned, and the assent of our government to that view of the matter.

Mr. Webster in his letter, says: "The president inclines to take it for granted that the main purpose of the instruction was, to cause it to be signified to the government of the U. States that the attack on the merchant "Caroline" was an act of public force, done by the British colonial authorities, and fully recognised by the queen's government at home; and that, consequently, no individual concerned in that transaction can, according to the just principles of the laws of nations, be held personally answerable in the ordinary courts of law, as for a private offence; and that upon this avowal of her majesty's government, Alexander McLeod now imprisoned on an indictment for murder, alleged to have been committed in that attack, ought to be released, by such proceedings as are usual and are sufficient to the case.

After this recital of the position in which the British government places the matter, Mr. Webster, speaking in behalf of our government, says:

"The communication of the fact that the destruction of the 'Caroline' was an act of public force, by the British authorities, being formalized to the government of the United States by Mr. Fox's note, the case assumes a decided aspect.

"The government of the United States entertain no doubt that, after this avowal of the transaction as a public transaction, authorized and undertaken by the British authorities, the individual concerned in it ought not, by the principles of public law and the general usage of civilized states, to be held personally responsible, in the ordinary tribunals of law, for their participation in it. And the president presumes that it can hardly be necessary to say that the American people, not desirous of the ability to suppress public wrongs by public means, cannot desire the punishment of individuals, when the act complained of is declared to have been an act of the government itself."

In a letter of instructions to the attorney general, which was also communicated to Mr. Fox, Mr. Webster says:

"That an individual forming part of a public force and acting under the authority of his government, is not to be held answerable as a private trespasser or malefactor, is a principle of public law sanctioned by the usages of all civilized nations, and which the government of the United States has no inclination to dispute."

Judge COVEX makes a criticism upon the communication of the British minister, which, perhaps, requires a passing remark. He says:

"Even the British minister is too busy to call it war; the British government do not pretend it was war; the words in a promise, indicative of an undertaking to warrant, amount, in law, according to 'Comen's Treatise, to a warranty, without the use of the term warrant, so, in the letter of the British minister, a description of hostilities that by the law of nations constitutes an act of war, is termed a general assertion in terms that it was war of the imperfect sort."

But the judge, evidently not feeling much confidence in his criticism upon the British minister's communication, afterwards seems to admit that our government, so far as it could, had decided the question in regard to the character of the hostile attack, and, consequently, in regard to the individual liability of those concerned in it.

The language of the judge is this:

"But it is said of the case at bar, there is more than a mere approval by the adverse government; than at explanation has been demanded by the secretary of state, and the British ambassador has insisted on McLeod's release, and his counsel claim for the joint decision of the latter states. And it is said that such effect upon the powers of this court as a certiorari from us would have upon the county court of general sessions. It was spoken of as incompatible with the judicial proceedings against McLeod in this state, as a suit actually pending between the two nations; and the action in this court, if the government comes in collision with and supercedes our own."

"To such an objection the answer is quite obvious. Dictation is not a judicial but executive function; but the objection would come with the same force, whether it were urged against proceedings in a court of this state or in the federal court."

The judge insists that "the executive power has charge of the question in its national aspect only," by which, from the context, we must understand, that the two governments may agree that the hostile attack was of that character which furnishes impetus to the military concern, yet the courts, for the purpose of the law, may determine otherwise, and inflict criminal punishment upon the offenders! How "the executive power has charge of the question in its national aspect," and yet its decisions be void of all efficacy and effect upon the subject decided upon, is a question that all our statesmen and jurists will admit cannot be answered. It is a question, issue any mandate to a court to carry its determination into effect, or remove a cause, or withdraw a suitor or criminal from the custody of the courts. But its decision becomes binding upon all courts or tribunals where the question arises; and thus the executive department of the government "has charge of the question in its national aspect," and the law makes its decision all-powerful and efficient.

It can hardly be necessary to resort to any course of reasoning, or to the citation of authorities, to show that the executive of the United States possess all the power in regard to the matter in question that usually belongs to the executive department of every government.

"The command and application of the public force to execute the law, maintain peace and resist foreign invasion, are powers obviously of an executive character, and require the exercise of qualities so characteristic of this department, that they have always been exclusively appropriated to it, in every well-regulated government upon earth."—1 Kent's Com. 282.

The memorable attack of the British ship of war Leopard, Capt. Humphreys, upon the frigate Chesapeake, Captain Barron, in which several American sailors were killed, became the subject of discussion between the two governments, and ended in an official declaration, amongst other things, that England offered "the American government a suitable pecuniary provision for the sufferers in consequence of the attack on the Chesapeake, including the families of those seamen who unfortunately fell in the action, and of the wounded survivors." Could Capt. Humphreys have been proceeding against in a court of our country, and held personally responsible, notwithstanding the executive department of our government had settled the whole matter with the British government? There cannot be a doubt, as we think, that this adjustment of the matter, "in its national aspect," was an adjustment of the matter in every aspect, and binding upon all courts and tribunals of the country.

This principle has been judicially recognized in England. There where the executive department of the government has determined the relation in which the British government stands towards any other country, in regard to hostilities, such decision is conclusive, and in all the courts precludes any further examination or agitation of the question.

15 East. 81.—This was a case of insurance, and the case turned upon the question whether the trade to St. Domingo was, at that time, with a country at war with England.

Lord Ellenborough says, this is a grave question, and depends in a great measure upon the considerations of the orders in council which have been referred to. I agree with the master of the rolls in the case of the Pelican, that it belongs to the government of the country to determine in what relation of peace or war any other country stands towards it, and that it would be unsafe for courts of justice to take upon them, without that authority, to decide upon these relations.

"But when the crown has decided upon the relation of peace or war in which another country stands to this, there is an end of the question; and in the absence of any express pronouncement of the will of the sovereign in that respect, it may be collected from other acts of the state. The master of the rolls, in the case of the Pelican, lays down the rule generally 'that it belongs to the government of the country to determine in what relation any other country stands to this, and that the courts of justice cannot decide upon the point;' and Lord Mansfield, in the case of the Betsy, said that they cannot decide adversely to the declaration of the sovereign upon that point.

"For want of a declaration by the crown at one period, different verdicts were given in different cases, in respect to commercial adventures of the two nations, the Betsy, the Boscawen. But lords and jurists have since uniformly decided in one way, and cannot do otherwise than decide separately in regard to probate in such particular cases without regard to other proof in other cases."

This let it be remembered, was a private litigation between individuals; and the court held that the determination of the government, as to the relation in which another government stands towards it, controlled the rights which it may understand to be a part of the question. How much stronger is the reason for the application of the rule to our country and government.

Without such a rule, conflict and collision arise between the executive and judicial branches of the general government, and between the general and state governments.

Mr. Buchanan, of the senate, has well described the conflict which such adverse decisions, between the executive and judicial departments of the government, would produce.

"If judicial authority will be on one side of the question, and executive government on the other. Whilst the judiciary decide that McLeod is free, the executive will decide that he is not."

very decides that he is not. By prejudging this pending judicial question, the secretary has placed himself in an awkward dilemma, should the supreme court of New York determine that the recognition and justification by the British government of the capture of the Chester should not release McLeod from personal responsibility."

The mode of remedying this difficulty, and preventing such conflicts in the two departments of government, suggested by Mr. Buchanan, is, we confess, most extraordinary. It is that the secretary of state, representing the executive department of government, should demand the decision of a question pending with a foreign government until the question shall have been judicially decided; and this course is suggested even in a proceeding where the government is not a party, and where a decision may be delayed until those interested in the question see fit to bring the matter to a close.

Our remedy for what Mr. Buchanan calls this "awkward dilemma," is the rule which prevails in England; when the executive department has decided a question between our own and a foreign government, which properly belongs to the executive department to decide, the judicial department is to abide by such a rule. Such a rule produces consistency and harmony in the management of the general government, and prevents all collision with the judicial departments of the state governments. Without such a rule, the intercourse of our government with other nations becomes empty diplomacy, where national matters, discussed and settled by the proper executive department, are not only disregarded by the judicial department of the government, but are perfectly annulled by adverse decisions and judgments, and executions carrying into effect those judgments.

If, in England, the determination of the government as to the relation in which another government stands to this, is a question of individual rights, in a litigation with which the government is not the most remotely connected, and in which the public has no interest, how much stronger is the reason for applying the rule to criminal courts; especially when the guilt or innocence of the accused is made to depend upon the decision, as to the relation in which another government stands towards this country, a collision, where the accused was an actor, unconscious at the time of the possibility that the part he took could subject him to the imputation of crime!

But this principle has received the sanction of the highest court of our own country. 2 Peters. Rep. 307. Chief Justice Marshall says, "in a controversy between two nations, concerning national rights, it is scarcely possible that the courts of either should refuse to abide by the measures adopted by its own government. There being no common tribunal to decide between them, each determines for itself, on its own rights; and if they cannot adjust their difference peaceably, the right remains with the strongest. The judiciary is not that department of the government to which the assertion of the interests against foreign powers is committed, and its duty commonly is to decide upon individual rights according to those principles which the political departments of the nation have established."

Arizona, 309. "If those departments which are entrusted with the foreign intercourse of the nation, which assert and maintain its interests against foreign powers, have unequivocally asserted its rights, it is not in its own courts that this construction is to be decided."

We have now concluded our examination of the great principles of national law involved in the case of McLeod, and we feel great confidence in saying we have, by the most ample authority, maintained, 1st. That a hostile attack and violation of our territory, in time of general peace, by the authority of the British government, with apparent cause, is so far a hostile act, as to be a violation of the law, as to furnish impunity to the military engaged in it.

2d. That the instructions given to the governor or chief officer of Canada, under the circumstances and situation of that colony, contained sufficient authority to legalize the attack; or, if that be doubtful, to excuse it.

3d. That the sanction by the British government of the attack, supplied any possible deficiency in the instructions.

4th. That the executive department of our government has decided that the relation in which Great Britain stands towards our government, as to the affair of the Caroline, is a public question; and that "individuals concerned in that transaction ought not, by the principles of public law, and the general usage of civilized states, to be held personally responsible."

5th. That such decision, by the executive department of our government, is final and conclusive upon all the courts in the United States.

AIDS DE CAMP OF GEN. WASHINGTON. "Col. Trumbull," says the New York Commercial, "is the last survivor of the military family of Washington." This is corrected by the editor of the Taunton Whig, who states that the honorable H. Baylies, of Dighton, was an aid to General Washington in the war of the revolution. Judge Baylies is in his 86th year—resides but about six miles from, and is frequently at Taunton. He enjoys the blessings of a "green old age," health and activity—is one of those whigs of '76, whose life and principles are models for the whigs of the present generation.

EDWARD BOLING. Of whom our readers have doubtless read, has been tried for "bigamy" at the supreme court of Rockingham county, N. C. and found guilty. He was sentenced to be branded with the letter B on the left cheek, (which was carried into execution in the presence of the court), to be imprisoned three years, and receive thirty-nine lashes at three several times before the expiration of the term of imprisonment. His abode has been assigned to him in Guilford jail.

DEATHS during the last week in Boston 27; in the city of Baltimore 23, of which 14 were under 2 years, and 6 free colored.

Few men have lived who performed all the duties of a good Christian and good citizen with a sweeter grace, and never was pastor more beloved by those entrusted to his cure. Their temporal and eternal welfare was the great aim of his existence. The character of the village preacher, in all its leading traits, found a realization in him. (Rick Whitt.)

THE NEW EXCHANGE BUILDING IN NEW YORK. The merchants of the city now assemble in the large room designed for their accommodation.

ESCAPE. Commodore Stewart, Biddle, and Reed, came within an ace of being drowned. They had just landed at the Fulton ferry, when the steamer Nassau ran into their boat and smashed her. [N. Y. Herald.

Mlle. FANNY ESSLER, according to the terms of her engagement with the French opera, was to return, and make her appearance on the 15th Aug. 1840, but her voyage of absence was prolonged till the 1st January, last. This period elapsed, and still the anxiously looked-for danseuse remained on the other side of the Atlantic. In consequence, the court of appeal laid before the Tribunal a petition, the first demanding a very large tract, and secondly, damages for its breach to the amount of 60,000 francs. The cause came to a final hearing on Wednesday. The counsel for Mlle. Essler pleaded to the jurisdiction on the ground that the matter in question was not an affair of commerce. This plea being overruled, the Tribunal's decision was given in favour of the plaintiff, and a decree to the full extent of the claim of the plaintiffs was pronounced. (Paris paper.)

EXCHANGES have advanced considerably since our last quotations.

Domestic exchanges have likewise varied unfavorably.
New York on Philadelphia is now at 53a 6; on Baltimore 32a 4; Virginia 6; North Carolina 4½; Charleston 1½; Savannah 2½; Augusta 3; Columbus 9½; Macon 12; Florida 42½; Mobile 9½; Tuscaloosa 10; New Orleans 4; Nashville 11; Louisville 8½; St. Louis 10½; Cincinnati 12; Indiana 12½.

FLOUR. Prices have advanced and holders are demanding yet higher. Sales were effected of 2,000 barrels in Baltimore on the 18 h, at $6 25a$6 50—generally asked. The inspections of the week were 12,824 bbls. and 171 half bbls.

The prices at New York is $6 75 for Genessee and $6 62½ for Ohio.

FRANCIS' LIFE BOAT. The French government have granted Mr. Francis a patent for this invention.
 "The American merchants of New York have deter-inited to present one of those boats to the Prince de Joinville as a specimen of American ingenuity and a token of American good will."

Wm. B. GREEN, implicated in the affair of the defalcation of the cashier of the bank of Virginia, has been tried at Richmond, and a verdict of not guilty has been rendered on the first indictment. He has been remanded for trial on twenty three remaining indictments against him. Bail was offered but refused.

LIME ON THE BORDERS OF THE LAKES. The Philadelphia Sentinel says—It has been discovered, recently, that the pebbles on the shores of the Four Lakes, in Wisconsin, furnish a lime equal to the best Louisville pebble lime, for any kind of finish or cement; and is not surpassed, in point of whiteness, gloss and beauty, for the finish of the finest work. Mr. Wilcox intends plastering the capitol, at Madison, with this beautiful article. This lime is a valuable discovery, and is exceedingly important, as the pebbles can be obtained at almost any

The town of Thomastown, in Maine, annually exports 400,000 casks of lime, producing about half a million of dollars.

MEXICO. A correspondent of the N. Orleans Bulletin writes as follows: "It is with regret I have to inform you of the recent massacre at Agua Nueva, some ten leagues distant from Saltillo, on the route to Mexico, of 12 prisoners of war, who were taken by the Mexicans on the 10th inst. positive. I will give you the reports as brought by several officers of the garrison, and also by several merchants belonging to this city. It is said that Mr. Dinnitt procured the release of the prisoners, and that he was taken along, and caused to be mixed, with some liquor that was distributed among the guard, the consequence of which was the death of the sergeant of the guard, the corporal and two privates. Some time after the deed was committed, it was discovered that the prisoners had been taken to the cape, leaving Dinnitt still in his tent—that on the alarm being given, Capt. Schaffino, in command of the escort, ordered his men in pursuit, who overtook the fleeing prisoners, and that the remainder of the guard were where they were captured—that Mr. Dinnitt put an end to his life by poison—and that the remainder of the unfortunate captives will no doubt fall victims to the Mexicans. It is to be regretted that the officers of the country are enabled to escape. To other people it is not so."

MOUNT VERNON. The Mount Vernon estate consisted soon after the French war, of 9,000 acres, and when Washington returned to cultivate it, he had 1,200 persons upon it in his employment. Now but five slaves live on the place, and 400 acres are only cultivated, chiefly used for raising wheat and Indian corn.

Pews, have been sold in the new church of Ascension in New York, within a few days past, to the amount of $70,000, a sum beyond the entire cost of the church—and a number remains yet to be disposed of.

SHIP BUILDING. The whole amount of tonnage built this year in the state of Maine, is said to be about 35,000 tons more than has been built in any previous year in this state, or in any other state during the present year. There are now seven vessels on the stocks in New York without counting small craft; three ships, from six to nine hundred tons, two brigs of five hundred, and two steamers. The two brigs are for the Mexican government. There are but four or five vessels at present building at Baltimore.

THE STEAMER Great Western is to leave New York on her last trip for the season, on the 22d instant.

STEAMBOAT ITEM. The New York Sun says—Preparations are making for building one of the most splendid steamboats in the world. Her speed is not to be less than thirty miles per hour. She will accommodate 1,600 passengers with state rooms. Length of keel 325 feet. This boat will be built on an entirely new principle. Instead of the cumbersome water wheel, she will use a newly invented propeller. She is to ply between this city and Albany the ensuing season. The building of this magnificent steam palace will be under the direction of Captain Fellows, her intended commander.

STEAM ENGINES—BRITISH MANUFACTURES. An English paper says—"There were in this country about a year since, not fewer than sixteen thousand steam engines at work, some of them one thousand horse-power. But taking them at a low average of twenty-five horse power each, this would be equal to 400,000 horses. Five men and a half are equal to the strength of one horse; thus the country possesses a power, through the medium of this vast number of steam engines, nearly equal to that of 2,000,000 of men. Each horse, for his food a year, consumes the product of two acres of land; and thus 800,000 acres are to spare for human subsistence more than there would be if steam power were not employed in the produce of the manufactures for which England is now so celebrated."

POPULATION OF THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE. The Augsburg Gazette of the 4th inst. states that the Ottoman empire (according to the census) contains 25,000,000 inhabitants, of whom 16,000,000 profess the Mahometan religion, and 7,000,000 Christians and Jews. The Turkish population at Constantinople had tripled since the suppression of the Janizaries, and the government asserts that the population is increasing throughout the empire. The population of Asiatic Turkey comprises 10,000,000 Mussulmans and only 2,000,000 Christians.

PORK is quoted in the last Cincinnati papers at $1.50 per 100 lb. and $1.25 to 1.37½ per head, averaging about 100 lb. each.

The Springfield (Ill.) Journal states that a thousand hogs can be purchased in Tazewell county, Ill. in three days at $1 50 per hundred. The same price rules elsewhere, and those who are buying here do not give more than $1 50 per hundred, and it is hardly probable that much advance will be made upon this price.

Letters from Kanawha state, that there are about 20, or 25,000 hogs on the road leading from Owinsville, Kentucky, to Charlestown, Kanawha; and about 8 or 10,000 on the road from Point Pleasant to that place. Some 5 or 6,000 have passed through that village to the eastern markets. Price in Charlestown, $3 per hundred, cash. The number of hogs brought this fall to Virginia, will, it is supposed, be larger than in any year for the last four or five.

SPECIE. The packet ship Francis First, sailed from New York on Tuesday for Havre, with $100,000 in specie, and the Shetfield, for Liverpool, with $30 000.

The Chillicothe Advertiser states that the Bank of Chillicothe, last week shipped between '60 and 100,000 dollars in specie to New York.

Our next number will no doubt announce its departure for Europe to contribute its mite towards restoring "the balance of trade"—but how the bank is to contrive to resume specie payment by continuing this process, is not easy to perceive.

Stocks have declined within a few days from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent, and are looked at with increasing apprehension.

STUDENTS. Young Semmes, who was indicted for killing Professor Davis at the Virginia university, has forfeited his recognizance ($25,000) and it is said is now in Texas.

The students at Oberlin college, Ohio, who lynched a fellow student for writing anonymous letters soliciting a private interview with a female scholar, have been fined by a jury in the sum of $1,500. Judge Huchcock has

Three of the students of New Haven college, who were concerned in the riot with the firemen, have been fined from five to seven dollars, and the costs of prosecution. They have appealed.

THE SUGAR CROP, we learn from the New Orleans Bulletin, has been considerably injured by the late frosts. One fourth of the crop in the parish of Ascension is supposed to be lost by it. In the vicinity of Donaldsonville and on the Lafourche and Terrebonne, there is every prospect of a good crop.

TOBACCO.—In Virginia, the tobacco inspections for the year ending September 30, 1840, amounted to 53,834 lbs.; stock, 13,829 lbs.; those ending September 30, 1841, amounted to 51,994 lbs.; stock, 8,719 lbs.—About half of this quantity this year, amounting to nearly nine millions of dollars, went to foreign ports; the other half to coastwise ports.

The inspections of last week at Baltimore consisted of 375 hhd. Maryland and 42 O'ajo. Prices remain firm at our last quotation.

TRINIDAD. We are indebted to friends for copies of Port of Spain (Trinidad) Gazette. They contain little news. It is remarked that the immigration of laborers continues regularly. In the month of September, there were 283, making, since the first of January, 1841, no less than 2,625. These are colored people, many of them from the United States. With reference to the exports of this Island, it is stated that up to the 30th of September, there were 18,825 boxes, 1,243 tierces, and 2,673 barrels, which is about 3,000 boxes more than last year. The rum is about 23,500 boxes.

WISCONSIN. The legislature is politically divided—council, whig 7, Van Buren 6, house, whig 10, Van Buren 18. Six members only were elected this year to fill vacancies.

It appears, that at the election for delegates in 1839, in the Territory of Wisconsin, the vote was 4141. This year, it was 6,400. A increase of 2,000 votes in two years.

WHEAT has advanced in price; $1.40 has been paid at Baltimore for good red; a like advance in other places.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The British mail steamer CALEDONIA left Liverpool on the 4th, touched at Halifax on the 16th, and reached Boston on the 18th, making the passage in 14 days 6 hours. She brought 42 passengers to Halifax, and 43 from thence—leaving eight there and taking in nine. She brought 14,000 letters of which 5,025 were for New York. Postage amounts to about $17,000. On those to New Orleans $307.

The war fever appears to be subsiding for the present. The steam ship Acadia left Boston on the 16th ult. arrived at Liverpool on the 29th, in thirteen days passage.

GREAT BRITAIN.

THE McLEOD CASE. The Acadia carried out the account of the trial of McLeod, which is published at length in the London papers. Fifteen columns of the Sun, of the 30th are occupied with the particulars of the trial. The papers generally express satisfaction at the result. The London Chronicle (Whig) announcing the decision, says: "The result of this trial might have been easily anticipated from the proceedings of the three first days. The manner however, in which the investigation has been conducted is highly creditable to the character of the judicial tribunals of America. Had the case been one affecting an American subject in England and triable at one of our assizes we could not have wished the mere formal proceedings to have passed off otherwise than they did at Utica."

A report that Louis Philippe had offered his mediation between England and this country, was current in the best informed circles.

The following paragraph appears in the London Herald of October 30. The Herald, by the way, is said to be the organ of Lord Aberdeen, the foreign secretary.

"To have reason to believe that if any serious difficulty should arise between Great Britain and the United States of America, relative to the trial of McLeod, the northeastern boundary, or any other question pending between both countries, our government has agreed to accept the mediation of France, which mediation has been offered as a guarantee of peace and good will between the French and English cabinets."

"Relative to the trial of McLeod, no question is likely to arise between England and America. The question of international law involved in the Caroline affair is not a question of arbitration. We might as well appeal to Louis Philippe for a decision of the queen's bench. It is a mere question of law (upon the facts of the case there can be now no doubt) on which all the legal advisers of the crown have been decided opinion."

"As to making the boundary question one of arbitration, it is the merest delusion to suppose that this would 'settle' it. Why it has been arbitrated upon already. America refuses to be bound by the decision of the king of Holland. What guarantee has Lord Aberdeen that Americans will be bound by the decision of Louis Philippe, or is Louis Philippe an arbitrator such as England ought to accept upon such a question?"

We cannot yet believe that this is to be the first step of Lord Aberdeen's foreign policy." [Whig.]

From the Morning Chronicle.

A considerable portion of our paper to-day is occupied with the trial of McLeod, an outline of which appeared in the second edition of Saturday's Chronicle last week.

The question of McLeod's "triability" is a matter upon which, if we are to credit the Tory press, Lord Aberdeen is determined to make a stand in opposition to the decision of the supreme court of New York. Is this one of the questions his lordship intends to submit to the arbitration of Louis Philippe? On Friday last we intimated our belief that the British government intended to have recourse to some such method of at once complementing a doubtful ally and compromising a question of national interest.

The Herald says: "It has seldom fallen to our lot to communicate tidings of deeper national interest than those we had the pleasure of communicating, under the head of our American intelligence, in a very early second edition of Saturday last. This day we give in another page some valuable additions to that intelligence."

"The anxiety of the public mind as to the late Mr. McLeod is now relieved. The news of his acquittal, the accounts of the deportment of the court, the charge of the judge, and the circumstances attending the delivery of the verdict of the jury—so far as they go—impart a character of the highest and most satisfactory interest to the papers and despatches received by the 'Acadia.' It is pleasing, indeed, to contemplate, under any circumstances, so noble a spectacle as the majesty of law and justice riding in tranquil triumph over the wildest tide of popular violence and through the most furious tempest of popular faction. And this spectacle has been afforded to the world at large by the dignified and conscientious manner in which an American judge and an American jury have discharged their high and responsible duties."

The Times indulges in brutal sarcasms against the court, the jury, the American people and their government, pretends to ridicule the importance given to the trial, sneers at the charge of judge Gridley, affirms that the acquittal was arranged beforehand, for fear of England's vengeance, and concludes with a long tirade of bragadoocio, the keystone of which is a windy call upon England to take summary vengeance for the insult she has endured, and ample security that it shall never be repeated. A brutal and most malignant article.

The cotton market continues without any material alteration.

The steam frigate, having on board Sir Charles Bagot, had been obliged to return to Portsmouth, having carried away her connecting rod, and sustained other damage in her machinery. Sir Charles was to re-embark on board the Illustrious, ship-of-war.

The lords of the treasury have authorised the admission of rough rice from the United States, at one penny the quarter.

The accouchement of the queen was daily expected—her majesty had been indisposed, but had recovered her usual health. The Liverpool European of the 4th instant, says: "We have thus to announce the birth of a prince of Wales, though such an event was expected to be near at hand. Her majesty, meanwhile, continues in the enjoyment of excellent health."

The greatest distress still prevails in every part of Great Britain. Several incendiary fires have taken place in many of the country towns and the destruction of property has been considerable.

Several large meetings have been held in Manchester, Leeds, and other places, by the Chartists. Vincent, the Chartist, at a meeting held in Manchester most ably stated the people's charter is sufficient for the removal of every abuse, and that the agitation for its adoption ought to be persevered in."

Upwards of £1,000 have been raised in London for the destitute Paisley operatives. The queen gave £100 and Sir Robert Peel gave £50.

To increase the difficulties so large a portion of the difficulties attending the position of Sir Robert Peel's ministry, it is now said that the potato crop in Ireland is likely to prove a total failure.

The incessant rains in Ireland during the month of October have been productive of serious injury to the crops of grain and potatoes. The Leeds Mercury says on this subject:

Every week of the present month has made the winding up of the harvest and the prospects of the country more unfavorable and gloomy. The corn crops, in some of the northern and hilly districts, have been quite ruined; and owing to the excessive quantity of rain, the potatoes in many parts of England and Ireland, have rotted in the ground, so as very materially to diminish the food for the people. The price of corn is, consequently, on the advance, and the ports would soon be open again for the admission of corn at the lowest duty, if it were not that the bad quality of much of the new wheat keeps down the averages. Trade continues to be in a wretchedly depressed state, both in Yorkshire and Lancashire; and there is a prospect of a winter of the most severe suffering, if not of terror. There have recently been many incendiary fires in the agricultural districts; by what parties they are committed is yet unknown. It is certain that such fires occur in times of distress, however criminal and infatuated are the incendiaries.

Government is about to strengthen the fortifications of Gibraltar.

The Royal West India Mail company has memorialised government to run monthly instead of fortnightly.

The overland mail from India with very important intelligence from China, was hourly expected to arrive in London.

The British troops in China have suffered so much that it is stated that the force is to be augmented by two regiments.

It is stated that the greater part of the six millions of dollars paid by the Chinese for the redemption of Canton, turns out to be bad silver.

CENSUS OF 1841—POPULATION OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE. From the results of the census which has just been concluded, it appears that the population of Great Britain and Ireland in the present year amounts to upwards of twenty-seven millions of souls. The return for the three kingdoms, the Channel Islands, and the Isle of Man, is as follows:

England and Wales, 15,901,981
Scotland, 2,624,580
Ireland, 8,395,429
Guernsey, Jersey and Man, 124,079

Total, 26,856,028

This is exclusive of the army and navy, of merchant seamen afloat, and of all persons travelling abroad, or of any persons who the night of the 5th of June were out of the country.

Including these classes, the population may be safely taken at twenty-seven millions, which is an increase of about two millions since 1831. If to this be added the population of the colonies dependent on this country, it will be found that the subjects of the British crown are more numerous than the subjects of any other civilised monarchy or republic on the face of the globe.

After making every allowance for possible exaggeration or uncertainty in the accounts of the Indian or Australian population, we may safely say that her majesty, queen Victoria is the sovereign of a hundred millions of subjects—a larger portion of the human race than has ever obeyed any one European sovereign since the downfall of the Roman empire.

FIRE IN THE TOWER OF LONDON. An event which will be long remembered in the annals of English history, and which may be regarded in discover himself completely from party in his official capacity.

At a late meeting of the Dublin Repeal Association, he announced his intention of presenting a petition to the house of commons, in his robes as lord mayor, in favor of a repeal of the union.

FRANCE.

The Paris papers are singularly destitute of any news of importance. The few lines in Paris, which the intelligence from America by the Acadia was received. Quénisset has made further disclosures relative to secret societies in Paris, and several persons have been arrested in consequence. The peers were to meet about the middle of this month, and the trial of him and his companions would come on towards its close.

A French army of observation has been formed on the Spanish frontier, amounting to 30,000 men. It is stated that the long announced disarmament by France is now in actual progress. The reduction of the army was going forward in all quarters. The new order appears to be a medium between the peace and the footing.

Delarocche, the editor of the National, had been again brought before the tribunal for attacking the king's inviolability; but the jury found a verdict of "not guilty."

The French excitement on our revenue bills had by no means subsided, and the journals were making themselves busy in contriving some mode of making reprisals on the United States.

By a royal ordinance, dated 19th instant, the peace establishment of medical men for the French army is fixed as follows: physicians of different ranks, 127; surgeons, ditto, 1,137; pharmacists, ditto, 113; total, 1,377.

"In the evening receptions at Saint Cloud," says the France, "Louis Philippe assures the visitors at the palace that the affairs of McLeod and of Canada will be settled peacefully."

The French paper the Temps states that the French and British fleets in the Mediterranean were in progress of reduction, the former by six and the latter by eight ships of the line.

REVENUE. We find the following in the Courier Français on the revenue returns published by the Moniteur: "It will be seen that the augmentation of revenue of 1841 arises principally from the duty on sugar, which has produced 6,365,000 frs. more than in 1840, but of this sum two millions represents the additional duty on indigenous sugar. The tobacco tax, in progress, and it is evident that this article, which was formerly only a luxury, is now becoming a necessary of life. The tax upon public carriage has yielded two millions more than in 1840. This denotes an increase of circulation which bodes well for future rail roads. The produce of the duties on potable liquors also shows an increase of two millions. We do not know how whether we should congratulate the country on this result; for it is frequently a sign of prosperity, it may also be an indication of a depraved state of the public morals. In the customs we perceive only a slight increase of 1,800,000 frs. and this will always be the case until we shall have modified our absurd tariffs. We should be proud of the French customs to keep pace with the population and with the public wealth when we keep up a system which excludes foreign produce from our ports? We are doubly punished for this folly; first, in having an annual tribute levied by manufacturers in whose favor monopoly is maintained, and secondly, excluding the sources of supply to the public treasury."

The Arabs continued to make nightly attacks on the outskirts near Algiers, and from time to time succeeded in cutting off the sentinels.

PRUSSIA.

STATISTICS. Prussia reckons 14,000,000 inhabitants, and can raise an army of 532,900 men. Austria has a population of 32,000,000 souls; its army is 750,000 strong; and if this power would adopt the Prussian system, it could easily raise 1,216,000 men. The Germanic confederation, without reckoning Austria and Prussia, has a population of 16,000,000, and an army of 195,920 men. If it followed the Prussian system, it could easily have 608,000 men. The confederation could bring but an army of 370,000 men. France, out of a population of 35,000,000, has an army 840,000 men. If it adopted the Prussian system, it might increase the army to 1,330,000 men. Thus all these forces joined form in Germany 1,652,000 men; and after the Prussian system the army might be increased to 2,356,000 men. Thus France would have 312,000 men less than the confederation. If they adopted the Prussian system, France would have 1,026 men less. Germany would be strong enough to wrestle with Russia and France united; it would oppose 1,350,000 men to France, and 1,000,000 to Russia. At any rate, Germany would have the advantage over France in numbers.

There has just been published at Berlin a statistical account of the criminal justice for the last 23 years in the whole of the kingdom of Prussia, under the German system of legislation, that is, with the exception only of the Rhenish provinces, in which the French code is still in force. From this work it appears 15 during the period mentioned there have been 312 criminals condemned to death viz: 234 men, 78 women, making on an average about 13 capital sentences per annum, or 1 in every 3,000,000 inhabitants, the population of this part of Prussia being reckoned at 10,000,000. Of the 312 capital convicts, 145 only were executed, of whom 120 were men and 25 women. Among the 78 women condemned to death, 33 were for infanticide, all of whom obtained full pardons or commutations of their sentences.

The German Journal of Frankfurt publishes an ordinance of the king of Prussia giving a sum of £15,000, of which the interest is to go to defray half the stipend of a Protestant bishop, to be established in the diocese of the Rhine, in concert with the interest to be paid to the archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the Bishop of London; but if lands can be bought in Palestine to establish the donation, then the capital will be paid to these prelates. The decree is dated Nollentz, Sept. 6, 1841.

GERMANY.

The inauguration of the rail road from Vienna to Olmutz took place on the 7th inst. The distance is nearly 30 French leagues.

The grand duke of Hesse Darmstadt has issued a decree ordering the use of the guillotine in all cases of decapitation within his states.

A letter from Amsterdam, of the 25th, says: "Yesterday the definitive refusal of the king, as grand duke of Luxembourg, to ratify the Belgians with Luxembourg, and the German Custom Union, was officially communicated to the Prussian minister at this court. This event has caused a great sensation in the diplomatic circles."

A letter from the Hague states that the king of Holland has just granted a representative constitution to the grand Duchy of Luxembourg, on a liberal footing.

A plot to overturn the government had been discovered at Brussels, which created some alarm for a time, but turned out to have been got up by a few officers of damaged reputation, with the pretended object of once more uniting Belgium with the Dutch crown.

RUSSIA.

A Liege journal states that the emperor of Russia has sent an order to an armorer of that town for 15,000 percussion muskets with rifle barrels, at 80¢ each, for the imperial guard. These guns are to carry a ball 1000 paces, and to be discharged are placed on rocks which are so high that the balls cannot get above the belt. The box formed in the butt end of the pieces carries the various small implements required. Bavaria and other German states, it is said, have sent orders to Liege for similar arms.

"An imperial ukase of 1834" says the Augsburg Gazette, "fixes the duration of the stay of Russian nobles in foreign countries at five years, and that of citizens not noble at three years. Previously to the publication of this ukase, several Russian ladies had been settled abroad, and have since been married in foreign countries. The ministerial commission has just issued a decree, according to the terms of which the ukase of 1834 is made applicable to these ladies, and the period of stay to be allowed them will commence from the date of the decree."

Letters from Trebisond, of Sept. 16, say that an insurrection had broken out in Georgia against the Russian authorities. The insurgents, it is said, by way of sequel, burnt the Russian consulate establishment, Akhesika (probably Achalsik).

TURKEY.

The latest intelligence from the Levant is to the 6th ult. Lord Ponsonby had his audience of leave of the Sultan, on the 28th September, and was received with the greatest possible distinction. Mehmet Ali continues to give proofs of his loyalty and obedience. Several severe shocks of earthquakes have been felt at Constantinople, the 28th ult. attended with considerable damage and loss of life.

An earthquake occurred at Constantinople and its neighborhood, on the night of the 5th, which terrified all the inhabitants. A number of persons had perished, and four dead bodies had already been taken from under ruined buildings in the city.

Nothing is known concerning the expedition against Tunis, and Tahir Pacha's fleet was still lying at the mouth of the Dardanelles.

Twenty-two villages have been destroyed in Egypt by the overflowing of the Nile.

GREECE.

The Constitutionnel contains the subjoined statement relative to the late mission of M. Piscatory in Greece: "The special object of his journey was to observe the present situation of the Greek government, and make an inquiry as to the resources of the country. The ministerial envoy is said to have gathered information of a most favorable nature. The amount of the revenue receipts has considerably increased, balancing the expenses, and even slightly exceeding them. The finances are all brought to a regular account, established partly upon the French system, for which the country is indebted to the ability and zeal of the late M. de Rigby. The mercantile marine has been increased to an astonishing extent. The Greek journals a short time ago enumerated the naval force, which, in case of war, their government would be able to oppose to the Turks, and their list showed an effective navy of more than three hundred vessels of all kinds. It appears also that the municipal institutions already work well, and are becoming so deeply planted as to promise the future establishment of good order."

Letters from Athens of the end of September mention that the excitement occasioned by the resignation of Mavrocordato has been increased by the receipt of M. Guizot's circular, declaring Greece incapable of representative government.

SPAIN.

The difficulties in Spain appeared to be drawing more and more towards a conclusion. Christina repeated that she had no hand in the insurrection, though both Christina and Louis Philippe are accused of countenancing it. O'Donnell had arrived at Paris. About 4,000 of the insurgents had taken refuge in France.

Montes de Oca, one of the leaders, had shared the fate of General Leon. His torture was taken and in prison, and O'Donnell had fled. It is confidently affirmed that negotiations are in progress, with fair prospects of success, for a political amalgamation between the moderados and the Carlists, to be cemented by a marriage between the son of Don Carlos and the young queen; the queen formally abandoning all pretensions to the throne in favor of his offspring.

A letter from Madrid of the 20th instant says: "The regent quitted the capital yesterday, accompanied by the ministers of war and the interior, whose portfolios will be held in their stead by the minister of marine. The regent quitted the capital through which the regent passed, and cheered him. He appeared to be much affected by their demonstrations in his favor. All the troops of the garrison, with the exception of 300 foot soldiers, and a few horsemen, have left with the regent. The national guard will therefore support all the posts. An officer quitted the capital, he addressed the national guard as follows: "National guards! my heart remains with you; I set out for the purpose of exterminating the horde of traitors who wish to rob you of your constitution. They will fly rapidly before our bayonets, and their impure feet will leave no trace upon the Spanish soil, the soil of all liberty. Adieu, my friends, long live my comrades."

General Labra, who is implicated in the movement of the Basque Provinces, had been arrested at Santander, as he was embarking for Bilbao, disguised as a sailor. The regent was expected to return to Madrid in a few days.

The dissolution of the citadel of Barcelona has been commenced in presence of the junta, the municipality, and the national guard, notwithstanding the reiterated protests of Gen. Zabala and the political chiefs.

The Madrid Gazette of the 22d inst. states that an order has been issued by the Regent, dismissing from office every employe in the department of the finances who had directly or indirectly given encouragement to the present movement. On the 18th inst. General Rodil published at Burgos a decree of amnesty to all rebels who, within a delay of twelve days from the date of the decree, should demand it in any place occupied by the government troops. All persons refusing to avail themselves of the given encouragement on that day are to be arrested and shot. The persons excepted from the benefit of the amnesty are the rebels of Pampeluna, Vittoria, and Bilbao, and those of any other place who were the instigators of the revolt. The parties so excepted are to be arrested and shot.

The Moniteur of Pau of the 26th instant says: "A proclamation by Don Carlos has been distributed in all the depots of Carlist refugees, desiring that they would not take any part in the new war raised in Spain. The pretender (for we cannot but believe that it is he who speaks, though the document is signed with initials only), tells them that this cause is not theirs, and that therefore they should rest indifferent spectators of the struggle between Christina and Espartero, and that they should not re-appear upon the stage until the other two parties have destroyed each other."

The subjoined letter from Bayonne, in the France Moniteur of Toulouse, is not without interest. The writer, after noticing the upshot of the recent movement in Spain, says: "Thus has terminated the third act of the tragedy which has been performing in Spain since the death of Ferdinand VII. There remains a fourth act still more terrible—the abolition of the Monarchy, the fall of that of the Moderates, and even that of the moderate progressive party who were conquerors in September; the republicans, encouraged by late events, have begun to count their numbers at Barcelona, Valencia and Seville, and are about to raise their heads. Barcelona reckons between 30,000 and 40,000 associated workmen; in the rest of Catalonia, one may, without exaggeration, calculate that there are 50,000. Let us remember the late disorders at Vich and Sabadell, where the manufacturers were forced to submit to the laws imposed upon them by the association—then the decrees just issued by the Ayuntamiento of Barcelona for our republicans at Seville, about 3,000 republicans assembled daily on the Alameda promenade, under the eyes of the authorities, to hear the republican paper, the Huracan, read, and listened to the declamations of demagogues. A projected move by the republicans of this town has just been talked of, as to Valencia, the first of the last Bando of the Ayuntamiento—let us observe the movement of the National Guard on the formation of the council of War, composed of Moderates and men of the treaty of Bergara, and then form our judgment. We make no mention of Jerez de la Fontesa, Malaga in Andalusia, Huelva, in Castile, and other places where republicanism has gained numerous proselytes; but we can answer for it that ere long, the regent will hear news of the republican party."

The Leipsic Gazette has a letter from Paris of the 15th, in which is the following passage: "The greatest misfortune of Spain is that there are three wives to the throne. The first is the daughter of Isabella II. to the throne and her marriage, viz: the wife of Don Carlos, the wife of the infant Don Francisco de Paula, and Queen Christina. Of these three, the only one who would be content for her son with the title of husband of the queen, is the wife of Don Francisco de Paula. Such a marriage would not be without influence, even Christian, republican and the pretensions of Queen Christina."

ITALY.

The Gazette di Venezia gives an interesting account of the serious irritation that occurred at Venice on the 6th ult. The Adriatic rose to such a height that the whole of St. Mark's place was several feet under water.

From Rome gives the following account of the pope's reception of the Abyssinian mission: "On August 17th, the Holy Father, seated on his throne, with the Cardinal Mezzofante on his right, and the secretary of the Propaganda on his left, received the Abyssinian envoys. Having prostrated themselves at his holiness' feet, and then kneeling, they were then to be seated. He then entered into converse with them, Cardinal Mezzofante, the Apostolic Prefect, De Jacobi, and the Priest Galabarda, serving in turn as interpreters. The other members of the embassy, among whom were several Ethiopian learned doctors, who sat on the floor, were then introduced, with the whole of their suite, and a letter from the sovereign of Abyssinia was laid at the feet of the pope, who, with his own hand, broke the three seals, and Dr. Desta, formerly secretary of the emperor Sabagaris, read the letter aloud. It was immediately translated into Italian by Cardinal Mezzofante and De Jacobi. The envoys then expressed their regret that in their poverty they were unable to offer the sovereign Pontiff tributes in gold, but intreated him to accept in token of their homage, the purest incense and the most precious perfumes their country produced, adding, that instead of presenting him with myrrh, the emblem of that mourning which they prayed the God would long keep for distant from his holiness, they begged permission to tender to his acceptance some of the finest and rarest birds of Ethiopia. The reception given by his holiness to the deputation was most affable, and he promised to grant them another audience, when he would deliver his answer to their sovereign's letter."

JAVA.

JAVA A RIVAL OF INDIA. In the India papers, the exports from the island of Java are described with a view of showing that that island is the most formidable rival to the Indian possessions of England, so great is the increase in its exports. Last year the exportation of coffee amounted to 141,000,000 lbs. Sugar has increased to a great extent, viz: at the rate of about 800 or 900 per cent. within the last few years, and in 1840 reached about 56,189 tons, being upwards of a fourth of the whole consumption of England. In the article of indigo, Java is looked upon as a still more formidable rival; its production has been nearly doubled in a single year, though the year 1840 is not yet fully known, and in that year the quantity raised was no more than 42,884 lb. Last year the exports amounted to 2,123,911 lbs.

JAMAICA.

Kingston dates to the 30th ult. have been received at New Orleans. The colonial legislature was in session, but had done nothing of importance. The papers of the 28th state that a party of four Englishmen, with an inhabitant of the Mosquito shore, while on friendly mission arrangements with the authorities for exploring the Bluefield river and examining its fitness for a route of commercial intercourse with Spanish America, had been seized and carried into the interior of Central America. This seizure was caused by the excitement produced by the imprisonment of the commandant at Balise, and the receipt of the papers of General McDougal, the British envoy at Balise, had proclaimed freedom to the slaves at San Juan de Nicaragua.

THE REPUBLIC OF YUCATAN.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. The Commercial Bulletin of Merida and Campechy, under date of October 23d, contains the proceedings of the house of representatives, which took place on the 20th and 21st of that month, with regard to the important question as to whether or not Yucatan should be declared a free and independent republic. At an early hour the galleries were thronged with spectators, who manifested the greatest interest and anxiety in the discussion. After the secretary had finished reading the "report of the select committee upon the subject of independence," a long and animated debate arose, in which most of the representatives took part. Some were for postponing the declaration until it could be ascertained what would be the effect of Santa Anna's movements in Mexico, while others, on the contrary, were of opinion, that it was by no means necessary to regard those movements, but that it became the Peninsula of Yucatan to be a sovereign and independent republic. The speech of Senor Vargas was greeted by enthusiastic applause in the galleries, he having declared "that it was a vague, remote, and chimerical hope, to imagine that the present revolution in Mexico would lead to the establishment of a liberal government, and also that the people of the government should entertain a profound conviction that it was necessary to postpone, for a while, the declaration of independence, still conviction ought to be sacrificed in obedience to the will of the public, without forgetting, for a moment, the anxiety every where manifested upon the subject, since, in respect to the people, it is for ever a people to command, and for the government to obey."

Upon taking the vote, the first article was carried unanimously; whereupon the spectators retired, exhibiting the liveliest signs of satisfaction, and the house forthwith adjourned.

1st. The people of Yucatan, in the free exercise of their sovereignty, hereby erect themselves into a free republic, independent of the Mexican nation.

2d. The constitution promulgated on the 31st of last March, shall have full force and remain unalterable, except so far as it conflicts with this declaration.

3d. Congress has the power to make any alterations in the constitution which may be required by the new order of things.

4th. All those officers constitutionally elected, shall remain in the army, until removed as directed by the code.

5th. The republic of Yucatan enjoys full power to enter into direct relations and form treaties with the other nations of the earth.

6th. The republic of Yucatan feels herself in honor bound to pay her quota of the foreign debt contracted by the Mexican nation, since February 15th, 1840.

7th. Yucatan offers an asylum and special protection to all the natives of the North American continent, who may be harassed on account of their political opinions. [Rejected by a vote of 10 to 2.]

8th. The republic of Yucatan will admit into her territory every honorable man, of whatever nation or creed.

TEXAS.

The message of President Lamar has been delivered to congress. It opens with congratulations on the prosperity of the country. The relations with Mexico are deemed unsatisfactory, and an amicable adjustment of the quarrel impracticable. He adverts to the hostilities, and states that he has made arrangements to send the Texian navy to co-operate with the government of Yucatan—a friendly power—in acting against Mexico. He thinks many advantages must result from this course. The navy will be preserved in active service, free of expense, and will compel the Mexican government to a more peaceful policy with regard to Texas. He is opposed to a military invasion of Mexico; but advises the establishment of military posts west of the Nueces for the protection of that portion of the country. He recommends that congress take into consideration the traffic conducted by the people of the western frontier, and approves highly of it. He submits to congress the capture of Mr. Demit by a party of central troops of Mexico.

The relations of Texas with France are friendly—the attack of Mr. Salguir will cause no disturbance of tranquillity. With Great Britain the mutual ratification of treaties has been postponed till June, 1842. With the United States the relations of the young republic are most amicable. The message speaks in glowing terms of the probable results of the Santa Fe expedition, in pouring into the coffers of Texas the rich resources of the commerce of that section, and establishing intimate political relations with a people known to be friendly to our government, and with the Mexican government. The remainder of the message is devoted to topics of minor interest. [See of 17th.

The Houstonian thinks Santa Anna will recognize the independence of the republic. It says: "If the report of Santa Anna's success in Mexico should prove to be correct, we venture to predict that, with him, Houstonian as he is, our government, one year will not have elapsed before the independence of Texas shall have been unconditionally recognized by Mexico."

The Colorado Gazette announces that the navigation of the Colorado is about to be opened from the head of the raft, 13 miles above Matagorda, to Columbus.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

DIPLOMACY. It is stated on the authority of English papers that Mr. Everett, our new minister to London, was expected daily in London from the continent at the time of the sailing of the last steamship. The archives of the legation were left by Mr. Stevenson in the hands of Col. Aspinwall, consul of the United States. [Nat. Intell.

NOLLE PROSQUIL. Our readers will learn, from the report of proceedings in our criminal court, that, at the request of the president of the United States, a nolle prosqui was yesterday entered by the attorney of the United States in the case of the prosecution against the individuals implicated in a riot in the city of New York. The petition was presented at the president's house, in the month of August last, (on the night following the first veto).

We subjoin a copy of the president's letter, not merely as a mark of respect for an honorable official act, but from the pleasure which its just and liberal sentiments will give to us, and will, we are sure, impart to our readers. [Nat. Intell.

Washington, Nov. 21, 1841.

"Sir: Having understood that a prosecution was pending in the criminal court of the District of Columbia against certain persons charged with having been engaged in a riot in August last, I directed the attorney of the United States to submit to you the propriety of entering, with the consent of the court, a nolle prosqui in the cases. It was one of those outbreaks of popular feeling incident, in some degree, to our form of government, and entirely evanescent and harmless in its character. My confidence in the good sense and becoming feeling of the people of this district leads me to believe that there will be no danger of a similar occurrence in future, and that therefore those who have been betrayed into a thoughtless proceeding will not be likely to repeat it. Be assured of my constant regard. J. TYLER.

Mr. Fendall, district attorney, Washington.

CONGRESS. The papers from distant sections of the union tell us that the members are wending their way to the seat of government, where as we are informed by the Washington papers, some of them have already arrived.

CONGRESSMEN. Of the remored resignations and declinations noticed in our list, it appears that that of JOHN QUINCY ADAMS declining after the present term, is untrue. The Quincy (Mass.) Patriot, contradicts it on Mr. A.'s authority, and adds that "Mr. Adams says he shall be ready to serve his constituents as their representative in congress, so long as they may require his services, or his health may permit him to discharge the duties of his office."

The New York Tribune, whence originated the article asserting that the Hon. CLAY, of Kentucky, would certainly resign his seat in the senate, and pair to the West Indies for recovery of his health, has postponed that determination. It is now stated that Mr. C. is expected in Washington early in the approaching session.

Col. BENTON, who was arrested by a severe attack of sickness in Kentucky, on his way to Missouri, has returned to Washington. The Globe says he is convalescent, although yet too unwell to leave his room.

DEATH OF THE HON. DIXON H. LEWIS. The Globe of the 23d inst. says: "The melancholy tidings of the death of this true-blue patriot, noble and most estimable man, come through so many channels, that although at first we hoped the report was unfounded, it seems to be confirmed beyond all doubt. There is not a man in the house of representatives whose loss could have produced in that body more universal and sincere sorrow. No man was ever more beloved by his friends or respected by his political opponents. His honest zeal for the cause in which his convictions enlisted him, knew no bounds and affected no disguise; and yet his magnanimous spirit never suffered it to settle into personal hostility to opponents. We know that some who must have deeply offended him in collisions of party, received from him afterwards the most striking proofs of disinterested kindness."

THE COTTON TRADE. The National Intelligencer of Thursday contains, in addition to several of foreign paragraphs to which we called attention in the last number of the Register, the two following upon the same subject, published in the same paper.

The following extracts from some of the best foreign papers may be depended on as furnishing facts which are of great importance to this country. The extensive preparations making by England for supplying herself with her own cotton and excluding that of foreign growth, and the success which has attended them, has excited public attention. We now see all alive to the protection of their own interests: the growing of cotton is becoming a subject of investigation in other countries. It would be well for the people of this country if they too would open their eyes to this subject, and look forward to the future that is now presented to them. With cotton at 10 cents a pound, the manufacturer barely holding its own and not increasing in Europe, with Texas rising rapidly into importance with its rival production, and the South American states, the West India islands, Egypt, and other countries increasing theirs, where are our plantations to look for higher prices and a ready market? Instead of being jealous of our own manufactures, which already take 266,000 bales, we think it would show more prudence to cherish them as our best resource for the future.

By reference to the report of the committee of parliament on East India produce, published last year, the design may be seen more in detail by the message of the governor general. The feeling that exists in England against slavery pervades every class of people. The doctrines of abolition are not confined there to a section, or to comparatively a few enthusiastic or designing persons, as in this country; practical men and politicians, churchmen and dissenters, the nobility and gentry, all cherish the same feelings; and if their zeal should appear great, we may account for it in part perhaps by the jealousy which exists among true classes against republican institutions and rivals in trade.

From the Journal Des Debats.

It is with the 200,000 tons of cotton which England purchases annually in the Mobile and New Orleans that she produces the 450,000,000 francs of cotton goods which she spreads over all parts of the world. It is by cheapness of production that England is able to carry on so extensive a trade; for her to run the risk by making reprisals of being obliged to pay for this cotton at a dearer rate would be attacking her own interest. This she will not do. But what she will do will be to increase in the East Indies as in the Antilles the growth of cotton, and thus free herself from the monopoly of the growers of the United States. This will be a skillful system of reprisals, and one which we, who wish to give importance to our colonies, would do well to imitate; leaving open, however, the question as to whether the interests of the mercantile shipping may not require more immediate and direct measures. As these interests have been vigorously defended by the representative of France at Washington, we may have full confidence in the measures which the minister of commerce may propose on this subject.

From the London Atlas, Oct. 2.

COTTON IN INDIA. From the period of Captain Bayles' mission to America, for the purpose of making himself acquainted with the system adopted in that country in the cultivation of cotton, to the transportation of that cultivated method to our Indian possessions, we have watched with deep interest, and from time to time recorded, the progress of the speculation. On Captain Bayles' arrival from his interesting and ably accomplished tour of investigation, we devoted, as our readers may perhaps remember, considerable space in this department of the Atlas to the explanation of the system in question, and of the advantages contemplated by its adoption. That system is, we are glad to learn by the papers of the last overland mail, meeting with the entire approbation of the Indian government, and there is every prospect of the anticipated benefits arising thereby being eventually realised. The Madras United Service Gazette of the 25th June states that government has ordered the transfer of the American cotton planters, sent to organize their plans at that presidency, from Tinnevely to Coimbatore, which country is better suited to the project. The local authorities, it appears, with full confidence of the ultimate success, were covering themselves zealously in the promotion of the scheme. Capt. H. and Mr. Fitch, who are stated to be most efficient coadjutors in the cause, were busily engaged in carrying out the plans of the government at Madras presidency, whilst those on the Bengal side (with Capt. Bayles as superintendent) are equally energetic in the prosecution of their plans.

From the Bombay branch we have not recent tidings on the subject. The American cotton seed and implements of husbandry sent from England had reached Ecote, and great preparations were making in various parts of the country in bringing this extensive enterprise into immediate operation. At the agricultural meeting of Calcutta, in May last, some of the soil of the island of Chedwa was stated to have undergone analysis, and was found to correspond exactly with that on which the Sea Island cotton of Georgia is produced. A report on the subject of this important discovery had been made to the Indian government, and a cask of Sea Island cotton seed had been accordingly shipped to Chedwa.

It has long been a dogma, among the cotton cultivators, that the description of soil so favorable to the cultivation of cotton was peculiar to America, this yielding to the country a vast monopoly in the production of a superior cotton; but we have at last discovered a Sea Island of our own, and will doubtless turn it to a profitable account. We may here mention that the Bengal section of the American planters, in passing through Allahabad, were shown specimens of Indian cotton, which they had declared worthy, if of equal quality, as good as they commonly met with in America.

UNITED STATES VERSUS UNITED STATES BANK OF PENNSYLVANIA. The Philadelphia Chronicle says: "We learn that the government of the United States has filed a bill in equity in the U. S. circuit court of Pennsylvania, against the Bank of the United States, the object of which is to annul all the assignments made by the bank as fraudulent, and to appoint a receiver to take into his possession all the funds of the bank. If, as seems to be the general impression, this application succeed, the consequence will be that all the property of the bank will go into the hands of the receiver, to pay its debts pro rata. The most important question for the note holders is how it will affect them. It seems to us that if the $7,000,000 of assets is taken out of the possession of the first class of trustees, it removes the special security for the five millions of post notes now held by the city banks; that the city banks, pressed by their creditors, will then be obliged to sell these notes for what they will bring, and that thus an amount of five millions of notes of the bank of the United States will be forced into the market for sale, in addition to the three or four millions now floating about."

DEFENCES OF NEW YORK. The defences of the harbor of New York now consist, on the Long Island side, of Fort Delaware and Fort Clinton; on Staten Island are Fort Richmond, 100 guns, Hudson battery 63 guns, Battery Moon 20 guns, and four floating shot galleries, for the purpose of setting a fleet on fire; also about the harbor, Fort William 200 guns, Bedlow's Island 50, Gibbet Island 25. In addition to these it is now proposed to erect a battery of 200 guns at the mouth of the Narrows, which it is believed would render New York unapproachable by the fleets of any nation on earth. The New York Sun says the plan of the new fort has already been submitted to the secretary of war, and the engineers of the department think so favorably of the project, that it is their intention to place it before the next congress.

THE LAKE TRADE. The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser of the 2d inst. says: "During the month of October a greater number of vessels arrived and departed from our port than during any single month of this or any previous year, amounting to 600 vessels. The principal articles landed, &c. are embraced in the annexed table: 375,003 bush. wheat, 124,983 bush. flour, 56,295 bush. corn, 8,291 bush. oats, 2,155 bush. rye, 14,552 kegs butter and lard, 2,793 cks. seed and ashes. The result of these facts sustains the opinion expressed by us on the 18th ult. that the quantity of flour to be landed here during all of October would equal that of 1840, notwithstanding the drought and all efforts made to keep it back. The number of barrels of flour alone which came in during Sunday and Monday last was over 25,000."

THE ARMY. FLORIDA. A letter from Fort Pierce under date of the 14th inst. states that Capt. Wade and Lieutenant Thomas, of the 3d artillery, with K company, of the same regiment, had returned to Fort Lauderdale from a scout on the Indian country, just before the boat left. They had been exceedingly fortunate—the result was 8 Indians killed (6 of them warriors), and 49 prisoners, (8 of them warriors). Some 30 acres of corn, &c. and several canoes, were destroyed.

It is said that Sam Jones is on an island in the Okelocobee with some 500 warriors, and that he is determined to make a stand, and the sooner than surrender. East Florida, Nov. 15, 1841. Every thing is quiet along the border, and not a murder has been committed during the whole of the last full moon. Indians in small parties are still coming in and surrendering. On the 11th instant Halleck Harjo and his company of about ten Indians, from the Spring Garden, on the St. John's, Halleck says, after searching four or five days, these were the only Indians he could find on the river, and he believes there are none on it, except high up, probably south of Fort Mellen.

The difference of detachments detailed for the Everglades expedition is moving from Tampa bay to their designated positions around the Big Cypress. You may soon expect to hear thunder from that quarter, and I hope the capture or surrender of Sam Jones and the prophet. Pilatka, Nov. 17, 1841. We have nothing new from the red men. It is stated that a schooner under the command of Lieut. McLaughlin, belonging to the Florida squadron, had come into the Caloosahatchee with the yellow fever on board. Some of the crew had died. It was feared that the troops would be infected. Severe fevers had broken out at some of the posts.

EXISTING ALIENS. Important decision. During the late term of the supreme court of Norfolk county, Virginia, George Cottingham was brought up, on a writ of habeas corpus, directed to col. FANING, the commandant of Fortress Monroe. By the return to the writ, it appeared that Cottingham was a soldier under col. FANING's command, and had been regularly enlisted in the army of the United States. He was born in Dublin, was at the time of his enlistment a subject of Great Britain, never having been naturalized. Judge Baker, after mature consideration, decided that the enlistment of an alien was illegal, and that therefore the petitioner was entitled to his discharge. The case will probably be carried to the court of appeals, on a writ of error. [Sentinel.

THE NAVY.

The West India squadron is still at Norfolk. The Levant left Pensacola for Norfolk some time since, after having suffered much from the yellow fever. Why then does the squadron still linger?

[N. Y. Star 19th.

The U. S. sloop of war Levant is expected home in about a fortnight.

The U. S. slooper Dolphin is expected home in a few weeks.

THE CONSTITUTION AND HER CREW. We have seldom seen a finer looking or more orderly set of men than the crew of the United States frigate Constitution. Nearly the whole of them have been paid off, and unlike some of those who have heretofore been discharged from United States vessels, their conduct as they pass along our streets is respectful and decorous. There is no quarrelling or fighting among them; they appearing to act towards each other as a family. Their brothers, their department too, towards the officers of the ship, has been, we learn, respectful. As an evidence of their good conduct, we can state, that they thoroughly dismantled and cleansed the ship in two and a half days after her arrival at the navy yard. [Norfolk Beacon.

STATES OF THE UNION.

THE DEBTS OF THE STATES.

A late number of the Boston Post gives the following estimates of the state debts. As this is a subject on which we have often spoken, we copy the table in full.

	Stock and state debt.	Deficiency to principal.
Maine,	$1,678,367	$57,340
Massachusetts,	7,272,339	1,022,339
New York,	20,165,000
New Jersey,	83,283
Pennsylvania,	37,723,000	1,773,519
Maryland,	15,000,000	600,000
Virginia,	6,557,000
South Carolina,	3,764,000
Georgia,	500,000
Alabama,	10,859,556
Mississippi,	12,400,000	393,500
Louisiana,	20,585,000	908,000
Tennessee,	7,709,166
Kentucky,	4,665,000
Ohio,	14,889,900	348,954
Indiana,	13,667,433	754,000
Illinois,	13,265,083	732,340
Missouri,	2,027,557
Michigan,	6,011,000	400,000
Arkansas,	7,755,382
Florida,	3,900,000
District of Columbia,	1,500,000

Total, $300,491,157.

To this state indebtedness of $299,491,157, add the surplus revenue deposited with the states, $8,191,644 dollars; city debts of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Albany, Troy, Cincinnati, New Orleans, Mobile and Charleston, a total of $22,372,441; and we shall have, as the total of state and city debts, $290,365,142.

The states that owe no debts are New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, Rhode Island, North Carolina and Delaware.

The above statement is probably erroneous in many particulars. The debt of the state of Maryland, for instance, is set down at the amount authorized, which exceeds the amount actually incurred by several millions of dollars. The Trenton Gazette contradicts the statement as to the indebtedness of New Jersey, and says that state "is not only out of debt, but has a permanent fund of $129,000, besides a school fund of $336,000. The surplus revenue distribution, amounting to $779,000 was apportioned by the legislature to the counties, so that the state received no benefit from that. The ordinary expenses of the state government are $70,000 to $80,000, but the state tax is only $20,000 to $30,000, other resources defraying the rest.

The indebtedness of others of the states is believed to be exaggerated in the above table.

VERMONT.

BOUNDARY. The legislature of this state have just passed resolutions, declaring that it is the duty of the general government to prosecute the settlement of the northeastern boundary question without any unnecessary delays.

FINANCES. We learn from Walton's Daily Journal, that the report of the auditor of Vermont shows that the expenditures of the state, for the year ending September 30, including all expenses, interest paid, and the balance of the preceding year of $9,539 33 against the treasury, were $81,128 06 Receipts, $4,922 57

Balance in favor of the treasury, $3,794 81 Adding to this the balance of $9,539 33, it appears that the receipts for the year have exceeded the expenditures of $13,334 14.

The apparent state debt is $136,619 81. Of this amount, there is due to the school fund, $1 of this property of the state, $119,637 19, and there is also due from individuals to that fund $44,656 69—which two items make $164,292 28, being $7,672 47 more than the sum set down as a state debt. In point of fact, then, the state has its school fund more than means enough to meet all liabilities, both real and imaginary.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY. The committee appointed by the Vermont legislature and instructed to make inquiry and report on the expediency of a geological survey of that state, have made a report in its favor. The committee say:

"They believe that no state, in proportion to the extent of its territory, has so much to expect from such a measure as Vermont. Accident has already brought to light many rich sources of wealth to the farmer and manufacturer; and probably still greater and more numerous sources, left to accident to their discovery, may lie hid ages to come, in our mountains and valleys, which might be developed by a systematic and scientific survey, and be forthwith rendered productive of individual and public prosperity. A bed of shell marl has been recently, by accident discovered in New Albany, covering a tract of at least fifty acres, and appears to be nearly inexhaustible. No person can now estimate with what beneficial result this material may be used, as a manure, through the whole agricultural region bordering on Lake Champlain. A few other beds of the same material have been discovered in other places; and by a careful examination, under the authority of the legislature, other similar beds may be discovered, which may be immediately applied to enrich our soils, and thus increase our agricultural wealth.

"A large majority of the committee, which is itself numerous, have come to the conviction that it is time for the legislature of this state to consider a measure which many of our citizens think has already been too long delayed. The people of this state must always look principally for their wealth and prosperity to agriculture and manufactures. And the committee believe that the resources of the state should be brought to such a point, as may be, within the control of these two great interests.

"As to the probable expense of a survey of the whole state, when examined before the committee at the last session, professor Benedict stated that he thought that, on account of the greater facilities furnished by his former surveys in several neighboring states, his former estimate was reduced, and that the survey might be concluded in four years, for $8,000, that is, $2,000 annually."

NEW YORK.

THE DELAWARE AND HUDSON CANAL AND RAIL ROAD. This canal and rail road extends from the coal mines in the Lackawanna valley, in Pennsylvania, to Rondout on the Hudson river, ninety-two miles above New York. The whole improvement is one hundred and twenty-three miles long.

The rail road extends from the mines in Carbondale to Honesdale, and thence terminates at the canal. It is sixteen miles long, having eight inclined planes, five of them ascending planes from the mines and worked by stationary steam engines, and three of them descending planes acting by gravity. The rail road is wholly in Pennsylvania.

The canal extends from Honesdale, in Wayne county, twenty-three miles down the Lackawanna creek to the river Delaware; thence seventeen miles down the Delaware; and thence sixty-seven across the state of New York and New York to Rondout on the Hudson river, sixty miles below Albany and ninety-two above New York. It is one hundred and seven miles in length, having locks seventy feet long and nine feet wide. Its boats can carry thirty tons. The capital stock of the company is $1,300,000. Borrowed to complete the canal and rail road,

Cost of the work, $2,303,000

We understand that the company has borrowed a further sum of about $250,000 for the purchase of boats, cars, horses, and to open mines. This we believe will add to the permanent debt, making the cost of the whole improvement a little more than two millions and a half of dollars.

Of the debt of the company $800,000 is for stock issued by the state of New York, and the other in company loans, as follows:

$500,000—3 per cent. payable after 1846,	$25,000
300,000—4½ do. do. 1847,	13,500
Interest on company loan last year,	17,040

Interest annually to be paid by company, $55,540. In addition to the above interest paid by the company last year, their dividends to stockholders have been at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, and a surplus fund is accumulating towards paying off the debt.

The company was incorporated in 1823, the excavation of the canal commenced in July, 1825, and the work was finished in 1828.

The coal trade commenced in 1829, and increased as follows:

Years.	Tons	Years.	Tons.
1829	7,000	1835	90,000
1830	42,000	1836	106,000
1831	54,000	1837	115,000
1832	81,000	1838	76,321
1833	111,277	1839	122,300
1834	43,700	1840	148,470

The New York Express says, "we learn that the probable sales of coal by the Hudson and Delaware Company, with this year reach 300,000 tons, which at a profit of $2 50 will yield a revenue of half a million of dollars."

There were employed by the company in 1833, in the mines, upon the rail road, canal and wharves, eighteen hundred and sixty laborers, and three hundred and eighty-six horses. There are now employed more than three thousand laborers, and six hundred horses. In 1833, the site on which Carbondale is built, contained but one building, and Honesdale was a wilderness. They are now large and flourishing towns.

The stock of the company cost $100 per share. In 1839 it sold for $48½ per share; it is now rated in New York at 108½; nearly 9 per cent above par in these times of depression of stocks.

We have related the foregoing particulars not only to give our readers information in relation to an important public work, on which annually is carried to market Pennsylvania products to the amount of more than a million of dollars; but to show the certain value of our canals and rail roads, when completed to our coal fields. Here is a rail road carried sixteen miles over a mountain, with eight inclined planes and five stationary steam engines—a transhipment in a canal with a capacity of only thirty ton boats, one hundred and seven miles long, and requiring another transhipment into vessels for the New York or Albany market—so that coal passing over such an improvement with two transhipments, must be carried two hundred and fifteen miles from the mines to the city, and yet the work is profitable and yields seven per cent to the stockholders, besides leaving a surplus fund!

A rail road can be constructed from the first mines of the Swatara or Pinegrove region to Harrisburg, through the Swatara gap without any ascending grade, and the distance will not exceed thirty-five miles. Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars estimate the canal required to the Lackawanna, and will make the whole route to Harrisburg will be the shipping place from a million of tons. Harrisburg is but 71 miles above tide water, and a good canal for boats of 75 tons burden all the distance.

[Harrisburg Chronicle.

REVENUES OF THE STATES CANALS. Mr. Verplanck, in his report on finances, in the senate in March last, estimated the canal revenue for this year, at $1,875,000. And the payments as follows:

Repairs and superintendence,	$550,000
Interest on present loan—debt,	330,000
Do. on lateral canal debt,	357,000
Payment in aid of general fund,	200,000

Leaving the sum of $438,000

In the administration of the affairs of the state, I shall as heretofore, be regulated by a conscientious regard for the public welfare; and, in discharging the solemn obligation I am about to receive, I shall cause justice to be executed in mercy; while the circumstances of each case presented for executive action will be allowed their due influence, the safety of society shall be with me the paramount consideration.

We, fellow citizens, are servants of the people, and are not delegated to serve ourselves. Let us then dismiss every sentiment of personal ambition, and let us, in the public good, bury the stripes of party, and earnestly invoking the presence of Him who can guide us aright in all things, proceed to the discharge of our respective obligations to our country.

ALABAMA.

LEGISLATURE. The two houses assembled at Tuscaloosa on the 1st November. The honorable Nathaniel Terry, of Limestone was elected president of the senate without opposition.

Extracts from Governor Bagby's message.

The banking system of the state of Alabama continues to be a source of great anxiety, trouble and anxiety with the community at large, and will, I trust, command itself to the early and diligent attention of the general assembly. This system has been in operation eighteen years. In that time it has experienced all the vicissitudes of prosperity and adversity, to which a period of that duration subjects human institutions. It has passed through a long series of years, the grave and important questions now presented for the deliberate consideration of the general assembly are, whether upon a full and candid review of the operation and effect of this system upon the public interests, it has answered well the ends and the objects of its establishment, and of continuing a steady, unprecipitated value; affording a safe depository for the public funds—and furnishes a reasonable hope that it will, by the success of its operations, continue to pay the interest on the capital stock; and finally to reimburse that capital, for the payment of which the state has contracted a solemn obligation. However gratifying it might be to a just sense of patriotism and state pride, to be able to give an affirmative answer to all these questions, and/or imperatively requires that most of them should be answered in the negative. For, although it is with pleasure admitted, that the public funds committed to the custody and safe keeping of the bank, and forming a part of the capital; the payment of the interest and redemption of the stock, depending as they do, upon the sure foundation of our plighted public faith, are beyond the reach of accident, it is no less true, that the present condition of the banks is not such as to afford satisfaction to the community, either in regard to their past management or to inspire full confidence in their future success. The large amount of bad and doubtful debts—the enormous sums due from individuals, most of which will, in all probability, should the general bankrupt law go into effect, be lost to the community, and the schedule and affidavit—and the fearful encroachment already made on the capital stock—are considerations well calculated to cast the most ominous conjectures on the success of the whole system.

Whether the failure of these institutions to realize the reasonable expectation of the public, is to be ascribed to defects in the system, or to be found in the manner of selecting the board of directors, and in which they have managed the affairs of the banks, is the question now submitted for your candid, deliberate determination. And upon the correct decision of that question, depends the fate of the banks, and the credit of the state. If the defects are in the system, and are radical; they are admitted to be without remedy, and the system ought to be abandoned, at least as soon as a proper substitute could be provided. And I have no hesitation in declaring it as my settled opinion, that if the present mode of conducting the business of the banks, be sooner the state and its branches are wound up the better. If, on the other hand, the defects lie in the manner in which the directors are elected, and in which the affairs of the banks have been conducted, it becomes the indispensable duty of the legislature to apply the corrective, and to adopt such measures as will insure a better management hereafter. It has been my misfortune to differ with a majority of the legislature, in relation to the manner of electing bank directors; and in relation to many important points of policy in the management of the banks. Whether the measures recommended by me would have been salutary in their operation, cannot, with certainty, be asserted; but that the course pursued by the legislature has been most disastrous, in its effects upon the banks, is unfortunately no longer a problem. But for the settled conviction resting on my own mind, that in the present state of society, a paper currency is indispensable, and can be only constitutionally furnished by the states, and not by the general government, the discouragements I have experienced in advocating, so far as Alabama is concerned, to place the state banks on a better footing, would have induced me to abandon the present system altogether, and to have looked to some other expedient, within the purview of the constitution, as a substitute. And I still think, with entire respect for the opinion of others, that the state bank system is susceptible of being rendered a source of incalculable benefit to the people of Alabama. I believe further, that the state bank system is destined ultimately, under some modification or other, to furnish the paper circulation of this union.

In reflecting upon such measures as would most likely tend to alleviate and improve the present condition of the banks, and to enable them to conduct a sound and healthy action, the following have occurred to me as most likely to be productive of that desirable result; and they are, therefore, with becoming deference, respectfully recommended to your consideration. Still satisfied, and even more deeply convinced than ever, in the correctness of my opinion, that the plan of electing directors is to be erroneous, and will prove fatal to the banks, if persevered in, I am of opinion that it should be changed, so as to make it the duty of the governor to nominate double the number to be elected, and for the senate, or the two houses jointly, to select from that number the directors of each bank. The presidents, should I think, be elected as at present, by joint vote of the two houses. I am also of opinion, that the number of directors should be reduced to two, and a president for each bank; that they be paid a sufficient salary to secure the best financial talents; and that they be required to devote their entire time and attention to the management of the banks, until they are in a condition to resume specie payments. It will be proper also to adopt suitable measures to compel punctual attention to their duties, and to punish them for negligence or malpractice in office.

No doubt it will be objected to the proposition to reduce the number of directors, that it is aristocratic to take power from a large and bestow it on a smaller number; and that the proposition to increase the compensation, is anti-republican in its tendency. These objections sound loftily in theory, and are strictly correct in practice. But the mistake, the error, the mistake, consists in their application to the present case. Who ever heard of a man seeking the appointment of a bank director either from patriotic motives or for the distinction it confers? On the contrary, the accounts of many of the directors, from 1834 to 1837, prove that they were under the influence of a much more powerful motive than the love of distinction and of power.

And, even if it were otherwise, it may be safely affirmed, that no greater or more fatal error has been or can be committed, in regard to the management of the banks, than that they ought to be conducted on what are usually termed popular principles. The office of a bank director is not only one of the most desirable, but the most honorable of all offices, and the most desirable, if the capital of the bank was increased by being constantly used, and every man could be supplied with whatever amount his necessities required, whether he was able to pay it or not. But this not being the case, the capital being borrowed, no man ought to be permitted to exercise the office, who is not able to pay. Equally delusive and ruinous to the banks will be found the fanciful expectation of obtaining competent talents to manage the laborious and multifarious concerns of a banking institution, already extensively embarrassed, ably and successfully without adequate compensation. The only persons who are capable of such a service, both in regard to public and private affairs, that those who are willing to labor for nothing, fall, must usually, under the denomination of hard bargains. This remark does not, of course, refer to officers which confer great political distinction, which are doubtless sought, in many instances, even at an enormous price, by very dishonest and unworthy men, from a love of honest fame and the more ennobling feeling of patriotism. But so far as our banks are concerned, experience furnishes ample testimony to the fact, that their present embarrassed condition is owing in a great measure to the election, in many instances, of very dishonest and unworthy men, in situations without any stipulated compensation sufficient to compensate a man of ordinary capacity, with the fixed determination to compensate themselves. Volunteers certainly answer admirably in some departments of service; but experience has au-ply proved, that they are not always the appropriate corps from which to select bank directors. The most prudent policy of the present course pursued, both in legislation and the management of the banks, is, that it will inevitably place them under the control of their debtors. Let this state of things be once accomplished, and it requires no participation in the spirit of prophecy to foretell that the best directed legislation aimed at the banks, will have no other result, than to place a large portion of their business on long time, has also been a prolific source of evil to the banks, and one, the effect of which, they cannot much longer withstand. It is, therefore, respectfully suggested, that the banks be prohibited from discounting any promissory note having more than six months to run, and not to be renewed in any case; and from purchasing any bill of exchange having more than six months, secured by two good endorsers, and drawn against shipments of produce, at least to the amount of the bill, or actual funds at the point where the bill is to be paid. The present amount of circulation, which is about seven millions, is believed to be entirely adequate to the sound business wants of the country, and ought not to be increased. It is particularly recommended to enlarge the discretionary powers of the directors in regard to the security and collection of debts; and to enable each bank to appoint a marshal, with extensive powers, in all cases, to enforce the claims of the bank, and to be exercised by the sheriffs of the respective counties throughout the state. The salary of the bank attorneys is entirely too low, and ought to be increased by law; or left to the board of directors within a reasonable limit, beyond which they should not go.

It is, however, although I admit it is an unpleasant one, to recommend that the banks be relieved, at least for the present, from defraying the expenses of the state government. It is a maxim, that to tax and to please, any more than to love and be wise, is a difficult matter. But it is also true, that taxation in some form or other, is indispensable to the support of government, and my own reflections long since led me to conclude, that if the amount was kept down to the actual wants of the government, the more directly it was paid the better. The people are then constantly sensible of the amount of the contribution exacted from them for the support of government, and are more disposed to bear the tax, the amount absolutely necessary for its support, administered on the most economical scale. Whatever may be the correctness of this view, I have sufficient confidence in the patriotism and magnanimity of the people of Alabama, exhibited on so many occasions, to believe that they will be disposed to contribute a sufficient amount to defray the expenses of the state government; more especially when, by doing so, they will avert evils of greater magnitude. Indeed, I feel fully satisfied, that the people will not, for a moment, compromise their high claims to magnanimity, by leaning on the banks to defray the expenses of the state government, when the institutions are not in a situation to redeem their own notes. It were superfluous to remind the general assembly, that taxation is, of all others, the most delicate operation of a free government, and that in amount it ought to be kept down to an economical standard; and to be so regulated, as to operate with as much equality as is attainable in human affairs.

The law setting apart $200,000 annually, in aid of the valueless sixteenth sections, operates most injuriously on the interests and business of the banks, and ought to be repealed. It is admitted that the appropriation of this sum is directed to a most commendable and desirable object; and if the banks were in the habit of contributing to the fund, it would advocate the withdrawal of this appropriation, from an object dear to every patriot, and deeply interesting, if judiciously applied, to a part of the rising generation. But to be just before we are generous, is a maxim that holds as good in political, as in moral or legal affairs; and it is in the power of the banks, to be just, and to contribute to the straight pathway of common honesty, which is always the best policy, to require them to perform acts of individual accommodation or public munificence.

The various laws now in force for the relief of bank debtors, are believed to have been salutary in their operation, and ought to be continued, and the property applied and enforced, need no alteration.

It is not improbable that some of the views I have submitted may appear unreasonable, and that some of the measures I have recommended may seem to be harsh and rigorous. They have been reluctantly entertained, and I am fully sensible of the weight and dense of the high and solemn obligations of official duty. And permit me to add, in conclusion on this subject, that if the legislature, in their wisdom, should be able to devise any other plan, more likely to effectuate the objects which I feel satisfied we have alike in view, it will receive my cordial sanction and approbation. Impelled by a constant desire to preserve the faith and credit of the state unimpaired, I have more than once recommended the propriety of providing a permanent and efficient sinking fund, for the redemption of our state bonds; and the extinguishment of our public debt; and I avail myself of the present occasion to express the hope, that the legislature will keep this object steadily in view.

It is impossible to recur to our banking system, without being admonished, that it is based on borrowed capital, and that the faith and credit of the state are solemnly pledged for the payment of that capital. And Alabama owes it to herself; to her past history, every period of which is signified by the propriety of providing a permanent and efficient sinking fund; and to the great and good men to whom she is indebted for the rich inheritance of a written constitution, to pursue such a course as will enable her at all times to redeem the obligations of her plighted faith with scrupulous fidelity.

"The intimate relations subsisting between the state and general governments, and our liability to be affected, either for good or for evil, by the action of the latter, renders it proper that I should notice some of the measures introduced during the late extraordinary session of congress, most of which have, unfortunately as I conceive, become laws of the land. Some of these are some of the most objectionable every allusion by the state authorities to the action of the general government, as a species of impertinent and officious interference. My habit of thinking upon this subject has led me to a different conclusion. The general government was formed by the states; it can only be altered by the states; it is responsible to the states for its action; it was constituted a trustee by the states, for the benefit of the people, in relation to such matters, and none others, as were specially confided to it.

The integrity of the friends of a national bank, in consequence of the late extreme views, in order to enable them to seem to evade, while they violated the constitution, and to incorporate some institution of this kind. Fortunately for the country, all these attempts were unsuccessful—not so much, it would appear, however, from a disposition to preserve the constitution, as from inability on the part of the legislature to agree among themselves, as to the particular manner in which that instrument should be violated. And it is astonishing that the president of the United States should have vetoed two bank bills for constitutional reasons, without even alluding to the main question, which is unconstitutional. The result, namely, that congress has no power to incorporate a national institution of any sort. This question, like the sword of Damocles, is still suspended over our heads; and whether this state of suspense is to terminate in the ultimate triumph of the constitution, or in the prostration of that instrument to the influence of some mad and powerful man, is a question which belongs to the future. Unless, however, the indications of the times are grossly deceptive, the people are about to look to this subject, and to relieve the country for ever from the thralldom and the corruptions of a national bank. It is hoped that the legislature, in the next session, will give to the subject the consideration of any institution of this kind, by whatever name it may be called; and in the event of its passing congress in any shape, against the establishment of a branch in this state.

"The act to appropriate the proceeds of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights, as it is styled, is, in my judgment, the most extraordinary, as well as the most dangerous, measure that has ever emanated from the legislature of Alabama, and contains more of that subtle poison which is finally to neutralize the power and destroy the independence of these states, unless prevented by their constant vigilance, than any act passed by congress since the foundation of the government. This measure may be, and is, in answer to this objection, that it contains that could be embraced within its provisions. It violates the constitution by abolishing a permanent source of revenue belonging to the United States; thereby creating a necessity for increasing the duties on imports, which must fall unequally, and the weight of which must operate heavily and oppressively on the poorer states. It is answer to this objection, to say that the act is not to operate if it violates the compromise act of 1833—the compromise act is itself a violation of the spirit of the constitution. It violates the articles of cession from the ceding states to the United States, by distributing that which was intended to be a common fund, for the benefit of the ceding states jointly, among the individual states. It is an act of wasteful improvidence to give away three or four millions annually, when the national treasury is penurious, and places congress under the necessity of borrowing money, and taxing the necessaries of life, in order to support the government. It involves the right of congress to lay and collect taxes for the purpose of distribution among the states, in order to make them the plant subjects of national ambition and national power—for there is no difference between giving to the states the existing revenue, thereby creating a necessity for additional taxes, and laying taxes in the first instance, for the purpose of distribution.—It amounts to the same thing. Congress has no power to make donations when the treasury is thus straitened. It is attempted to give the character of these states, under such circumstances, to accept them. This act is one of that series of measures intended to pave the way for the permanent introduction of the misallied American system, the effect of which is to be to fasten perpetual burdens on the people of the south, in order to protect and foster the productions of labor in other sections of the union. If this law remains in force, it destroys all hope of reduction in the price of the public lands—a matter more interesting to the great mass of the people than any other, as it would enable every class, even the poorest, to provide homes for their wives and children, at a very moderate price. It is not to be expected that the price will be reduced while a majority of the states are interested in keeping it up, in order to increase the distributive portion to which each state is entitled. The true and wisest policy of this government, is to contribute to the happiness and comfort of the people; and not by exhausting existing sources of revenue, to increase the necessity for additional impositions, and diminishing their ability to become interested in the soil, by acquiring a home which after all, is the strongest tie to the soil and the country.

"The foregoing are some of the objections which apply with great force to the law for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. The 17th section of this act presents a subject for the consideration, and possibly for the action of the legislature. It provides that the two per cent of the nett proceeds of the lands sold by the United States, in the state of Alabama, on the first day of September next, 1842, and reserved by the act entitled "an act to enable the people of the Alabama territory to form a constitution and state government, and for the admission of such state into the union on the same footing with the original states, for the making of a road or roads through the Mobile and Tennessee rivers, and relinquished to the said state of Alabama, payable in two equal instalments; the first to be paid on the first day of May, 1842, and the other on the first day of May, 1843, and quarterly as the same may hereafter accrue. Provided, that the legislature of said state shall pass an act declaring their acceptance of said relinquishment, and also embracing a provision, to be unalterable without the consent of congress, that the whole of said two per cent. fund shall be faithfully applied, under the direction of the legislature of Alabama, to the connection, by some means or means not provided, of the navigable waters of the bay of Mobile with the Tennessee river, and the construction of a continuous line of internal improvements from a point on the Chatahochee river, opposite West Point, in Georgia, across the state of Alabama, in a direction to Jackson in Mississippi."

"This section of the act relinquishes to Alabama the right arising from this part of the stipulation of the public lands in this state, and which was reserved according to the terms of the act for our admission into the union, for the purpose of making a road or roads to the state. It is not perceived that this provision in the act of congress, would commit us to any extent of the object of the principle of the act is to be rejected, or accepting it, for one, should be for rejecting it without regard to consequences.

"It is certain that the two per cent. arising from the sales of the public lands in this state, can never become the property, or form a part of the revenue of the U. S. without our consent; and perhaps the act is correct in this part of the stipulation, that we are equitably entitled to the benefit of it.

"If the legislature should acquiesce in the correctness of this view, the only remaining question will be; whether they will now or at a more favorable period, bind the state to furnish the additional amount necessary to complete the work of internal improvement, contemplated in the act of congress. The entire cost of these works may be estimated at five millions—the amount of the two per cent. at three hundred thousand dollars—hence the sum to be furnished by the state would be four millions seven hundred thousand dollars. A more liberal estimate, in connection with the sister states of Georgia and Mississippi, by means of a permanent work of internal improvement is certainly a most desirable object, if we have the means to accomplish it. And the connexion of the navigable waters of the Mobile bay with the Tennessee river is, in every light in which it can be viewed, a matter of vast importance. It would bring us into intimate connexion with one of the finest provision raising countries in the world, by which we should annually save vast sums in the purchase of productions directly from the producers, which we now have to purchase in the first instance in N. Orleans; and the difference of exchange on the articles thus purchased would, in a few years, be sufficient to construct the work. A work of this kind would also have the effect of connecting the two great sections of the state more intimately, and what is of still higher importance, it would in time bring emergency, from which the most pacific and enlightened nations have not always been exempt, afford great facility in the transportation of troops, munitions of war, and provisions from that quarter, to which in time of need we should be compelled to look for them. The whole subject is respectfully submitted to the legislature without a doubt, that they will dispose of it with due regard to all the high and important considerations which it involves."

LOUISIANA.

The supreme court, at its late session at Alexandria, decided the case of Mrs. Jane Rowley vs. C. N. Rowley, from Concordia. The Red River Whig says:

"This case, our readers may recollect, is the one in relation to the result of which, in the district court of Concordia, the difficulty arose between judge John A. Rowley and the Rowley, which finally led to the lamented death of Mr. Rowley. Mrs. Rowley had sued her husband for a separation of bed and board and property. The district court decreed that she was the owner of the property which she inherited from her father, of one-half of the community of acquits and gains, and granted her a separation from bed and board. From this decision an appeal was taken to the supreme court, which was decided in substance as follows:

"The judgment of the district court is annulled, avoided and reversed; and it is decreed that so much of the plaintiff's demand as relates to a separation of bed and board, and divorce, settlement, and partition of the community of acquits and gains existing between the plaintiff and defendant, be rejected and dismissed. It was further adjudged that the plaintiff, JANE ROWLEY be restored to the administration of her paraphernal estate, separate and apart from the assets of the community of her husband, and that she recover judgment for the sum of $43,900—that sum consisting, principally, of the proceeds of one-third of the price of the Marengo plantation.

Judge GARLAND delivered the opinion of the court, which was a long and able one.

INDIANA.

EARLY HISTORY OF INDIANA. John D. Dillon, esq. of Logansport, is the gentleman to whom allusion was some time since made in the public journals, as having engaged in writing the "Early History of Indiana." Much of the history of our state, as we learn, has been devoted to this arduous undertaking—and it is gratifying to know that his indefatigable and persevering efforts have resulted already in the accumulation of a vast amount of most interesting and valuable data, from which, aided by such additional research as he may deem necessary, he will be able, in his power, to produce a work of no mean value. Mr. D. claims to have passed two weeks since, on his way to Vincennes, Corydon, Louisville, Ky. and other points, with the view of securing as many of the pioneers of the west as possible, and of drawing from them a mass of facts which may be able, what may yet be wanting to complete the ground-work of his plan. The manuscripts and correspondence of a distinguished citizen, now no more, whose history is intimately connected with that of the territory and state of Indiana from the year 1810, have, we believe, mostly fallen into the hands of Mr. Dillon, and he will doubtless draw from them much interesting matter connected with the secret history of the west during the late war with England.

In his collection we saw several specimens of the paper currency used among the French traders on the Wabash in the 18th century—all of which were redeemable in peltries and furs. But the most interesting relic, to us, was the first treaty ever made between the crown of Great Britain and the Miami nation of Indians, which appears to have been prepared with great care, for nearly a century, bearing date as it does in the year 1763. This treaty was written out on parchment, indented according to the English form, and besides the signatures and seals of the English commissioners, and the names and seals of the principal chiefs, it contains the marks of the latter, each in the form and similitude of a turtle—rather clumsily drawn it is true, but presenting very much the same general features as the original. [Type-caster's Journal.]

ILLINOIS.

ILLINOIS VS. JOHN DELAFIELD. This important case is now on trial before the court of errors, sitting at Albany. Samuel Stevens, esq. is counsel for the appellant and for the respondent, Judge William Kent, and Willis Hall, attorney general. About $60,000 is the amount at issue in this appeal. It is understood that the main point upon which the appellant's counsel will insist is, that the courts of this state have no jurisdiction over the case, it being cognisable only by the courts of the general government.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

THE HONORABLE ANDREW STEVENSON. Late minister to England has returned to the city of Washington. A number of the citizens of Philadelphia as he passed through their city, were anxious of showing their respect for his services by a public entertainment, but he declined in the following reply:

Philadelphia, Nov. 18, 1841.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your kind letter, congratulating me upon my return to my native country, and inviting me to a public dinner at such time as may best suit my convenience. Few things would have afforded me more pleasure than to have had it in my power to have met so many of my personal and political friends, and availed myself of the opportunity of expressing to them in person my grateful acknowledgments for such a manifestation of confidence and kindness. Continued indisposition, however, from my late distressing voyage, and engagements which I am unable to control, will deny me this pleasure, and I must throw myself upon your indulgent kindness to excuse me for declining your proffered invitation.

For the too favorable estimate gentlemen, which you are pleased to place upon my conduct and services, and the undiminished confidence expressed in my principles and future course, I pray you to accept my warm and grateful acknowledgments. These services, and greater, had I possessed the ability to render them, were due to my country, and its approbation my only reward. I receive, therefore, the distinguished honor which you confer upon me, and am conscious that the subject and a sense of duty can inspire, enhanced as it has been by the very kind and flattering manner in which it has been done. And I do not utter words of mere form and ceremony, when I assure you, that next to my native state, there is no part of the union from which such a compliment could come with greater welcome, than from the democracy of Pennsylvania. Who is there that ought not to feel proud and flattered, when such men come forward to cheer and honor him with their approbation and confidence? In returning, gentlemen, after an absence of so many years abroad, I may yet be permitted, I hope, to say that I return not only unchanged in heart and sentiment, but more devoted than ever to my country, and to those principles and doctrines of our republican fathers, upon which I have acted for the last thirty years, and which are identified with the whole course of my public life. These are the principles which I have ever most cherished, and carry with me to the grave, and upon the maintenance of which, in my opinion, depend the success and triumph of our free institutions.

I request, gentlemen, that you will accept, individually, assurances of the cordial esteem and respect with which I have the honor to be to you an obedient and faithful servant.

To Messrs. Dallas, Ingersoll, Giffin, Rush, Vane, Pennington, Cobb, &c. esquires.

THE VETO POWER.

THE VETO POWER—ITS HISTORY.

From the Savannah Georgiaian.

The veto power originated with the ancient Romans, and was the first essay of the common people of the republic towards the securing of their proper liberties. The Plebeians, having been oppressed by the Patricians, at the instigation of Scipio, about 260 years after the founding of the republic, seceded to a mountain, three miles distant from Rome, (eventually termed Mont Sacer), and would not return to the city until they had received from the Patricians compliance with their demand, and the solemn assurances that the common people should elect magistrates, whose persons should be sacred and inviolable, to whom they could commit the protection of their rights. These magistrates were called Tribunes, and were chosen from the Plebeians, and no Patrician could hold the office, unless he had first been adopted into a Plebeian family. Their power was at first limited, but at the same time extraordinary. It was preventive, rather than enforcing; it was to interpose and protect the people from oppressions and tyranny of their superiors; to assist them in redressing their wrongs, and in maintaining their liberties; and consisted in the utterance of but one word, and that one "veto," I forbid. These officers could prevent the discussion of any question, the passage of any law, the execution of any sentence, the levying of any taxes, the enlisting of any troops, almost arrest the machinery of government, by standing up and speaking that one word veto. No reasons were required of them; no one dared oppose them; their veto was supreme! As originally designed, it was emphatically the people's measures for the people's protection; the necessary balance-wheel, to equalize the power of the government, which had hitherto been engrossed by the rich, and give the people that interposing check which the alarming tyranny of the Patricians made necessary. It was the first attempt at a democracy, i.e. a people-ruling institution, and in all its features, save that of unlimited power, showed the humility of its origin. The Tribunes were chosen from the Plebeians, and they were no insignia of office, save a kind of beadle, who went before them; were not allowed to use a carriage, had no tribunal, but sat on benches. Their doors were open night and day for the people to prefer their requests or complaints. They were not allowed to enforce the senate, and were not even dignified with the name of magistrate; as designed by Scipio, they were the mere unadorned majesty of the people's voice, assimilated to the lowly pretensions of the people, the visible exponent of their will. These popular traits did not, however, long remain. The grasping ambition of some of the Tribunes, for change in others, soon abused the power, the Tribunes became themselves a greater evil than they remedied, and their authority was more tyrannical than the edicts of those they were created to oppose.

Veto became a word of despotic power. The decrees of the senate, the ordinances of the people, the laws of the state, were all bowed to their supremacy; and such was the force of the word, that not only could it stop the proceedings of the magistrates, which Cesar well calls "extremum jus tribunum," but, whoever, senators or consul, Patrician or Plebeian, dared oppose it, was immediately led to prison, and there to die. As so sacred were the persons of the Tribunes, that whoever hurt them was held accused, and his goods were confiscated. Sylla was the first who resisted the gross encroachments of the Tribunes; but on his death they regained their influence, and henceforth it became but the tool of ambitious men, who used it to the utmost ruin of the state. Such was his abuse, that, as Cicero says, the popular assemblies became the scenes of violence and massacre, in which the most daring and iniquitous always prevailed. The perversion of the original design of the veto was now completed by the acts of the Emperor Augustus, who got the tribunes to resign their office, and made the veto concentrated in his person the entire uncontrolled disposition of the state. This was the first instance of the combination of royal and veto power, and its assumption was all that was wanting to make the king a tyrant. From this time it was conferred upon the emperors, and the veto power continued to be elected, without, however, the exercise of it, until the emperor, until the time of Constantine, when the office was abolished.

The early operation of the veto power in Rome was good, the subsequent disastrous. At first it protected the people, gave them a voice in the legislative assemblies, and secured their liberties; ultimately, however, the lower orders, excluded them from the councils of the nation, and made the veto powerful instruments of power-hungry demagogues. The first civil blood shed at Rome was the blood of Tiberius; the Tribune battling, imprudently indeed, against the oppressions of the nobility. The last created continued and tragic series of intestine wars, the perversion of that power which was at first designed to give peace and unity to the Roman nation. So true has it ever been, that the delegated power of the people when abused has always reverted to their hands. Having traced the veto power from the simple word of Tribune, to the imperial exercise of its rights in Rome, we are now prepared to come down to modern times, and cite a few instances of its adoption and influence in European states.

The king of Great Britain possesses the veto right, and the power of parliament, though no instance of its exercise has occurred since 1692. In fact, constituted as the British government is the veto is entirely unnecessary. Such is the powerful agency of the monarch, and influence that they will prevent the passage of any law obnoxious to the crown, and the king can, through his ministers, so trim and shape the proceedings of those bodies, as to accommodate them to his views. While, on the other hand, the taking away responsibility from the monarch, and resting it with the cabinet, which varies, with the changes of public sentiment, never creates an agency for the exercise of the royal negative. The same power is vested with the king of Norway, but if three successive Storthing or Diets repeal the resolution or decree, it becomes a law without the king's assent, though he may have negatived it twice before. As the Storthing, however, sits only every third year, the veto of the king, though it may not eventually be ratified, has yet a prohibitory on any given law for six years. It was thus that nobility was abolished in Norway in 1821. The king had twice vetoed the law, passed by the Storthing, against the further exercise of the veto, and the Storthing Diet confirmed the resolutions of two former, and the law became established, notwithstanding the royal negative.

The constituent assembly of France conferred the veto power on the king in 1789, but the very first exercise of it proved his ruin. It was preposterous for such a body, and at such a time, to make such a provision in the constitution, and the king, as a monarch, and as affairs then stood, when judicious temporising, and not royal prerogative, was required. It was equally preposterous in Louis to employ it. It but slowed the waywardness of the popular will, which could at one time grant such a right, and at another punish the king for its exercise. The negative is, however, held by the present king, though it has never yet been put into requisition.

By the constitution of the Cortez, the king of Spain was vested with the same power, and it still forms a provision of the Spanish government. In Poland the veto power assumed another shape. It was centred not in the king, but in the Diet, and the king, as a member of the Diet could by his Nie Poszanala (I do not permit it) prevent the passage of any resolution, and defeat the operations of the rest. On the partition of Poland, Russia confirmed this liberum veto to the Polish assembly with the sinister design of keeping the Diet in a state of inefficiency or dependence; legislation; well knowing that in its then distracted state, the continuance of this individual veto would be, as it proved, destructive to harmony of action and unity of design, and the Nie Poszanala of the Polish representative has been but an apple of discord to that unhappy suffering people.

Upon the adoption of the American colonial assemblies, there existed a double negative, or veto vested in the royal governor, the other in the king. By the royal governors the right was often exercised, and the king frequently signified his disapproval of acts which had not only passed the colonial assemblies, but even been sanctioned by the governor. This feature was one strongly set forth as a prime grievance, in recounting the injuries and usurpations of the British monarch, in the Declaration of Independence, and its exercise was highly repugnant to the interests of America.

Dr. James Madison, in debates of the federal convention, thus shows the utility of the veto power under the proprietary government of Penna:

"The negative of the governor was constantly made use of to extort money. No good law whatever could be passed without a private bargain with him. An increase of salary, or some donation, was always made on a different bill, in vast, it became the regular practice to have orders in his favor on the treasury presented along with the bills to be signed, so that he might actually receive the former before he should sign the latter. When the Indians were stealing the western people, and notice of it arrived, the commander of the governor in the means of self-defence could not be so slow as was sometimes the case, his estate should be exempted from taxation; so that the people were to fight for the security of his property, whilst he was to have no share of the burdens of taxation."

At first sight, then, it appears strange that the framers of our constitution should have originated a new government, which should combine the experience of the past, without borrowing any of its defects, should bring in such a power, the operation of which had proved so baneful, and which had already been so strongly reprobated. But such was the fact. The war of the Revolution over the articles of confederation alone bound the states together, and the reaction which took place in several places, urgently demanded some new form of compact more adequate for the purposes of government, and more consistent with the character of the officers. I mean the civil and political officers, and not the military. I have seen the choice of proper officers, and the adoption of necessary rules, Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, opened the history of the convention by proposing, on the 29th May, a series of resolutions, embodying his views as to what the crisis required, and on the same day general Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, laid before the delegates the draught of a federal compact, to be agreed upon between the free and independent states of America. The veto power entered into the scheme of the gentlemen, though centered by them in different points. The 5th resolution of Mr. Randolph says:

"Resolved, That the executive and a convenient number of the national judiciary ought to compose a council of revision, with authority to examine every act of the national legislature before it shall operate, and every act of a particular legislature before a negative thereon shall be final; and that the dissent of said council shall amount to a rejection, unless the act of the national legislature be again passed, or that the act of a particular legislature be again negatived by the members of each branch."

The article embracing this feature in the draught of Mr. Pinckney reads thus:

"Every bill which shall have passed the legislature shall be presented to the president of the United States; if he approves it, he shall sign it; but if he does not approve it, he shall return it, with his objections, to the house in which it shall have passed, and the members present, notwithstanding the president's objections, agree to pass it, shall send it to the other house, with the president's objections; where, if two-thirds of the members present also agree to pass it, the same shall become a law. And all bills shall be signed by the president, and not returned by him within a certain time, shall be laws, unless the legislature, by their adjournment, prevent their return, in which case they shall not be laws."

Mr. Randolph's views were evidently based on the suggestions of Mr. Madison, or that gentleman, in a letter to Mr. Madison, a few weeks previous, urged the same idea of a negative by the national government, "in all cases whatsoever, on the legislative acts of the state, as the king of Great Britain heretofore had."

The resolutions of Mr. Randolph become the basis on which the proceedings of the convention commenced, and, as Mr. Madison says, "to the developments, narrations and modifications of which, the plan of government proposed by the convention may be traced."

Let us, then, follow out the discussions of this body until the suggested joint revision by the executive and judiciary became altered to the single negative of the president. On the 4th June the first clause of Mr. Randolph's eighth resolution was taken up; but Mr. Gerry, from Massachusetts, doubting whether the judiciary ought to have anything to do with it, moved to postpone the clause, and introduced the following amendment:

"That the national executive shall have a right to negative any legislative act which shall not afterwards be passed by — parts of each branch of the national legislature."

Rufus King, from Massachusetts, seconded the motion, and the opinion of Mr. Gerry was taken up. Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, and Alexander Hamilton, of New York, wished to strike out the latter clause, so as to give the executive an absolute negative on the laws; but, though supported by these gentlemen, it was opposed by Dr. Franklin, Roger Sherman, of Connecticut, Madison, Butler of South Carolina, and Mason of Virginia; and was therefore negatived.

Mr. Butler and Dr. Franklin then wished to give a suspending instead of a negative power; but this was overruled, and the blank of Mr. Gerry's resolution was filled up, sub stituted, with two-thirds; and the question was taken on the motion, as thus stated, it received the votes of eight states, Connecticut and Maryland voting in the negative. On the 6th June, according to previous notice, Mr. Wilson and Mr. Madison moved to reconsider the vote, excluding the judiciary from a share in the revision and negative of the laws, with the view of reinforcing the latter with the influence of the former. But though Mr. Madison urged the plan of associating the judges in the revisionary function of the executive, or thereby doubling the advantages and diminishing the dangers, and as enabling the judiciary better to defend itself against legislative encroachments, it was as eloquently opposed by Mr. Gerry and others, who thought the executive, while standing alone, would be more impartial than when he could be covered by the sanction and seduced by the sophistry of the judges; and it was finally rejected. Two days after, the proposition of an executive and judicial council, of the number of each branch to be determined by the convention by Mr. Randolph's resolutions, and subsequently brought up for reconsideration by Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Madison, was also voted down, three yeas in the affirmative, seven in the negative, Delaware was divided.

On the 15th of June, Mr. Hamilton offered to the convention a plan of government, the fourth article of which the veto power was unqualifiedly conferred on the executive. The next day, Mr. Gorham, from Mass. reported from the committee appointed to reconsider the various propositions before the convention, that the tenth resolution of the report says: "That the national executive shall not have a right to negative any legislative act which shall not be afterwards passed, unless by two-thirds of each branch of the national legislature." The convention proceeded to take up the several articles and clauses of the report, and it was not till the 18th July that the tenth resolution became the order of the day; it was then passed unanimously. On the 20th, however, Mr. Wilson still entertaining his original views as to the union of the judiciary with the executive on the veto power, moved an amendment to the resolution, which gave rise to a most interesting debate, in which Mr. Elsworth, of the Connecticut, Mr. Mason, of Virginia, and Mr. Madison, and the six members from Morris, of Pennsylvania, sustained the views of Mr. Wilson; and Messrs. Gorham, Gerry and Strong, of Massachusetts, Mr. Martin of Maryland, and Mr. Rutledge, of South Carolina, opposed them, and the amendment was lost. The original resolution, therefore, was again passed.

Having gone critically through with the report of the committee, the various resolutions which had been agreed to were, on Thursday, 26th July, referred to a committee of detail, to report on Monday, August 6th, a draught of the constitution. This committee, of which Mr. Rutledge was chairman, reported on the day assigned, and the veto power was conferred by the 13th section of the sixth article. This paragraph, as reported by the committee, came under discussion on Wednesday, 15th August, when Mr. Madison moved an amendment which revived of the previously agitated question of uniting the judges of the supreme court with the president in his revision and rejection of laws passed by congress. Much debate followed. Mr. Wilson and Mr. Mercer supported Mr. Madison, and Mr. Pinckney opposed. The amendment was lost—three states voting for it, and eight against it. Having thus surveyed the subject in all its bearings, the constitution, amended, altered and perfected, was, on the 17th September, 1787, signed by the convention, and constitutes to this day the basis of our government. The veto power in this constitution is thus expressed, article 1, sect. 7:

"Every bill which shall have passed the house of representatives, before it become a law, be presented to the president of the United States; if he approves, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that house in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it."

The first use of this constitutional power was by Washington, who, on the 5th April, 1793, vetoed the "representation bill," which originated in the house of representatives. As this, from its priority, is an event worthy of extended notice, we give the circumstance of the case, as briefly related by Jefferson, then secretary of state:

"April 6th, 1793. On Monday, the 5th, I went to breakfast, and first introduced some other matters, then fell on the representation bill, which he had in this possession for the 10th day. I had before given him my opinion in writing, that the method of appointment was contrary to the constitution. He standing of that opinion, and to which was understood at the time by the makers of it, that it was under the construction which the bill put; and he observed that the vote for and against the bill was perfectly geographical—a northern against a southern side with a southern party. I admitted the fact of delicacy, but that it should not induce him to do wrong, and urged the dangers to which the scramble for the fractionary members would always lead. He expressed his fear that there would, ere long, be a separation of the union; that the public mind would be ready on any pretence to secede. I went home, sent for Randolph, the 11th, and he desired him to get Mr. Madison immediately, and come to me; and if we three concurred in opinion, that he would negative the bill. He desired to hear nothing more about it, but that we would draw up the report for him to sign. They came—our minds had been before made up—we drew the instrument."

Randolph carried it to him, and told him we all concurred in it. He said, "I do, upon my honor." He sent it to the friends of the bill, and the house of representatives instantly. A few of the hottest friends of the bill expressed passion, but the majority were satisfied with it, and out of doors it gave pleasure to have at length an instance of the negative being exercised. Written this the 9th April."

This was in Washington's first term. Again elected, he again, on the 1st March, 1797, vetoed the bill inshutment of the elderly Adams nor Jefferson employed it. President Madison vetoed the following bills, all but the bank bill originating in the house:

February 21, 1811. Church in Alexandria.
February 28, 1811. Baptist church.
April 12, 1812. Judicial bill.
November 6, 1812. Naturalization.
January 20, 1812. United States bank.
March 3, 1817. Bonus bill.

President Monroe, on the 4th of May, 1819, vetoed the bill of the house of representatives "for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road."

Following on the views of President Monroe in his veto, President Jackson also put his first veto, May 27, 1830, on the "Maysville road bill" from the house. Also, on the 31st May, 1831, "an act to authorize subscription of stock in the Washington Turnpike company."

December 17th, 1831—"An act making appropriations for building light-houses, light-boats, beacons, monuments, placing buoys, and for improving harbors and directing surveys."

An act to authorize a subscription to stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal company."

July 10th, 1834—"An act to modify and continue an act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States."

December 6th, 1832—"An act providing for the final settlement of the claims of states for interest on advances made to the United States during the late war." The same day he also vetoed the harbor bill.

December 5th, 1833—"An act to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States, and granting lands to certain states."

In 1834—"An act for making an appropriation for improving the navigation of the Wabash river."

June 9th, 1836—"A bill fixing a day for the meeting of congress."

And on the 3d March, 1837, virtually vetoed the currency bill of the senate.

President Tyler vetoed, August 16th, 1841, the fiscal bank bill, and on September 9th, 1841, the fiscal corporation bill.

Such is a plain history of the veto power. As it respects the several states, the executive in some have the power, in others not. Those which possess the negative power, such as is given to the president, the New York, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri and Maine. The other states do not have it at all, or the bill when returned by the governor may be re-passed by a mere majority.

Of the ten presidents, five have made use of the veto power, and five have not.

The following paragraph in relation to the president's veto, is taken from a late number of the London Times.

"Mr. Tyler, the new president, elevated to that office without any popular election, by a dispensation of Providence, at least as accidental of the de vote on the bill of irresponsible monarchy, has placed the veto upon a bill of immense importance, for incorporating a bank of the United States, which had passed both houses of congress, merely on the ground of his own personal convictions. In monarchical England, the sovereign has a veto, but it has never been exercised for 150 years; yet in democratical America, the veto is a power which a single man, and that man not chosen for the purpose."

"In England the prerogatives of the crown are exercised, not according to the private opinions of the sovereign, but under the advice of responsible ministers; but in America, the democratic chief refuses his assent to a law because it is contrary to his individual judgment. And, to make the case still stronger, this is done upon the great party question of the day; the very question which came uppermost during the late presidential election, and on which the contest was waged. He has signified their will by rejecting the candidate who then professed views similar to Mr. Tyler's, and elected one pledged to adopt an opposite course. Our readers will perceive that we regard this matter merely in a constitutional point of view."

Eastern Shore of Maryland tells us that the fly has already appeared in the fields that were sowed early in Peninsula.

CHRONICLE.

SANTA FE AND THE FAR WEST.

From the Evesville (Indiana) Journal.

We are permitted by a gentleman residing in the neighboring county of Gibson to take the following extract from a private letter from him, dated,

Santa Fe, July 29, 1841.

I left Vincennes on the 23d April for St. Louis, with a view of ascertaining the object of the visit by the company raising for the Pacific ocean. When I arrived at St. Louis, I found I had to proceed to Independence, the southern terminus of the Santa Fe company, and adjoining the Indian boundary, four hundred miles farther. There I found three different caravans busily recruiting; the reverend bishop Smith, with a caravan to establish a mission amongst the Blackfoot Indians, in the valley of the Columbia river, who left with the caravan, to California by way of the head waters of the Columbia river, commanded by col. Bartleson and Richman, composed of about ninety persons, male and female. The second to California, composed of one hundred men and about thirty women and children—the yearly caravan composed of merchants to this city, Chinhuana and Seneca, composed of about eighty men and forty wagons, loaded with merchandise, &c. The caravans all left between the 8th and 10th May. After ascertaining the object of the California caravan, governor Briggs and myself having understood positively a caravan was to leave from Santa Fe to join the one by the way of Columbia, raised ten men and agreed to leave at a time to overtake the Santa Fe company at or near the Arkansas, but on the evening previous to our departure the governor's wife was taken unwell, and he was compelled to abandon the adventure. Accordingly, on the 19th May, myself with eight others, with three little wagons loaded with provisions and arms, and three riding mules, left the line of Missouri for the far west.

The Indian country as far as Council Grove, two hundred miles from the line, is perhaps as fine a tract of country as can be found in the world; there is rather a scarcity of timber, but in soil and water none superior. The Council Grove, as it is called, is the ancient site of once a proud and mighty city. It is situated on the main White river, which here forms a crescent or curve of about nine miles in circumference, and contains more than a hundred mounds, half of which are more than ten times as large as those near Vincennes—those in the centre are in the form of a square, many containing a surface of more than two acres, some in the form of a triangle and others perfectly round. Here the Pawnee, Arapaho, Camanche, Loups, and Eutaw Indians, all of whom are at war with each other, meet and smoke the pipe once a year in peace. Every person and the things are sacred for many miles around this peaceful grove. This ceremony has been handed down for many centuries to the red men by their forefathers, and here their chiefs and great men are brought from hundreds of miles around to be buried one of them every two weeks before we passed, had a proud mound of stones erected to his memory, with a pole painted red and a scalp appended thereto, to show that he had been a great brave. The numerous camps every where to be seen around here, at once convince the traveler that here is the great rendezvous of thousands annually. From there onward, for four hundred miles, there is nothing to be seen but one eternal desert, without one, even one solitary stick of timber to cheer the eye for thirty days. Nothing here is to be had but buffalo dung to cook the food that is used, but of this the whole prairies are covered, and it is an excellent substitute.

We overtook the caravan in sight of the Arkansas, about four hundred miles from the line of the United States and eight hundred from St. Louis, without trouble by the Indians, and attached ourselves thereto for duty in crossing the river, which is much larger than at the mouth, and always muddy and rolling her quicksands into bars almost every hour, so that fords or crossings are dangerous and uncertain. From the Arkansas river the scarcity of water commences, and even the little to be had is so deeply impregnated with salt, sulphur, &c. that stern necessity alone brings the traveller to the use of it. On the Sacramento river there are one or two good springs, at one of which we met of the Arapahoe Indians five hundred warriors, who treated us with a proper friendship, elated with their success ten days before, when, in battle, they killed seventy-six Pawnees. We gratified them with encamping on the battle ground, where the untired bodies were yet almost warm. The next day we visited their lodge, six miles from the battle ground, where we had a full view of savage life in a perfect state of nature; amongst five hundred women and children there were but few that had never before seen the dress and equipage of the white man.

After leaving the good and friendly Indians, we were cheered in eight or ten days with the far distant appearance of the Rocky Mountains. From day to day as we approached them, the beauty of the scenery increased, and when within twenty miles, the reflection of the sun through the melting snow that eternally covers their highest peaks is splendid beyond all description. Here the traveler beholds a chain of many hundred, nay, thousands of miles, piled up, as it were, until they reach to heaven, with stone uncovered with verdure or shrubs of any kind; nothing but the white caps of snow, and rough and terrific precipices, varied for the eye to behold, but yet reaching the crossings of Red river, at the foot of the mountain, and here the pine and cedar tree again, on the mountain side and in the valley, greet the eye once more; and here on this plain we had to encounter about three hundred Eutaw warriors, but, after repeated skirmishing, they were fain to retreat, without effecting any great success. We then rode here to the town of Bogas we found water, wood, and good cheer. The caravan arrived in this city on the 2d July, all in good health, in less than two months, the quickest trip ever made over the desert.

Now for Santa Fe, or the Holy City. It is situated in a valley 10 miles long, and from 2 to 5 wide, surrounded by immense mountain ranges, the sides of which are covered with red rocks, and one foot wide, made with straw and mud, and dried in the sun; and such is the durability that many houses more than two hundred years old are standing and look well; they are only one story high, handsomely whitewashed inside, with dirt floors. The houses are one and a half stories high, and no other than dirt floor, but they are generally covered with carpets; the houses are covered with stones and dirt, and are flat roofed, perfectly weather proof. The city contains six churches, generally richly fitted out. The population is about eight thousand inhabitants, all rigid Roman Catholics. It is situated on a small branch of the Rio del Norte, and about 14 miles from the main river, which is near the size of the river Wabash at Vincennes.

The ladies, certainly, are far more beautiful in this country than those of the same rank in America; their dark eyes, slender and delicate frame, with unusual small ankles and feet, together with their gay winning address, make you at once easy and happy in their company. Perhaps no people on earth love dress and attention more than the Spanish ladies and it may be said of a truth, that their gorgeous costumes, with the man, are matters to boast of amongst themselves. The work but little; the fandango and siesta form the division of time. The fandango is a lascivious dance, partaking in part of the waltz, cotillon, and many amorous movements, and is certainly handsome and amusing. It is the national dance. In this the governor and most humble citizen move together, and in this consists all their republican boast.

The men are honest—perhaps more so than those of the same class in the United States, proud and vain of their blood—the descendants of the ancient Spaniards of their pure blood—those of the Spaniards and Pueblo Indians, the descendants of their great monarch, Montezuma, doubly more so. The pure blood cannot inherit office here; the present governor general, and all the officers of state, are of the mixed blood of Montezuma. This has been the case since the year 1836. In that revolution fell the most honorable and beloved of all the native Spaniards in Mexico, and all his family were banished. In the city there is but one officer of justice, the Alcalde, and he has nothing to do.

The commerce of this place is certainly very considerable; and although there is but one gold mine worked here now, and one copper mine, yet the daily receipts amount to about six or seven hundred dollars net. More than from one to two hundred and twenty hands are employed at work. The revolution has set every thing aback here in the mining departments, as they were generally held by natives of old Spain, and accounted for its to the general government after the revolution. This thing will soon be settled, and then the Holy City will appear in all her gaudy plumage again.

I start in two or three days to California. The company consists of about two hundred Americans and Spaniards, to co-operate on the 1st of January, 1842, with the Columbia caravan, at Monterey, on the bay of San Francisco. We expect the governor will allow us to settle, and concede to us certain lands, &c.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

CONSUL. THORNGREN ZEENAS has been recognized by the president of the United States as vice consul of Sweden and Norway for the port of New York.

THIS HON. HENRY CLAY. We are happy to state that Mr. Clay's health is entirely able to state, that Mr. Clay's friends that he leaves Ashland in a few days for Washington city, where we have no doubt he will remain as long as his services can be of any benefit to his country. The rumor, that he only awaits the meeting of the legislature to tender his resignation, is unfounded. It is not possible that Mr. Clay should at this time, when, above all other things, his counsel is needed, retire from his post, and yield the citadel to the enemy.

Lexington, (Ky.) Intelligence.

PRESENT TO MR. CLAY. A number of citizens at Dayton, Ohio, purchased a plough exhibited at the agricultural fair recently held in that city, and presented it to Mr. Clay, accompanied with a handsome complimentary letter, to which he replied as below.

Ashland, November 9, 1841.

Gentlemen: I have received your obliging favor of the 3d instant, and the plough which you have done me the honor to send. I request your acceptance, and that of the gentlemen by whom it is offered, of my cordial thanks for a present so congenial with my most agreeable occupation and indicative of the best and the most innocent pursuits of man. It is a magnificent specimen of its kind, and highly creditable to the skill and taste of Mr. Wilnington, who made it. If our lawmakers would work as well, and as true, as I am sure this plough will, their laws would be as good as the crops which, I am persuaded it may be made to produce.

I am gentlemen, inexpressibly thankful and grateful for the confidence you have so kindly conveyed in my public career. It is perfectly true that it has been one of full difficulties; resulting, from political opponents, and recently from both professed friends and open foes. Whether proceeding, however, from the one or the other, or from both, my rule of conduct has been, and, during the short time I expect to remain in the public councils, will be, to discharge my duty fully, firmly and faithfully, regardless of all personal consequences. Your personal gratification—coming, as it does, from a respectable portion of Ohio to which I have been under the greatest obligations. I tender a heartfelt acknowledgment of these to you, and to those who, on this occasion, you represent. Your friend and obedient servant.

H. CLAY.

Messrs. D. Kiler, P. Voorhes, and D. A. Heynes.

NORTH EASTERN BOUNDARY. The correspondence of the Boston Mercantile Journal, under date of Bangor, Maine, November 22, says—The northeastern boundary commissioners, I understand, have completed their ex parte labors, with the exception of Major Graham, who has been unfortunately delayed by reason of a dense smoke which filled the region where he was located. Six weeks of his time have been unoccupied in the business of the commission in consequence. He will leave the line for the fall and winter, somewhere in the vicinity of the St. John river and at about thirty miles from the N. E. angle of the state.

Professor Renwick, who ran the line from the N. E. angle, along the highlands, to the N. W. angle, arrived at its terminus on the 20th of October and returned home by the way of Quebec. The part of his party under Mr. Lally, returned by this route. The highlands are of a description that leaves no doubt of their identity with those mentioned in the treaty.

Captain Talcott, who ran the westerly line to the N. W. angle, arrived there a short time previous to Professor Renwick's party. The British commissioners followed directly upon Captain Walcott's line to the highlands. They have left for the winter, and will not again go up until the spring. The fact that they were satisfied that Captain T's line is the true one, argues favorably to the early settlement of the whole line in our favor. The British officers on the Tenoscouate lake, went over the ground and examined some part of the survey, on the highlands, and he is said to have expressed themselves with the justness of the American claim. The sources of the rivers running into the St. Lawrence, and into the Atlantic were discovered, and frequently, at no great distance apart.

The land throughout this region is remarkably sterile. The ground is mostly dry, the climate is cold. The earliest snow this season fell on the 15th of October; I believe later than usual. When the party left on the 20th, the snow was six inches deep.

The joint commission will probably go upon the line some time next year; and doubtless before the year 1843 has expired, the much vexed boundary question will be settled in our favor. This result will not be at all agreeable to our New Brunswick neighbors; who, finding the heavens and the earth against their claim, are already yelping anathemas against all the Yankees in general, and Major Graham in particular, for consulting these unscrupulous authorities in the matter.

The above information I have from one of the "Highland" party. Our lumbermen are going largely into their business the coming winter. Seldom, if ever, have more teams been fitted out than there have been this fall. One man, I am told, sends two hundred men into the woods. How many others send as many, I am not informed.

SACS AND FOXES. The Galena Gazette says that Governor Doty has returned from the council held with these Indians. He reports, that the commissioners were unable to effect a treaty. Their instructions were, to buy no part of their lands, unless they could buy the whole. The Indians refused to treat on these conditions.

A delegation of some twenty Indians, the chiefs and head men of the Sacs and Foxes, passed up the river on board the Lehigh, on their way to Washington. We were not made acquainted with the object of their visit, but presume it had relation to the treaty spoken of by the Gazette. They were dressed and painted in the real Indian style, and created quite an interest among those of our citizens who were fortunate enough to get a glimpse of them.

SHOE STATISTICS. A Lynn shoemaker, writing in the Boston Atlas, gives some interesting facts, in relation to the number of shoes and boots imported from France. The quantity of boots fairly entered from France, last year, was 16,845 pairs, besides those from other countries, which is an increase of sixteen hundred per cent. in eight years; and the custom is daily becoming more common for gentlemen to send out their measure, and order directly from the manufacturer. Owing to this, Furr's boots are now as well known in New York and Boston as in Philadelphia.

Of ladies' shoes, the quantity imported last year was 73,432 pairs, which is an increase of more than four hundred per cent. in eight years. In this, we make no calculation for those brought into the country in other ways than through the custom house, which, as they are not bulky, is no doubt very large.

But, rapid as is the increase of importations from France, we have more to fear from Germany and other continental countries, under a reduced duty, than from France, as they can furnish the medium qualities, which are worn by the mass of our people, and at a reasonably low price.

How then, emphatically asks the writer, can we compete with the foreigner, when the duty is reduced to twenty per cent?

THE ARMY.

FLORIDA. From the St. Augustine Herald. Bevity is the soil of wit. We publish the following as the best bulletin from Florida which has appeared since the war commenced. It is an extract from a letter of capt. W. D. A. Wade, 3d artillery, to a brother officer in this city, which has been politely furnished to us. We copy it verbatim:

"I have no time to write a long letter—suffice it to say I am pleased with the RESULT, RECAPITULATION:

Killed, 6 warriors, 3 boys,	8
Prisoners, 14 warriors, 10 women,	39
10 boys, 15 girls,	25

Destroyed, 20 caecoes.

Captured, 31 rifles.

Do. 19 powder horns, (well filled).

Do. any quantity of balls and backshot, and as for provisions more than you can tell. Pumpkins, cooties, beans, &c. No loss on my part. All returned well. The Indians were ready to fight, and very well prepared. Had 60 men of D and K companies, 3d artillery. Lieutenant J. Thomas and assistant surgeon Emerson accompanied."

To the politeness of officers of the garrison, we are indebted for the following particulars of captain Wade's admirable expedition:

About the 12th of the month, captain W. D. A. Wade, 3d artillery, commanding at Fort Lauderdale, (on the Atlantic coast, 30 miles north of Key Biscayne), caught an Indian fishing on the beach, who undertook to conduct him to a village. Setting out with 60 men, he came to the place, where he shot 8 and captured 20. One of the captured informed him that he had been a great friend to Sam Jones, but lately had quarrelled, and that he would guide to another village 30 miles distant. To this village they went, where they captured 25, without receiving a shot, although the Indians had 13 loaded rifles.

The friendly Indian now offered to bring in more, if captain Wade would permit him to go after them. Permission was given, and he returned with 4 men and 2 boys. As the party returned to the post, another Indian came up and surrendered himself.

Lieutenants Wyse, Rankin, Thomas and Cherchill had gone out with 70 men, guided by this friendly Indian; but not knowing where Sam Jones is, they expect but little success. Sam is supposed to be a few days march south of Lake Okechobee, with a few warriors, and on the return of this party, major Childs intends proceeding with boats into the everglades to hunt him out.

The scout from Fort Dallas, commanded by Capt. Burke, had not returned. They have been absent six or seven weeks.

Major Childs had gone down to Fort Landerdale, and was preparing for a general scout on the Okechobee Lake.

Lieut. Patrick has temporarily assumed charge of the settlement of the country. He is a very active and efficient officer.

4th artillery.—The following are the stations of the companies of this regiment, Lieut. Col. I. B. Craze, commanding; head quarters, Buffalo, N. Y.

B, F. H. I, Buffalo.

C, capt. P. H. Galt, Fort Niagara.

G, capt. J. Monroe, Fort Ontario.

A, D, E, K, Major Belton commanding, Madison barracks, Sacket's Harbor.

DEATHS. The National Intelligencer announces the death of his residing in Washington city, on Tuesday, November 30th, lieutenant colonel James H. Hook, assistant commissary general of subsistence U. S. Army. By this dispensation the army has lost an undeviating and sympathizing advocate, the poor and distressed an untiring friend, and one in whom the kniplier feelings of our nature centre in an eminent degree. Upon his immediate family connexion, and in a more especial degree his bereaved widow, will this blow fall with accumulated weight. May the balm of consolation be theirs!

At Indian Key, East Florida, on the 1st ult. FREDERICK DENN, United States marine corps, in the 22d year of his age.

THE NAVY.

THE COURT OF INQUIRY at New York of which Com. STEWART was president has adjourned.

A COURT MARTIAL, of which commodore Jones is the president, is to convene at the navy yard Philadelphia, for the trial of Captain Bolton, on charges connected with his recent return in the Brandywine frigate from the Mediterranean.

COMMODORE STEWART, now in command of the navy yard, Philadelphia, has received preparatory orders to hold himself in readiness to take command of the home squadron.

Commodore G. C. Read, succeeds Com. S. at the navy yard.

LIEUT. R. S. PINCKNEY ACQUITTED.—Official—navy department, Nov. 30, 1841. Sir: The court martial before which you were recently tried upon charges and specifications preferred by the department on the information of surgeon James M. Green, found you not guilty, and fully acquitted you.

The finding and judgement of the court are approved by the department, and you are hereby released from arrest, and will regard yourself as awaiting orders. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant, A. W. FUSHER.

Lt. R. S. PINCKNEY, U. S. Navy, Washington.

From the Army & Navy Chronicle.

THE COURT MARTIAL at NORFOLK. All the cases except one having been acted upon, we are now enabled to announce the result.

Commander W. K. LATIMER was tried upon the following charges:

First—Oppression and cruelty; second—illegally inflicting punishment; found guilty of both charges, and sentenced to be reprimanded by the secretary of the navy, and to be suspended from rank and command in the navy for the term of three years from the 23d June, 1841. This sentence was approved on the 7th August, 1841, but has been remitted as to part of the period of suspension.

The case of lieut. F. B. ELLISON is still under consideration.

Lieutenant S. W. GONON was tried on a charge of "disobedience of orders, and neglect of duty" found guilty, and sentenced to be suspended for two years from the 24th July, 1841. The sentence was approved, Oct. 14, 1841; but upon a careful reconsideration of the case, the judgment of approval was reversed, and the sentence disapproved, Oct. 27, 1841.

Lieutenant B. MORE DUVE was tried upon the following charges:

First—sleeping upon his watch, and negligently performing his duty; second—disobedience of orders, and contempt and disrespect to superior officers; found guilty of both charges, and sentenced to be dismissed from the navy. The sentence was approved by the president of the United States on the 20th Oct. 1841; but in consideration of the circumstances of extenuation which exist in the case, and trusting that the severe example presented in the sentence of the court is not necessary to produce a due effect upon the accused and upon the service generally, Lieut. Duve was restored to his former rank on the 14th Nov. 1841.

Surgeon L. B. HUNTER was tried upon the following charges:

First—Disobedience of orders; second—Using provoking words, gestures, or menaces; third—treating with contempt his superior, being in the execution of his office; fourth—scandalous conduct; fifth—negligence in the performance of his duty; sixth—disobeying 2d article of rules, &c. "For the naval service, under the head of 'officers in general' seventh—disobeying the 'regulations relative to naval surgeons and their assistants' he was found guilty of part of the 2nd, of the 3d and 6th charges; and not guilty of the 1st, 4th, 5th and 7th charges; and sentenced to be suspended upon half pay for the term of five years from the 13th July, 1841. Sentence disapproved, Oct. 29, 1841.

Purser H. BRIDGE was tried upon the following charges:

First—Disobedience of orders; second—conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman; third—neglect of duty; fourth—disrespect to his superior officer; found guilty of the 1st and 2nd, and not guilty of the 3d and 4th; and sentenced to be publicly reprimanded in general orders, to be read on board every ship in commission, and at every naval station. Sentence disapproved, Nov. 1, 1841.

NAVAL MEDICAL BOARD. A board of naval surgeons assembled at Philadelphia, on the 23d ultimo, for the examination of assistant surgeons for promotion, and of candidates for admission into the navy. The board consists of surgeon W. P. C. Barton, president. Surgeons T. Williamson, T. Dillard, W. S. W. Ruschenberger, and J. F. Brooke, members.

A large and respectable meeting of the citizens of Charlestown, Massachusetts, on the 23d ult. passed several resolutions in relation to their navy yard, among which was one soliciting the secretary of the navy to cause the ship Vermont, or the frigate Comberland, to be finished and launched the coming winter, and fitted for the service; or in case it should be judged inexpedient to finish either of said ships, that he would cause a steam frigate to be built this winter at their yard, as the frame for such a vessel is already provided at the station.

GENESEE VALLEY CANAL. Extensive preparations were made at Danville on the 23d, to celebrate the letting in of the water into that portion of the canal between Mount Morris and Danville. The whole navigable distance is now about 50 miles.

ERIE CANAL. The Syracuse Journal says some ten or twelve sections of the enlarged canal, between Utica and Rome, were let by the commissioners last week. Four or five hundred persons, it is stated, were present, and desirous of obtaining work.

LOW WATER IN THE CANAL. The water in the canal this forenoon was low, the water has been at any time since the completion of the work. It was measured this morning in the deepest part, just on the southeast side of Commercial street bridge, and was found to be only 15 inches in depth. Of course the passage of boats is impossible. Near by some thirty men, under the direction of Superintendent Baker, are at work deepening a portion of the canal bed. They labor as much at their ease, so far as water is concerned, as men employed in ordinary ditching or draining. [Buffalo Commercial.]

PENNSYLVANIA.

CANALS AND RAIL ROADS. Mr. John Dougherty, in a communication dated Hollidaysburg, Nov. 30, addressed to the legislature of the state recommends a variety of reforms in the management of the canals and rail roads of that state. He recommends that the repairs on all these state works should be made by contract—the contracts to be made in short sections, and with men who will themselves do the work, and not to contractors who will undercut. He recommends that the locomotives on the Columbia rail road should be leased to individuals, one engine to a man, the lessee to run them on their own account, and also owners of locomotives be authorized to run them on their own account. This system we presume would introduce a salutary competition in speed, though it would hardly tend to promote the safety of passengers. He is of opinion that on this system the cost of motive power, which at present amounts to $1 30 per ton from Philadelphia, would be reduced to a great extent. He recommends that all tolls should be charged on the merchandise, instead of being charged on the ear, and that it should not exceed $3 per ton of 2,000 lbs. for hardware, $2 for groceries, $1 50 for flour and wheat, and $1 for coal and plaster, and that the motive power should not exceed 50 cents. He recommends an increase in the lease of state works to admit of the use of larger boats. By means of these and other reforms he maintains that the Pennsylvania route of communication between the Atlantic and the valley of the Ohio may compete successfully with the New York canal and the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, and that the Pennsylvania public works may be made productive of revenue to the state.

VIRGINIA.

SOUTH WESTERN ROAD. The Lynchburg Virginian, of November 15, contains the following memorial presented in pursuance to a resolution of the Christianburg convention, in relation to this subject.

To the general assembly of the commonwealth of Virginia.

The memorial of the subscribers, citizens of — respectfully represents:

That your memorialists desire to direct the attention of the general assembly to a subject which they feel to be of the greatest importance to them, and to the state. They do not forget, that on more than one occasion, and in various shapes, the construction of a road, having for its object the connection of the southwestern counties of the state with James river, and some of the principal markets of Virginia, has been brought before your body. But they are also painfully sensible, that nothing has yet been effected. Deeply impressed with the importance of such a work to the interests, not only of the southwest, but of a large portion of the eastern part of the state, they again respectfully, and most urgently, bring that subject before you, and ask the construction of a good McAdams road from the Tennessee line near Abingdon, to the point where the James river, and that the work be executed wholly by the state, and be commenced forthwith.

Your memorialists deem it unnecessary, at this day, to urge at length the various arguments and motives, in behalf of this important measure, which arise on every side, and crowd themselves upon the mind. Yet they cannot forbear to suggest to the general assembly some of the most important facts and considerations which tend to the adoption of the project.

It is the southwest that asks this boon—a section of country more rich than any other part of the state in its resources of every kind, and in the extent of these resources are, they are rendered of but little comparative value by the destitution of commercial facilities. Remote from the markets of the country, and denied by nature those easy and cheap channels of intercourse which elsewhere exist, the products of a soil teeming with fertility, if cultivated beyond the limit of consumption, are lost to the state, and our unequalled mineral wealth be confined in its circulation, and in its use, to the extent of a difficult and expensive land transportation.

The soil of the southwestern counties is notoriously rich, and possessing a climate favorable to the growth of a harvest every article which can be cultivated in the state, the only limit to its production is the want of markets; and notwithstanding the distance of those points which we seek the aid of the general assembly to reach, many of those products might be profitably cultivated, even in that remote quarter.

There is, perhaps, no part of the United States which comprises, within a small compass, so much mineral wealth, as a few of the southwestern counties.

The counties of Wythe, Smyth, Washington and an extensive adjoining district, of the state of Tennessee, abound in the richest quality of anthracite coal, equal to any elsewhere. Numerous manufacturing of this metal exist, which produce a quantity sufficient for the supply of the country around, and furnish to the distant southwestern states a small amount by the precarious means of the winter freshets.

The salt of Washington and Smyth counties, is equal to any in the world. The water from which it is made is saturated with that mineral; and recent search has ascertained the fact, that it flows from a thick deposit of rock salt. Upwards of 100,000 bushels are annually made, a portion of which is sent off on the winter floods to East Tennessee.

The lead mines, in the county of Wythe, are capable of supplying the demand of the country to almost any extent; and though the manufacture of it now languishes on account of the low price in market, and the high price of transportation, upwards of 400 tons are annually made.

But the most valuable of the minerals of that region is the gypsum, which is found in Washington and Smyth counties. Extending over a tract of country not less than 12 miles in length, and existing in beds of immense thickness, it may be said to be inexhaustible. This mineral is the more valuable, from its great purity—its quality being far superior to that brought from abroad.

Your memorialists need not enlarge upon the benefit that must result from affording to all these interests some facility for the conveyance of such abundant agricultural and mineral products to market. To develop to their full extent such resources—to impart activity and energy to an extensive and rich section of the state—to give wealth and commercial prosperity to a hitherto neglected part of our common country—are surely objects, the attainment of which may be justly deemed the duty of our government.

But the benefits which must result from the contemplated improvement, would not be confined to the southwest. We seek, through this measure, to enlarge a commerce now small, with the eastern part of Virginia. The principal towns upon James river, together with the country around them, cannot fail to reap a harvest from it, rich in proportion to the degree of facility afforded. The proposed work cannot fail, in our view to have a further tendency in the highest degree desirable. The merchandise for the consumption of the southwest, including a large part of east Tennessee, is purchased generally in the cities north of Virginia. The construction of the proposed road, together with the James River canal, would make that the line not only of transport, but of travel, for those merchants; and we look with confidence to the result, that, before long, that purchasing trade would stop in the principal towns of our own state, the merchants of which will not permit a commerce so very near to them by them to more distant points beyond our border.

To the James river improvement, which is regarded as the great work of the state, its effect must be particularly advantageous. Terminating at a point high up on that river the stimulus thus afforded to southern commerce, would pour into the state a greatly increased quantity of foreign goods. Indeed, your memorialists look upon the projected road as the most valuable auxiliary that can be devised to that work, and to be so essential to a full development of its great utility, that it should rather be regarded as a necessary part of that magnificent undertaking.

Nor is this subject to be regarded with a view to the commerce of southwestern Virginia only. The broad and rich valley of the Holston extends into east Tennessee, where its character for fertility and productiveness is maintained, and the same facilities which will stimulate, and throw into eastern Virginia, the trade of the southwestern counties, will draw along the same channel, and to the same points, the commerce of an extensive and rich portion of the state of Tennessee.

The proposed road becomes of greater importance, when it is recollected, that the state of Tennessee is prosecuting the improvement of her own territory by a vigor which promises the best results. A rail road, extending from Charleston, in South Carolina, by Augusta, into Georgia, is now under construction to the border of Tennessee; and that state is actively prosecuting the continuation of the road within her own territory to the town of Knoxville. There is moreover, strong reason to give to that enterprise, which will extend from the Virginia line, whatever work may be constructed to that point on our part, at least to Knoxville—perhaps to Nashville; a large fund is now in her hands, which there is strong reason to believe will be applied to this object. The completion of these plans will form a long and highly important line of communication between the eastern, western and east of Abingdon, and the states south and west of that point; constituting one of the most valuable and useful channels, both of commerce and travel, in the United States. The general assembly cannot fail to perceive the danger, that the valuable agricultural trade of the southwest may seek a southern outlet, and be wholly diverted from our own state, unless the connection with James river, which we ask, shall be made, and made at once.

The foregoing facts appear to your memorialists to shew satisfactorily, that the stock of the proposed road must be profitable, and that it will form a valuable exception to most of the projects of that kind, in which the state has hitherto engaged. No accurate estimate can be made of the amount of transportation along the route annually at present; but enough is known to justify the assertion, that not less than 50,000 tons is now transported on it, even under the present most unfavorable circumstances. Under the influence given to the industry and energy of the country by the projected work, the increase of transportation must be great; and when to that is added the tolls derived from travel, no doubt can exist as to the profit of the work to the state.

The practicability of the easy and cheap construction of such a road is not now a matter of any doubt. Its general direction would conform to that of our mountains, and along its whole length but one ridge of any magnitude is to be encountered, which can be surmounted at any grade that may be desired. The materials best adapted to that kind of road abound everywhere; and labor and other necessities for such work can be procured in great quantities, cheaper than in any other part of the country. More than one side of the southwestern part of the Valley has been made by the engineers of the state, whose reports are in the possession of the general assembly, and with the information which they afford, as well as the personal observation, the principal engineer of the state estimates the cost of the project at $3,000 per mile, which taking the distance to be 190 miles, would amount to $570,000. Cheaply, indeed, would all its advantages be purchased at a price so far below their value.

Your memorialists refer the general assembly to the proceedings of the convention of delegates from a number of the southwestern counties upon this subject, held at Christiansburg, on the 25th day of October, 1841, a copy of which is ordered to be laid before you herewith. It will be seen that this memorial is submitted to you in obedience to, and in conformity with, the resolutions of that numerous and talented assembly.

We appeal, then, to the general assembly, to bestow this rich and long deferred boon upon a part of the state hitherto but little obtrusive as to its claims upon their attention and patronage. We ask of justice to extend to that quarter of our commonwealth those facilities of intercourse, which we have heretofore cheerfully seen it bestow, with a liberal hand, upon the more fertile and populous regions. And we need the adoption, and immediate prosecution, of the project the more strongly, because in our view it cannot fail to prove profitable to the state as a mere source of income, at the same time that the interests of both the west and east will be greatly promoted, and distant parts of the commonwealth be brought nearer to each other, bound more closely to each other, by increased intercourse and mutual interest.

And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

UNIVERSITY. Professor Seabster. We are happy to announce the arrival of this gentleman—the newly appointed professor of mathematics at the University of Virginia—an event which was distinguished on the part of the students by a brilliant illumination.

The number of students has swelled to about 175, which is a full average of previous sessions at this period, and affords a favorable augury of the continued prosperity and usefulness of the institution.

[Charlestowne Jhr.]

CONSTITUTION. A movement is making among the people of the western part of Virginia, to procure an alteration in the constitution, so as to apportion representation on the basis of a white population. Several public meetings have been held, and the papers are discussing the subject with great earnestness. The late census showing a majority of white population west of the Blue Ridge, the people of that section say they feel a deep injustice in not having a controlling voice in the councils of the state.

To effect the object, some propose a convention, while others are disposed first to make a trial in the assembly. The existing constitution provides for a re-apportionment with the consent of two-thirds of each house of the general assembly.

RESUMPTION IN VIRGINIA. "Our intelligent correspondent proposes the 1st of September, as the period of resumption. The Lynchburg Virginian proposes the 1st of October. We are not prepared to prefer either, but the 1st of August, or even an earlier day, if practicable. The sooner, certainly, the better.—But we must have an eye to the state of the exchange between Virginia and the north; and by one of the days specified, it is presumed the next harvest of wheat, and the present crop of corn, may be brought to market and come into requisition, and furnish available funds for the resumption of payments and the solid support of our bank credit. It is better to wait a short time, to allow these institutions the means of maintaining their specie payments when they commence, rather than precipitate a resumption and then be compelled to close the vaults again."

[Richmond Eng.]

POPULAR EDUCATION. There appears to be a general movement on this subject in many parts of the state. The citizens of Richmond and Henrico met Nov. 15, Gen. Lambert, the mayor, presided, and Thos. Ritchie was appointed secretary. A deputation of 10 deputies from the city, and of 10 from the county was appointed to represent them in the state education convention to be held at Richmond on the 9th of December.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE, will be found in this number of the Register.

THE LEGISLATURE. The Columbia correspondent of the Charleston Mercury writes on the 24th Nov. that the business of the session began already to assume an interesting character, and as there is full four weeks to Christmas, a good deal of important matter will be introduced and disposed of. The distribution bill will be repudiated with promptitude and unanimity, to the lasting honor of the members of both houses, and a vote very decidedly on the point, and will make strong reports at an early day. Judge Huger has, with his characteristic decision and high-mindedness led off in the senate, and all the prominent men are of one mind, as well as all of the legislature.

"The governor's message," which has given the state a cordial satisfaction, was to-day dissected, and its several parts turned over to the proper committees, on motion of Mr. Phillips. The committee on federal relations will have their hands full, you may depend, but not more than the broad back of the able chairman, Col. Hunt, can give to the subject, and we shall soon see some of the results of his clear, vigorous, laborious head.

"Mr. A. Rhett gave notice of the introduction of a bill relating to the pending controversy between New York and the Old Dominion, about reclaiming fugitive slaves. It is understood to be a simple transcript, with a few alterations, of what is called the Virginia inspection law, and, I presume, will be unanimously passed. How can the state do otherwise, if she sets a particle of value on her safety, and the pledge she gave to her sister states of the south, when the matter of Maine and Georgia came up two sessions ago."

GEORGIA.

SENATOR BERRIEN.—INTRODUCTIONS. A majority of the committee in the Georgia legislature on the state of the republic have made a report instructing Judge Berrien to resign his seat in the senate of the United States. The report protests against the distribution bill and the bank bills. The minority were to make a counter report.

ALABAMA.

THE LEGISLATURE adjourned after a nine day's session. Among the acts was one for a special election of members of congress in not less than twenty days from the date of the governor's proclamation; and another sanctioning the suspension of specie payments in the state. Resolutions expressing the opinion that New York is wrong in the Virginia controversy, and pledging Alabama to Virginia; others, in relation to the death of Hon. Dixon H. Lewis. Members to wear crape for thirty days, and the governor to convey to the widow of the deceased the sincere condolence of the state of Alabama.

"The joint preamble and resolutions (says the Tuscaloosa Flag of the 17th inst.) introduced in the Senate of the State of Alabama, by Mr. V. C. McJannet of Jefferson, against the reception of the portion of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands that may fall to the share of this state in the grand scheme of bribery, devised by Mr. Clay, had their second reading in that body on Monday, and were referred to the committee on federal relations. We do not know what will be the complexion of the report the committee will make on them."

MISSISSIPPI.

THE STATE BONDS. The hon. John Henderson, late U. S. senator of the state, has addressed a long letter to his constituents, from which we extract the following in regard to the policy of the state on the subject of the state bonds:

"Mississippi now surpasses four of her sister states of the old thirteen, and three of the new states, in representative population. We grow the largest agricultural export of any state in the union, and the largest for its population, of any state in the world—besides growing as much corn for home consumption as all the New England states together. If, therefore, we had all our bonds to pay without assistance from the banks that owe them, and this payment was assessed equally upon a full cotton crop of a single year, it would only diminish the year's product as left for enjoyment of our citizens to an ordinary short crop. I, of course, will be understood in this proposition as using it only to expose the exaggerated fallacies of those who would cheat our citizens out of their good savings, and who would fail by alarming their apprehensions with the imagined burdens of taxation and ruinous consequences they must encounter to support the honor and integrity of the state. No one supposes our debt is to be paid in a single year. The contract does not authorize it, and no financial principle would justify or require it. But it is clear, if our citizens could survive one short crop without ruin, they could, if necessitated, pay this whole debt in a single year from the proceeds of a full crop, with no greater distress than a failure of less than half of a single export crop would cost them. As a question of policy then, how mistaken and mischievous is that which proposes to require the payment of our state bonds in full. All will agree our debt is a large one, and requires good economy to pay it without some inconvenience. All will concur in condemning the causes which devolved this debt upon us. But to justify or excuse the principle of repudiation, we exaggerate the debt—we exaggerate the responsibility—we exaggerate the ruin it will bring to ourselves—the worse reputation abroad, in exaggerating the moral delinquencies of our citizens and public functionaries, in contracting the debt and wasting the proceeds. Every matter of apprehension, of obloquy, or censure is exaggerated for the purpose of nerveing the passions with a view to the utterance of some measure requisite to adopting the desperate and fatal policy of dishonoring the bonds and plighted faith of the state."

In this state of things, the several communities abroad and around us are watching this singular contest with astonishment, derision, pity or reproach.—Its tendency is to check emigration to the state, and promote that of our citizens from the state. It diminishes the price of our real property and its citizens; and none of us, in the estimate of strangers, can or do escape a portion of the moral blight which this question inflicted upon us. I doubt much if this who for months past have been engaged in this strife, excited by party violence and prejudiced by their pecuniary interest which this question involves, apprehend its consequences and perceive its bearings with unbiased judgment. Most of you, my fellow citizens, are emigrants from the state of Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Kentucky and Tennessee.

Your former friends and acquaintances in those states can have no interest in this agitating subject, aside from your honor and prosperity. Have you deemed it of sufficient importance to ascertain how these impartial judges regard the question? You cannot be indifferent to their good opinion nor to the honor of the state of your adoption. A few, as for months past, I have heard much more of this subject without than within the state, I will pledge you my best judgment and information that not one in twenty of the citizens of those states, who have noticed the subject, but condemns the anti-bond policy urged for its abolition. I do not say this in abatement, even if temporarily successful, will justify us in the judgment of our peers. The moral sense of communities and of mankind will condemn us.

Suppose then, you who urge the measure, achieve that disastrous majority against the payment of these bonds what then? How long can the position be sustained? Suppose you are forced to pay for the next five years—beside the dishonesty, which a position does not efface, I verily believe as a question of dollars and cents, the state would lose more in consequence of its position in that time than would be sufficient to pay the debt. And what finally, after all these years of disapprobation the banks are unable to pay these bonds they are to render for and unpaid? Trust no such chicanery. No. After we shall have run the round of disloyalty and humility, and greatly diminished or retarded the resources of our state, either from coercion or a constrained choice, we shall at last pay the bonds. Honestly, therefore is still the better policy, and the more honorable merely, but in this instance a great deal of honor may be lost, and the credit and resources of the state by a vote of repudiation, each dollar we shall afterwards pay will have cost us two. Every incentive, then, save the temporary success of a party, urges us to the public recognition of our state bonds—the prompt payment of the interest thereby due, and a renewed pledge to maintain our public faith untarnished for the future."

Governor McNutt's letter to the bankers, Hope & Co. of Europe, in reply to their enquiries, will be found on page 388 of the last vol. (60) of the Register—and furnishes the opposite view on the subject of those bonds. The letter is now extensively copied into the public journals of the day without reference to its authority.

OHIO.

PROPOSED WHIG CONVENTION. A suggestion is thrown out by the standard at McConnellsville, seconded by the Times, at Cambridge, for holding a whig state convention sometime next spring at Zanesville, for the nomination of a whig candidate for governor. [Zanesville Republican.]

The Scioto Gazette in allusion to the subject says: "The proposition to hold a state convention takes a like wild-fire. The good whigs of Ohio are chafing for another contest with their opponents, in which only one end is attained to come off victorious. The time and the place for the meeting of the convention, are now only to be determined. We are to the anniversary of Washington's birth day, as the time; and Columbus as the place. Our experience in conventions proves to us that it is no favor to the people of any town to have a great gathering in it. But the people of Ohio have a great gathering in it for it was their money to a great degree that Columbus, that city what she is. Therefore, though the good folks of Zanesville may be anxious to display their well known hospitality, it is too much to ask of it. Let the Buckeye whigs meet at their own state meeting, when central, and easy of access from all parts of the state."

tion as will secure the most efficient action of the democratic party."

On this topic the Steubenville Gazette says—"The Van Buren party have not yet fixed either upon time or place for their convention. If our present excellent governor, Corwin, will consent to be again a candidate for that office, we may not perceive the necessity for a convention. Not a true democrat in the state will refuse to yield him his support, and we trust he will not decline a re-election. It would give the senior editor of this paper great pleasure, to have, again, the opportunity of calling to "order" the organizing members of the party, and to perceive the fixed stout hearted democrats. If a democratic convention must be held, we rather think that Columbus is the most suitable place. But we are willing to leave the whole matter to the democratic central committee."

ELECTION STATISTICS. The Ohio State Journal, says: "We are indebted to a friend for the following compilation of the total vote given at the late election in this state for members of the legislature. In Stark and Butler counties, the whigs made no regular opposition. In Summit, the election turned upon the county seat question. The vote of Athens could not be obtained. In these four counties, last year's vote is given, except Athens, where Corwin's majority is given. This calculation is made from the highest vote given to each party."

COMMON SCHOOLS OF CINCINNATI. We are indebted to the kindness of E. P. Langdon, esq. for a copy of the report of the trustees of the common schools rendered by the board of trustees and visitors including the report of the board of examiners and inspectors from which we derive the following extracts:

Government and instruction. The schools are so arranged as to form four general grades under each principal teacher. The pupils of the first, or higher grade taught by the principal; the second by the 1st assistants; the third by the 2d assistants; and the fourth by the 3d assistant teachers. When attention is paid to having the schools properly graded, it is found that one teacher can teach a much larger number of scholars, without an increase of labor, than could be taught by him, were no such grades made.

It has been the unceasing effort of the trustees to make the course of instruction uniform in all the schools, and to infuse into the minds of the pupils the necessity of being strictly moral in their conduct, to be chaste and pure language, and to be polite and kind to all with whom they associate.

The lamented Judge Buch, in the fifth volume of the Cultivator, has said, "CHILDREN BELONG TO THE REPUBLIC." Thus taught the Spartans and thus we should teach. As the twig is bent so will the tree incline. If we sow tares we cannot expect to reap wheat. Children are the materials, the wood, brick and mortar, if we may so express ourselves, which are to compose our temple of freedom, and if the materials are bad or unsound, dilapidation will ensue and the temple will never develop upon the ground. If children are brought up in idleness, they are too often useless to themselves and become a tax upon society. If they are not taught to do good they will learn to do evil. If they are brought up in ignorance, they are, in a manner unfitted to the duties of the high civil and social life of our men. If the mental soil is not cultivated, weeds and brambles, and thorns will spring up spontaneously, to the great annoyance of the community. As every man's vote weighs alike in the political scale, it were well for all that every man had enough of good sense and independence, to cast his vote honestly. And the best way to instill this is to lay a good foundation of usefulness in youth—to teach the habits to work and the mind to think."

School revenue. The revenue is mainly derived from a general tax upon the property of the city—namely, the mill tax for building purposes, and one mill on the dollar for tuition—making two mills on the dollar levied by the city for school purposes, over and above the state tax. The state has heretofore levied a tax of two mills on the dollar for the support of schools. The law left it discretionary with the commissioners of each county in the state, to reduce the school tax for that state in their respective counties, to any sum not less than one mill to the dollar. And without any call for the exercise of this power from the people, the commissioners of Hamilton county have taken off one mill on the dollar; thereby doing to the common schools of the county all the injury that the state in this respect has inflicted them to do. It has taken one-half of the support from the schools in the county, and one-third from our city schools, so far as the fund raised by taxes is concerned.

The provision in the law no doubt was a wise one, and intended to benefit the counties otherwise extremely provided for, or those in which the inhabitants were so thinly settled, as to render a postponement of a full organization of the school system within their boundaries advisable. But that the old, populous, wealthy, enterprising, patriotic and benevolent county of Hamilton should be disgraced by such a threat to the interests of its school system and spirit, was never contemplated by the framers of that law.

That the representatives from Hamilton county never contemplated a reduction in the school tax here, is evident from the fact that they imposed additional duties upon the trustees, which are attended with a large increase in the school expenditures—such as the establishment of German English schools, and evening schools for apprentices, &c. Instead of pulling down this noble system, the commissioners should have been among the first to sustain and build it up.

The tax should be reinstated, and the power to reduce it, taken from the commissioners.

In addition to the above named funds the state appropriates two hundred thousand dollars for the support of schools—which sum is distributed to the different counties, and school districts of the state in proportion to the number of children reported, from four to twelve years of age, in each. These several sums for the city are, however, as other public moneys are, to the city treasurer.

School officers. Two trustees and visitors of common schools to each ward, are annually elected by the citizens: thus composing from the seven wards of the city a board of fourteen members, who audit and allow all school accounts, which are then passed by the council, and orders drawn upon the treasurer for their payment. The trustees appoint the teachers, and have the general supervision and control of the schools.

The board of examiners and inspectors of common schools are composed of seven gentlemen, who receive their appointment from the city council, for three years. They examine the qualifications of teachers, inspect the schools as to their government and course of studies, and are required to report the result of their examinations and inspections to the council, and the trustees, and the city council. No teacher can be employed in the common schools without first having obtained from the board of examiners a certificate as to qualifications and moral character.

In addition to the two boards already named, the city council exercises a limited and constant supervision over the interests of the common schools.

German English common schools. In conformity with the law of the state passed March 19, 1840, the trustees and visitors have, during the past year, instituted two schools of this kind. One is conducted by three teachers, the other by two—making five teachers in all. The expenses in keeping these schools amounted to $1,113 88.

It is proper to state that there was considerable difficulty in establishing these schools. The school rooms had to be furnished, and teachers selected who understood the German and English languages. This was not so easily done as was at first anticipated. In the selection of teachers, however, the board have thus far been very fortunate. But after the teachers were employed, there was still a difficulty as to the organization of the school, and the course of instruction to be pursued in them.

The trustees have requested their German friends to visit the schools, and have advised with them in all matters relating to them, and requested their views as to the course of studies they deemed proper to be conducted therein. These requests have been kindly acceded to, and several communications have been laid before the board on these subjects, which have been received and duly considered.

The law authorising the German English schools, contemplates giving instruction in language. It says: "The duty of the board of trustees and visitors of common schools, to provide a suitable number of German schools under some duly qualified teachers, for the instruction of such youth, as desire to learn the German language, or the German and English languages together, which schools shall be subject to such regulations as said board may from time to time adopt for the government of the same."

The following is copied from a petition presented by German citizens, who are friendly to these schools and the institutions of our country, and therefore entitled to due consideration:

The board of trustees and visitors of common schools of Cincinnati.

GENTLEMEN: It is the desire of the undersigned, Germans of the city of Cincinnati, that the German language should not be made a separate branch of study, in the German English common schools, but that both languages should be taught together, even in the lowest and smallest of the large portion of the pupils in these schools will not be able to acquire a thorough classical education. It is therefore important that what they learn here should be made most beneficial to them, which will not be done if the English language is excluded in any of the department.

Cincinnati, March 12, 1841.

This was signed by about fifty of our German citizens, who are more immediately interested in these schools, by their friends and patrons.

Evening schools. The law of March 19, 1840, also requires the trustees to provide a suitable number of evening schools for the benefit of young men over twelve years of age, who, by the nature of their occupations, are prevented from attending day-schools. Three of these schools were opened during the months of November, December, January and February last.

Some of these schools were for a time well attended, and great good was anticipated from them. There was, however, greater irregularity in the attendance of the pupils than is consistent with the character of these schools; and hence that benefit has not been realized which was at first contemplated. From the indications which have been given, we are of opinion that the continuance of these schools for three months is as long as their usefulness can be rendered adequate to the expenses incurred for their support, and that this should be from November 15th to February 15th.

The expenses of the evening schools this year has been $299.

These, and the German English schools, have increased our annual expenditures about $1,500.

School at the Cincinnati orphan asylum. This school is still in successful operation.

Private schools. There are now comparatively but few private schools kept up in the city of the same grade as our public schools. The better than any thing else, goes to test the popular character of the common schools, and the estimate placed upon them by those who have children to educate. There are however several excellent private schools of the same grade, and others of a lower and higher grade, all of which, with our public schools, and the "Woodward" and "Cincinnati" schools, are harmoniously contributing to build up, and expand, the literary and scientific character and interests of our city.

School apparatus. Our schools are all supplied with Mitchell's large map of the world, and of the United States, and the map of Ohio by Doollittle and Munson—and blackboards. Some of the schools, through the efforts of the pupils and their teachers, have provided themselves with globes. All of these are found to be very useful. The blackboard in particular is now variously used, by nearly all the classes, in the three higher grades of our schools.

Examinations and inspections. The annual examination of our public schools takes place at the close of the school year, generally commencing in the middle of May, and continuing from two to four weeks.

The inspections take place in December of each year; the object of which is to review the schools, and to see that every thing is in order.

School books. The recommendation of the former board, to change the books, so that each grade of pupils has been adopted, and found to be of great utility to the schools, and a saving of trouble and expense to parents.

The following is the list now in use: 1. Alphabetical and spelling cards; 2. McGuffey's Primer; 3. Fickett's Spelling Book; 4. Eclectic Second Reader; 5. Fickett's Juvenile Reader; 6. Fickett's Reader and Definer; 7. Eclectic Fourth Reader; 8. Introduction to Fickett's Expositor; 9. Fickett's Grammar; 10. Mitchell's Geography and Atlas; 11. Mitchell's Geographical Reader; 12. Ray's First, Second and Third Arithmetic; 13. The Bible, without note or comment. The course of elementary works in history, algebra, geometry, and natural history, is left to the discretion of the trustees and the principal teacher of each school; subject, however, to the direction of the board.

School teachers. During the past year 69 teachers have been employed, 49 females and 20 males.

Pupils. There has been enrolled in our schools this year, 6,081. The number removed and withdrawn, 2,547. The number remaining, 3,534. The average number in daily attendance has been 2,760.

The average number of pupils in daily attendance to each teacher has been 40.

The number enrolled, and the number in daily attendance has increased considerably during the past year.

Hours of tuition. The teaching hours in our schools are in summer from 8 to 12 in the forenoon and from 2 to 5 in the afternoon. In winter from 9 to 12 in the forenoon and from 2 to 5 in the afternoon. There is an intermission of 15 minutes in the forenoon and afternoon sessions; and in the primary departments these recesses are repeated during both sessions, or extended a longer time, at the discretion of the teachers, with the concurrence of the resident visitor.

Expenses. Amount paid for tuition, $18,594 82. Amount paid interest on school loan, 3,000 00. Contingent expenses, 4,550 31. Average cost of each pupil based on the average number of those enrolled, and those in daily attendance is 5 25.

The amount paid for the school for the children of the colored people was commenced on the 1st of May, 1840, and continued to the 1st day of March, 1841; when the school tax on the property of the colored people was discontinued, and the supervision of the board over it ceased.

The amount of their school fund was $257 96. The amount paid for the support of the school was $262 50. The average number of pupils in attendance was fifty.

The school room was furnished without charge to the school fund, which was all laid out for tuition.

MISSOURI.

The St. Louis Commercial Bulletin says, that no less than one thousand substantial buildings of the largest class were erected in that city within the past year, some costing from $3,000 to $40,000 each!

LARGE BENEFIT. Mr. Shackford, who recently died in St. Louis (Mo.) made the following disposition of his property:

"Mr. S. gave the American Bible society about $10,000. By bequeathing to his widow $15,000 and $10,000 each to his children, in stock in the Louisville and Portland canal, (a very valuable investment), he gave the residue of his property to the Foreign Missionary society, Home Missionary society, American Tract society and Marion college, to be equally divided among them."

The St. Louis Gazette says: "If the property could have been sold at his decease, it would have given $10,000 to each of these societies."

LEXINGTON, Mo. State of improvement. About ten buildings more will make one hundred since the first of January last. Nineteen new brick buildings can be counted on the ground. The balance of the buildings are wood, and among them some beautiful buildings and showpieces. At least ten new houses will be put up between this and the first of January next, so that the year will give one hundred buildings for the present year. (Lex. Express.

HANNIBAL. About sixty-six buildings more will make one hundred since the first of January last. In other words, there have been forty-four buildings erected, comprising a church, two saw mills, warehouses, factories, stores, dwellings, &c. [Hannibal Journal.

MICHIGAN.

ELECTION. The Detroit Free Press sums up the gain to the Van Buren party, from the recent election as follows: In the senate, 19 Van Buren to 5 whigs, and one vacancy. In the house of representatives, 47 Van Buren to six whigs. The popular majority, as ascertained in the vote for Barry, (V. B. candidate for governor), over Fuller, (whig), 6,529. Last fall, Harrison's majority was 1,805.

COLORED POPULATION.

There are several considerations which give interest at the present moment to the subject embraced in the following article. It is taken from the proceedings of a meeting held in Anne Arundel county, Maryland, calling a convention of delegates from the several counties of the state, of slaveholders, to assemble at the city of Annapolis in January next. Meetings have been held in several of the counties appointing delegates for that purpose. It would of course be very important to the meeting to be in possession of the provisions of the existing laws upon the subject they are to have under consideration.

Without being apprised of the objects in view we notice that the following resolution has been adopted by the board of common council of Washington:

"Resolved, That the mayor be requested to inform the board, with the least possible delay, what are the provisions of the state laws, of the laws of Maryland and Virginia in relation to the emigration to, and settlement in, those states respectively of free negroes and mulattoes, and the conditions upon which such persons are by law allowed to emigrate to, settle, and reside therein; and, also, of provisions of the laws of the United States, in relation to the emigration of slaves therein, respectively; and, further, of the provisions of law now in force, if any, in the cities of Baltimore and Richmond upon the same subjects.

Towards the above object the following article may perhaps contribute something.

Independent of those local considerations, the deep interest which so many are now taking on both sides of "Mason and Dixon's line" upon a topic involved in the following article, renders it of general importance, especially when it is remembered that the laws of the states of Maryland and Virginia, as they existed at the time of the cession of the District of Columbia to the United States, continue to be the laws of the District, except in cases where congress, as the legislature of that territory, have thought proper to make enactments to supercede those laws; and on the subject of the colored population it is believed they have passed very few laws. It would be a knotty subject for them to legislate upon now.

But beyond all those considerations, the history of the real condition and progress of the colored population of the state, as that condition may be collected from the existing legislation, and the existing laws, is a matter that a few years hence will be sought for with as much avidity as perhaps any topic that we could have regarded.

The following abstract was compiled by a friend to the editor, and will be found substantially correct.

A SKETCH OF THE LAWS OF MARYLAND.

In relation to the colored population of the state.

Policy of the state. In our state we have a species of servant not known in England, and which therefore is peculiarly regulated by our own laws. Negro slavery commenced in this colony at an early period, and was here, as elsewhere in this country, too much encouraged by the legislation, and the promotion of individual riches, and too little repressed—in the influence it would exercise on the country, on posterity, and on the character of the citizens, as well as the rights of the slave himself. But as this species of property originated by purchase in Africa, and during the busy period of the settlement of the country, it was not deemed expedient to render conscience towards the rights of their fellow man to prevent it, the custom of owning slaves became a precedent, and grew into law—communis error facit legem; and the law therefore recognises this species of servant, unknown to the laws of England, and indeed, it is the general opinion now, that it would be better if slavery not only had never prevailed here, but that all distinction between different classes could be obliterated by removing from the soil of the state those who never will be able to move in a sphere of Voting—Testimony. The act of Nov. 1796, ch. 67, § 5, enacted that no slave manumitted by the laws since the act of 1783, ch. 23, shall be entitled to vote at elections or be capable of being elected or appointed to any office of profit or trust, or to give evidence against any white person, or be competent evidence to manumit any slave petitioning for freedom. And spirit of liberty that impelled our revolutionary forefathers, and, like them, felt that the success of their efforts was necessary to the welfare and happiness of their posterity. They did succeed. Day after day the cheering tidings came in, that state upon state had declared for the whig cause. At length the whole of the whole American people were united, and HARRISON, the patriot, the state-man, soldier, and, best of all, Christian, was called to direct the nation! To his voice (said Mr. B.) I yielded, and became a member of his cabinet. And when, sir, I saw and knew that noble old man, and those whose counsel about him were men of high standing, in the midst of thousands of his countrymen, take that solemn oath which bound him to redeem the pledge then given, of faithful devotion to his country, I felt deep assurance that misrule was at an end—that the one-man power was repudiated from our system, and the nation secure of a true representative government.

But a fearful change has come over the land. There is a voice heard as of mourning, and a feeling of distrust seems to pervade every part of the country. Why is this? Are whig principles less sound than were two years ago? Are they? Are locofoco doctrines less fraught with destructive anti-social and anti-religious qualities than they then were? Are the whigs more ready now than then to embrace them? None will answer these questions in the affirmative. No, though there are many good reasons for the rapid change in public opinions, the tendency of their party principles are still disorganizing and destructive, and the whigs as much as ever reject and dread them. And yet, look at the present aspect of things; of seven states of the union, in which elections have recently taken place, and where the whig party was told by the election returns to exhibit a locofoco triumph. Why this, if the whig strength is not diminished? In my opinion, this result is to be attributed to the same causes which led to the disruption of the late cabinet. And what are they? The whigs have raised up a man to the executive chair, who, though elected as a whig, presumes to be a whig, and believed to be a whig, nevertheless either does not justly understand, or truly value and consistently pursue, the great constitutional principles of that party. It is neither my purpose nor wish (continued Mr. B.) to speak in terms of severity of Mr. Tyler, but the principles of the States, though they may be administered, is but a public servant, and as such, his conduct is a fit subject for examination and remark. His conduct towards congress and his constitutional advisers was the main cause of the dissolution of the cabinet and the same cause has led to our removal from the cabinet. There is no abandonment of whig principles any where, but uncertainty and distrust have produced, for the time, inaction among the whigs.

Attempts have been made, I know, sir, (continued Mr. B.) to discredit the statement in Mr. Ewing's letter of what passed in the cabinet meeting of the 18th of August, but I may here, in the presence of this enlightened and respectable company, on the responsibility of my own reputation for truth, of which none are better able to judge than those I address, that that statement is true—in its leading and essential facts absolutely true—in all its details substantially true.

There is no doubt that would not have been dissolved simply because the president vetoed the bank bills. His scruples, if sincere, however unreasonable, and even absurd, would have been entitled to tenderness, if not respect; and no member of his cabinet would have visited with the harshness of censure, the error of one who sought for truth, and who, in the process, to find and a desire to embrace it, merely because, through feebleness of understanding or early prejudice, he was disabled to perceive it. It was the want of sincerity and ingenuousness—of directness and candor—it was the disregard of courtesy and respect—it was the manifestation of a vacillating and an unsteady mind—it was the want of that manliness which assumes and avows its own errors, and scorns by concealment or evasion to visit them on others—that compelled the president's confidential advisers to abandon their position. Consider the circumstances of the case, and you must admit, if this is not so. One bill having been defeated, he himself proposed another, and induced the members of his cabinet to urge its passage. The bill was passed and sent to the president. Did he sign it? Sir, after his cabinet had induced their friends in congress to accept it, he signed it with a bad grace, he only did not sign it, but he sent it back with scorn, as a measure that every one must have known he could not sanction. How, then, sir, was his cabinet situated? The bill that they had been induced to recommend was so repudiated as plainly but indirectly to exhibit the cabinet as false to truth, false to congress, and false to the country. What would be thought of that master who, having commissioned his servant to make a purchase, should, after the execution of his order, deny the contract, and put him upon proof of his authority? Every man must perceive that, a total loss of confidence having taken place, there was an end at once to all hope of rendering aid to the country. Of the future conduct of the president we could only judge by the past; and from that, what could we infer but a disregard of all that was justly due to his confidential advisers? His conduct, then, standing, as it does, alone, without any explanation of its apparent deviation from manifest propriety, and without any sufficient pledge for the future, left, in my judgment, no alternative but immediate resignation, unless I had been a miserable sycophant, willing to retain office, under whatever circumstances of degradation, for the sake of its emoluments and power. And in this opinion there is not a member of the whig party, or of any other party probably in N. Carolina, who would not concur.

Over the past (continued Mr. B.) we have no power, but from it we may gain lessons to guide the future. What course does it become the whig party to pursue; or rather, what steps shall be taken by the whig party of North Carolina, under the present circumstances? We see our nominal chief opposed to a leading whig measure, demanded for the relief of a suffering country, even when that measure had been framed upon his own suggestions. We see him rejecting over whig defeats, and the organ of his administration, the organ of every locofoco leader. We see, sir, our leader, who should have led the way in every conflict, holds intercourse with the enemy, and yet retains the name of whig. It was in this position he was seen when the recent elections took place, in which we suffered loss. Sir, how could we have expected that the whig party of North Carolina, in an army, drawn up in battle array, discover its general not ready to lead them to the conflict or to cheer them on to victory, but occupying some neutral position, in friendly converse with the enemy, how shall they answer with courage and confidence the trumpet of adversity? Yet their numbers are not diminished, their strength is not enfeebled, their courage has not cooled, and, if guided by a leader of undoubted fidelity, their arms would be crowned with glorious success. This, in my opinion, is a just view of the condition of the whig party. It is as strong as ever, and as ready for the field. The late elections which have taken place recently, it is apparent that the whigs have in numerical strength lost nothing, for our adversaries have gained nothing. Our voters have not gone over to the enemy, but, uncertain and dispirited by the conduct of their chief, they are ready to abandon him. Yet their numbers are whom they can rely, and the rallying word shall find them at their posts as numerous and faithful as ever. Our course, then, seems to be sufficiently plain. The whig party of the state should organize and concert their measures. To this end, it seems to me a convention on whig principles, as the only means of every quarter of the state. Let us stir up the people and invoke the aid of their patriotism, that the state may be fully represented. Let us consult together like brethren, in behalf of our country, and leave no just means untaken to preserve the union and integrity of the whig party. Especially let us select our leaders—those who know that the only consistent policy suitable to a finite creature, like man, is a consistent pursuit of truth; and that to live for thirty years without improvement, and who, therefore, will not make it the great business of his life to think, or to improve himself, as he knows that the only way to look upon it as a reproach that he has become wiser by experience. Let us have a man who, while he has intelligence to know his own opinions, and firmness to pursue them, will yet understand that the only value of any opinion is its agreement with truth, and that therefore at once to abandon and to change every opinion when satisfied that it is false and injurious. Let us have a man whose mind is deeply impressed with the importance to his country of the great principles of the whig party, and whose fidelity to them is guaranteed, not by pledges given upon obtaining a nomination, but by the faithful devotion of his life to his country's service. Above all, let us have a man with a sound American head and a sound American heart—whose patriotism instead of dwindling into the narrowness of a political sectary, enlarges itself to embrace and love and foster every interest of every citizen, and who, by the faithful devotion of his name upon the glorious whig banner, and give it to the breeze, and rely upon it, gentlemen, a noble triumph awaits us.

With such a leader we defeated the phalanx of locofocoism, headed by Van Buren, and winking with our sculps, for party purposes, the whole executive power and patronage of the nation. Shall it admit of doubt that we can defeat the same party under the guidance of Mr. Tyler?

But, sir, (said Mr. B. in conclusion), however it may be in other states under such circumstances, the Old North State will again give evidence of her devotion to the whig principles for which she was destined in 1776. She will be true to her principles, and North Carolina—sir, speak not of Carolina, nor of North Carolina, but of North Carolina—then again will North Carolina, the faithful, the honorable, but moderate state, show herself true to whig principles, whoever may desert them!

RESIGNATION OF THE HON. C. C. CLAY. Huntsville, Nov. 12, 1841.

SIR: I am constrained by considerations of a personal and domestic nature, which cannot consistently be disregarded, to retire from the public service. You will please accept this as the resignation of my seat in the senate of the United States.

I have for some time past apprehended that circumstances beyond my control would compel me to adopt this course, and have, frequently, expressed my apprehensions to friends—more especially since my last return from the seat of the general government. It seemed, however, to be the general wish of those to whom I have commended, that I should postpone a determination upon the subject, as long as might be consistent with the public interest, under the hope, kindly expressed, that a favorable change might enable me to continue in the discharge of my public duties. But, alas! the change which has arrived; no such change has occurred; and I am compelled to yield to obligations which cannot be cancelled.

I have been long in the public service. It has been my good fortune to have been cheered and sustained, throughout, by the approving voice of an enlightened, courageous and generous constituency. Whatever changes in political sentiment, or in public opinion, may have taken place elsewhere, and notwithstanding the agitation and excitement which have sometimes prevailed around her, Alabama has never wavered, nor faltered—she has stood firmly and imperially in the ranks of the republican faith. She is now where she has been, and her position, in the integrity of her political character, the zealous maintenance of her constitutional rights, or her devotion to the cause of popular liberty. The change of relations which is about to take place, inspires me with painful emotions. Under more auspicious circumstances, I should be glad to see the people of Alabama could consistently reflect her sentiments in the national councils.

However, the regret I should otherwise feel for the necessity which imposes on me the course I am about to pursue, is much diminished by the consideration, that the principles, which it has been my pride and pleasure to sustain throughout my public life, are now in the ascendant. Indeed, were it otherwise, I know not to what sacrifices of feeling as well as interest, I would not submit, sooner than withdraw from any honorable support. Although not in power, the democratic party never was stronger than at the present moment. The people have already detected and passed sentence of condemnation on the frauds, by which they were deceived and misled during the last presidential canvass. They have arisen in the majesty of their strength, and the reaction has been overthrown, and the people are united to the other. They have again demonstrated their capacity for self-government, and will, I trust, never hereafter be defrauded of their suffrages by the ill-omened alliance of parties contending for power, without any common principles, and without any acknowledged system of measures. To insure the permanent ascendancy of democratic principles, it is only necessary for the people of this quarter of the union to understand and appreciate the prophetic truth of Mr. Jefferson's declaration, that "the democracy of the north is the natural ally of the south." To do this, let them be true to their principles. The exchange journal of the late extra session has been permitted to see the light; and they will there find that the nominations of abolitionists, of the most obnoxious character, were confirmed by the votes of southern whig senators, when every northern democrat, in his place, voted against them. These and the developments have conclusively established the charge, long since preferred, that a coalition had been formed between southern whig leaders (not the party generally) and the abolitionists, as well as the federalists, of the north. This extraordinary alliance, sanctioned by the majority of the union, and consummated by the vilest treachery, should be dissolved. Its dissolution is no less indispensable to the perpetuity of the union than it is to the safety of the south.

Although about to retire from their service, my gratitude to the people of Alabama, for the many evidences of confidence, with which they have honored me can only terminate with my existence—nor can I ever cease to feel the lively interest which the well-earned confidence of my fellow citizens has bestowed state, and the well-earned confidence for their continued prosperity. And though but a private citizen, my faith in the republican creed is unchanged and unshaken, and I shall ever be found ready to co-operate with my fellow citizens in the support of the principles of that happy motto maintained. With great respect, I am, sir, your most obedient servant.

C. C. CLAY.

To his excellency, the governor of Alabama.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Executive department, Columbia, Nov. 23, 1841.
Fellow citizens of the senate and house of representatives:

I congratulate you on the concurrence of this occasion of assembling in the service of your constituents, under circumstances as auspicious to the useful discharge of your duties, as I trust they will be conducive to the harmony of your deliberations.

While, in the general health of our citizens, and the abundance of our harvest, we have experienced the usual beneficent distribution of the blessings of an overruling Providence, we have not less cause for congratulation in the reviving prosperity of our people, from the unexampled depression and embarrassment of the times. Already has credit begun to regain confidence and stability—to pursue its accustomed channels—prosperity to resume a fixed and reasonable value—and the energy and enterprise of our people to embark with new and invigorated hope, in its various employments and pursuits.

Not the least gratifying reflection arising from these cheering auguries of our condition is derived from the consciousness that they are the results, not of any paupering patronage of the government—not of the artificial stimulants of legislative aids or interference—but of a wise and vigilant economy in the people, awakened by the disastrous experience of the past, to improve the means, and to curb the sources of the poverty. If some of the lingering effects of the late arrangement in the monetary affairs of our country are still painfully experienced, in the reduced value of property—diminished as it must be from the inflated standard of a depreciated and expanded currency—or in the difficulty of discharging debts incurred in the flood tide of extravagant speculation, and a redundant circulation—they are to be regarded as the unavoidable consequences of former errors and delusions, and perhaps the surest indications of a progressive state of convalescence and improvement.

Nor have we any cause to exult in the hope, that our government may now be regarded as having passed in security, through the most trying and difficult exigencies, that ever tried its virtue, or tested its stability.

In the events of a single year, the sudden ascendancy of a party, actuated by a high-wrought enthusiasm—impelled by the disasters of the times to seek relief in change, and rashly imputing them to the conduct of our rulers—seemed to threaten the subversion of the well established principles of '78 and '99, and of the republican policy of the government, as well as the overthrow of the exponents, by whom they were administered. But a few weeks' experience of power, laid bare the weakness, dissipated and rescinded this magnificent array of party elements and organization into its distinct and original elements. The deliberations of the late session of congress have dispelled the delusions of party zeal and fervor. Its impracticable expedients and distracted councils have I trust, again gathered and assembled the republican portion of the nation, in the unity and strength of one fold, and one conviction. And if the great measure of "deliverance and liberty," important as we still regard it to the faithful, as well as equitable administration of the financial affairs of the country, has been repealed, in form and in name, we have still the unquestionable assurance of its final success, in the overruling necessity resulting from the signal failure of every other substitute or device.

Among these abortive expedients, none was regarded with more intense and absorbing solicitude, than the proposition to establish a national bank. On no occasion has the exercise of the legislative power vested in the federal executive, been received with warmer approbation by the people of this state; or been more wisely and fortunately interposed, to arrest the most dangerous, and most obnoxious, of any unconstitutional violation of the constitution. Of all the great maxims of national policy, the production of the bitterest contention among the great parties of this union, and which has always and justly been regarded as fraught with the most powerful influences (for good or for evil), on our political institutions, the establishment of a national bank, is certainly the most obvious and important. If such has been the experience of the country, in the primitive and purer ages of the republic, under the regulations of a bank, arising out of the embarrassments of the first war, and the exigencies of the last—of comparatively limited capital, and a restricted sphere of operations—that what were to be anticipated from an institution organized as the instrument of a party then in power—operating amidst the ruins of a disordered currency, and the wreck, weakness and dismay, of state and local institutions! The expiring struggles of the late United States, and the spectacle of its existence, afford the fiat of the people, and the constituted authorities of the country, are recent in the recollection of all of us, and form an important epoch in the history of our government. Doubtful as that contest must be admitted to have been, waged even as it was against an administration, porous and effusive and energetic that has ever controlled the destinies of this nation, what were we to anticipate, when our rulers themselves should have become its allies, its party or its pageants. In this view, it would have changed the character of our government, become part of our political institutions, and the nation would have been subjected to the deprecating evils that could befall a country—"the union of purse and sword, in the federal head"—or worse, in the hands of a federal party. Well may such an institution be supposed to have had the power to regulate the currency; but it would have been with the iron rule of despotism, restraining all interests, absorbing all capital, measuring all profits, overpowering all competition, and attracting the wealth and prosperity of every other portion of the union, to the centre of its operations.

It was an honest confession, of one of the ablest patriots of the United States, that before a committee appointed by congress to investigate its affairs, that it was at any time within its power to crush state and local institutions! What an appalling fact for the contemplation of the sovereign states of the union! What a prophetic warning to the institutions chartered by their authority! What a warning to the country, which has been crushed at the bidding of a heedless, soulless, cent. per cent. calculating corporation! The rights of the states, and the liberties of the people, to be subjected to the domination of a sordid moneyed avarice! And yet, such is the supremacy over law, liberty and the institutions of the country, which such a power inevitably has attained. Encroachments upon the liberties of the people, in other times and nations, were to be apprehended from the swords of conquerors, and the usurpations of ambitious rulers; but experience has shown that in our own age and country, the strongest efforts to maintain constitutional and even sovereign rights, have been waged against an ambitious money power, in all its various forms, of bank monopolies, and protective tariffs. Well, therefore, may we congratulate the country on having escaped the ambitious pretensions of an institution which after imperiously dictating the humiliating duty to the federal executive, of violating his constitutional obligations, now threatens, through the vengeance of a disappointed party, the rash and iniquitous retribution, of abolishing the most useful and conservative of all the prerogatives of his department.

The revision of the duties on imports, justly regarded by the friends of this state, as so much proportioned to the burdens which the protective tariff has hitherto imposed on them, has been made, neither in that spirit of equity, or of compromise, which we had just reason to anticipate from the penalties and concessions of the act of '33. The history of the opposition of this state, to a tariff for protection, can only be too clearly and justly maintained, and the considerations which actuated her, in consenting to compromise her interests for a term of years, to the peace and safety of the union, should be a warning, as well as an inducement, to respect her rights, as well as her forbearance. While the government is involved in the struggle between the agricultural and manufacturing interest perhaps the least objectionable, and the most prosperous of any in the union, the renewal of a policy by indirect means, which is now universally admitted to bear unequally upon the productive industry of different portions of the union, is a violation of the rights of justice, as well as a most wanton violation of law. The living generation, who were the witnesses of the struggles and pledged in the late contest for her constitutional rights, have not yet passed away—the monuments of the times have not yet perished, the very altars consecrated by the blood of our fathers stand before us—in her preparations for defence, still in a condition of requisition—the age, its records, and recollections, have scarcely become a part of history, before the very burdens and oppressions which they were intended to resist, are renewed with a shameful infidelity, which seeks neither pretext nor justification. A home valuation, cash duties, and an unreasonable and exorbitant revenue of more than thirty millions, it is believed are a little less onerous in amount, or unconscionable in effect, than the enormous thirty per cent. duties which the sovereignty of this state was so sternly interposed to resist. And if, upon the principle of all protective duties, they are destined to increase to an extent and enormity to which our experience of the past, as well as the tendency of the times, most emphatically and loudly then, it will be better to say, whether South Carolina has so fallen from her high eminence of sovereignty and independence, as to admit by a silent acquiescence in these wrongs and grievances, that there is no "mode, no remedy, no measure of redress." If she was sufficient then for the emergency, she is doubly adequate and fortified now, in the union and strength of all her citizens, to meet aggressions upon her rights, come from what source they may. Nor is it less becoming the dignity and character of a free state, in assuming a position of defence which she is resolved to maintain, to manifest a due regard for all the rights of the oppressed, and to stand upon the strong and irrepressible in fact, as it is in equity, and in argument. Disregarding all theories, that so often confound the convictions of the best and purest minds, and resorting to the resources which she can so amply command through her organized government, and with which God and the people have honored her, would she not in the union and strength in the hands and the hearts of her citizens, which she will be invincibly united in her defence.

Another topic, of not less importance in itself, or of deep moment to the citizens of this state, is the act of distributing the proceeds of the public lands. As a source of revenue, the proceeds of the public lands, at the very instant when the federal treasury is said to require to be replenished, it would seem like wantonly seeking a pretext to increase taxation. But considered in any point of view, it can be regarded in no other light than that of a distribution of the public revenue. In one year, during a previous administration, the proceeds of the public lands, sold, produced a revenue of upwards of twenty millions—a maximum to which, in more prosperous times, it would possibly again attain. Its average may even now be estimated at five millions, which, if annually withdrawn from the treasury, leaves that deficiency of at least five millions to be supplied by increased duties on imports. Thus, the amount of the proceeds of the public lands to raise revenue for distribution, is a principle I presume, which this state is not prepared to admit. Under the operation of the various pre-emption laws, and the frequent reductions in the price of public lands, those very states which were the largest contributors to the "public domain," or whose "blood and treasure" were most lavishly expended to acquire it, have at the same time been subjected to the greatest sacrifices, in the emigration of her citizens, and in the diminished value of their products, reduced by an unequal competition with the more abundant and teeming resources of those new and fertile regions, which their enterprise and industry have been seduced and abstracted to cultivate, to the waste and abandonment of their own. It was enough to have borne all this with patriotic devotion to the interests of our common country; but when it is proposed to divert that domain from the sacred purposes of the government, and to devote the proceeds to additional burdens of taxation on one class of industry, to give protection and bounty to another, it assumes a character of the highest injustice, as well as the most palpable infraction of constitutional principles.

But the most dangerous, as well as the most humiliating effect of this measure, is the condition of dependency, which it would tend to create upon the bounty and beneficence of the government—existing as they would, in the relation of subsidiaries upon the profits of their own estate—receiving its charity, doled out from their own wealth, and subdued to a state of homage, servility and compliance, by bribes, stolen and lavished from which the trade of the state is not to be regarded as the first step to the assumption of state debts; designed to consummate a consolidation of interests, obliterating all distinctions of sovereignty, or pride of independence, and tending to concentrate empire and dominion over the rights of the states, and the confederacy of the people. I trust, however, that the noble reform, which has been so powerfully evoked by the errors of the late session of congress, and so decidedly manifested in the results of the popular elections throughout the union, will prevent the spoils and plunder of this system, from ever sapping the treasury, or containing the coffers of a single state in the union. Let us pause, at least for a moment, in the hope, that the correct principles and high motives of an unbought, unfeigned, and incorruptible democracy, are operating their pure and salutary influences on the councils and measures of government.

Among other resolutions, which, as the official communication of a sister state, it is my duty to submit to a co-ordinate branch of the government of this, is one proposing to alter the constitution, to limit the eligibility of any individual to one term of years. The experience of this state furnishes no reasons for such an innovation upon the long established usage and principles of the government. I cannot conceive that it can be productive of any other effects than to increase the usually over wrought excitement of the presidential canvass, render the relations of the people frequent—to disconnect the relations of sympathy between the executive and his constituents—to divert him of the most powerful motives to regard the will, or to merit the approbation of the people—and to make him the instrument of a party, to minister to its purposes, and to pandor to its lust of domination.

In all the history of our government, the influence of the executive power, to modify its action on the reserved rights of the states, has been of a conservative, rather than of an aggressive character. More than twice has it been interposed to rescue the people from the domination and abuses of a national law. It was in defence of our rights and our institutions, that the determination of a late executive to refuse his constitutional sanction to the abolition of slavery in any of its forms, was so fearlessly avowed; and this state, I presume, can have no interest or motive to remove the few salutary checks and embarras to the action of the executive. The legislation of a majority in congress, as to induce it to war against the dignity and prerogatives of a department, the weakest and most conservative, perhaps in the government.

I also submit for the serious consideration of the legislature, a copy of the communication of the governor of Virginia, on the proceedings of the general assembly of that state, on the subject of her late controversy with New York; and reports and resolutions from the state of Alabama, responding to the views and declarations so solemnly announced by this state, on questions deeply involving the right of property, and so sacred to the dignity and interests of the south. Bound by every consideration of duty of interest, of honor, and of equity, to repel so flagrant a disregard of the rights of a sister state, we should always be ready and prompt to redeem the pledge of our alliance to a cause with which our independence and institutions are so intimately connected. If amity cannot be preserved even between separate nations, in which the rights of property are not regarded as they exist, under the respective laws of each; much less can sovereign states be permanently allied in a bond of union, under the same laws, government, and constitution, where fugitives from justice, plunderers of the property, and violators of the laws, of one, find refuge and impunity under the sanction of the constituted authorities of the other. No wrong is more deeply resented by nations—no injustice can more deeply stain the faith, or more essentially impair the friendly and intimate relations of confederated states. If the obligation of comity, which requires one nation to do to another, on demand, fugitives from the justice of deliver, are to be disregarded—our institutions assailed—the plunderers of our property encouraged and protected—then must we regard the perpetrator of these aggressions, "no matter by whom committed," as a foe to our rights, and an enemy to our peace. Whether the wrong in this case has been done to Virginia or South Carolina, the principle is the same, the interest involved common to both, and the responsibility of protecting them should equally devolve on every state in the union, in which justice exercises dominion, or similar institutions exist. Persisting in such a course of unprovoked hostility to the interests and institutions of the south, New York can only be regarded in the light of any other aggressing power—in peace friends, but enemies in war. The adoption, in all such instances, of a similar course of vigilance to that which the state of Virginia has instituted, will perhaps be the only safe and effectual precaution, to prevent the recurrence of similar aggressions upon the rights and rights of our own citizens and institutions. We ought, upon every principle of equity and of interest, to make common cause with any state whose rights and institutions are thus wantonly assailed and assailed.

It is possible that it may become this state to assume, on any of the important questions presented, would seem to suggest the importance and necessity of cultivating and improving her means of safety and rights, liberty, or sovereignty, without the aid of ability, or resources to defend them. It would be better at once to endure threatened or impending ills, unaggravated by opposition, than by unceasing denunciations, and imminent exhibitions of resistance, to provoke and increase their bitterness. Prohibited, by the laws of the state, the only means of saving the rights, the honor, and sovereignty of the state. The improvement in which it so rapidly progressed, under the influence of the late brigade encampments, offers the highest encouragement to the continuance of patronage, as well as the happiest illustration of the beneficial effects of the mode in which it has hitherto been conferred. Assembled in these normal schools of drill and tuition, where a patriotic emotion was excited—where knowledge was imparted and received, under the criticism of the most improved and accomplished officers—where such favorable opportunities were afforded for discriminating the qualifications, both of the soldier and the citizen—and where that martial pride and feeling was acquired, which is the best, perhaps the only foundation of an elevated patriotism, combining so many motives, stimulants, advantages and incentives—it is not surprising that the results are so beneficial. The salutary effects of the gratifying assurance that our militia now comprises in its organization, a class of officers whose knowledge and complements would do credit to any age, or service, or country. With such inducements before us, it is deeply to be regretted, that an experiment productive of so many advantages and improvements, without any detracting consequences whatever, should have been prematurely abandoned.

Already are the effects of that abandonment visible in the waning enthusiasm of the service, and the resignation of some of our ablest officers, from a conscientious regret and despondency, for the future usefulness and efficiency of their exertions. Such a state of things, it is to be regretted, has induced an invocation to restore a system from which the state has derived such important benefits. Confined perhaps as those encampments should be, to commissioned officers, it is not to be presumed that any officer would be so inconsiderate to the honorable rank of his position, or to the confidence which the state reposes in his courage and fidelity," as to regret the privations and inconveniences of five days camp service, to learn the art of defending his country and institutions. With some slight and salutary modifications of the law by which they were regulated, it is to be hoped, that the age and the talents of the schools of correct morals, as well as of patriotism and military discipline. With the alteration or addition of such provisions as may promote this desirable object, the bill under the consideration of the legislature, at the last session, in December, and revised by the adjutant general, with the accompanying report, is respectfully referred to your consideration.

And all the portents of the time—the peril that every where surrounds our domestic institutions—the emergency that may call upon us to vindicate our rights and principles—I cannot refrain again and again to urge your attention to the organization of our military resources and defences, without a due regard to which, no state action can be efficient, and the assertion of sovereignty itself be but a bye word and a reproach, without dignity, and without effect.

The urgency of a national war, (remote and distant as I trust it is), cannot be overlooked, among the numerous other inducements to improve our military resources. The most exposed, perhaps as we are, to its ravages, from the neglected condition of our coast—the greatest sufferers, from the burning of our harbors, are destined to improve our means, how provoked or originating, whether by the ambition of one power, or the officious border aggressions of the other—there can be I am sure, no selfish or ignoble considerations, that would ever restrain the most generous contributions upon the part of this state, to the improvement of our means, to save the national honor from tarnish or disgrace.

By an act of the legislature, in December last, the duty was devolved on this department, of proposing for the acceptance of the several banking institutions of this state, an act to amend their charters, with a view to the improvement of the interest on the payments. The bank of the state, the South Western Rail Road bank; the Union bank, and the Planters' and Mechanics' bank, with a commendable desire to conform to the wishes and objects of the state, have, in good faith and security, accepted its provisions.

In executing the instructions of the legislature, in that spirit of mildness and forbearance in which I am sure they were conceived, I deemed it proper to overlook the delay of a few weeks, after the precise period fixed by law, for the acceptance of the two latter institutions. It appears, however, that it had arisen from unavoidable circumstances, and not from a culpable neglect or refusal to comply with the requisitions of the law.

It is due to the high character which these institutions have hitherto sustained, and I am sure now reflects no injustice upon the motives of the legislature, to state, that the object of this enactment was to prevent anticipated evil, rather than to redress past or existing abuses. The federal government having in the exercise of a wise and sound policy, abandoned that control over the currency which it had hitherto usurped, the necessity of a supervision over the monetary affairs of this state, had become more obligatory upon those to whom the people have entrusted the power of regulating them.

In such a state of things, it could not be deemed an unnecessary or officious act of caution, upon the part of this state, if she resorted to all the ordinary and legitimate means of rendering her own currency sound, adequate and stable. The exercise of these means, it is to be presumed, will be sufficient (and perhaps an imprudent) extent, to her banking institutions, by the extraordinary privileges and immunities with which she has endowed them. If the trust has heretofore been faithfully and ably executed, the merit is to be ascribed to the virtue and fidelity of the agents, rather than to the want of any power or opportunity, to abuse it; or to any provisions in the laws, to restrain or punish it. Under these circumstances, this state was perhaps necessarily forced to entertain the question, whether she had irrevocably parted with all power to regulate her own currency, or delegated that power, without reserve, restraint, control or supervision, on her part, for the term of years for which she has chartered her monied institutions. If in fact there does exist this imperium in imperio, for the exercise of so important a power, the people of this state might well ask, upon what constitutional principle a sovereign right, which can only be exercised legitimately by their own government, has been delegated to agents, politically irresponsible to them. In such an issue, it is not a very remote or fanciful anticipation, that if so important a right were indeed improprietly lost in law, it would be too probably, in the absence of any other resort, be reclaimed by revolution.

The wisdom and propriety of retaining some checks and guards, similar to those which have been proposed, upon the extraordinary privileges with which this state has endowed her chartered institutions, is I presume universally admitted, in reference to those hereafter to be chartered. It will readily, however, occur to every reflecting mind, that a preventive legislation in this respect, could remedy none of the existing evils.

The banking capital of the state is more than equal to its exigencies and requirements, and the most of those corporations in which it has been vested, have many years to complete the term for which they were chartered. Such a discrimination with regard to future and existing banks, would therefore be as inefficient as it would be injurious.

If I have a just and proper conception of the objects of the proposed amendment, it was with these views and conceptions, that the state thought proper to require these salutary concessions from her chartered institutions, to her sovereign authority and supervision. Deriving commonwealth privileges and immunities from her liberality, she has pre-emptive and irresistible claims upon their confidence and gratitude. Trusted for a long course of years, with the exercise of rights and powers and franchises sovereign in their nature, and which can appertain to none of her citizens individually, she may as well assume a moral, as a political right, to be trusted in turn, with a discretion, which she cannot exercise for her own interest without promoting theirs. That she has generously sustained them in all past misfortunes and difficulties, is the highest evidence of her future kindness and liberality, and should be a most potent motive, to induce her to continue in the exercise of that confidence, and to be contented with the future acts of contumacy. And while the interests of her citizens are so intimately connected with their stability and success, the restraining influence of a just and enlightened popular feeling, will be ever ready to interpose, to prevent the capricious exercise of legislative authority.

To these high considerations, may perhaps be added another, of not less practical importance: that the salutary influence of state authority would perhaps greatly conduce, in times of extraordinary calamity, to prevent those controversies and dissensions between the banks themselves, which were so unpleasantly exemplified in the history of some of our own institutions, during the disastrous events of the late suspension. That it has already exercised a salutary and judicious influence, may be inferred from the fact, that under the operation of its provisions, the banks of this state alone, of all the institutions south of the Potomac, have in the history of the present engagements or demands for specie, without pretext or evasion.

Whatever may have been the motives or necessity which induced to the enactment of this statute, the rejection of its provisions, by some of these institutions, has made the necessity of the grave inquiry, the subject of the discussion and decision of which, this state cannot, without a sacrifice of her dignity and self-respect, shrink or recede. In this aspect of the question, I felt constrained, by every sense of duty, as well as of allegiance, to exercise all the authority which I was entrusted by the legislature or the constitution to enforce the objects of the law through the judicial tribunals of the state. With this view, I deemed it proper to engage the services of several of the most efficient gentlemen of the bar, as assistant counsel, to co-operate with the attorney general and solicitors. I regarded as the more necessary to do so, as the season of the year at which the court was held in Charleston, as well as the demands of their respective circuits, would necessarily deprive the state of the able services of some, if not of all of the solicitors. I had no authority to command their presence and services in Charleston, and under such circumstances of inconvenience, as those under which they would have been rendered, I could not presume officially to request them. The arduous duties which would therefore have devolved upon the attorney general, could not have been performed, even by his indefatigable zeal and industry, but at the expense of every other duty and engagement. And although having every confidence in the talents and attainments which have so deservedly placed him at the head of his profession, yet the grave responsibility of advocating the interests of the people, and the dignity of the state, on a subject so important and so vexatious, seemed too great, as too serious (and it was even deemed so by his modest sense of his own merit), to be devolved on the abilities of a single advocate.

From the manner and ability with which their duty has been performed, I have derived the greatest satisfaction; and the people and the state I trust, lastingly and essentially benefited by the able and unflinching efforts with which their rights and interests have been vindicated and secured.

In connection with these remarks, relative to the controversy into which this state has been so unfortunately drawn, by the recusancy of some of her banking institutions, I thought it proper to allude to the views to which you have been so good as to direct your views to the consideration of some permanent and prospective mode, of regulating our currency. I assume, of course, that this state can never acquiesce in the existence of a national corporation, or admit the necessity of subjecting its monetary affairs to the arbitrary and exclusive control of such an institution.

Much of the pressure and difficulty under which our community has labored, has arisen from the constraint imposed upon the operations of our banking institutions, by the dissensions, necessarily incident to the inability of parties to agree, and to the probability so fact in the economy of banking operations, more incontrovertible than that the business of a moderate capital, under ordinary circumstances, is usually productive of the highest rates of profits.—And if, in our experience, there exists any exception to this, it is in favor of the larger banking institutions; it is because the late policy of the state, in creating so vast a disproportion of capital as now exists, has substituted the dominion of the few, for the honorable competition of all, and thereby produced strife and discord, where nothing but a generous emulation of public usefulness should prevail.

The greatest profits of the banking institutions are presumed to be derived from its operations in exchanges. In proportion to the exorbitancy of the rates produced by the derangement of the currency and the pressure and difficulty of the times; and in proportion to the advances of the capital by which the more numerous and smaller banks are enabled to sustain, so may its interest and tendencies be directed to protract, and even to increase that state of disorder, from which it acquires its greatest gains. It cannot therefore be a wise policy which supplies the more numerous and smaller banks with the power, motives and inducements to profit by the necessities, or to extort from the necessities and inconveniences of the people.

I do not mean by these general propositions, to impose a censure on the conduct, or illustrate the abuses of any one of our own institutions. The example of one of them, at least, during the late suspension, so far from manifesting such a policy, cannot be too highly commended for its forbearance in the use of its advantages, as well as its wisdom and firmness, in maintaining the faith and credit of the south. Still, an undue and dangerous power over our currency, is necessarily incident to the position of financial authority which it occupies. And if that power has not been tyrannically or corruptly used to its injury, or the detriment of the public, it has been owing solely to the discreet forbearance of those who wielded it, and not to any safeguards provided by the laws to restrain it.

The protection of the capitals of the several banking institutions of this state, (where their charters to be removed), to some common and moderate standard, less than that of our state institution, would probably prevent the recurrence of future evils from this cause. But in the mean time, to strengthen the influence of our state bank, either by an increase of capital or of immunities, is perhaps at present, the most efficacious, and the only means of correcting existing ills, which legislative action cannot otherwise reach, without violating the charters which sanction them. Whether this state should participate in such an operation, at this time, I do not regard as an open or a practical question. But whether she should not use her institution, in the language of a distinguished statesman, to "unbank" the abuses of the system, is a policy that deserves to be well considered. Such a position it is presumed the state would occupy, with a most dignified, salutary and judicious policy, with the most my estimation, that so long as the state engages and competes in banking operations, her institution should at least exercise a controlling influence on her monetary affairs; or else present the strange political anomaly of the public treasury, (with which it is practically identified), and the people's money, subjected to the capricious and selfish domination of private corporations which, however beneficently exercised heretofore, is always liable to abuse. That its present resources are inadequate to this object, is but too apparent from the inconvenience and restrictions, to which it is at all times of great pressure and difficulty, it has been subjected.

Whether it may not be expedient, in the event of increasing its capital, to associate private interests, which may always exercise a salutary vigilance on its operations; or, by merging, as their charters exist, the capital of the state into the capital of the system, proportionately controlled by the officers and representatives of the people, are measures which I would suggest as worthy of your consideration. Such a system of finance, if uniformly adopted by the states, regulated and modified by the influence of a common and salutary system, it is believed would furnish the best and soundest currency in the world.

The report of the president of the bank, will apprise you of the profits which have accrued from the transactions of this institution for the past year; and for a review of the circumstances and embarrassments pervading the community under which they have been realized, you need not be referred to monitor more faithful than your own experience.—Satisfactory as those profits are, considering the character of the times, they have been derived from accommodations as beneficent in their effects, as they have been judiciously and advantageously directed to the benefit of the institution itself. Without alluding to any of the usurious expedients of the times, its resources have, I believe, been as faithfully and humanely directed to protect the property of the citizen, as patriotically to subserve the interests of the state.

From the aspect of the financial affairs of the state, as you will find presented in the comparative view, you will perceive the expediency of exercising the same rigid and judicious economy, in the disbursements of the revenue, which has hitherto prevented the necessity of increased taxation. Additional burthen, on the land and property of the people, should not be imposed in times of such great pressure and distress, except for objects of such primary necessity and importance, as affect the permanent weal and safety of the state, or any of the great principles of constitutional liberty. Improved as our revenue is, in comparison to the aspect presented at the last session, the treasury is still far from having obtained a redundant and overflowing condition. It will be found I trust however, adequate to meet all such necessary exigencies, as cannot be neglected without consequences more ruinous, than the most judicious and moderate economy and extravagance.

are still unfinished, others unprofitable, and many falling into decay—will demand your attention, either to abandon, repair, or otherwise dispose of them. The state or lease of many of them, under the supervision of commissioners appointed for the several communities in which they are located, at a price not less than the value, (as estimated by the comptroller or superintendent), would perhaps be one of the most efficacious and satisfactory modes, of relieving the state from further embarrassment and expense.

The improvement of the public road through Vance's swamp, and its great importance as a common, and I believe, the only channel of intercourse with Charleston, to more than three districts in this state, as well as a large portion of North Carolina, makes it highly desirable that the liberal appropriation already made to improve it, should not be utterly lost by the ruinous inconducive condition in which it now remains. More than twenty thousand dollars were expended by the state, in constructing the original road; from which it has derived neither benefit or improvement. Ten thousand dollars was afterwards received by a contractor, for erecting the skeleton of a bridge, which was afterwards rendered perishable and dangerous, was abandoned, and removed. Of the last appropriation of twenty thousand dollars, to embark the swamp, the contractor has received the first instalment, and after accomplishing a very considerable portion of the work, at the expiration of the term, has been compelled to abandon it, from the exhaustion of his resources, the influence of recurring freshets, and an inability to complete a contract so far exceeding the estimated cost and labor. The balance of the appropriation still remains in the treasury; and if diverted from the object contemplated by the legislature, will leave the state without a single corresponding benefit, to compensate for all the sacrifices of treasure, which have been so ruinously sustained, by both state and individuals.

No portion of the police or statistics of the state, is presumed to require more radical reform, than our system of road working. There is no object upon which so much labor and expense is so unprofitably bestowed, or so unequally contributed, by the different classes of society. Notwithstanding the annual impositions upon the time, labor, and purses of our citizens, the condition of our roads is far from manifesting a corresponding degree of improvement. It is less obvious, that much the greater portion of the burden of the present system devolves upon the people, is sustained almost exclusively by the agricultural interest. The labor or profits of the capitalists, or of the professions, (no matter how productive or enormous), are practically exempt from these assessments, which always recur, and which sometimes fall with much inconceivable force, upon the interests of the planter. Nor are the objections arising from principle, less cogent than those which are so amply illustrated, by the experience of its inefficiency and inequality. The sovereign power of taxing, even within a limited discretion, the property of the laboring people, as possessed by the board of commissioners now established in the several districts of the state, can never be safely or wisely reposed in any body of men, however virtuous or discreet, not elected by the people themselves, and wholly irresponsible to any of the penalties of the law, or even the consequences of impeachment, for any of the ordinary abuses of the system, as they are referred to the board of commissioners, are not only ministerial, but, to the extent to which they are vested, of a legislative character, and if they have not been hitherto abused, to the oppression of the citizen, it is because the forbearance and justice of the officers, have been more than sufficient to restrain, than the provisions of the law. If the power of the same character and extent, were conferred on a military, or any other tribunal, accompanied with the self-perpetuating prerogative of electing its own members, the liberties of the people, and the authority of the government, would be regarded as deeply endangered or subverted. I do not mean to exaggerate the effects of the present system are most to be deprecated, in the execrable condition of most of our high ways, or in the capricious, partial, and oppressive exercise, in numerous instances, of the most despotically abused of the present system of the state. If, therefore the present system be necessarily continued, from a supposed impracticability of devising any other, I would recommend that the appointment of the members of the several boards, should devolve upon the people, at the same time, and under the same restrictions, as appertain to the election of the members of the legislature. It cannot be inspired with a spirit and energy for usefulness, let it at least be shorn and divested of its power and tendency to evil. I cannot I trust too impressively invite your attention to a subject of so much practical importance; and while the improvement of roads, as one of the indispensable means of advancing commerce, has justly been regarded as one of the ages of the world, as the evidence of increasing prosperity and civilization, the patriotic emulation which I am sure you are always ready to manifest promoting the public welfare, will direct your most sedulous exertion to the improvement of our own.

The revision of our criminal law. In many essential particulars, is required by the dictates of policy, as well as of humanity. The effects of time and circumstances, have produced so many modifications in the character of some crimes, that it is difficult, in some instances, to apply the law, and to enforce punishment. Where the penalty exceeds the sense of public justice, or where the feelings of commiseration for the culprit overpower the apprehension of consequences to the safety or interests of the community, neither the wisdom of the judiciary, nor the interest of the executive, can prevent a law from becoming obsolete as it is often. Of this class of cases may perhaps be enumerated some of the lesser grades of forgery, the punishment of which, as a capital offence has gradually been ameliorated, even by the policy of those nations, from whose commercial exigencies, they were originated. Some of our necessary laws have exceeded, in this instance, the inflictions of the divine law, and the enumerated offences to be expiated by death, it is hoped that the force of that necessity has gradually diminished under the influence of time and circumstances.

Trial of slaves for capital offences, in the ordinary summary mode of process, and in the midst of all those circumstances of excitement in which feelings of partiality or of prejudice are so apt to predominate, must be admitted to be capable of producing those perversions in the administration of justice, from which the rights of humanity and the principles of propriety should be protected. To limit the small circle of neighborhood communities, so easily swayed by passion or feeling, vindictive motives to the master, may sometimes conduce to the punishment of the slave, while the influence of a popular favorite, on the other hand, may be successfully exerted to extenuate the crime, and to mitigate the penalty. The result of my reflection and experience, therefore, induces me to reiterate the recommendation of one of my predecessors, to alter the mode of trial, to a jury of twelve freeholders, to be assembled at the court house; and the prosecution in all capital cases, to be defended, when practicable, to be conducted by counsel. The convenience of the public, as well as remote as some of them are from the seat of justice, may readily be accommodated by special provisions. If, in making this recommendation, I have said little to your more recent suggestions of some of the defects in this behalf, for a variety of reasons, entitled to your more serious consideration, as the result of the matured and accumulated experience of this department, in all its stages of occupancy and succession. The instances of awakened regret and contrition, on the part of many of these classes of criminals, as well of the interposition of executive clemency to modify or arrest their own hostile and often illegal convictions, are of frequent and ordinary occurrence.

The present mode of applying the free school fund has been productive of no benefit, to correspond with the most munificent of all the benefactions of our state government, to improve the moral condition of her citizens, and to secure the many good things which presents us with the result of a long period of our indigent citizens, who have grown up without the encouragement or the opportunity to participate in its advantages, but at the same time forces upon us the conviction, that these opportunities when enjoyed, have in many instances been accompanied by a state of mind, as well of the feelings, which is a source of perhaps more injuries, than the worst consequences of the most profound ignorance. While our grammar schools and literary seminaries have advanced and improved in proportion to the increasing intelligence of the age, and to the higher requirements of the church, and of the state, the common schools has depreciated in all the essential requisites of a sound and judicious course of education. Where are their beneficial effects to be witnessed, in any of their influences on society? Where are the monuments of their usefulness to be seen, in any new branch of agriculture, than to perpetuate the error? What signal example can be adduced, to illustrate a solitary instance of moral or intellectual reclamation, for the expenditure of more than thirty-six thousand dollars annually? Better would it be to leave the mind entirely to nature's influences, and heaven's mercies, than to perpetuate the error, and corrupt the heart, by a degraded and injudicious course of education. The result of so many years' experience, is enough to dissipate your hopes, in the present mode of applying the liberality of the state; but not, I trust, to discourage your efforts to improve it. When the state assumes to become the guardian of the education of any portion of her citizens, the character of that education should be of a kind not inferior to the most useful and improved standard of tuition. I am inclined to the conviction, that if elevated to the condition of the highest order in each district, the grammar schools—one to be established in each district, and the other a course of instruction being chiefly directed to the acquisition of some of those scientific attainments so necessary to success in the useful and mechanic arts—and associated with a system of manual labor, to invigorate the body, as well as to enlighten the understanding—tended sphere of usefulness. But the present arrangement, in my view, to any radical reformation in the system, would be the appointment of a general superintendent, whose practical observation and experience, would furnish many valuable suggestions for the future action, as well as introduce in the meantime, salutary improvement in the present mode of instruction. If the expense of a salary should be thought to constitute an objection to this experiment, the amount necessary to compensate such an officer, might be beneficially abstracted from the treasury, and I have no doubt will be contributed to the economy, as well as to the effects arising from the distribution of the balance.

In pursuance of an act of the legislature, to carry into effect a treaty, to extinguish the title of the Catawba Indians, to lands in the districts of York and Lancaster, and to purchase other territory for their residence and subsistence an agent in whose intelligence and fidelity the greatest confidence is reposed by the proprietors and chiefs, was appointed by this department, with such specific instructions, as were deemed best comporting with the wise and benevolent views of the legislature. By the report of the agent, it is transmitted, that the same has perceived, that the objections urged by the executive of North Carolina, to the purchase of land in that state, precludes the possibility of gratifying the wish expressed by some of their chiefs, to unite their declining tribe with the remains of the Cherokee nation, now residing in that state. It is hoped, however, that the acquisition of other lands, within the limits of their own domain, may be advantageously made for them; and the faith of the state, as well as the exigency of this now homeless and landless people, requires that the necessary appropriation should be made during the present session, to comply with this important condition of the treaty. The same, in relation to their part conformed to all the stipulations and requirements of the law and the treaty, the taxes imposed by the legislature, having been received into the treasury—and the annuities which have hitherto been paid to the several nations of subsistence to the Indians, being accordingly ascertained, the fulfilment of the obligations assumed by the state, is now imperative, to relieve this improvident people, from a state of utter destitution, and dependence on the charity and benevolence of the community.

I regret to communicate to you the resignation of the late president of our college, whose sphere of usefulness, in that high and dignified station, has been occupied with such decided and distinguished benefit to the institution, and to the state. Under his wise and judicious control, its literary character has not only been more than fully sustained, both in the acquisition of his science, and in the conduct of the professors, but its morals have at the same time advanced to a state of purity and improvement, which it believed has never been surpassed, in the experience of this or any other seminary. Deeply regretting the loss, as well as the circumstances attending the resignation of his services, I can confidently hope that his character and example are so indelibly impressed upon the institution, and its successive generations of youth, that its lingering influences will continue to guide and actuate it, in the same honorable course of virtue and success. I accordingly, I trust, recommend to your consideration, and patronage, an institution, whose enlightened contributions have extended to every pursuit and avocation—every art and science, as cultivated in our state—and whose influences have been diffused through all the walks and vocations of life, occupying every station in society, pervading every profession, and adorning the bench, the bar, the pulpit, and our legislative councils. The moral weight and influence which South Carolina has so long exercised, through the talents and usefulness of her statesmen, on the affairs of this union, and which this institution has so long contributed to preserve, and to diffuse an overruling inducement to foster and improve it.

Encouragements to promote agricultural improvements, have never received that consideration which their importance merits, from the representatives of a people so entirely absorbed in the pursuit, and dependent upon the success, of that branch of industry, as are the citizens of this state. It would not be so much a matter of surprise (if however impenitent it might be regarded) if its interests had been so entirely neglected and overlooked, by the government of a community purely fostered by commerce. But in South Carolina, it is admitted to be the great, the absorbing, and almost the only productive interest; and our daily experience proves, that it is the constant aspiration of every other employment, to rest its account, and to find its subsistence. In the economy of this state, it is the element of every other business and vocation. Its productions supply the traffic of the merchants, its requirements give employment to the professions; and its patriotism and industry contribute the larger portion of our revenue. Its interests, therefore, looks furnish ample evidence of a wise and provident regard to the state, as well as to promote, the interests of other classes and pursuits, by the limited partnerships, commercial regulations, and corporate privileges and franchises, which they have so liberally established. In the benefits of legislation either partial or indiscriminate, to advance its peculiar interests, it stands in contrast with the independent character of the agricultural community, to desire to participate. But in the development of the wealth of the state—in the improvement of objects common to the enterprise and the interests of all—its citizens reasonably solicit expect, the aid and patronage of our state government.

A geological survey of our mineral resources, (which chance and accident are every day so wonderfully developing), a scientific analysis of the different soils so important to their profitable and judicious culture, may be properly considered among the general and legitimate objects to which legislative encouragement should be directed. The beneficial influence of the productive corporations and other new investments of capital so usefully and successfully operating to promote the prosperity of the interior and every portion of the state, are illustrative of the policy of instituting scientific researches, to enlighten and stimulate their labor. In diversifying the pursuits of industry—in extracting, as well as diffusing, the permanent sources of wealth from the valuable ores and products of the earth—the have increased and multiplied the means of national prosperity, and have created the conveniences of society, distributed new employments and infused life, energy and enterprise, into the habits and character of our people. A small annual appropriation to establish premiums, promotive of the objects to which the state agricultural society has so patriotically devoted its efforts, would amply contribute to aid its laudable exertions to inspire the emulation, as well as to enlighten the experience, of our citizens. The beneficial influence of legislative patronage, in such instances, may be illustrated by the successful example of those states, by whose experience it has been tested, and while it must necessarily tend to dignify, as well as to encourage, the great and important interest, upon the success of which the prosperity of this state so mainly depends, it is at the same time exempt, in my view, from those objections which may reasonably be urged, on principle, to the practice of conferring privileges, protection, immunities, or franchises, on particular classes or associations of citizens.

The last but not the least interesting topic to which I would invite your attention, is the dilapidated and ruinous condition of our houses, and its appendages; the offices and government apartments, which are in a most cheerless and uncomfortable state of inconvenience and decay. Venerable for the purposes it has subserved—associated with the most important events, and the proudest recollections of the past—consacrated by the feelings of patriotism and of antiquity which it has often been the scene and the occasion, it is well worthy of the pride and fostering care of those, into whose guardianship it has now descended. The moral influence of a high state example, exercised in the wise economy of improving, as well as in the prudent protection of the people and of the state, and in the desire to perpetuate the honors of our ancient halls of our ancestors and predecessors, is practically more effective to fix the attachment of our citizens on our institutions, and to stimulate the enterprise and industry of the people to improve their individual efforts and resources, than all the speculative inducements, which either legislation or commerce can proffer. We should therefore regard the mouldering effects of time, upon the venerable walls of our capital, with the same sedulous care, and reverential solicitude, to remove them, as we would defend, and would up to the walls and foundations of law, and against encroachments on the sacred barriers that surround the sovereignty and independence of the state.

JOHN P. RICHARDSON.

EVOLUTIONARY HERO HAS DEPARTED. Mr. N., a worthy, industrious and highly esteemed of Anne Arundel county, Maryland, affliction which he sustained like a soldier, lay campaign on Sunday morning last, the 1st, in the 82d year of his age. He was born in 1760. At the most disastrous and of the American revolution, an orphan years, Davidson determined to risk his all his energies in defence of the liberties. He joined General Washington's army Maryland line just prior to, and was engaged in the battle of the Clouds.

White Plains. He assisted to kiddle cover of which the army under Washington from Trenton, where he was taken prisoner. He was within his grasp, and he placed the Americans quickly after, mostly retailed. After this he was with most at Elizabethtown, N. Jersey, which was surprised by the British, and he was taken prisoner. For eleven months and Davidson underwent the privations and inflicted upon "rebel prisoners,"—first in the camp, and afterwards in the prison, and he was the enemy as prisoners. The confinement was exceedingly rigorous, having been discovered in undermining the prison. Just as the party had completed their work, they were discovered and were prepared to escape, a traitor betrayed them to the eyes of Hessians were instantly sent for, to charge. When they arrived they found the hang, whether by his treachery or by the king's officers, was ascertaining.

Davidson was exchanged, and soon after again joined the army and was engaged in the battle of Monmouth, one of the severest fought in Maryland, one of the most bloody days in Maryland history to the charge, and in that battle he owed the preservation of his life to a friend on his right, whose superior skill in the use of the rifle enabled him to take the enemy in the second charge three of the enemy in the rear. From that to the close of the war, Davidson's services were such that the book of his fortunes and privations, and the fragments of his life, would fill a large volume. He was shot by a shell which exploded near him, but he did not die, and when a corps of chosen men were ordered to carry out the duty of burying him, he was found to be still alive. It is interesting to learn that service that his beloved comrade placed his hand upon Davidson's shoulder and said, "Well done my brave comrade," and that he was still in the old soldier's mind, occurring to the incident; "not to myself, but to my men engaged in the affair did our brave comrade give me the idea." It was the soldier's sense of complicity in it.

ITION TICKET in New York, as will be seen, obtained at the recent election in that state. It is said that they hold the balance of the great political parties in eight of the 24 elect 24 members to the legislature.

TRAD AFRICANS. Thirty-five, all that survived, were brought to our shore in the Amistad, sailed on the 25th ult. for their native country, and accompanied by rev. Messrs. Steele and Mrs. Raymond, missionaries to Africa, and son and wife, teachers.

The United States Gazette says Mr. White, a white man, and his first mate, a colored man, the cook, Pietro Mezick, were arrested on a charge of the recent voyages from New Orleans to Cuba, with a cargo of stolen slaves. It appears that in concert with the late John Brown, they had smuggled the slave aboard at New Orleans, kept him during the passage, and on arriving Delaware bay, aided his escape. The requisition of the governor of Louisiana having reached this city, the accused were placed on board the ship Hopewell, for New Orleans, to be taken to that city for trial. U. S. Gaz.

BANKS. The New Orleans banks have made a very rapid reduction of their circulation.

	Circulation-	Specie.
January 30, 1841,	$8,254,171	$3,406,094
October 30, 1841,	6,084,795	3,013,757

Reduction,	$2,169,376	$392,274
The deposits in the same time have been reduced $1,778,411. They propose to resume specie payments on the 1st November, 1842.

By the returns of the Tennessee banks, lately made to the legislature, the circulation amounts to $1,923,495, and the specie in their vaults to $615,675 21, being about three dollars in circulation, to one in specie.

The Albany Evening Journal says that although several of the safety fund banks of the state are struggling with the liabilities incurred years ago, "all and each of these banks are in a better condition than they were a year ago. They are, by prudence and economy, working out of their difficulties; and they would extricate themselves if they could be exempted from the assaults of party."

CENTENARY OF LUTHERISM. This year being the centenary of Lutherism in the United States, it will be generally observed throughout the church.

CHINESE COLLECTION. Nathan Dunn, with the Chinese collection, was to sail from New York on the 24th ult. in the packet ship Hendrick Hudson, Captain Morgan, for London. He goes to London to exhibit his collection, under the patronage of the crown, and with an order from the lords of the admiralty to pass duty free. It will be exhibited at Hyde Park corner, London, when the buildings now putting up, are ready for its reception. Some idea may be formed of its magnitude when it is known that the bulk of the establishment is four hundred tons.

COLONIZATION: The Maryland Colonization Journal says: "The sailing of the vessel for Cape Palmas has been postponed from the 1st to the 10th Dec. in consequence of the prospect of obtaining more emigrants from Charles and St. Mary's counties. It is hoped that the establishment of the Catholic mission at Cape Palmas will induce many of that persuasion who have heretofore desired to go but for leaving their church, will now be disposed to avail themselves of the present opportunity."

DEATH OF GOVERNOR BUCHANAN. The Gloucester Massachusetts Telegraph says—"We learn by a letter that his excellency Thomas Buchanan governor of Liberia, died at Bassa, September 3d, very much lamented."

The Journal of Commerce says: "Mr. Buchanan, in the discharge of his multitudinous and responsible duties as governor of Liberia, showed himself admirably qualified for the true statesman, an exhibitor of the highest qualities of true statesmanship. An officer of the United States navy, who dined with him on a certain occasion at Monrovia, in company with several other highly respectable Europeans and Americans, including some of the most distinguished statesmen of the country, who, while being the presence of a superior; and speaking of the guests en masse, he said Governor Buchanan was a head and shoulders above them all. On several occasions the deceased had opportunity to show his fearless and unflinching character, and his high sense of duty. He was as much of the same spirit into the minds of the colonists. Under his administration the colony has made great progress in every desirable respect. A gentleman, who knew him well, remarked that he would have done more than any other man in the colony could have done; he has died in the prime of life and in the midst of success; yet few men have accomplished more than he, for the welfare of mankind, and especially of Africa and her descendants. His name will be enrolled with that of the great benefactors of the world in the glorious cause of African civilization and civilization."

EGG MARKET. It has been ascertained that over half a million of eggs are consumed every month in New York. They are brought down the Erie canal in barrels, and New Jersey, and even Pennsylvania, supplies the Gothamites with this essential article of domestic utility. One woman in Fulton market recently sold 175,000 eggs in ten weeks—supplying the Astor house.

with 1,000 each day, but 2,500 on Saturday.

GOLD IN A SOLID STATE ABSORBED BY COPPER. The process of melting gold and copper together, has been a common occurrence with goldsmiths ever since the days of Tubal Cain—that it would indeed be wonderful that a fact like the following, if it could occur, should have escaped detection until this day. Gold has been "tried in the fire" of alchemists in most of its ramifications. We insert the article however for what it is worth as we find it in the public papers:

"A workman was gilding a copper sword scabbard and had placed ten dollars worth of gold upon it, and was engaged in heating it. Suddenly, long before the copper had arrived at the melting conduct, the gold had disappeared. This excited some curiosity, and caused numerous experiments to be tried, all of which ended in establishing a new fact in science—the absorption of gold by copper in a solid state."

MRS. MADISON. The numerous friends of this respected lady will be glad to learn that she has arrived at her residence, in this city, from her seat in Virginia, intending to pass the winter here. It gives us pleasure to learn that she is in excellent health, which we trust she will long live to enjoy. [Nat. Int.]

MISSISSIPPI BONDS. The Vicksburg Sentinel (V. B.) thus notices the recent decision of that state with regard to state bonds:

"The people of Mississippi have repudiated the illegal bonds now held in the name of the state, by a band of stock gamblers in Europe, fraudulently obtained through the agency of Nicholas Biddle. This is only the commencement of that mighty political, MORAL and SOCIAL revolution commenced in this state, and which is destined, before many years, to sweep over Florida, Maryland, and Louisiana. Two years ago last September we announced the principle of repudiation, and now the people of a sovereign state have decided the question. We hope that engine of popular oppression—borrowing on the faith of the state—is at an end."

PHOTOGRAPHIC PLATES.—At a sitting of the "French academy of science," on the 18th of October last, a communication was read from M. Gaudin, descriptive of his method of preparing photographic plates of metal with the bromure of cadmium, instead of the chloride of silver, which he had used in his first experiments. It is singularly sensitive that perfect impressions could be taken, not instantaneously, but in a quarter of a second! He had thus succeeded in taking impressions of objects in the air, and had obtained, in the form of a photograph, a beautiful plate of the Pont Neuf, from M. Lerebours's balcony, with all the people, horses, and vehicles while in motion. He had also taken portraits in this manner, and had even obtained impressions of the face while the persons were speaking or smiling, was perfectly given. It was mentioned that the bromure of cadmium required great precautions in its preparation, bromine being a very violent and corrosive substance, and a single drop of it, falling or splashing on the eye of the preparer, causing blindness. One of the persons employed by M. Gaudin to prepare his plates had lost the sight of one eye by an accident of this kind not many days before.

STARVATION. The English papers state that the bill of mortality in London have been greatly increased this year by the absolute destitution of an immense number of families. Of 25,000 journeymen tailors, in that city 17,000 are entirely out of employment. The situation of journeymen printers, shoemakers and others, is equally deplorable.

STRENGTHS. The New York Courier des Etais Unis says there can be no question that the government of France has taken up in earnest the project of establishing, in a line of steamships between the principal maritime ports of that kingdom and of the United States, a mail service of the kind which the United States has. M. D'Arny, minister of the navy, has been sent hither by the minister of marine for the special purpose of investigating the actual state of the steamship service between the United States and Europe, and of studying the improvements that may be made. The visit of the Prince de Joinville itself has not been without reference to this object, as we judge from a paragraph in the Journal des Debats of the 10th inst. "The Prince de Joinville," it says, "has just arrived in New York, where he is already in progress for the purpose, of 1,300,000 horsepower, and engines of 600 horse power to be put on the war model, and to be used for transportation in peace, commanded by a French officer, who is expected to be here in readiness by the close of 1842."

VENICE is the name of a new town laid off on the Illinois shore at the landing of the Upper steam ferry boat company of St. Louis. The boats land, (on the Mississippi shore), within the city limits.

Washington. The statue of Washington (by the American sculptor Greenough) says the National Geographic, the 23rd issue was yesterday raised to its lofty pedestal in the centre of the great rotunda of the capitol, and is now uncovered to public view. The president of the United States, Mr. Grant, presided at the ceremony, which was attended with a large number of citizens, during the elevation of the statue. The operation was directed by the same energetic citizen who were employed to remove it from the navy yard, and the statue was placed in its new position without accident, and without the slightest injury to the statue. Pretending not to be judges of such things, we would not say that the great statue of Washington on this column of war art; but we must say that the work which it has impressed us with deep admiration. The attitude is dignified; the resemblance of the head and features to the original is perfect; the expression of the countenance is grandeur and repose which distinguished the countenance of the great original. As a whole, the work strikes us as worthy of the subject, and of the magnitude of the task, and which, for the statue of the nation is itself so noble a regalia.

THE WINNEBAGO INDIANS. A correspondent of the Galena Gazette, at Prairie du Chien, under date of November 4, writes that the commissioners appointed to treat with the Winnebagoes, to induce them to go further north, will not be able to accomplish their object. Some of the chiefs will not meet them. Those who have had a talk, say in plain terms they will hear no further propositions, as they do not want to move again.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.
PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS.
CHRONICLE.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The steamer Aecadia left Liverpool on the 19th ult. and arrived at Boston on the 7th inst.

The Columbia steamer had arrived out, making her run from Halifax in ten days and a half.

GREAT BRITAIN.

BIRTH OF A PRINCE OF WALES AND DUKE OF CORNWALL. All England was leaping with joy on the evening of the 9th November. The Park and Tower guns announced the joyous event, and gratulations rung through the realm.

Immediately after the birth of the child, says the Court Chronicle, "the sex of the royal infant was announced by Sir James Clark to the anxious group of distinguished personages assembled in the royal chamber, and subsequently to those collected in the ante-room, exciting in every bosom unspeakable emotion of joy and gratification. Prince Albert received the congratulations appropriate to the occasion with graceful ability."

The privy council being assembled as soon as possible at the council chamber, Whitehall, it was ordered, that a form of thanksgiving for the queen's safe delivery of a prince be prepared by his grace the archbishop of Canterbury, to be used in all churches and chapels throughout England and Wales, and the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, on Sunday, the 14th of November, or the Sunday after the respective ministers shall receive the same.

It is worthy of historical record, that this is the only queen regent who has given birth to a male heir applicable to the British throne.

Bulletins were issued daily until the 18th, on which day it was announced the queen was convalescent.—The infant prince is as well as possible. Her majesty's recovery is so far advanced that no more bulletins will be issued.

The queen Dowager, was dangerously ill at her residence in Sudbury hall. The last bulletin dated 17th inst. was considered unfavorable.

Another attempt had been made by a crazy man, to break into Buckingham palace, insisting that the queen had cut off his brother's head, and he meant to have hers.

Sir Chas. Bagot, the new governor of Canada, left London on 12th November, to embark in H. M. ship Illustrious, for Quebec, we suppose, via Halifax.

TRADE. The accounts from the manufacturing districts continue to be of a very gloomy nature, nor is there at present any prospect of their being relieved.

IRELAND.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN. The London correspondent of the Boston Morning Post furnishes the following:

At a recent repeat meeting, in acknowledging the receipt of a letter from Judge Doran from America, O'Connell said that one of the first letters he would despatch from the mayoralty house would be one in reply to Judge Doran's. The generous sympathy for the friends in America, O'Connell said overpowered him, and he wanted language to express his gratitude; they had received by the last post no less a sum than three hundred and fifty pounds, and it was not therefore surprising, that grateful thankfulness to America for her munificent contributions should be the prevailing sentiment throughout Ireland. O'Connell thus referred to the article in the Times respecting the plan to split the American union, attributed to Capt. Mayratt:

"He had read," he said, "with the deepest horror and disgust, a paragraph in the Times, in which the writer had the audacity to threaten the great American nation. He had the unpardonable impudence and audacity to strive to bully and terrify a people amounting in number to seventeen millions! What was this writer's object?—evidently to foment a war between the two countries. (Hear, hear.) It was a most traitorous document—injuries to the country, menacing blood and war—dangerous to the throne, and inimical to national liberty throughout the world. (Hear, hear.) Was the man insane enough to fancy that his paper thunder could terrify the noble American people? He might as well attempt to frighten soldiers with a porgon, or back a regiment of grenadiers with the squeaking of a child's penny trumpet. (Laughter and cheers.) There was a pride about republicanism—for the republican had no master—which was apt to be exaggerated, and to lead to irritation and excitement. This the Times knew well, and intended nothing but mischief in supporting the Tories by articles like that to which he referred."

Mr. O'Connell continued—
"Such articles would never meet with sympathy from Irishmen. (Cheers.) Irishmen would never enter into an insulting crusade against the Americans. They would continue to obey the law, and above all, they would hold a firm attitude of defiance towards that miscreant faction, the Tories, and their lying villainous and insulting organ, and show that the harmony between Britain and America could not be disturbed. Was it not enough, asked Mr. O'Connell, that the Tories had a preponderating influence in both houses, and controlled the queen—a power obtained by depriving the operatives of cheap bread; by giving the aristocrat two slices of the loaf without reserving a morsel for the poor man? Was England insane? Was her destruction coming on, and was that insanity indicative of her approaching dissolution? He hoped, however, that the queen might be saved, but he recollected the Roman proverb—

"Quem Deus vult perdere prius ducit avertit."

FRANCE.

The Paris papers are occupied almost exclusively with the affairs of Spain. The Siecle and Commerce announce positively that two French armies of 15,000 men are to assemble at Bayonne and Toulon, with a reserve of 14,000 men. It is piggan, with a reference to the letter of our correspondent that, although there has been no official announcement to this effect, the absence of all contradiction of the statement in the official journals would lead to the inference that something of the kind was intended. The army at Toulon was intended for a Spanish intervention, and an armed police to maintain peace in the city in which it is stationed.

The Paris papers contain a most gratifying account of the reception of the British ambassador, Lord Cowley, at the court of the queen.

The reading of the report of the committee of the commons of the king has commenced. Thirty-five persons are implicated in the conspiracy; but it is not expected that more than eight or ten will be brought to trial. They are all, with a single exception, of the working classes. In the trades to which they belong, the cabinet makers appear to out-number all the rest. M. Dupotet, the editor of the Journal du Peuple, is the exception above referred to. Nearly all the conspirators appear to be persons of the lowest intelligence and influence, the readers of a villainous publication called the "Humanitaire." Consider, who was tried and acquitted in the affair of Darnes, is one of the number. He keeps a wine shop at Montmartre, which is much frequented by the Humanitarians and the Communists.

SPAIN.

The news from Spain is of little interest. Four of the officers capitally convicted of participation in the attack on the palace of the 7th ultimo, have been placed in prison preparatory to being shot. The news from Andalusia is satisfactory; the whole of that province remained tranquil. It was doubted if Espartero, who was on his way from Perpignan to Saragossa, would go to Barcelona.

TURKEY.

The Levant mail, which has arrived, brings us very little news of interest, if we except the fact communicated in letters from Constantinople, that Mehmet Ali had sent to the Sultan an additional sum of 5,000,000 piasters on account of the tribute. The old pacha seems particularly anxious just now to be upon the best possible terms with the Ottoman Porte; for, in a concluding, by all the means in his power, to court the smiles, and to win the approbation of the Sultan.

CHINA.

The arrival of the Ann McKim at New York brought Canton dates to 29th July. Overland despatches reached England and were brought out by Aecadia, as late as the 24th August, just 106 days. Nothing material appears to have transpired since our former dates.

The London Standard thus epitomizes the news by the overland mail:

The steamer (the Atlanta) which conveyed the mail from China to London was the least of the late plenipotentiary, capt. Elliot, and commodore Sir J. J. Gordon Bremer, who pursued their journey to England overland.

Sir Henry Pottinger, the new plenipotentiary, and Rear Admiral Parker, the new naval commander-in-chief, arrived at Macao on the 9th of August, and hastened to fulfil the respective duties assigned to them.

The first notification of the new plenipotentiary was published, along with his own commission from the British crown, in the Hong Kong Gazette three days afterwards. The former of these documents announces the determination on the part of Sir Henry Pottinger to pursue a firm and decided line of policy. He proposes to respect the existing treaty, provided it be not infringed in the slightest degree by the Chinese themselves, in which case he threatens them with an immediate renewal of hostilities; an event which, judging from the notorious perfidy and bad faith of the provincial authorities, he appears to contemplate. His notification is accompanied by a warning to her majesty's subjects, and all other foreigners, not to place themselves in the power of the Chinese authorities during the present anomalous and unsettled relations of the empire.

From the commission of Sir Henry Pottinger it appears that he is wholly independent plenipotentiary, and that he is altogether independent of the government of the British India government. A notification of Sir Henry's arrival and powers was dispatched to Canton immediately on his arrival, accompanied by a letter, the answer to which was required to be sent to a northern station, (Chusan, it is said.)

The refusal of Sir Henry Pottinger to treat with Kwong-chow, or to answer to Canton, or any other subordinate, and his directions to the fleet to move to the northward, appear to have had a salutary effect on the conduct of the Chinese, who have been suddenly metamorphosed from rude, insolent, and ill-bred savages into quiet, discreet, civil, behaved gentlemen. Character is reflected by the mere difference of All this has been effected by the mere difference of Sir Henry's arrival and powers was dispatched to Canton immediately on his arrival, accompanied by a letter, the answer to which was required to be sent to a northern station, (Chusan, it is said.) So far, too, the truce appears to have been unbroken, and in the present aspect of affairs it does not seem likely to be infringed by the Chinese. Instead of running head-on at the beck of a rascally man, the new representative of her majesty has already declined to see one of the most important of the Chinese officials. They now begin to find out with what sort of opponents they have to deal. The Canton treaty had reference solely to the southern provinces: the preparations of the fleet for proceeding to the northward have, accordingly, excited no little alarm, and large sums of money—no, some say 30 millions of dollars have been offered to Sir Henry Pottinger to induce him to alter his purpose. These overtures have been very properly rejected, the fleet, consisting of nine ships of war, four armed steamers, and twenty-two transports, sailed for Amoy on the 21st. The admiral having demanded more steamers for river operations, the British admiral, Sir George Elliot, has ordered the Venemus, left Bouslay on the 26th September. A strong force of seven ships of war and one steamer remain at Hong Kong and in Canton river, a force more than adequate to chastise the insolence of the southern provinces, should they attempt to repeat their former aggressions. In this state of things—no considerable time elapses before we can expect further news of a very decisive character.

INDIA.

The news from India is unimportant. That country continues, with the exception of occasional local broils, tolerably tranquil. From Scinde no news has been received to the British. The negotiations with Nuzzar Khan are also expected to terminate favorably.—Afghanistan, barring an occasional conflict between Shah Soojah's troops and the neighboring mountain tribes, is quiet. Letters from Adee, dated October 1840, state that a force of 400 men and a gun had proceeded inland and attacked a strong post of the Arals with effect. The boldness of this act appears to have led to conciliatory offers on the part of the sultan.

MEXICO.

The New Orleans Crescent says: Santa Anna had succeeded in placing himself en scene at the head of the Mexican affairs. A convention was called to reform the affairs of the country—and nine tenths of the members were men opposed to Bustamante and readily resolved to depose him, and elevate Santa Anna in his stead. On Sunday the 14th of Oct. he took the oath of office as president of the republic. It is presumed that Santa Anna, will acknowledge the independence of Texas.

TEXAS.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE White Hall N. Y. Chronicle says: Shadrick Burleson, better known hereabouts as Shad. Burleson, is now vice president of the republic of Texas. He is well known in the Champagne as a bonan of 1834-5. He was engaged in building a boat at this place, about that time. By this together with irregular habits, and mis-calculations in business, he became embarrassed, took the Sabine slide—entered the Texan army—became colonel, and now vice president by over 2,000 majority! Shad, was a "go-ahead!" and a right sort of a Texan citizen we should think.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY. A meeting of the friends of agriculture was held in the city of Washington lately, at which Solon Robinson, esq., presided, and J. F. Collins and John A. Smith, esq., were secretaries, when resolutions were adopted declaring that the interests of agriculture required the formation of a national agricultural society. A second meeting was held on the 8th, and a committee consisting of Messrs. J. M. Comeau of Virginia, J. H. French, of Massachusetts, and Dixon H. Lewis, of Alabama, was chosen to prepare a draught of a constitution to be presented for approbation to the convention. The meeting is to be res-sessible on the 13th instant.

DEATH OF A MEMBER OF CONGRESS. The Philadelphia United States Gazette states that the Hon. Henry Black, member of congress, elected in the place of Mr. Ogles, from Somerset and Bedford counties in Pennsylvania, died recently at his residence in Somerset, of apoplexy. Judge Black was highly esteemed for his many virtues.

THE HON. DIXON H. LEWIS, of Alabama, an account of whose death was circulated in most of the public journals, and inserted in the last number of the Register, most agreeably and conclusively refuted the statement, by making his appearance in the house of representatives on Wednesday last, "as large as life," and in good health. Few men could be more cordially welcomed.

NORTHEAST BOUNDARY. A hoax has been played off upon one of the penny papers of Boston, giving an account of a battle between the British and Americans on the lines, in which thirty lives were lost. The accounts are received from the post up to the day of the reported affair. Major Graham has run his line 85 miles due north of the monument, which carries him six miles north of the St. John's.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS. The official report of the secretary of the treasury of the commerce of the U. States for the year ending 30th September, 1840, comprises a large volume, which has been but recently completed and distributed, and from the pages of which numerous extracts have been inserted in several of the last numbers of the Register. This report varies in its aggregate slightly from the annual report of the secretary of the treasury as submitted at the commencement of the session of congress in December, 1840.

The report as now officially ascertained and published, shows the importations during the year ending Sept. 30, 1840, to have amounted to $107,141,519 The amount estimated by Secretary Woodbury in his annual report to congress, December, 1840, for same period was 104,805,801

Difference in imports $2,335,718
The amount of exports as now officially published is $192,055,946
The amount as estimated in the treasury's annual report to congress in December, 1840, was 191,571,850

Difference in exports $54,696
This correction proves that instead of the exports of the year ending Sept. 30, 1840, being the sum of $26,766,059, as estimated by the secretary in his report of December, 1840, the exports are $192,055,946
And the imports 107,141,519

The exports only exceeded the imports by the sum of $84,944,427
The difference between the estimate submitted by the secretary of the treasury in his annual report, and the actual result as reported in detail in the volume alluded to, added to the delay in publishing the latter we suspect has led the editor of the New York Journal of Commerce into an error. An article appeared in that paper of last week, and has from there been extensively published in the public journals, in which the sum reported by the secretary in December, 1840, is taken as the true amount of imports and exports of that year, and the sum as corrected in the official report in the volume as now reported, is assumed as the amount of imports and exports for the year ending 30th September, 1841—and the aggregate of the two years thus paraded makes the formidable sum of $51,710,436 balance in favor of this country. We should like to find a result going so considerably towards the relief of the American people. The estimates of the secretary of the treasury as to the imports and exports of the year 1841 will be given to congress we presume in a few days.

Meantime the following table will show that the particular causes may operate, as in the year 1840, and perhaps in 1841, to produce a balance in our favor, the balance but demonstrates the extent of ruin the suffering element of trade, to our country, has for a number of years has brought upon the country. We have been and are yet allowing foreign countries to restrict and interdict our articles at every point, tho' admitting every luxury from them, almost free of duty—affording them all the benefit of "free trade" in the United States. The restriction is truly confined to monopolies—"corn laws" and the exaction of over a thousand per cent upon our tobacco. This is the true cause of the difficulties under which this country is now prostrated. All attempts to cure the evil by forced expedients will fall for short of reaching the real seat of the disease. We must have a complete change of policy—those who trade with us we will have to suffer—and the measure of that suffering will be invariably graduated by foreigners.— Whilst ever we can pay, they will furnish us with their gew-gaws to the very bottom of our purse, and leave us to fight about the rates of the domestic exchanges, which this weak and foolish policy has decreased for 200, and to search in vain for any other than a disaster currency, whilst they place a premium upon every piece of coin in the country.

System of trade by aggregate sales. Here are the actual proceeds of our existing system as operating for fifty years. The exports exceeded the imports in only seven out of the fifty. Excluding the year 1840, and the total amount of the excess in the other six of those years was but twenty-five millions—with that year the excess of exports was altogether $50,107,573 whilst the excess of imports during the remaining forty-four of the fifty years is $803,428,630! In the whole fifty years the excess of imports over exports is seven hundred and fifty-three millions three hundred and nineteen thousand, three hundred and fifty-seven dollars—being an average of fifteen millions of dollars! What other nation on earth has suffered so much from the trade system as the period since the enactment of the compromise bill and the progressive reduction of the tariff thereunder, up to 1839 inclusive, and the average excess of imports was nearly thirty millions annually. This was continued until our resources and credit both failed, and disaster is upon us.

COLUMBIA RIVER. The Bogor Wing publishes the following extract from a letter received by a friend, dated Hououlun, Sandwich Islands, May 6, 1841:—
"Our latest dates from the United States are May 1841, giving an account of the death of Gen. Harrison. The United States ship Peacock, and schooner Flying Fish were here in June last, on their way to Columbia river, two months behind their time. The Vineueus and Porpoise arrived at the Columbia river in May last. Capt. Wilkes has highly flattering descriptions of the country—he will make a thorough survey of it before he quits it. I hope Capt. Wilkes' official report will open the eyes of Uncle Sam to his interest on our northwest coast. Great Britain has held and still holds, through the agency of the Hudson's Bay company, exclusive jurisdiction of the beautiful country, the great wealth, and the trade of the country to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Several Americans of enterprise have attempted a settlement in the country, but they have been checked by oppressive monopoly, until they were fairly starved out, and obliged to return. The charter of the Hudson Bay company has recently been renewed with an additional grant of two millions pounds sterling intended expressly for the settlement of the disputed territory. And they are now erecting temporary buildings on every valuable lot of land and mill-site in the country. Capt. Wilkes says the harbor at Pagot sound, is the finest he ever anchored in, in any part of the world. We have an almost incalculable amount of commerce in the Pacific, and yet allow John Bull quiet and undisturbed possession of the only harbor that belongs to this side of Cape Horn. You are aware that they have already taken possession of New Zealand, and broken up and excluded our fishermen from those seas—they have taken possession of the Falkland Islands (which affords an excellent harbor) and forbidden our vessels cruising for whales within three leagues of the land."

"The 'stars and stripes' are set at half mast this day, over our roof, on account of the intelligence received of the death of General Harrison."

INDIANS. THE CATAWBAS. According to the report of the Indian Agent laid before our legislature at the present session, this tribe of the only Indians now inhabiting South Carolina, has dwindled to 51 individuals, of whom 6 only are men, the rest being women and children. The agent proposes that a tract of 500 acres of land in York District be bought for them, and presumes that from their idle habits, they will not cultivate of the same more than 75 acres. The proposed tract borders on extensive forests; is well adapted to the culture of grain; and can be purchased for 4 dollars per acre. Ch. Cour.

THE WYANDOTS. Negotiations have been in progress with the Wyandots for some months past for the sale of all their lands in Ohio to the United States, and then to emigrate to the west. By a vote of the male portion of the tribe, assembled by their chiefs and council, on the 22d of Nov. it was determined, without a division, to authorise the chiefs to enter into a treaty of cession and removal.

The tribe decided, however, by a majority of two votes, that the sum offered by the United States commissioner was too small. Colonel John Johnston, the United States commissioner, in a communication to the State Journal remarks—"thus it is virtually settled that the last tribe of the natives within the territory of Ohio, will soon be prepared to leave us, and take up their residence near to their former friends, the Shawnees and Delawares, southwest of Miami."

The Wyandots hold some of the fairest section of our state in the vicinity of Upper Sandusky, are mostly civilized, and elect their chiefs annually. The discussion on the subject of the proposed treaty was conducted with frankness and fairness, and with perfect good feeling. [Cleveland Herald.]

THE ARMY.

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 71.

Head quarters of the army, adj't gen's office.

Washington, Nov. 18, 1841.

The following addition to the general regulations for the army, received from the secretary of war, is published for the government of the army.

ARTICLE XLIII, paragraph 237. "But such detail must always be made by the officer appointing the court, and in no case can the authority to supply vacancies in a court martial be delegated to any other officer."

TOPOGRAPHICAL ENGINEERS. Captains A. Canfield and G. W. Hughes, and lieutenant R. M. McLane have returned from their visits to Europe.

Capt. C. Graham, under orders for a military reconnaissance, in the vicinity of New Orleans. Lieuts. J. E. Blake, and A. W. Whipple, ordered as assistants to Capt. Graham.

Capt. G. W. Hingles, ordered on survey in Louisiana. Lieutenants L. Stigreeves, I. W. Woodruff, and R. M. McLane, ordered as assistants to Captain Hingles.

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT. Capt. E. Harding, ordered to command of Allegheny arsenal. Cap. J. Williamson, to command of Charleston depot.

Lieut. G. H. Taleott, to command of Augusta, Ga. arsenal.

Lieut. J. M. Morgan, to command of Mount Vernon, Ala. arsenal.

Lieut. A. B. Dyer, to Watervliet arsenal.

[J. & A. Chron.]

LATE FLORIDA NEWS has been received at Savannah, Ga. Black Haulin who was sent recently into the interior to confer with his band, had returned to Pitaka, bringing with him 17 warriors. At Tampa the balance of Neathucke Enathla's and of Tigitari's people were coming in slowly. They were much scattered and could not be found by the runners with-out much trouble.

A letter from Indian Key, in the Norfolk Herald of Saturday, dated the 12th announces the sailing of the great expedition through the everglades, the schooners at Indian Key were to join on the 15th, at Fort Dallas. Dr. E. McKinley of the schooner Otsego, had died of congestive fever.

FORT MIFLIN. The troops ordered to garrison Fort Miflin, have arrived at their quarters. They number in all, including the staff, seventy men. The officers and their families have taken up their abode in the fort, which has since assumed quite a cheerful aspect.

THE NAVY.

COURT MARTIAL. We learn from the Army and Navy Chronicle, that the court martial to meet at Philadelphia on the 13th inst. for the trial of Capt. Bolton, and such other officers as may be brought before it, consists of commodore Jacob Jones, president. Commodores John Downes, Henry E. Hall, and E. E. Kennedy, John B. Nicholson, W. B. Shubrick and Capt. Daniel Turner, members. Charles H. Winder, esq. of Baltimore, judge advocate.

HOME SQUADRON: Active preparations are in progress for getting this squadron ready for sea. Commodore Stewart will hoist his broad pendant on board the Independence. By reference to our navy head, it will be seen that captain F. A. Parker has been ordered to the command of the frigate Columbia, and captain J. Gallagher to the command of the razer Independence. Several other officers have also been ordered to the different vessels, but we prefer waiting, as usual, until the lists are complete, before we publish them. No commanders for the steam ships have yet been designated.

The Army and Navy Chronicle states that it is in contemplation to increase the number of naval rendezvous. Portland, Me. will be one; commander J. S. Paine has been ordered thither as recruiting officer, and the brig Consort, under the command of Lieut. A. Lewis, will be employed as receiving vessel. New Orleans will be another. The ship Ontario will be sent thither.

STATES OF THE UNION.

A NEW STATE PROPOSED.

A communication has appeared in the National Intelligencer, over the signature of "A Member of Congress," proposing to divide the state of Tennessee into two states. The writer says he only wanted an opportunity to urge it upon congress, but prefers that the proposition should originate with the legislature of Tennessee. He proposes to call the new state "FRANKLAND."

NEW YORK.

THE SAFETY FUND.

From the Albany Evening Journal.

Comptroller's office, Albany, 24th Nov. 1841.

THROWLED WEBER, ESQ.

DEAR SIR: In answer to numerous enquiries in relation to the redemption of the bills of the Bank of Buffalo and Commercial bank of Buffalo, I send you for publication a statement showing the situation of the safety fund, and the provision of the laws appertaining to the subject. Very respectfully, your obedient servant, JOHN A. COLLIER.

Comptroller's office, Albany, 25th Nov. 1841.

Statement of the situation of the safety fund:

The amount of the capital remaining
30th September, 1841	$485,487 90
The advances from the treasury since that time to redeem safety fund bank notes	106,031 00
Balance of safety fund 24th Nov. 1841	$379,456 00
Under the provisions of the act of 26th May, 1841, the comptroller has given notice to the safety fund banks, that they will be required to pay 1 per cent. upon their capital, on the first day of January next, which would produce	158,776 24
And there will be due from several banks who have not yet paid their original contribution of 3 per cent. on first January next	31,175 00

Which would make the whole amount of safety fund $569,408 23
From which is to be deducted the 1 per cent. of the Bank of Buffalo, and Commercial bank of Buffalo, since suspended

3,000 00

Leaving the balance, 1st January, 1842 $566,408 23

The comptroller has no authority to redeem the bills of a suspended bank until the chancellor makes the order required by the act of 8th of May, 1837, which provides that:

"It shall be lawful for the chancellor upon the certificate of one or more of the bank commissioners that the amount of the debts of such banking corporation, over and above its property and effects, will not exceed two-thirds of the amount of the bank fund then paid in and invested, exclusive of all prior establishments of the bank, to make an order upon the comptroller authorising him to take such measures as he may deem necessary for the immediate payment of the ordinary bank bills or notes of such banking corporation then in circulation, out of the bank fund then paid in and invested."

Upon filing a certified copy of the chancellor's order, under the seal of the office, and before the comptroller is authorised to make provision for the redemption of the bills, nor is there any authority, without such prior order, to receive the bills of a suspended bank in payment for bills, or other indebtedness at the treasury, which of course would be virtually redeeming them from the treasury, and make an order upon the comptroller authorising him to take such measures as he may deem necessary for the immediate payment of the ordinary bank bills or notes of such banking corporation then in circulation, out of the bank fund then paid in and invested."

In relation to the recent failures of the Bank of Buffalo and the Commercial bank of Buffalo, the bank commissioners were not able to give the required certificate, and the chancellor could therefore, make no order upon the comptroller, authorising him to redeem.

The safety fund, as the law now stands, is only to be replenished by the annual contribution of the banks of one-half per cent. upon their capital; and unless further legislative provision is made, the bills of the above banks cannot be redeemed from the safety fund, until the annual contributions so far replenish the fund as to enable the bank commissioners to give the required certificate to the chancellor, and he shall make the order.

JOHN A. COLLIER, comptroller.

PENNSYLVANIA.

THE INTEREST ON OUR DEBT. We have seen a letter from a high source at Harrisburg, which says—"It gives me pleasure to state the interest on our public debt, due Feb. 1, will be promptly paid without recourse to loans. The balance in the treasury this day, (Nov. 30), is $1,109,922; of which the sum of at least $750,900 is available. The two heaviest masses of the receipts are yet to come before interest is payable, and the receipts for said months, I think may be safely estimated at from $400,000 to $500,000. I am therefore of opinion, that the resources of the treasury will not only be sufficient to pay the interest, but that all the ordinary demands of our government will be likewise met."

But as guard against contingencies that might occur to injure the present prospect, the governor has made requisition upon the banks under the resolution of May 5, to make up any deficit, if such there should be. Under all these circumstances, there cannot for a moment remain a doubt as to the interest being punctually paid. [Birdsall's Rep.]

VIRGINIA.

The legislature of this state met on Monday, and was organized by the re-election, without opposition, of John W. Nash, as speaker of the senate, and W. V. Southall, (whip), speaker of the house of delegates; the latter guard against having been chosen by a majority of free votes over Joel Holliman, (opposition).

There was a remarkably full attendance of the members of the house, belonging to the house of delegates, only five of whom were absent—two whigs and three Van Buren men.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The hon. Richard Gantt, long known as law judge of this state, on the 30th inst. received a handsome letter from the legislature of the state, tendered his resignation of that office, which was accepted. In addition to some highly complimentary resolutions, one year's salary ($3,500) was appropriated for his use, to be paid him at the adjournment of the legislature.

ALABAMA.

LEGISLATURE. The paragraph which was extracted from a Pittsburg paper into our last number, stating that the legislature of this state had adjourned, proves to be incorrect.

ELECTION OF A UNITED STATES SENATOR. The Tuscaloosa flag of the Union, the 24th ult. says: "We stop the press to announce the result of the election to-day, the election being held on the 23d inst. United States senator, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Governor Clay."

MISSISSIPPI.

GOVERNOR MCNUTT, THE ELECTION AND THE STATE BONDS. Governor McNutt addressed the following letter to the editor of the Richmond Enquirer, accompanied with copies of his letter to the European bankers, Hope & Co. which correspondence may be found on page 388 of the National Register, vol. X. Jackson, (Miss.) Nov. 10, 1841.

To the editors of the Richmond Enquirer:

Sir. The election for state and county officers took place in this state on the first and second days of this month. The result is known here, and all the counties have been heard from except six. The anti-bond ticket has succeeded by an average majority near three thousand votes. Tilghman M. Tucker is elected governor; William McKendree, Gwin and Jacob Thompson representatives in congress; Augustus B. Saunders auditor of public accounts; Richard S. Graves, state treasurer; and John D. Freeman, attorney general. These gentlemen are all democrats. We have probably lost our secretary of state by running two candidates, (Woodwards and Williams.)

The legislature will consist of twenty-one or twenty-two anti-bondmen in the senate; and from fifty-eight to sixty-two representatives in the house. The bondmen will have from ten to eleven senators, and from thirty-six to forty representatives. It is quite certain that the anti-bondmen will have a majority of two-thirds in each branch of the legislature. This result will astonish many persons abroad, who are ignorant of the grounds on which the state rests the payment of the five millions of dollars in state bonds delivered to the Mississippi Union Bank, and negotiated by that institution. I send you a copy of my letter to Hope & Co. and request you to publish the same in the Enquirer. Our Senator, Robert J. Walker, and our representatives, Gwin and Thompson, sustain me in the positions I have taken. A demand will probably be made on the government of the United States for the payment of the bonds referred to. This will raise an exciting and perplexing question. The state has defined her position, and I will maintain it, be the consequences what they may. I firmly believe that five-fourths of the people of this state prefer going to war to paying the bonds.

The whig candidates for governor and members of the legislature generally pledged themselves to oppose any bill intended to tax the people, to pay either the principal or interest of those bonds. But for this and national politics, the state would have been almost unanimous in opposing the payment of the bonds.

The Mississippi Union Bank is hopelessly insolvent, and has made an assignment of all her effects to her president, (Elliot), cashier, (Clopton), and attorney, (Scott). This was done for the benefit of all her creditors, and to save the wreck of her fortunes. Her assets were in the federal court for about $300,000. Her circulation is near two millions two hundred thousand dollars. She gives each assignee $1,000 per annum, in specie or its equivalent. With good management, her circulation may eventually be paid. The whole stock is sunk. Her paper is now selling at thirty-five cents to the dollar.

I have been a subscriber to your paper for more than twenty years. I am a native of Virginia. I am not now, nor never have been, a stockholder or debtor of the Mississippi Union Bank. I never requested it to loan money to myself or friends. As senator I voted against its charter, and have always opposed pledging the faith of the state for banking purposes. At the risk of my life and political aspirations I prevented the sale of ten and a half millions of bonds authorized by the act signed by Gwin to the Union Bank. I TRUE. I SIGNED AS GOVERNOR THE CHARTER OF THE BANK. I DID SO IN OBEDIENCE TO THE PUBLIC WILL. I WARNED the people of the evil consequences of engaging the state as security for reckless speculators. The action of this state, I earnestly hope, will forever destroy the ruinous system of borrowing money abroad to be wasted in banking and visionary systems of internal improvement. Yours, truly,

A. G. MCNUTT.

ELECTION. Parties in the legislature it is said will stand.

	Senate.	House.	Total.
Van Buren	21	61	82
Whigs	10	41	51

Majorities, 11 20 31

All of the Van Buren, and it is said three of the whigs are against paying state bonds.

TENNESSEE.

SENATORS. The Nashville Banner of the 23d ult. states that Mr. Speaker Turvey announced in the senate of Tennessee, on the previous day, his determination to bring on the senatorial election, and moved to take up his resolution to elect a senator to congress for six years; but at the request of gentlemen, who remarked that several senators were not in their seats, Turvey moved to lay on the table for one day. He said he might disappoint his political friends in the senate by taking this step; but he represented a whig district; his constituents had been kind to him—and besides, he believed it was right to bring on the election. He also introduced a bill, providing that the two houses should hereafter meet in convention—as they have always hitherto—by resolution—to elect senators to congress, whenever such elections are to be had.

OHIO.

CINCINNATI PUBLIC SCHOOLS. The trustees and visitors made reports in 1830, '33, '34, '36, and in June annually, for 1838, '39 and '40. And the same for 1841.

Tuition fund. Receipts were $2,716 17 of which $4,501 75 was the balance left of the preceding year.

$1247 90 was received from the city, $4,452 20 was in taxes for 1840, and $4,500 00 was the city's proportion of $200,000 appropriated to school purposes by the state. The expenditures for the same period amounted to $20,175 13, leaving a balance in the treasury June 30th, 1841, of $8,571 04.

Building fund. Balance of preceding year $8,238 11, receipts $7,026 13, total $15,264 24. Expenditures $8,493 71, leaving balance in treasury of $6,770 53.

The annual abstract of the schools for the present year shows that there are of male teachers 20; female teachers 49; total teachers 69. Number of pupils enrolled 6,681; pupils withdrawn 2,593; pupils remaining 3,488; pupils in daily attendance 2,711.

The number of male and female pupils attending the schools is about equally divided.

The schools are so organized that the pupils of each sex are generally taught in separate apartments.

They also have their respective play grounds, which are divided by substantial walls or fences.

Statement of moneys received for tuition purposes from 1829 to 1840, showing the amount received for each year, the amount expended, and the balance remaining at the close of each year; also the number of teachers employed, and the number of pupils enrolled each year.

Years.	Received.	Expended.	Balance remaining.	Number of teachers.	No. pupils enrolled.
1829	$10,391 40 (including balance of 1828.)	$5,590 32	$5,401 08
1830	7,167 63	8,115 92	4,453 20	22	2103
1831	8,067 07	8,111 09	4,502 88	25	2300

1839	22,812 92	20,797 21	4,501 67	61	4480
1840	25,245 10	20,175 13	9,571 04	63	6121

*$1,217 24 of this sum was used this year for other city purposes, and returned by the city—which is included in the amount of 1840.

Prior to 1834, pupils were received at 4 years of age; since that time, from 4 to 6 years of age. By this change in the law, many pupils were excluded from the schools that year, who had previously been enrolled before.

The board of examiners and inspectors of common schools report that the close of the annual examinations, in which the schools have removed all doubt as to their actual condition, and have attained a state that may have been felt for their future prospects.—The state of the times—necessary changes of teachers, either by the introduction of new ones, or the transfer of old ones to new locations—the unusual falling off of pupils of older classes from causes unconnected with the schools, as well as the want of regularity of attendance of those remaining—all these facts had prepared the board of examiners to anticipate a decided falling back from the high standard which the schools have hitherto maintained. The board are gratified, however, to be able to say, that their apprehensions in this respect, have been most agreeably disappointed—that the children, on the whole, never appeared better—the teachers never more earnest; nor both, in better apparent spirit to realize all that a sound philanthropy could expect from these most interesting and important institutions of the public bounty.

There are several matters, however, in the economy of the schools which, in the progress of the examination, have attracted the attention of the board, and upon which they would offer a few suggestions.

1st. Teachers should be transferred from old to new rooms, only in cases of the clearest necessity.

2d. In some of the rooms, indeed in all of them, to a certain degree, the system of ventilation is imperfect.

3d. Four hours' confinement, at one session, is, in the opinion of the examiners, entirely and even worse than unwise, positively hurtful, if not cruel. The number of hours should be less thought about, than the exact time that should be found, by experience, to be best adapted to the cheerfulness, as well as fullest, development of the capacities of children, in given courses of study and at given ages.

4th. The number of pupils to a teacher is entirely too great in many of the rooms.

5th. Discipline is quite too imperfect in regard to regularity of attendance, or statedness, in this particular, there seems to be no discipline at all.

6th. The examiners cannot estimate too highly the importance of periodical examinations.

7th. The attention of the public, especially of parents, is, as the examiners conceive, of the greatest importance to the examining and to the schools. Their countenance is expected, and their aid demanded.

8th. The examiners could with no propriety discriminate in their estimation of the schools. It is sufficient for their present purpose, without pledging themselves to any rule for the future in this regard, that no school has fallen behind just expectation whether it be a German or a native school. They, however, feel that they do no violence to the principle of non-discrimination, when they mention with particular and deep interest the signal success of the schools for the benefit our German population. The provision for these schools has been singularly wise; not wiser, however, than the election of teachers has been. They have been selected for their talent and patriotic purpose, of raising up, in our midst, a people of singular capacity and hope, to aid a true American population, as a part of it, in developing and sustaining the great principles of republican liberty. Our German friends, in this respect, are entitled to our warmest greetings and our deepest sympathies. They are to be assisted, and their efforts are to be for them, to accommodate themselves to institutions, which we shall hope, may be unchangeable, unless for the better, in all coming time; and for us, to bid them God speed, in that progress of intelligence in our literature, our customs and peculiar politics, that shall make them one with us in the great work of moral growth, political advancement, and true Christian civilization.

The standing committee on common schools, from the city council, report that in pursuance of the act of the state, passed March 19, 1841, the trustees and visitors have, during the last year, established two German English schools, with live teachers. In devising a system of instruction, and in the management and conducting these schools, the trustees have encountered many difficulties. The undertaking being entirely new, it is natural to suppose that embarrassments would present themselves in adopting a system on which these schools should be established and permanently conducted. The plans adopted and hitherto pursued, are considered by the trustees to be the best, more than as a system to be permanently adhered to. In these we find nothing to condemn and much to approve; and we are of opinion, that the trustees are pursuing the right course in order to discover the best method of carrying into effect the designs of the legislature.

The trustees have also, in pursuance of the provisions of said law, established three evening schools during the past year. These schools are designed for the special benefit of young men, over twelve years of age, who, by their occupations through the day, are debarred the privilege of attending the day schools. It is painful to learn, that these schools have to a great extent failed of accomplishing the benevolent designs which led to their establishment. The young persons, for whose benefit they were established, have generally neglected to attend them; and the committee unite with the trustees in recommending, that the evening schools be hereafter confined to the winter season, when the evenings are longer, and the labors of the day generally less fatiguing than at other seasons. They would also strongly recommend that an appeal be made to such young men, and also to their parents and guardians, urging them to avail themselves of these opportunities for improvement, generally, and for the last time, before entering upon the active duties of life.

The city is divided into 14 school districts.

THE MUSKINGUM IMPROVEMENTS. The Zanesville papers will notice the completion of the improvements on the Muskingum river. Steamboats have been plying for several days from Zanesville to Marietta and Pittsburgh, and the Gazette states the departure of the Muskingum for Cincinnati.

COLORADO CONVENTION AND COLONY PROPOSED. On the 23d October, a meeting of colored persons met at Warren, Trumbull county, Ohio, at which it was resolved that the interest of colored persons would be promoted by forming a settlement at some point where land is cheap, and the laws not oppressive. It was also recommended that a convention of colored persons from Ohio and the adjoining states be held at Massillon on the 1st day of December next, to consult on the subject.

INDIANA.

PUBLIC DEBT. The Louisville Journal gives an interesting account of the financial condition of Indiana, which we have condensed below.

The public debt of this state exceeds $14,000,000 and it was contracted as follows:

1832, for the Wabash and Erie canal	$100,000 00
1834, for the stock to subscribe for state bank	500,000 00
1835, for the Wabash and Erie canal	605,257 42
1836, for the state bank	390,000 00
1836, for the Wabash and Erie canal	241,742 58
1836, for the general internal improvement system	850,000 00
1836, for the Lawrenceburg and Indianapolis rail road company	100,000 00
1837, for the Wabash and Erie canal	390,000 00
1837, for the general internal improvement system	1,650,000 00
1837, for the Lawrenceburg and Indiana rail road company	121,000 00
1838, for the general internal improvement system	1,800,000 00
1839, for the Wabash and Erie canal	400,000 00
1839, for the general internal improvement system	1,632,000 00
1839, for the state bank	1,000,000 00
1839, for the state bank, instead of fourth instalment of surplus revenue, which was to have been invested in state bank stock	294,000 00
1839, for the Indianapolis and Madison real road company	455,000 00
1840, for the amount advanced by the state bank on the public works	629,453 00
1841, for the treasury notes issued to contractors of public works	1,500,000 00
Making	$13,148,453 00

to which must be added the bonds hypothecated last winter for money to pay the January interest, and forfeited, also the July interest which is unpaid, and the interest on treasury notes, and the total is more than $15,000,000, exclusive of the three instalments of surplus revenue. We have also omitted the Wabash and Erie canal scrip issued to carry on that work, now, for nearly two years, receivable for debts due that fund for canal lands sold and for lands yet to be sold.

In negotiating the above loans moreover, the receipts of the state have fallen more than $3,000,000 below her obligations. This has resulted from the practice of selling bonds on credit, and the failure of the purchasers to pay. Upon these purchases the state has now a claim to the amount of about $3,000,000, which it is not expected will be realized in any considerable degree.

The utmost the state can now hope from these claims is that the parties, so long as they fail to pay the principal of their debt, should pay the interest on the bonds they have received. This will exempt the state at present from the payment of the interest on, say—

The dividend received from the bank stock, about 8 per cent. may pay the interest on the bonds contracted for stock	$3,000,000
The amount advanced to the state on the fourth instalment	$1,390,000
And the amount advanced on the public works	294,000
	629,453
	2,313,453
The Lawrenceburg and Indianapolis rail road company pays interest on the money they received	321,000
The Madison rail road company pays interest on the money they received	455,000
	58,989,453
which deducted from the total debt of the state, leaves about $8,000,000, on which the interest is otherwise to be provided for.
Of this sum, $6,500,000 is at the rate of at least 5 per cent.	$325,000 which is the sum that must be annually raised for interest alone. The expenses of the state government are about $100,000 per annum.
$1,500,000 of treasury notes, 6's.	90,000

The question now arises, what has been done with the money actually derived from the sale of the state bonds. We answer, it has been disbursed in the construction of works of internal improvement throughout the state, projected so as to extend altogether fourteen hundred miles.

The most expensive of these works is the Wabash and Erie canal, which was commenced in 1832. But in the session of the legislature of 1835—'6, the system of internal improvement was adopted. The bill passed providing for the construction of twelve public works, rail roads, canals, and turnpikes, in addition to the Wabash and Erie canal. In the following spring they were commenced simultaneously. Ever different points of the same work were begun at once. The estimate for them all was about eighteen millions—the law appropriated ten.

In the fall of 1839, the purchasers of the state bonds having failed to pay, and the credit of the state being no longer available, the whole system of state public expenditures amounted to about seven millions, and it was then estimated that the total cost of the works, if completed, would be about twenty-three millions. Such was the undertaking of a state whose whole taxable property, at the time the system bill passed, did not exceed, according to the actual returns, more than forty-seven millions, and such was the result. The policy of constructing the works, and parts of works simultaneously, was so well pursued, that no considerable portion of any work was completed or fit for use. "Twenty miles of the Madison rail road, thirty miles of the White Water canal, were the principal works in progress on the bond made ready—the system lay in fragments throughout a state, whose vast territory of wood land was, as yet, but slightly interspersed with patches of cultivation. There lies the system still—its unfinished excavations and embankments, locks, culverts, aqueducts, and bridges—standing to ruin. The income insufficient to pay the expenses of production and repair. The Wabash and Erie canal may be ready for navigation next fall, but conceding as much revenue to the work as was derived from similar portions of the Ohio canal, it will not yield in five years more than expenses and repairs.

In order to meet the payment of the interest on this debt, a revenue law was passed last year, levying a tax of fifty cents per one hundred dollars of taxable property, and a poll tax of seventy-five cents. Let us examine into its operation.

"The state of Indiana contains about twenty-one millions of acres. But little more than fifteen millions is held by private proprietors, the residue chiefly by the United States. There are, however, only seven millions as yet taxable; the land sold for the first five years not being subject to taxation. Of this, eleven millions, and more than one-fourth is as yet cultivated—the rest being still covered with the primitive forest. This estimate is conjectural; but the allowance of the former is ample. In some of the oldest counties on the river, it is computed that the improved land does not exceed forty per cent. But allowing the total cultivated soil in the state to amount to three millions of acres, it will be seen that little surplus can be produced beyond the necessities of the population. According to the late census, the total number of people in the state amounts to nearly 680,000. Allowing 150,000 of these to be holders of land bought of congress within the last five years and consequently exempt from taxation, there will remain five hundred and thirty thousand acres before any thing can be applied to public purposes. This is little more than five acres and a half to each person. Certainly this is a small allowance. The land could not be rented for more than two dollars and a half per acre per annum, which would amount to less than four hundred dollars per head. It is the labor of about one person in five of this population, on its soil, that sustains the community. Indiana has no commercial thoroughfares or large cities, by which she can make the commerce of other states tributary, nor has she any manufactures of sufficient consequence. She is not very indebted to credit for capital for agriculture, for stock, and the various facilities of tillage. The total of her taxable property, including land, stock, merchandise, &c. at the assessment of the most prosperous times, was about one hundred and seven millions. This was in 1837 '38, and the subsequent change has diminished the assessment to nine and one millions. And this valuation of her property was made when that of Ohio was not assessed at as much by eight millions, although Ohio had more than double the population, and more than twice the age.

It may seem easy enough to half a million of people to raise as many dollars for taxes, in addition to the sum paid indirectly as duties to the general government. But as a tax on labor, on property, or on both, the state and general government demand of Indiana, more in proportion than is paid by the people of Great Britain; if we consider that she is assisted by machinery with the force of one hundred millions of men, and possess the accumulated capital of a thousand years.

In another aspect of the subject the weight of the existing burthens will be better understood.

In 1832, the people were in number about 400,000, and the owners of only six millions acres of land. In 1841, they received from foreign loans	$5,000,000
From three instalments surplus revenue	882,000
State bank loans over and above stock taken	2,000,000
200,000 emigrants, bringing $20 each,	4,000,000
	$14,882,000

Or an actual income of nearly $2,000,000 per annum.

Under that process purchases were made, debts contracted, and habits formed, which must now encounter the action of an order of things entirely reversed. Instead of income, it is today, a drain of property and labor—a fall—emigration about at an end, and credit gone.

Let us now consider the effect of the change. It is necessary to raise four hundred thousand dollars of taxes; but the two million yield is done. The present circulation of the state bank, which is nearly the whole circulation of the state, is about two millions, and three quarters. The taxes amount to nearly to one-fifth of the sum. This is all collected and taken to the seat of government, causing, whilst accumulating with the tax payer, the tax gatherer, and state treasurer, a pernicious contraction of the currency. The state is bound to pay interest on bonds, and drafts on the sea board, which are drawn on shipments of produce. This, then, is the effect, that a surplus of produce must be raised and transported to the Atlantic, sufficient to pay the tax of more than three hundred thousand dollars. This quantity of tax is sent to market, over and above that surplus which is exchanged for commodities."

But if a corresponding surplus were produced by the whole United States it would amount to twelve millions. And the question then will arise, can we find a market for this increased supply? And if a market be found, will not the forcing so large an increased supply upon it, thereby lower the price of it? Increased, perhaps the difficulty of providing for her wants by an increased production of her staples would not be so great. But it unfortunately happens that Illinois and Michigan, Ohio and Kentucky are placed in a precisely similar condition, and are all aiming to increase their exports, and for the same all the consequence is that the value of all their great staples is materially diminished. Pork has fallen to a mere fraction of its former value, and by increasing its production it will fall still lower.

It is well known to those who are familiar with the condition of the new states in the west, that the wealth of the laborer is almost inextinguishable. The hardy settler of Indiana has begun the world with little, and is looking to the future when the resources of the state shall be fully developed, for a remuneration of his toils.

When the fields become co-extensive with his power of tillage, and his stock co-extensive with the price of the laborer, the annual increase, no longer susceptible of further fruitfulness, is sold, and the per centage of profit in after years falls far short of the rate which had previously been produced on smaller capital, connected with the immediate labor and supervision of the proprietor. Whilst, therefore, the process of clearing and stocking is going on, every dollar of capital is exerting the most vital and prolific energy. Let taxation now intervene and intercept a portion of this capital—let it divert a head of stock or stalk of corn from the great work of reproduction, and there is a loss sustained, not only of the market value of the commodity, but of the annual pluing power, the prospective value of all its worth.

A tax that comes upon a farmer in this stage of progression, (and this is the present condition of Indiana), not only absorbs part of a scanty possession, but blights a valuable expectancy. It not only curtails the present sum of employment, but blights the most promising harvest of hope. A tax of five hundred thousand dollars, year after year, acting in this manner, is a tax of sterility, paralysis and despair. It rests like a shadow on the face of the earth, like a cloud on coming time.

Every different interest would be the effect on a long settled country. There, taxes are levied on the annual surplus, on the fund set apart for expenditure, and operate to diminish the indulgence of luxury. The people of the old states are comparatively rich. Poverty has been a pioneer of the new. If a strict valuation of property could be made, it would be found that the average wealth of citizens in the old states is more than double that of the new. Taxes in one case are levied on abundance, in the other on insufficiency.

ILLINOIS.

STATE NOTES. We learn from the Alton Telegraph, that Geo. White, a land commissioner, failed to procure from the assignees of Wright & Co. in London, the bonds belonging to Illinois, which were in their hands as its agents, for sale at the time of their failure.

THE CONTINENTAL ARMY.

This was the subject of the fifth lecture of the series recently delivered by Mr. Sparks before the New York Historical society. We subjoin a sketch of it.

Mr. Sparks commenced with a brief review of the causes which induced the colonies to resort to arms to resist the insupportable oppression which the British power had levied upon them. "The Massachusetts legislature, then sitting at Cambridge, made the first movement, and that too with sound of the British cannon at Boston. They raised a body of men called 'minute men,' to be ready for action at a minute's warning. Officers were appointed to command them, and they received all necessary supplies of arms, ammunition, &c. In Virginia about the same time, the people reorganised their independent companies, and had been in readiness against the Indians and French during the last war, and made Col. Washington their commander as one of their leaders. Patrick Henry was a captain of one of those companies.

Most of the other colonies soon after took measures to put themselves in a condition for defence, and prepared for a final appeal to arms. The experience of the British army had not previously served as officers in the British army, but were now enlisted as privates in the colonies, materially assisted their organization. After the battle of Lexington, the colonists flew to arms from all quarters. When the British troops found an asylum in Boston after their retreat from Lexington, the colonial militia concentrated in the neighboring towns, but were inefficient for want of a chief.

The legislature of Massachusetts then resolved to raise an army of 30,000 men, from the different New England colonies. Gen. Ward was placed at the head of those furnished from Massachusetts; Gen. Putnam commanded the militia of Connecticut, and Gen. Greene those from Rhode Island. The militia from New Hampshire consisted of no higher grade than colonel, but among them was Col. Stark, a host in himself. Gen. Ward was chosen the principal commander of this army. Most of the men were enlisted for one year, but some of them for a shorter time.

Congress was at this time in session at Philadelphia. The news of the battle of Lexington ran through the colonies with almost electric speed, and the details were soon laid before congress. They immediately resolved to put the country in an attitude of defence, and to raise an army, which was hailed with joy. The first step was to choose a commander-in-chief who should unite and have the confidence of all the colonies. A difficult and a great difficulty. Both New England and Virginia had great claims to the honor of furnishing the commander, and there were many strong reasons pointing to general Ward, of the latter, as the proper man to assume the responsible duties of the station. A greater difficulty than all this, however, presented itself. It was necessary that the selection should be one that would not excite the local jealousies of the middle and the southern colonies. The New England delegates in congress saw the state of feeling which existed, and with great magnanimity resolved to forego their own claim for the good of the country.

Accordingly John Adams made a motion in congress that the militia then assembled in Massachusetts be recognised as the continental army; and stated that it was his intention to propose one of their own body, from Virginia, as commander-in-chief. His remarks in reference to the gentlemen's qualifications, were so pointed as to be well understood as applying to Washington, who so understood it himself, and immediately withdrew from the house. The appointment was made the next day, when Washington was nominated by Thomas Johnson, of Maryland, who had long been his personal friend. The next day, on the 22nd ult., the house adjourned, and it was ascertained that Washington was unanimously elected! The house then adjourned till next day, when notice of the appointment was officially communicated to Washington, by the president, and he signified his acceptance in a short and appropriate reply. At the same time congress appointed four major generals and five brigadier generals. The major generals were Warren, Lee, Schuyler and Putnam.

Mr. Sparks, in speaking at large of the characters and general qualifications of the major generals, said, the fourth in command was Putnam—another name for bravery and generosity—a most excellent name for to execute the plan of others, but whose defects were so few, that the narrow scope of his habits of life, and easy good nature, rendered him less fit for the chief command in high and responsible situations. It is to be regretted, however, that recent attempts have been made to cast reflections on his bravery—attempts alike insinuating and gratuitous. "As brave as Putnam," is a proverb, which many have lisped in their infancy; to gainsay it would be like gaining the first lesson of our primers, and asserting that Solomon was not wise and Sampson not strong. The career of Putnam in the old French war is brilliant with acts of daring adventure and lofty courage—danger was a word unknown in his vocabulary—and his military talents, as testified by his conduct on the townbank, or the woodman's rifle. "Great applause." The news of the battle of Lexington was carried to him by a special messenger, who found Putnam literally at his plough. His spirit kindled instantly—the plough was left in the furrow—he changed his vesty gear for his old regimentals, and mounted on his favorite horse, and rode off to the wars, whose ardor he greatly enjoyed. He remained in active service till towards the close of the war, when his bodily infirmities compelled him to retire. A warmer heart—a purer patriot—and a braver man than Putnam never existed!

The brigadiers were Gates, of Virginia; Montgomery, of New York; Hest of Massachusetts; Sullivan, of New Hampshire; Greene, of Rhode Island. Next to Washington, the lecturer considered Gen. Greene the first of all the officers of the revolution. History had done him but partial justice.

The whole number of major generals during the war was 75; of brigadiers, 100; of colonels, 1,000; of the Great Britain, eight of France, five of Germany and other foreign countries, and the remainder of America. The general officers were appointed by congress, the colonels, &c. by the states.

Gen. Washington took command of the army at Cambridge, on the third of July, 1775. The American army numbered about 16,000 men, and the British army 14,000 regular troops. Soon, however, rifle companies from Pennsylvania, first, then Virginia, and afterwards others, were added to the continental army.

Mr. Sparks then alluded to the difficulties which Gen. Washington encountered during the campaign. Gen. Ward was retained by congress, although they had appointed a commander-in-chief. Their jealousy of entrusting to him the sole direction of the army impeded its operations. These difficulties were, however, slight in comparison with those experienced on the reorganization of the army when the time of enlistment expired, from the confusion produced by congress in relation thereto, but the habitual respect entertained by Washington for congress, led him to acquiesce cheerfully in all their decisions, although frequently in opposition to his own judgment.

Mr. Sparks gave it as his opinion that the purity of the patriotism of Washington's character were never fully appreciated, until the 22nd ult. The remarkable incident fully illustrates the character of that noble man. It was a remarkable proof of his modesty that the subjoined letter was never published during his life time, although copies of it were earnestly solicited. A council was held privately by some noble influence, ever present, and the delicate situation was discussed, and it was proposed to tell their views, and hopes and fears to Washington. One man, Colonel Nicola, was chosen to write a letter expressive of their views, which letter was to be sent to Washington, and in this it was stated that nothing short of a monarchical system could save the country from the anarchy and disasters which threatened it; and they proposed to Washington that such a system should be established, and that he should take the head of it, with the power and title of "king." In carrying out this plan, they promised Washington that he should have the support of the army, and of many men of influence and power.

Now mark the reply Washington made to this.—Here it is:—

To Colonel Lewis Nicola.

Newburg, 22nd May, 1782.

Sir: With a mixture of great surprise and astonishment, I was seized with attention the sentiments you have submitted to my perusal. Be assured, sir, no occurrence in the course of the war has given me more painful sensations, than your information of there being such ideas existing in the army, as you have expressed, and which I must view with abhorrence and reprehend with severity. For the present, the communication of them will rest in my own bosom, unless some further agitation of the matter shall make a disclosure necessary.

I am much at a loss to conceive what part of my conduct could have given encouragement to an address, which to me seems big with the greatest mischiefs that can befall my country. If I am not deceived in the motives of my self, you will find me have found a person to whom your schemes are more disagreeable.

At the same time, in justice to my own feelings, I must add, that no man possesses a more sincere wish to see ample justice done to the army than I do, and, as I am a lover of the truth, and in a constitutional way, extend, they shall be employed to the utmost of my abilities to effect it, should there be any occasion. Let me conjure you then, if you have any regard for your country, concern for yourself or posterity, or respect for me, to banish these thoughts from your mind, and never communicate, from now onwards, any more of the kind to any man like unto me. I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

This remarkable letter is a transcript from the first draft in Washington's hand writing. The following certificate is appended to it, and is also in the same hand writing, except the signatures, which are autographs of the signer.

"I, the undersigned, is an exact copy of a letter which we sealed and sent off to Colonel Nicola, at the request of the writer of it."

"D. HUMPHREYS, A. D. C.

"JOHNATHAN TRUMBULL, Jr. sec'y."

The jealousy of congress was also manifested in authorising Washington to raise such an army as he thought proper, and to send it out of the country. A motion was also made to limit the standing army to 5,000 men. Washington remarked that he would cheerfully support this measure, provided a law was passed saying that the country should never be invaded by more than 3,000 men.

The loss of the army, and the difficulties of the movements of the army after the evacuation of Boston, and of the retreat through New Jersey, where the army had dwindled down to 3,000. Congress was aroused to the necessity of greater exertion, and determined to raise a new army, consisting of 88 battalions, apportioned among the different states. The mode of enlistment was also noticed—the embarrassment which arose from enlisting some for the war and others for a period of three years, and the unfavorable effect of the large bounties offered to recruits. The average number of the army was 40,000, and the largest number under the immediate command of the army was 60,000.

Mr. Sparks then adverted to the complaints made by the officers of the army—their pecuniary distresses—the inadequacy of their pay—and to the successful exertions made by their commander to procure for them from congress, a pension for life. At the close of the war, however, five years' full pay was substituted for the above. The lecturer, after speaking of the manifold privations of the army, and instituting a contrast between their condition and that of the British troops, closed with an eloquent tribute to the patriotism and talents of Washington.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

At the abstract of Mr. Granger's remarks at the Young Men's meeting convention in western New York.

Mr. Granger commenced his remarks by saying that he had never before, in addressing his fellow citizens, felt called on to speak of himself—but on that occasion he felt bound to do so. He then took a rapid glance of the formation of the cabinet under General Harrison, and portrayed the character of that lamented patriot. After dwelling for a short time upon the death of President Harrison, and the accession of his successor, Mr. G. entered upon a short history of the legislation of congress, the action of the executive, and the causes which led to the solution of the executive veto, and the passage of the land bill, as an act of long deferred justice to the states—to the bankrupt act as one which would bring relief to thousands of the unfortunate—to the revenue bill as one due to the wants and interests of the country. Mr. G. then went on to state that no one subject had engaged so much of the public attention or had been so emphatically scaled with public reprobation, as the sub-treasury plan. That plan had been repeated amongst the first acts of the present congress, and its repeal implied an obligation upon the whig party to provide a substitute—that a bank bill had been passed by congress, and arrested by the action of the veto.

Much as he deprecated the use of the veto power, such were some of the features of that bill that although he did most deeply regret that the executive sanction was withheld from it, he did not feel that the president should be harshly censured for returning it to congress with his objections. A second bill, which was formed which it was supposed would fully meet his wishes. Indeed the public had been informed by high authority, which remains uncontradicted, that the second bank bill was presented to congress with the approbation of the president to its details. That bill was passed, and its fate was known to our country. Congress was about to adjourn the sub-treasury repealed, and the substitute offered by congress defeated by the executive. The purse and sword were still united in the power where the whig party had declared they should not remain. Here was sufficient cause for the withdrawal of members from the whig cabinet—it was well known that four of them did withdraw.

But there were other additional reasons which Mr. G. said would frankly state.

The contest of last year had not been waged upon these legislative questions only.

It had been boldly declared, and by himself amongst others, that long continued power in the hands of our adversaries, had led to corruption among the office holders, and to a most dangerous interference on their part in our political elections. Not that every officeholder was corrupt, but the different departments of government patronage and expenditures, required a general purification. The revolution of last year was not accomplished, and for the purpose of placing the executive officers at Washington in snug and comfortable places, while the horde of office holders throughout the country remained undisturbed. Their removal was as much desired by the people as was the change in the highest offices of the government. So perfectly was this understood, that it was due to our country to say that they did not intend, when removed, and justly laugh at us when we permitted them to remain.

Many removals and appointments were made during the congressional recess and before the death of Gen. Harrison, which were afterwards sent to the senate for confirmation, but since that period very few had been disturbed. The president had seen fit to retain in power almost the entire force of the Canadian department throughout the country, although the whig party had been loud in their assertions of corruption and fraud in the enormous expenditures there. Custom house officers were retained who were known to have been actively engaged in the political intrigues of the country. At the same time the offices of the post office department were under the control of the president, who had permitted but few changes. Under this state of things Mr. Granger had been forced to consider his duty to the principles he advocated and to himself personally. After the deepest reflection he could not doubt. He felt that if the executive power should continue to thwart the will of the people, as expressed through the ballot boxes, and through their representatives in congress; if bold political partisans were permitted to retain the places they had so long abused, to trample down whig principles, and if, after all this he remained in office, the whigs throughout the nation—yes, the whigs of all Ontario, by whose party he had been so often sustained, would believe that for the enjoyment of office he had bartered his and their principles, and that "Frank Granger was not the man they took him to be."

Although fully convinced of the course it was his duty to pursue, Mr. G. said he did not feel at liberty to withdraw from the duty of the whig delegation from this state, who gave their unanimous approval of his determination. Then he did resign, ready to go into the ranks, to sustain the whig party. Mr. Granger said that here he had a single word to say as much in justice to another as himself. It has been insinuated in public prints, and circulated in secret whispers, that the member of congress of this district had received his nomination with an understanding with Mr. Granger that, in a contingency like that which has arisen, his place was to be surrendered. This was a miserable calumny, without the slightest shadow of truth. Mr. Granger, who had been secured by a friend named as a candidate until informed of his nomination. He need not say how well the trust confided to him had been executed. But he would say, in justice to his own feelings, that, during the whole of the delicate and perplexing responsibilities growing out of his position in the government, and the surrender of his place, the constant counsel and advice of that gentleman had been most useful to him. Mr. G. said that, on his return, he met at Albany Mr. Greig's letter of resignation, which had been followed, by the representatives of the whigs of Ontario, by a nomination more grateful to his feelings than any other occurrence of his political life.

Mr. Granger then reviewed the position of the whig party of the nation, and particularly of this state. He said that our enemies had supposed that those who differed from the president were to wage war upon him, and thus produce a breach in our ranks. The proceedings of the state convention sorely had been disappointed, and he believed that illusion, and put matters upon the right ground.

Should the present administration carry out whig principles, it was entitled to the support of the whig party, and from no one would such a course receive a more hearty support than from him (Mr. G.) wherever he might be situated. There were several other considerations that improper officers would be reformed. He trusted the president would continue these reforms, in which it was the duty of good whigs to sustain him.

MR. BELL, OF TENNESSEE.

In pursuance of the preamble and resolutions adopted at a meeting of citizens of Nashville and Davidson county, on the 9th instant, preparatory to tendering a public dinner to and making suitable arrangements for the reception of the hon. JOHN BELL, the committee of invitation and correspondence, appointed by the chairman, addressed his reply, will be found below. The hour at which Mr. Bell arrived at home (about daylight on Saturday morning) prevented the committee appointed for that purpose from carrying into effect the arrangements contemplated for his reception.

Nashville, November 22, 1841.

DEAR SIR: In pursuance of the resolutions of a public meeting of your fellow citizens of Nashville and Davidson county, herewith communicated, we have the honor, on their behalf and in their name, to tender you the assurance of a hearty welcome to your home, and the compliment of a public dinner, before which, at such time as you will best suit your convenience.

Referring to the preamble annexed, as expressive of the feelings of your old friends and constituents on the political events of the last few months, as well as of the sentiments of unabated confidence and personal regard which they entertain for you, it is our duty to have the honor to subscribe ourselves, your obedient servants.

[Signed by S. V. D. Stout, Thos. Washington, J. P. Clark, G. M. Fogg, C. C. Norvell, John Trimble, A. V. S. Lindsey, W. O. Harris, committee.]

Hon JOHN BELL.

Nashville, November 22, 1841.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your letter of the 20th inst. in which you, in behalf of the whigs of Nashville and of Davidson county, tender me the honor of a public dinner, as a testimony of their unabated confidence and esteem.

Under all the circumstances attending my return home, this public manifestation of the undiminished attachment of so many of my earliest and most tried friends affords me the most sincere gratification.—The particular reasons assigned in the preamble and resolutions which accompanied your letter of invitation, for the tender of this regard at this time, and the delicate and flattering manner in which they have been communicated, yield indeed a still deeper sense of gratitude on my part, if that were possible.

I cannot be mistaken as to the motives and feelings which prompt those zealous and devoted friends, who desire to welcome my return among them by tendering me all the honors in their power to bestow. Their generous sympathies have been awakened by the reflection of my long and ardent services, and the sudden reverse in my fortune which, from a high and a respectable public station, dooms me to the seclusion and obscurity of private life. Their generous sentiments and conduct upon this occasion affect me extremely. I reciprocate, with all my heart, the warmth and cordiality of their attachment and respect; but I beg through you to assure those whom you represent, and who have shown so true a friendship in this critical period of my career, that during the whole term of my public service I never ceased to have in mind the various duties and reverses which it is the lot of a few to escape who devote themselves to public affairs; nor am I at all surprised at, or unprepared for, that which awaits me at present. My friends know that the prospect of reverses did not cause me to hesitate in my course, when, with a handful of devoted companions, I rallied to the standard of opposition in the palmy days of Jackson's power; nor did the prospect of exclusion from any public station in future deter me from my purpose of retiring from the one I recently held when I could no longer do effective or honorable service by continuing in it. In resigning office, whatever my private feelings may have been, my friends they could not, I did not make the slightest calculation upon being continued in the public service in a different branch of the government, and I so assured them at the time. I need not trouble you with the reasons for that conclusion. It will be sufficient upon this point to state, that I was then able, as I trust I am now, to do so, without any other consideration whatever lot or condition may be imposed upon me in a career of honorable ambition, whether by my friends or opponents. Without pretending indifference to the honors and distinction of public station, I can truly say that I return to the bosom of private life without regret—not dispirited, but with a full consciousness that I have by habits contracted in public employments. Within that humbler sphere, I am convinced, there is ample scope and verge for the exercise of every faculty of the mind, and the full gratification of regulated ambition.

I submit with cheerfulness to the distribution of the vacant posts of honor and trust which it is now understood the whigs of the legislature decreed at an early period of the session, and there should be any election. For the two gentlemen who, under all the circumstances, have been thought most deserving of this distinguished testimony of the respect and confidence of the state and of the whig party, and for every member of the party, I wish increase of days and of honors so long as they may be able to do so faithfully and to the satisfaction of the people and policy.

I shall be happy if, by my humble example in yielding a ready acquiescence in a decision which will very probably close my political career, I can contribute any thing to moderate the rage of disappointed expectants, and abate those rankling jealousies and hates springing from rival pretensions in the whig ranks, which I should be glad to see have been so effectually put to rest by habits contracted in public employments. Within that humbler sphere, I am convinced, there is ample scope and verge for the exercise of every faculty of the mind, and the full gratification of regulated ambition.

I envy neither the honor nor the responsibility of those who, at such times, are the choice of their party to fill the high stations in their gift, and to lead the van in the great battle which is to be fought, or again, the responsibility of the objects of the van, in a long contesting can be secured and settled upon a permanent foundation. For the sake of the country and the great interests at stake, I earnestly trust that they will be able to hear the whig banner triumphantly through the perils which now encompass it. Great as these perils are, I do not believe that the whigs of the United States, at a time and under circumstances which very naturally led to a general expectation among the whigs of other sections of the

Let it be remembered that all the particular committees were expected to come prepared at that meeting, with instructions from their respective delegations to cast their votes for the nomination of the vice president. I have no doubt that every one of them did come so prepared and instructed, excepting myself. The delegation from Virginia gave me no instruction excepting (as I understood) that the nomination would not be made on the first vote, and, intending in that case, to make its selection among the nominees who should be presented by the other delegations; or, if the nomination should be made by general consent on the first vote, to concur in it.

When the general committee proceeded to collect the votes for the nomination of the vice president, the states were called in the order in which they are generally called in the house of representatives of the United States. The committees from Maine and New Hampshire announced the votes of the delegations of those states; the votes of one were given for the nomination of Mr. Tyler; those of the other (I think but not positive) were given for some other gentleman. Massachusetts being next called, Mr. Ashmun announced the vote of the delegation of that state for me. Upon this, I said, in substance, that, considering the part I had borne in the convention, and especially in that all important general assembly being that of the convention, and the Virginia delegation, no one of whom had ever suggested my name for the vice presidency—if, under such circumstances, I should receive the nomination, it might be said, without truth indeed, but with enough verisimilitude to make the imputation probable, and therefore very distressing to my feelings, that I had procured the nomination for myself; that, in my opinion, my name, instead of giving any strength to the ticket, would probably weaken it, even in Virginia; and that I was resolved, for other reasons, that I would not accept any such nomination—I did not state those reasons, and, as the matter was then closed, I did not state them. I suggested to the committee from Massachusetts that it should return to its delegation, and suggest to them the propriety of changing their vote. That committee saw at once that I was sincere and decided, and, adopting my suggestion, immediately retired.

It soon appeared that my "deleacy" had been "overstated," but for a reason very different from what you, gentlemen, have supposed. The voting proceeded in the absence of the committee from Massachusetts. The several committees from the other delegations (that from Virginia excepted) acting under instructions given before I had said a word on the subject, and therefore uninfluenced by my declining the nomination, unanimously, in order as they were called, the votes of their respective delegations. Not another vote was given for me. A majority of the whole number of votes, and a large majority too, was given for the nomination of Mr. Tyler. The other votes were scattering. It was then suggested to the committees which had given no vote, declining the nomination, in order as the delegations, report the state of the vote whereby Mr. Tyler was already nominated, and propose that their votes should also be given for him. Those committees retired in pursuance of this suggestion, consulted their delegations, and, soon returning, gave their votes also for Mr. Tyler.

I then said that, as Mr. Tyler was a member of the Virginia delegation, and thought that delegation would best consult his feelings and his dignity by withholding their vote altogether, so that the nomination should be entirely the act of the other delegations. I did not take this course because I thought the Virginia delegation would hesitate to concur in the nomination, and that willingly and promptly. My real and my declared purpose was, now, that Mr. Tyler had received the nomination, to place him before the country on the most elevated ground on which he could stand.

The committee rose, and Governor Owen reported to the convention that Mr. Tyler had been nominated for the office of vice president by the unanimous voices of all the delegations, except the northern ones, which had not voted at all. And I then stated publicly, in the convention, the same reasons for withholding the vote of the Virginia delegation which I had declared in the committee; and this was done in such a manner as not to disparage Mr. Tyler by withholding the vote of the Virginia delegation, but to elevate him. In the delegation, the northern Virginia, of my conduct; and this, I am sure, was its effect; for which I appeal to every surviving member of the convention. The scene cannot have been forgotten.

Saying this, it is proper I should add, that Mr. Tyler would not have been my choice for the vice presidency, if the state of the vote for him had been such as to have left me a choice. My own wish was that Mr. Mangum, of North Carolina, should be nominated; or, if the vice president should be selected from Virginia, my vote would have been for the nomination of James Barbour. I expressed these sentiments to the few gentlemen with whom I had the opportunity of conversing on the subject. But I had no objection to Mr. Tyler as would have induced me to dissent from his nomination, when I found it agreeable to the sense of the delegations from the other states; and I think that this was the general sentiment, at the time, of the delegation from Virginia. I certainly acted under the impression that it was so.

I have not, any more than you, approved the conduct of Mr. Tyler since his translation to the presidency, in consequence of the death of General Harrison; yet I would not, therefore, have him disparaged by an erroneous view of the facts attending his nomination; much more, by my silence as to those facts.

I perfectly true, as you suppose, that when Mr. Tyler was nominated for "vice president" by the Harrisburg convention, neither that body, nor, I believe, any one member of it, looked to the contingency of his becoming president of the United States by the death of General Harrison—I acknowledge myself, that the military event never entered my mind. I doubt very much whether, in any election since the amendment of the constitution of the United States touching the manner of electing the president and vice president, the vice president has ever been selected with any view to the contingency of his becoming president in consequence of the death of the president elected by the people.

Richmond, Dec. 3, 1841. B. W. LEIGH.
The Madisonian of the 7th in reference to the subject says: "After repeatedly asking the question, 'who nominated John Tyler for vice president?' and referring to the editor of the paper for the answer, I was at length drawn forth a reply from a prominent member of the Harrisburg convention—the hon. Benjamin Watkins Leigh."

"We did not put the 'question' without an object, nor cease to repeat it till we have gained an end—and one end will lead to other objects and ulterior objects. For the present, we have no occasion to comment upon the card of the hon. Mr. Leigh; when we do, we shall 'speak by the card.' The regard for truth and candor evinced in his communication does great credit to his character."

Noticing the card which follows, the Richmond Whig of the 4th inst. says: "Mr. Leigh's card will attract attention. The editor who has published it, while he, in appearance, not in effect, contraverts, made it upon the authority of a member of the convention. That editor believes, that from his delicacy and other causes, Mr. Leigh knew less of what passed in the under-currents at Harrisburg than any other member of the body. I doubt not, but he is accurate so far as his knowledge now believes, but he is not a man to know much of under-currents. He may or may not, take this as a compliment. We re-assert that Tallmadge was first choice—Leigh next—then Mangum—then Bell—and that Tyler was taken up when the others could not be persuaded. The editor's letter is later than the statement of the Ohio paper—edited by a brother-in-law of Mr. Tyler—that the whigs of the United States had demanded and dictated his nomination. That fact is assuredly false, and that conceded to us, we are indifferent to all the rest."

Mr. Leigh's observations are mainly confined to what passed under his own eye, in the "grand committee." See the statement by a member of the committee from New York as to what passed elsewhere and prior to the action of the "grand committee."

To the editors of the Courier & Enquirer. In your reply to the inquiry of the Madisonian, relating to nomination of John Tyler as the whig candidate for vice president, you have fallen into two or three errors which I ask leave to correct. It is true, as you say, that the nomination for vice president was tendered to Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, whose delegation, most unfortunately for the republic, declined it. Mr. Bell, of Tennessee, was not represented in the convention, we could find no delegate from the south authorised or willing to vote for Mr. Bell's acceptance of the office. Mr. Preston was then proposed, but South Carolina, at least so far as the whig convention was concerned, was out of the mind, and as the other southern delegates approved of the suggestion, Mr. P. was dropped. We then made a dash at North Carolina, whose strong, full, wholehearted whig delegates were in the convention. The choice was left to her delegates, and they designated the late Governor Owen, who was present, and for reasons too humble to his delicacy as a gentleman, and to his hostility to a whig, declined the nomination.

"These efforts to secure the nomination of some tried, staunch, distinguished whig, came from the delegates who had opposed the nomination of Mr. Clay for president. Their object, after the election of Clay, was to strengthen the party. But failing to unite in convention upon some distinguished friend of Mr. Clay as vice president, the question was referred to the "Grand Committee," consisting of three delegates from each state. In that committee, Messrs. Crittenden, Bell, Freslon and Owen, having declared in favor of Mr. Tyler, Messrs. Massachusetts, nominated Benjamin Watkins Leigh, who, (he being a member of the committee), rose and declined. Mr. Tyler was then brought forward and subsequently nominated. You will see, therefore, that Mr. Tyler was eminently indebted to a series of accidents for his elevation to the presidency.

"I ought to add that but for the fact that Mr. Porter, a delegate from Dutchess, produced a letter from the hon. N. P. Tallmadge, declining to be a candidate, and that Mr. Porter, in consequence, and consequently now have been our president."

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

To the senate and house of representatives of the United States:

In coming together, fellow citizens, to enter again upon the discharge of the duties with which the people have charged us, several, we find great occasion to rejoice in the general prosperity of the country. We are in the enjoyment of all the blessings of civil and religious liberty, with unexampled means of education, knowledge and improvement. Through the year which is now drawing to a close, peace has been in our bosom, and no calamities, save the occasional, though disease has visited some few portions of the land with distress and mortality, yet in general the health of the people has been preserved, and we are all called upon, by the highest obligations of duty, to renew our thanks and our devotion to our Heavenly Parent, who has continued to visit us with his eminent blessings which surround us, and who so signally crowned the year with his goodness. If we find ourselves increasing, beyond example, in numbers, in strength, in wealth, in knowledge, in every thing which promotes human and social happiness, let us ever remember our dependence, for all these, on the protection and merciful dispensations of Divine Providence.

[FOREIGN RELATIONS.—GREAT BRITAIN.] [The McLeod case.] Since your last adjournment, Alexander McLeod, a British subject, who was indicted for the murder of an American citizen, and whose case has been the subject of a correspondence heretofore communicated to you, has been acquitted by the verdict of an impartial and intelligent jury, and has, under the judgment of the court, been regularly discharged.

Great Britain having made known to this government that the expedition which was fitted out from Canada for the destruction of the steamboat Caroline, and which case has been the subject of a correspondence heretofore communicated to you, and in the death of an American citizen, was undertaken by orders emanating from the authorities of the British government, in Canada, and demanding the discharge of McLeod upon the ground that, if engaged in that expedition, he did not fulfil the orders of his government, has thus been answered in the only way in which she could be answered by a government, the powers of which are distributed among its several departments by the fundamental law. Happily for the people of Great Britain, as well as those of the United States, the only mode by which an individual citizen, by a criminal offence, before the courts of either, can obtain his discharge, is by the independent action of the judiciary, and by proceedings equally familiar to the courts of both countries.

If in Great Britain a power exists in the crown to cause to be entered a notte prosequi, which is not the case with the executive power of the United States upon a prosecution commenced in a state court, yet there, not more than here, can the chief executive power rescue a prisoner from custody without an order of the proper tribunal directing his discharge.—The precise stage of the proceedings at which such order may be made, is a matter of municipal regulation exclusively, and not of international law.

In cases of this kind, a government becomes politically responsible only, when its tribunals of last resort are shown to have rendered unjust and injurious judgments in matters not doubtful. To the establishment and elucidation of this principle, no nation has lent more ready aid, than the recently formed Government of Great Britain, Alexander McLeod having his option either to prosecute a writ of error from the decision of the supreme court of New York, which had been rendered upon his application for a discharge, to the supreme court of the United States, or to submit his case to the arbitration of a friendly power. Great Britain has shown the readiest mode of obtaining his liberation, and the result has fully sustained the wisdom of his choice. The manner in which the issue submitted was tried, will satisfy the English government that the principles of justice will never fail to govern the judgment of the arbitrators, and that the removal of a national claim, however, to suggest to congress the propriety, and, in some degree, the necessity, of making such provisions by law, so far as they may constitutionally do so, for the removal at their commencement, and at the option of the party, of all such cases as may hereafter arise, and which may involve the faithful observance and execution of our international obligations, from the state to the federal judiciary. This government, by our institutions, is charged with the maintenance of peace and the preservation of amicable relations with the nations of the earth, and ought to employ all the means of reasonable and proper means of maintaining the one and preserving the other. Whilst just confidence is felt in the judiciary of the states, yet this government ought to be competent in itself for the fulfillment of the high duties which have been devolved upon it under the organic laws of the state and the federal government.

[The Grogan affair.] In the month of September, a party of armed men from Upper Canada invaded the territory of the United States, and forcibly seized upon the person of one Grogan, and, under circumstances of great harshness, hurriedly carried him beyond the limits of the United States, and delivered him up to the authorities of Upper Canada.—His immediate discharge was ordered by those authorities, upon the facts of the case being brought to their knowledge—a course of procedure which was not to have been expected from a nation which professes to be governed by the laws of justice, and to be bound to the rights of the United States, than to its own regard for justice. The correspondence which passed between the department of state, and the British envoy, Mr. Fox, and with the governor of Vermont, as soon as the facts had been made known to this department, and the correspondence which followed, has been published.

[The affair of the Caroline.] I regret that it is not in my power to make known to you an equally satisfactory conclusion in the case of the Caroline steamer, with the circumstances connected with the destruction of which, in December, 1837, by an armed force fired on in the river, you were made acquainted. You are already acquainted. No such statement as was due for the public wrong done to the United States by this invasion of her territory, so wholly irreconcilable with her rights as an independent power, has yet been made. In the view taken by this government, the inquiry whether the vessel was lawfully employed in the service of transporting an unauthorised war against that province, or was engaged by the owner in the business of transporting passengers to and from Navy Island in hopes of private gain, which was most probably the case, in no degree alters the real question at issue between the two governments. The government can never concede to any foreign government the power, except in a case of the most urgent and extreme necessity, of invading its territory, either to arrest the persons or destroy the property of those who may have violated the municipal laws of such foreign government, or to hinder the execution of the laws existing under the law of nations. The territory of the United States must be regarded as sacredly secure against all such invasions, until they shall voluntarily acknowledge their inability to acquit themselves of their duties to others. And in announcing this sentiment, I do but affirm a principle which no nation on earth would be more ready to violate, at all hazards, than the people and government of Great Britain.

If, upon a full investigation of all the facts, it shall appear that the owner of the Caroline was governed by a hostile intent, or had made common cause with those who were in the occupancy of Navy Island, then, so far as he is concerned, there can be no claim to the judiciary for the redress of the wrong done. This government would feel itself bound to prosecute—since he would have acted not only in derogation of the rights of Great Britain, but in clear violation of the laws of the United States; but that is a question which, however settled, in no manner involves the higher consideration of the violation of the law of sovereignty and jurisdiction. To recognise it as an admissible practice that each government, in its turn, upon any sudden and unauthorised out-break, which, on a frontier, the extent of which renders it impossible for either to have an efficient force on every mile of the frontier, and therefore, can never be able to suppress in a day, may take vengeance into its own hands, and without even a restraining, and in the absence of any pressing or overruling necessity, may invade the territory of the other, would inevitably lead to results equally to be deplored by both. The right of redress, in such a case, must, therefore, be made on the authority of either government, or to be made on the authority of either government, general war must be the inevitable result. While it is the ardent desire of the United States to cultivate the relations of peace with all nations, and to fulfil all the duties of good neighborhood towards those with whom we have dealings, and to maintain the order and tranquillity which we desire, we would lead them to deny the right of any foreign power to invade their boundary with an armed force. The correspondence between the two governments on this subject, will, at a future day of your session, be submitted to your consideration; and in the meantime, I cannot but indulge the hope that the British government will see the propriety of renouncing, as a rule of future action, the precedent which has been set in the affair at Schlosser.

[Correspondence respecting the right of search.—The slave trade.] I herewith submit the correspondence which has recently taken place between the American minister at the court of St. James, Mr. Stevenson, and the minister of foreign affairs of that government, on the right claimed by that government to visit and detain vessels sailing under the American flag and engaged in the prohibited slave trade in the African trade.

One commercial interest in that region have experienced considerable increase, and have become an object of much importance, and it is the duty of this government to protect them against all improper and vexatious interruption. However desirous the United States may be for the suppression of the slave trade, they cannot consent to interpolations into the maritime code, at the mere will and pleasure of other governments. We deny the right of any such interpolation to any one, or all the nations of the earth, without our consent. We claim to have a voice in all questions of international law, and we are, therefore, to understand, as in this instance, by a foreign government, that its treaties with other nations cannot be executed without the establishment and enforcement of new principles of maritime police, to be applied without our consent, we must employ a language neither of equivocal implication, or susceptible of misconstruction. American citizens prosecuting a lawful commerce in the African seas, under the flag of their country, are not responsible for the abuse or unlawful use of that flag by others; nor can they rightfully on account of any such alleged abuses, be interrupted, molested or detained while on ocean voyages, or while engaged in the African trade, pursuing honest voyages in the usual way, and violating no law themselves, they are unquestionably entitled to indemnity. This government has manifested its repugnance to the slave trade, in a manner which cannot be misunderstood. By its fundamental law, it prescribed limits in point of time to the continuance of the slave trade, and it might so far forget the rights of humanity as to engage in that wicked traffic, it has long since, by its municipal laws, denounced the most condign punishment.

Many of the states composing this union, had made appeals to the civilized world for its suppression, long before the most sensible of other nations had been shocked by the iniquities of the traffic. Whether this government should now enter into treaties containing mutual stipulations upon this subject, is a question for its mature deliberation. Certain it is, that if the right to detain American ships on the high seas, for such detention, on the plea of the necessity for such detection, arising out of the existence of treaties between other nations, the same plea may be extended and enlarged by the new stipulations of new treaties, to which the United States may not be a party. This government will not cease to urge upon that of Great Britain, full and ample remuneration for all losses, whether arising from detention or otherwise, to which American citizens have heretofore been, or may hereafter be subjected, by the exercise of rights which this government cannot recognise as legitimate and proper. Nor will I indulge a doubt but that the sense of justice of Great Britain will consent to a more extensive return for any wrong, or loss, which any American citizen may have experienced in the prosecution of lawful commerce, may have experienced at the hand of her cruisers, or other public authorities. This government, at the same time, will relax no effort to prevent its citizens, if there be any so disposed, from prosecuting a traffic so revolting to the sense of humanity, as to be so far from protecting the fair and honest trader, from molestation and injury; but while the enterprising mariner, engaged in the pursuit of an honorable trade, is entitled to its protection, it will visit with condign punishment, others of an opposite character.

[The flag.] I herewith submit a statement to existing laws for the suppression of the African slave trade, and recommend all such alterations, as may give to them greater force and efficacy. That the American flag is grossly abused by the abandoned and profligate of other nations, is but too probable. Congress has, not long since, had this subject under its consideration, and its importance will justify renewed and anxious attention.

[Rice duties.] I also communicate herewith the copy of a correspondence between Mr. Stevenson and Lord Palmerston, upon the subject so interesting to several of the southern states, of the rice duties, which resulted favorably to the justice of Great Britain, and to the tranquillity of the United States.

[The northeast boundary.] At the opening of the last annual session, the president informed congress of the progress which had then been made in negotiating a convention between this government and that of England, with a view to the final settlement of the question of the boundary between the territorial limits of the two countries. I regret to say, that little farther advancement of the object has been accomplished since last year; but this is owing to circumstances no way indicative of any abatement of the desire of both parties to hasten the negotiation to its conclusion, and to settle the question in dispute, as early as possible. In the course of the session, it is my hope to be able to announce some further degree of progress, towards the accomplishment of this highly desirable object.

The commission appointed by this government for the exploration and survey of the line of boundary separating the states of Maine and New Hampshire from the contentious British provinces is, it is believed, about to close its field labors, and is expected soon to report the results of its examinations to the department of state. The report, when received, will be laid before congress.

[RELATIONS WITH SPAIN.]

The failure on the part of Spain to pay, with punctuality, the interest due under the convention of 1824 for the purchase of the Floridas, and the fact that the countries, has made it the duty of the executive to call the particular attention of that government to the subject. A disposition has been manifested by it, which is believed to be entirely sincere, to fulfil its obligations, in this respect, so soon as its internal condition and the state of its finances will permit. An arrangement is in press, from the result of which, it is trusted that those of our citizens who have claims under the convention, will, at no distant day, receive the stipulated payments.

[TREATY WITH BELGIUM.]

A treaty of commerce and navigation with Belgium was concluded and signed at Washington on the 29th March, 1840, and was duly sanctioned by the Senate of the United States. It was afterwards ratified by his Belgian majesty, but did not receive the approbation of the Belgian chambers within the time limited by its terms, and has, therefore, become void.

This occurrence assumes the graver aspect from the consideration that, in 1833, a treaty negotiated between the two governments, and which was the part of the United States, failed to be ratified on the part of Belgium. The representative of that government, at Washington, informs the department of state that he has been instructed to give explanations of the causes which occasioned delay in the approval of the late treaty by the legislature, and to express the regret of his government at the result.

[RELATIONS WITH TEXAS.]

The joint commission under the convention with Texas, to ascertain the true boundary between the two countries, has concluded its labors; but the final report of the commissioner of the United States has not been received. It is understood, however, that the meridian line, as traced by the commission, lies somewhat further east than the position hitherto generally assigned to it, and, consequently, includes in Texas some part of the territory which had been considered as belonging to the states of Louisiana and Arkansas.

The United States cannot but take a deep interest in whatever relates to this young, but growing republic. Settled principally by emigrants from the United States, we have the happiness to know, that the great principles of civil liberty are there destined to flourish, under wise institutions and wholesome laws; and that, through its example, another evidence is to be afforded of the capacity of the human mind, to advance the prosperity, happiness, and permanent glory of the human race. The great truth, that government was made for the people, and not the people for government, has already been established in the practice and by the example of these United States, and it is our duty to encourage and to facilitate its further exemplification by a sister republic, with the deepest interest.

[OUR RELATIONS WITH THE INDEPENDENT STATES.]

Our relations with the independent states of this hemisphere, formerly under the dominion of Spain, have not undergone any material change within this past year. The incessant and increasing wars, or between those countries, are to be greatly deplored, as necessarily tending to disable them from performing their duties as members of the community of nations, and rising to the destiny which the position and natural resources of many of them might lead them to occupy. The incessant and increasing wars, also, directly or indirectly, for complaints on the part of our citizens who resort thither for purposes of commercial intercourse, and as retarding reparation for wrongs already committed, some of which are by no means of recent date.

The late revolution of Ecuador to hold a session, at the time appointed for that purpose, in January last, will probably render abortive a treaty of commerce with that republic, which was signed at Quito on the 13th of June, 1839, and had been duly ratified on our part, but which required the approval of that body, prior to its ratification by the Ecuadorian executive.

A convention which has been concluded with the republic of Peru, providing for the settlement of certain claims of citizens of the United States, upon that government of that republic, will be duly submitted to the senate.

The claims of our citizens against the Brazilian government, originating from captures, and other causes, are still unsatisfied. The United States have, however, so uniformly shown a disposition to cultivate relations of amity with that empire, that it is to be hoped, the claims of our citizens of that empire towards us, which an adjustment of the affairs of Brazil would afford, will be given without further available delay.

[FLORIDA WAR.]

The war with the Indian tribes on the peninsula of Florida has, during the last summer and fall, been prosecuted with untiring activity and zeal. A summer campaign was resolved upon, as the best mode of bringing it to a close. Our brave officers and men who have been engaged in that service, have suffered toils and privations, and exhibited an energy, which, in any other war, would have won for them undying honors. In despite of the sickness incident to the climate, they have penetrated the fastnesses of the Indians, broken up their encampments, and harassed them unceasingly. Numbers have been captured, and still greater numbers have surrendered, and have been transported to join their brethren on the islands elsewhere allotted to them by the government. On our side, it is entertained that, under the conduct of the gallant officer at the head of the troops in Florida, that troublesome and expensive war is destined to a speedy termination. With all the other Indian tribes, we are enjoying the blessings of peace. On us, as on our best interests, it is our duty, as well as our interest, to maintain, with fidelity in fulfilling our engagements, the practice of strict justice, as well as the constant exercise of acts of benevolence and kindness. These are the great instruments of civilization, and through their use alone, can the untutored child of the forest be induced to conform to its teachings.

[FINANCES.]

The secretary of state, to whom the acts of congress have devolved the duty of directing the proceedings for the taking of the sixth census, or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, will report to the two houses the progress of that duty. The enumeration of persons has been completed, and exhibits a grand total of 2,069,216, making an increase over the census of 1830, 1,202,616 inhabitants, and showing a gain in a ratio exceeding 32 per cent. for the last ten years.

[FINANCES.]

From the report of the secretary of the treasury, you will be informed of the condition of the finances. The balance in the treasury on the 1st of January last, as stated in the report of the secretary of the treasury, submitted to congress at the extra session, was $957,345 03. The receipts into the treasury, during the first three quarters of this year, from all sources, amounted to $30,467,752 52. The estimated receipts for the fourth quarter, amount to $10,125,285, amounting to $39,147,747, and making, with the balance in the treasury, on the first of January last, $1,397,532 80. The expenditures for the first three quarters of this year, amount to $24,734,346 97, will amount to $34,734,346 97, by making the total for the fourth quarter, as estimated, $39,147,747 52, leaving a deficit of $10,125,285, amounting to $30,467,752, and leaving a deficit of $32,025,070 70 and leaving a deficit of $32,025,070 70, on the first of Jan. next, of about $32,557 90.

Of the loan of $12,000,000, which was authorized by congress at its late session, only $5,132,726 88 have been negotiated. The shortness of time which has elapsed, has prevented no inconsiderable impediment in the way of its completion by capitalists at home, while the same cause would have operated with much greater force in the foreign market. For that reason the foreign market has not been resorted to; and it is now submitted, whether it would not be advisable to amend the law by making what remains undisposed of payable at a distant day.

Should it be necessary, in any view that congress may take of the subject, to revise the existing tariff of duties, I beg leave to say, that, in the performance of that most delicate operation, moderate counsels would seem to be the wisest. The government, under which it is our happiness to live, owes its existence to the spirit of compromise which prevailed among its framers—jarring and discordant opinions could only have been reconciled by that noble spirit of patriotism, which prompted conciliation, and resulted in harmony. In the same spirit the compromise bill, as it is commonly called, was adopted at the session of 1833. While the people of no portion of the union will ever hesitate to pay all necessary taxes for the support of government, yet an innate repugnance to the imposition of burdens, not really necessary for that object. In imposing duties, however, for the purpose of revenue, a right to discriminate as to the articles on which the duty shall be laid, as well as the amount, necessarily and most properly exists. Otherwise the government would be placed in the condition of having to levy sales duties upon all articles, the productive, as well as the unproductive. The slightest duty upon some, might have the effect of causing their importation to cease, whereas others entering extensively into the consumption of the country, might bear the heaviest, without suffering diminution in the amount imported. So also the government may be justified in so discriminating, by reference to other considerations of domestic policy connected with our manufactures. So long as the duties shall be laid with distinct reference to the wants of the treasury, no will founded objection can exist against them. It might be esteemed desirable that the distribution of the taxes should take place as would have the effect of annulling the land proceeds distribution act of the last session, which act is declared to be inoperative the moment the duties are increased beyond 20 per cent. the maximum rate established by the compromise act. Some of the services of the compromise act, which will go into effect on the 30th day of June next, may, however, be found exceedingly inconvenient in practice, under any regulations that congress may adopt. I refer more particularly to that relating to the home valuation. A difference in value, at the same rate of duty, existing, will necessarily exist at different ports; but that is altogether insignificant, when compared with the conflicts in valuation, which are likely to arise, from the differences of opinion among the numerous appraisers of merchandise. In many instances the estimates of value must be conjectured, and thus as many different rates of value may be established as there are appraisers. These differences in valuation may also be increased by the inclination, which without the slightest imputation on their honesty may arise on the part of the appraisers in favor of their respective ports of entry. I recommend this whole subject to the consideration of congress at the next session, with an additional remark. Certainly and permanency in any system of governmental policy are, in all respects, eminently desirable; but more particularly is this true in all that affects trade and commerce, the operations of which depend much more on the certainty of their returns, and calculations, than in the distant periods of time, than on high bounties, or duties, which are liable to constant fluctuations.

[CURRENCY—EXCHANGES—FISCAL AGENTS.]

At your last session, I invited your attention to the condition of the currency and exchanges, and urged the necessity of adopting such measures as were consistent with the constitutional competency of the government, in order to correct the inequalities of the one, and as far as practicable the inequalities of the other. No country can be in the enjoyment of its full measure of prosperity, without the presence of a medium of exchange, approximating to uniformity of value. What is necessary as between the different parts of the country, is also necessary between the inhabitants of different parts of the same country; with the first the precious metals constitute the chief medium of circulation, and this also would be the case as to the last, but for inventions comparatively modern, which have furnished, in place of gold and silver, a paper currency, the value of the one, and the comparative analysis of the merits of the two systems. Such belonged more properly to the period of the introduction of the paper system. The speculative philosopher might find inducements to prosecute the inquiry, but his researches could only lead him to conclude, that the paper currency is a clearly better mode of exchange introduced, and that society might have been much happier without it. The practical statesman has a very different task to perform. He has to look at things as they are—to take them as he finds them—to supply deficiencies, and to prune excesses as far as he can. The task of furnishing a corrective for derangements of the paper medium with us, is almost inexplicably great. The power exerted by the states to charter banking corporations, and which, having been carried to a great excess, has filled the country with, in most of the states, an irredeemable paper medium, is an evil which government cannot, without the aid of legislative corrective. The rates at which bills of exchange are negotiated between different parts of the country, furnish an index of the value of the local substitute for gold and silver, which is, in many parts, so far depreciated, as not to be received, except at a large discount, in the payment of debts, or in the purchase of produce. It could scarcely be desired that every bank, not possessing the license of resumption, should follow the example of the late United States Bank of Pennsylvania, and go into liquidation, rather than by refusing to do so to continue currency in circulation, and thus to solvent institutions, thereby augmenting the difficulties incident to the present condition of things. Whether the government, with due regard to the rights of the states, has any power to constrain the banks, either to resume specie payments or to force them into liquidation, is an inquiry which will not fall to elain your consideration. In view of the great advantages which are allowed the corporations, not among the least of which is the authority contained in most of their charters, to make loans to three times the amount of their capital, thereby often deriving three times as much interest on the same amount of money as any individual is permitted by law to receive, no sufficient apology can be urged for a long continued suspension of specie payments. Such suspension is productive of the greatest detriment to the public, by expelling from circulation the precious metals, and seriously embarrassing the success of any effort that this government can make to revive the commercial facilities, and to advance the public interest.

This is the more to be regretted, and the indispensable necessity for a sound currency becomes the more manifest, when we reflect on the vast amount the interference concerns the country. Of this we have no statistics, nor just and adequate opinions. But there can be no doubt, but that the amount of transportation, coastwise, by sea, and the transportation inland by rail roads and canals, and by steamboats and other modes of conveyance, the sum of our vast rivers and immense lakes, and the value of property carried and interchanged by these means, form a general aggregate, to which the foreign commerce of the country, large as it is, makes but a distant approach.

In the absence of any controlling power over the specie, which by forcing a general resumption of specie payments, would at once have the effect of restoring a sound medium of exchange, and would leave to the country but little to desire, what measure of relief, falling within the limits of our constitutional competency, does it become this government to adopt? It was my painful duty at your last session, under the influence of the most anxious obligations, to differ with congress on the measure, which I proposed for my approval, and which it doubtless regarded as corrective of existing evils. Subsequent reflection, and events since occurring, have only served to confirm me in the opinions then entertained, and frankly expressed.

I must be permitted to add, that no scheme of governmental policy, unaided by individual exertions, can be available for ameliorating the present condition of things. Commercial modes of exchange and a good currency, are but the necessary means of commerce and industry, and the direct productive sources of wealth. Wealth can be accumulated by the earnings of industry and the savings of frugality; and nothing can be more ill-judged than to look to facilities in borrowing, or to a redundant circulation, for the power of discharging pecuniary obligations. The country is full of resources, and the people full of industry and enterprise; but permanent remedy for present embarrassments must be sought in industry, economy, the observance of good faith, and the favorable influence of time.

[PLAN SUGGESTED.]

In pursuance of a pledge given to you in my last message to congress, which pledge I urge as an apology for adventuring to present you the details of any plan, the secretary of the treasury will be permitted to submit to you, should you require it, a plan of finance which while it throws around the public treasure reasonable guards for its protection, and rests on powers acknowledged in practice to exist from the origin of the government, will, at the same time, furnish to the country a sound and permanent basis for all reasonable facilities for regulating the exchange. When submitted, you will perceive in it a plan amendatory of the existing laws in relation to the treasury department—subordinate in all respects to the will of congress directly, and the will of the people indirectly—self-sustaining, and capable in practice to realize its premises in theory, and respectable at the pleasure of congress. It proposes by effectual restraints, and by invoking the true spirit of our institutions, to separate the purse from the sword; or more properly to speak, denies any other control to the treasury than that which may be selected to carry it into execution, but what may be indispensably necessary to secure the fidelity of such agents; and, by wise regulations, keeps plainly apart from each other private and public funds. It contemplates the establishment of a board of control, at the seat of government, with agencies at prominent commercial points, or wherever else congress shall direct, for the safe-keeping and disbursement of the public moneys, and a substitution, at the option of the public creditor, of treasury notes in lieu of gold and silver. It proposes to limit the issues to an amount not to exceed $5,000,000—without the express sanction of the legislative power. It also authorizes the receipt of individual deposits of gold and silver to a limited amount, and the granting of certificates of deposit, divisible into such sums as may be called for by the depositors. It proceeds a step further, and authorizes the purchase and sale of domestic bills and drafts resting on a real and substantial basis, payable at sight, or having but a short time to run, and drawn on places not less than one hundred miles apart—which authority, except in cases of emergency, is necessary for government purposes exclusively, is only to be exerted upon the express condition, that its exercise shall not be prohibited by the state in which the agency is situated.

In order to cover the expenses incident to the plan, it will be authorized to receive moderate premiums for certificates issued on deposits, and on bills bought and sold, and then, as far as dealings extend, to furnish facilities to commercial intercourse at the lowest possible rates, and to subsume from the earnings of industry, the least possible sum. It uses the state banks at a distance from the agencies, as auxiliaries, without imposing any power to increase the amount it is subjected to such guards and restraints as have appeared to be necessary. It is the creature of law, and exists only at the pleasure of the legislature. It is made to rest on an actual specie basis, in order to redeem the notes at the places of issue—produces no dangerous redundancy of circulation—affords no temptation to speculation—its attendance by no inflation of prices—is equable in its operation—makes the treasury notes, which it may use along with the certificates of deposit, and the notes of specie paying banks—convertible at the place where collected, receivable in payment of government dues, and, without violating any principle of the constitution, affords the government and the people such facilities as are called for by the wants of both. Such, it has appeared to me, are its recommendations, and in view of them it will be submitted, whenever you may require it, to your consideration.

[CONCERNS CONSIDERED.]

I am not able to believe that any fair and candid objection can be urged against the plan, the principal outlines of which I have thus presented. I cannot doubt but that the notes which it proposes to furnish, at the voluntary option of the public creditor, issued in lieu of the revenue and in place of certificates of deposit, will be maintained at an equality with gold and silver, every where. They are redeemable in gold and silver on demand, at the places of issue. They are receivable every where in payment of government dues. The treasury notes are limited to an amount of one-fourth less than the estimated annual receipts of the government, and are subject to redemption. If all these assurances are not sufficient to make them available, then the idea, as it seems to me, of furnishing a sound paper medium of exchanges, may be entirely abandoned.

If a fear be indulged that the government may be tempted to run far beyond its issues, at any future date, it seems to me that no such apprehension can reasonably be entertained, until all confidence in the representatives of the states and of the people, as well as the people themselves, shall be lost. The weightiest considerations of policy require that the restraints now proposed should be maintained, and that no relaxation should be for light causes be removed.—To argue against any proposed plan its liability to possible abuse, is to reject every expedient, since every thing dependent on human action is liable to abuse. Fifteen millions of treasury notes may be issued as the maximum, but a discretionary power may be given to the government to issue less than that sum, and every consideration will unite in leading them to feel their way with caution. For the eight first years of the existence of the late Bank of the United States, its circulation barely exceeded $3,000,000, and for five of the most prosperous years, it was about equal to $10,000,000; afterwards, the authority was given to receive private deposits to a limited amount, and to issue certificates in such sums as may be called for by the depositors, may so far fill up the channels of circulation as greatly to diminish the necessity of any considerable issue of treasury notes. A restraint upon the amount of currency issued, has seemed to be indispensably necessary, from an apprehension thought to be well founded, that in any emergency of trade, confidence might be so far shaken in the banks as to induce a withdrawal from them of private deposits, with a view to ensure their unquestionable safety when deposited with the government, which might prove eminently disastrous to the state banks. Is it objected that it is proposed to authorize the creation of a new bill of exchange? It is answered, that such dealings are to be carried on at the lowest possible premium—are made to rest on an unquestionably sound basis—are designed to re-imburse merely the expenses which would otherwise devolve upon the treasury, and are in strict subordination to the general policy of the government. The case of the Bank of Augusta against Earle, and other reported cases; and thereby avoids all conflict with state jurisdiction, which I hold to be indispensably requisite. It leaves the banking privileges of the states without interference—looks to the treasury and the union—and while fulfilling every object of the first, it is in no way an interference of the last. But above all, it is created by law, is amendable by law, and is re-creatable by law; and wedded as I am to no theory, but looking solely to the advancement of the public good, I shall be amongst the very first to urge its repeal, if it be found not to subserve the purposes and objects for which it may be created. Nor will its plan be submitted in any overweening confidence, in the sufficiency of my own judgment, but with much greater reliance on the wisdom and patriotism of congress. I cannot abandon this subject without urging upon you, in the most emphatic manner, what I have already urged, that you should not permit me to have felt it to be my duty to submit, to relieve the chief executive magistrate by any and all constitutional means, from a controlling power over the public treasury. If, in the plan proposed, should you deem it worthy of your consideration, that separation is not as complete as you may desire, you will find it, as it is, in the plan proposed. For myself, I disclaim all desire to have any control over the public moneys, other than what is indispensably necessary, to execute the laws which you may pass.

[STATE DEBTS.]

Nor can I fail to advert, in this connection, to the debts which many of the states of the union have contracted, and under which they continue to labor. That indebtedness amounts to a sum which, less than $200,000,000, and which has been attributed to them, for the most part, in works of internal improvement, which are destined to prove of vast importance in ultimately advancing their prosperity and wealth. For the debts thus contracted, the states are alone responsible. I can do no more than to repeat the belief that each state will feel itself bound by every consideration of honor, as well as of interest, to meet its engagements with punctuality. The failure, however, of any one state to do so, should in no degree affect the credit of the rest; and the foreign capitalist will have no just cause to experience alarm as to all other state stocks, because any one or more of the states may neglect to provide with punctuality the means of redeeming their engagements. Even such states, should there be any, considering the great rapidity with which their resources are developing themselves, will not fail to have the means, at no very distant day, to meet their obligations. It is to the utmost farthing, nor will I doubt but that in view of that honorable conduct which has evermore governed the states, and the people of this union, they will each and all resort to every legitimate expedient, before they will forego a faithful compliance with their obligations.

[WAR DEPARTMENT.]

From the report of the secretary of war, and other reports accompanying it, you will be informed of the progress which has been made in the fortifications designed for the protection of our principal cities, roadsteads and inland frontier, during the present year; and of the progress which has been made in the work which will be prosecuted to completion with all the expedition which the means placed by congress at the disposal of the executive will allow.

I recommend particularly to your consideration, that portion of the secretary's report which proposes the establishment of a chain of military posts, from Council Bluffs to some point on the Pacific coast, within our limits. The benefit thereby destined to accrue to our citizens engaged in the fur trade, over that wilderness region, added to the importance of cultivating friendly relations with savage tribes inhabiting it, and at the same time giving protection to our frontier settlements, and of establishing the means of safe intercourse between the American settlements at the mouth of the Columbia river, and those on this side of the Rocky mountains, would seem to suggest the importance of carrying into effect the recommendations upon this head with as little delay as may be practicable.

[NAVY DEPARTMENT.]

The report of the secretary of the navy, will place you in possession of the present condition of that important arm of the national defence. Every effort will be made to add to its efficiency, and I cannot too strongly urge upon you, liberal appropriations to that branch of the public service. Inducements of the weightiest character exist for the adoption of this course of policy. Our extended and otherwise exposed maritime frontier, calls for protection, to the furnishing of which an efficient naval force is indispensable. We look to no foreign conquests, nor do we propose to enter into competition with any other nation in the possession of the ocean. It is due not only to the honor, but to the security of the people of the United States, that no nation should be permitted to invade our waters at pleasure, and subject our towns and villages to conflagration or pillage. Economy in all branches of the public service, is due from all the public agencies to the people. It is due from all the public agencies to the people, that the necessary means, for the protection of our domestic firesides from invasion, and our national honor from disgrace. I would most earnestly recommend to congress, to abstain from all appropriations, for objects not absolutely necessary; but I take upon myself, with all the awakened hesitancy, all the responsibility of recommending the increase and prompt equipping of that gallant navy, which has lighted up every sea with its victories, and spread an imperishable glory over the country.

[POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.]

The report of the postmaster general will claim your particular attention, not only because of the valuable suggestions which it contains, but because of the great importance which, at all times, attaches to that interesting branch of the public service. The increasing expense of transporting the mail along the principal routes, necessarily claims the public attention, and has awakened the feeling of solicitude on the part of the government. The transmission of the mail must keep pace with those facilities of intercommunication which are every day becoming greater through the building of rail roads, and the application of steam power—but it cannot be disguised that, in order to do this, the post office department is subjected to every extension of time. The lines of communication between distant parts of the union, are, to a great extent, occupied by rail roads, which, in the nature of things, possess a complete monopoly, and the department is therefore liable to heavy and unreasonable charges. This evil is destined to grow more and more, and it is imperative that some measure may become necessary to guard against it.

[APPOINTMENTS TO OFFICE.]

I feel it my duty to bring under your consideration a practice which has grown up in the administration of the government, and which, I am deeply convinced, ought to be corrected. I allude to the exercise of the power, which usage, rather than reason, has vested in the president, of removing from office, without the assent of the senate, any one of the holders of office, which not only withdraws them from the steady and impartial discharge of their official duties, but exerts an undue and injurious influence over elections, and degrades the character of the government itself, inasmuch as it exhibits to the public magistrate, as being a party, in the selection of his agents, in the secret plots or open workings of political parties.

In respect to the exercise of this power, nothing should be left to discretion, which may safely be regulated by law; and it is of high importance to restrain, as far as possible, the stimulus of personal interests in the exercise of this power. The great increase which has been made in public offices, in the last quarter of a century, and the probability of farther increase, we incur the hazard of witnessing violent political contests, directed too often to the single object of retaining office, by those who are in, or obstructing it, by those who are out. Under the influence of the passions, and the selfishness of the individuals, in such contests, I shall cordially concur in any constitutional measures for regulating, and, by regulating, restraining, the power of removal.

[SMITHSONIAN FUND.]

I suggest for your consideration, the propriety of making, without further delay, some specific application of the funds derived out of the will of Mr. Smithson, of England, for the diffusion of knowledge; and which have, heretofore, been vested in public stocks, until such time as congress should think proper to give them a specific direction. Nor will you, I feel confident, permit any abatement of the principle of the fund, which has been so judiciously turned out to the stocks, in which the investments have been made, have undergone a depreciation.

[DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.]

In conclusion, I commend to your care the interests of this District, for which you are the exclusive legislators. Considering that this city is the residence of the government, and, for a large part of the year, of congress, and, considering also, the great cost of the public buildings and the propriety of affording them at all times careful protection, it seems not unreasonable that congress should contribute towards the expense of an efficient police.

JOHN TYLER.

Washington, December 7, 1841.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

[A full list of the members' names will be found on page 195, volume 60, of the Register.]

DECEMBER 6. The president of the senate took his seat at 12 o'clock, and, having called the body to order, the following senators were found to be present, viz:

From Maine—Messrs. Evans and Williams.
From Massachusetts—Mr. Bates.
From Vermont—Messrs. Fretwell and Phelps.
From Connecticut—Messrs. Huntington and Smith.
From New York—Messrs. Tallmadge and Wright.
From New Jersey—Mr. Southard.
From Pennsylvania—Messrs. Buchanan and Sturgeon.
From Delaware—Messrs. Clayton and Bayard.
From Maryland—Mr. Kerr.
From Virginia—Messrs. Archer and Rives.
From North Carolina—Messrs. Graham and Mangum.
From Louisiana—Mr. Mouton.
From Kentucky—Mr. Clay.
From Ohio—Messrs. Allen and Tappan.
From Indiana—Messrs. Smith and White.
From Illinois—Mr. Young.
From Missouri—Messrs. Benton and Linn.
From Arkansas—Mr. Fulton.
From Michigan—Mr. Porter.

On motion of Mr. Bayard, and Ordered, That the secretary of the senate inform the house of representatives that a quorum of the senate is assembled, and that the senate is ready to proceed to business.
On motion of Mr. Kerr, the usual number of papers were ordered to be furnished each senator, not exceeding more than three daily papers.
A message was received from the president of the United States informing him that a quorum of the two houses had assembled, and that congress is ready to receive any communications he might be pleased to make. The senate proceeded to consider the resolution of the house; and, having concurred in the same, it was ordered that the chair appoint a committee on the part of the senate, whereupon Messrs. Bayard and Bates were appointed.

On motion, the senate then adjourned.
On motion of Mr. Pierce and Mr. Woodbury, of New Hampshire, and Mr. McKim, of Illinois, appeared in their seats.
Mr. Bayard, from the committee appointed on the part of the senate to join that of the house of representatives to wait on the president, reported that the president had been waited on in compliance with that resolution, and that a message would be communicated in writing at 12 o'clock.
A few minutes after 12 o'clock a message was received from the president, through Robert Tyler, esq., which having been read by the secretary—
On motion of Mr. Mangum, the message and documents were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.
Mr. Smith, of Indiana, moved that the usual number of copies of the documents and the message be printed.
Mr. Benton said that he could not vote for the extra number of copies which had been voted for, on account of pressing his opinion briefly upon the message, and particularly in reference to that feature of it which related to the new "fiscal agent." Looking over the message, as it was read, he saw the outline of the plan of the president, and learned enough to know what were the details of the plan to be furnished to the treasury. I apprehend, said Mr. Benton, that no details of such a plan can meet any part of my approbation. I regard it as flagrantly unconstitutional, and eminently dangerous to the country. The federal government was called upon to issue paper money; and as the constitution forbids draughted congress had no power to issue bills of credit, or paper money. The attempt or proposition to give such power failed to be established. The plan now proposed was to make the government a hard money government, and the proposition in the message was to do not only what was not granted, but what was positively denied.

The proposition to issue bills of exchange for commerce was a new invention, utterly unknown to Gen. Hamilton when he proposed a bank of the United States. The plan was not only utterly unknown to him, but it was invented by Mr. Biddle for the purpose of making this government a furnisher of bills of exchange. Mr. Biddle brought it forward for the purpose of changing the government from a hard money to a paper money government. I entirely object, (continued Mr. B.) to allowing this government to become a furnisher of exchange. The power to furnish bills of exchange is not to be found in the constitution, nor any power equivalent to it. While we are called upon to furnish bills of exchange for commerce, which we are not to be called upon to furnish drafts for farmers? Such a power was utterly unknown to the constitution and wholly pernicious in its practice. It was nothing more than the British exchequer system revived. It began with the first Congress, continued with the second Congress, and had been handed down to the present time. It was the system by which the British government had lost nine millions sterling. The one system was borrowed from sir Robert Walpole and the other from Mr. Biddle, who was in the city a few weeks since, and, without doubt, furnished it for the government.
But this is not the issue to discuss this question. Formerly, the message was gone into regularly, and contributed to regularity of debate afterwards, but the occasion for discussion did not now present itself, nor would it be treating the president of the United States with proper respect to do so; but I could not sit still and permit the message to pass through this chamber without expressing my entire repugnance to the system proposed, regarding it, as I do, as eminently unconstitutional, calculated to change the currency of the constitution to a paper money currency—to abandon the hard money government of our ancestors, and borrowing, instead of it, a system borrowed from sir Horace Walpole, the wisest and the glory times of Queen Anne. We propose to go far beyond what General Hamilton advocated. He utterly repudiated the idea of exchange, which was now proposed, in addition to the plan to issue paper money by the government. The two plans have no inter-relationship, and I shall avail myself of the earliest appropriate opportunity to discuss this question, said, by arguments and by references against what I regard as a formal proposition to change the hard money system of our government into that of the paper money system of Great Britain, and which had increased the debt of that government, from the reign of the first James to the sum of three hundred millions sterling into the enormous amount of three hundred millions.

The chair stated that the number of copies ordered to be printed had varied at different sessions.
Mr. Smith then suggested that fifteen hundred copies of the message and accompanying documents, and three thousand five hundred additional copies of the message, be printed; which having been agreed to—
Mr. Bayard moved that when the senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock; which motion having been agreed to—
The senate then adjourned.

DECEMBER 8. The following senators appeared today in their seats: Messrs. Dixon and Sumner, of Wisconsin; Messrs. Clayton and Bayard, of Delaware; Mr. Miller, of New Jersey; Mr. Choate, of Massachusetts; Mr. Barren, of Georgia; Mr. Merrick, of Maryland.
A resolution submitted by Mr. Archer, that two chaplains, of different denominations, be elected to congress during the present session, and by each denomination a sermon weekly, was adopted.
The senate then, on motion of Mr. Huntington, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, DEC. 6. At 12 o'clock M. the speaker of the house of representatives, hon. John White, took the chair and called the house to order.
The clerk of the house, Matthew W. Clark Clarke, esq., called the roll, when the following members appeared to their names.
Maine—Nathan Clifford, Wm. P. Fessenden, N. S. Littlefield, Benjamin Randall.
New Hampshire—Charles G. Atherton, Edmund Burke, Ira A. Eastman, John A. Rodman.
Massachusetts—John Quincy Adams, Nathaniel B. Bonder, George N. Briggs, Barker Burnett, Wm. B. Calhoun, Caleb Cushing, Charles Hudson, William Parmenter, Robert C. Winthrop.
Rhode Island—Robert B. Cranston, Joseph L. Tilghust.
Connecticut—Wm. O. Boardman, John H. Brockway, Thomas B. Osborne, Truman Smith, Joseph Trumbull, Thomas W. Williams.

Vermont—Horace Everett, Hiland Hall, John Matlock, William Stiles, Augustus Young.
New York—Alfred Babelock, Daniel D. Barnard, Bernard Blair, Sam'l S. Bowne, David P. Brewster, Timothy Chiles, Thos. C. Chittenden, John C. Clark, Stanley N. Clarke, James G. Clinton, Richard D. Davis, Andrew W. Doig, Millard Filmore, Charles A. Floyd, John H. Floyd, A. Lawrence Foster, Seth M. Gates, Samuel George, John Houck, Jr., Hiram P. Hunt, Archibald L. Linn, Samuel Partridge, Lewis Riggs, Jas. I. Roosevelt, John Sanford, Aaron Ward, Fernando Wood, John Young.

New Jersey—John B. Ayer, Charles, William Halsted, C. Stratton, Thos. Jones, Jr.

Pennsylvania—Henry W. Beeson, Benj. A. Bidlack, Chas. Brown, James Cooper, Joseph Fornace, James Gerry, Thomas Henry, James Irvin, Wm. W. Irwin, Wm. Jack, Francis James, Geo. M. Keim, Joseph Lawrence, Albert G. Marehand, Peter Newark, Arnold Fluider, Robert Ramsey, Wm. Simonton, John Snyder, George W. Toland, John Westbrook.

Delaware—George B. Rodney.
Maryland—Wm. Cost Johnson, John F. Kennedy, Alexander Randall, Augustus R. Sellers, James W. Williams.

Virginia—Richard W. Barton, John M. Botts, Walter Coles, Thomas W. Gilmer, Wm. L. Goggin, Wm. O. Goode, Wm. A. Harris, Samuel L. Hays, George W. Hopkins, Edmund W. Hubard, Cuthbert Powell, Wm. Smith, Lewis Stearns, Alexander H. H. Stuart, George W. Summers, John Taliaferro, Henry A. Wise.

North Carolina—Green W. Caldwell, John R. J. Daniel, Edmund Deberry, James Graham, Kenneth Rayner, Augustine H. Shepperd, Edward Staley, William H. Washington, Lewis Williams.

South Carolina—R. B. Rowland, R. B. Rowland, Georgia—Richard W. Habersham, James A. Meriwether.

Kentucky—Landaff W. Andrews, Linn Boyd, Wm. O. Butler, Garrett Davis, Bryan O. Owsley, John Pope, John B. Thompson, Philip Triplett, Aaron R. Underwood, John White.

Tennessee—Thomas D. Arnold, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Wm. B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Robert L. Caruthers, Meredith P. Gentry, Cave Johnson, Abraham McClellan, Hopkins L. Turney, Harvey M. Watterson, Joseph L. Williams, Christo. H. Williams.

Ohio—Sherlock J. Andrews, Benjamin S. Cowen, Ezra Dean, Wm. Doan, Joshua R. Giddings, P. G. Goode, Samson Mason, Joshua Mathiot, James Matthews, Wm. Medill, Calvary Morris, Jeremiah Morrow, Nathaniel G. Pendleton, Joseph Ridgway, S. Stokely, George Sweetney, John W. Wells.

Louisiana—John B. Dawson, John Moore.
Indiana—Andrew Kennedy, Henry S. Lane, Geo. H. Proffit, Richard W. Thompson, David Wallace.

Illinois—Zadok Casey, John Reynolds, John T. Stuart.
Alabama—Geo. S. Houston, Wm. M. Payne.

Missouri—John C. Edwards, John Miller.
Arkansas—Edward Cross.

Michigan—Jacob M. Howard.
Iowa—Augustus C. Dodge, delegate.
The hon. Henry Dodge, member elect from the territory of Wisconsin, was qualified and took his seat.

The hon. Francis Gregory, member elect from the state of New York, vice hon. John Greig, resigned, was qualified and took his seat.
A message was received from the senate, by the hands of A. Dickens, esq. secretary thereof, informing the house that a quorum of the senate had assembled, and that that body was ready to proceed to business.

Mr. W. C. Johnson rose and said he availed himself of this occasion to say that, at the last session of congress he had been placed at the head of one of the most important committees of the house, and that it might be possible that the speaker would be resigning the committee, would again place him (Mr. J.) in the position he then occupied. He requested the speaker to discontinue his (Mr. J.'s) name from that committee. He made this request because the measure most important in his consideration, and in which he felt the deepest interest, had already been passed, and although there were many other subjects of great importance which might come before that committee, yet there were none in which he felt so great an interest.

Another reason which he had for making this request was, that he proposed, in the progress of this session, and on the earliest suitable occasion, to move the appointment of a select committee on the subject of a national fund.

Whilst he was on the floor, he would submit a motion that the rules and orders of the 26th congress be adopted as the rules of this congress until otherwise ordered, or until the rules reported by a committee which had heretofore been appointed should be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. Adams said he had an amendment to offer to the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland. (Mr. A.) was perfectly willing to adopt the rules of the 26th congress, as they existed at the close of the second session of the 26th congress, with the exception of the 21st rule. (Laughter.)

There.—The rule referred to is in the following words:

"No petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia or any state or territory, or the slave trade between the states or territories of the United States in which it now exists, shall be received by the house, or entertained in any way whatever."

Mr. A. had prepared a resolution, he said, which he would now offer as an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Maryland, and which was then read as follows:

"Strike out all after the word resolved, and insert: That the rules and orders for the transaction of business in the house of representatives in force at the close of the second session of the 26th congress, except the 21st rule of the house, be and are hereby adopted until the further order of the house."

It would be glad to see the rules, as they existed at the close of the second session of the 26th congress, adopted, with the exception of the 21st; that rule had been expressly excluded at the last session by three distinct votes of the house.

Mr. W. C. Johnson modified his proposition to read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules and orders of the 26th congress, as they were at the close of the said congress, be the rules and orders of this congress until others are adopted."

All that he proposed to do was to adopt the rules and orders until such time as the rules and orders of the house could be regularly revised.

Mr. Adams reminded the gentleman from Maryland that the rule adopted at the last session of congress extended to all petitions. It did not refer at all to adoption petitions; but it provided that objection should be considered made to any petitions, with some special exceptions.

Mr. Fillmore said he foresaw that it was indispensable that this question should now be settled; and the only point to be decided was, what was the best mode. It seemed to him that the rules of the last session might with great propriety be adopted for a limited time.

Mr. Stansy, in order, he said, to carry out the views expressed by the gentleman from New York (Mr. Fillmore), desired to offer the following resolution, which he hoped would receive the sanction of the house, and which was read as follows:

Strike out all after the word that, and insert the following: The rules adopted by this house at the last session be the rules for the government of this house for fifteen days, unless others shall be adopted before the expiration of that time.

Resolved, That the report of the committee on rules made near the close of the last session, be printed for the use of this house, and made the special order of the day for to-morrow, and for each succeeding day until the same is disposed of.

Mr. S. remarked that he thought it was apparent that, if this resolution was adopted, the house would be organized without delay. The committees could then be appointed; the rules reported by the committee could be printed, and the house could go on in the usual order of business. He hoped the house would not present the disgraceful scene of being again without rules and without organization. He hoped the majority (though he confessed he did not know exactly where or what it was)—but he hoped that those who were desirous of transacting the public business would come forward and organize; and, to let the country see who were willing to do so, he would now, if in order, move the previous question.

Mr. Proffitt rose, and was addressing the chair—

Mr. Speaker. The previous question has been made.

Mr. Adams submitted that the motion was not in order.

The speaker said that the motion was in order, the house being now governed by the parliamentary law.

Mr. Adams. I have a great objection to the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Stansy).

Mr. Proffitt inquired of the speaker if the previous question had been moved.

The speaker. Yes.

Mr. Proffitt. Is it debatable?

Mr. Proffitt said he understood that the question was debatable, so far as regarded the propriety of putting the previous question.

The speaker said that the question of the propriety of putting the previous question would admit of a very limited debate.

Mr. Proffitt proceeded briefly to oppose the motion for the previous question. It was, he said, unconstitutional, and contrary to the spirit of the constitution, that members should be called upon to vote without having an opportunity of expressing their sentiments. He thought the question ought to be decided; and, if responsibility was to rest any where, let it be upon those who brought abolition petitions into this house.

Mr. Stansy. I call the gentleman to order. We shall not, I hope, discuss abolition petitions yet.

The speaker said the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Proffitt) must confine himself to the point of the propriety of putting the previous question.

Mr. Proffitt said he was showing why the previous question should not be put. He had a circular on his table, with black lines (he was understood to say) drawn round it, calling upon him and others to meet this question as the question of the session—

Mr. Stansy inquired of the speaker if this was in order.

Mr. Proffitt submitted to the chair that he was strictly in order.

The speaker said he thought not.

Mr. Proffitt believed, he said, that he had a right to show why he and others should speak their sentiments on this subject. He wished to show that there was a regular abolition party in this country.

Mr. Stansy hoped the speaker would enforce the rules.

The speaker called Mr. Proffitt to order, and decided that his remarks were not in order.

Mr. Proffitt said that the speaker decided that in the absence of all rules the previous question could be moved or recognised, he (Mr. A.) would appeal from that decision. The proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Stansy) prevented the presentation of all petitions for fifteen days.

There was, he said, a rule of the house—and a most valuable rule it was—which provided that for the first thirty days of the session petitions should be the order of the day. If this privilege was taken away for one petition, it was thus taken away for all petitions for fifteen days to come.

Mr. Proffitt here interrupted Mr. Adams, with the remark that he (Mr. P.) had not yielded the floor; nor had he understood the speaker as deciding him to be out of order.

The speaker said he had decided the gentleman to be out of order. The gentleman had a right to appeal.

Mr. Proffitt appealed, and inquired if the appeal was debatable?

The speaker said the gentleman could state the grounds of his appeal.

Mr. Proffitt said they were these. He was not transgressing the strict limit of showing why the question was called; he was showing the reasons why these petitions ought not to be presented, and why he ought to have an opportunity of presenting his opinions on the subject. He wished to show that there was a regularly organized abolition party—having a committee (he was understood to say) the number of congress at the head of it—and a committee of attendance here to aid in the question.

The speaker said that, under the parliamentary law, the debate allowed on the appeal was very limited. It must be confined exclusively to the previous question alone.

Mr. Proffitt then withdrew his appeal, and took his seat.

Mr. J. Q. Adams submitted to the speaker that, in the absence of rules, the previous question could not be recognised or moved.

The speaker decided that, in the absence of written rules, it had been the practice of the house of representatives to be governed by the lex parliamentaria, in which the previous question was recognised, and that in cases analogous to the present, the previous question had been moved, recognised and put in the house, and that he should therefore receive the motion for the previous question.

Mr. Adams, alleging that the law of parliament was not the law of this house, and without the sanction of the house itself, appealed from the decision of the speaker, and asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. Gilmer inquired of the speaker by what authority the parliamentary law of England was understood to be the law of this house. (Mr. G.) understood that no vote of this house had been taken adopting what was called the parliamentary law of England as the rule of its proceeding.

The speaker said that there was certainly no written law, or adopted rule, by which the parliamentary law, or any other law, governed this house until regular rules of proceeding were adopted. But such was before the rule, and such was the precedent.

Mr. Gilmer considered it a very imperfect rule, he said, and if called upon to vote, he should himself vote against it.

Mr. Everett, in reply to the objections of Mr. Gilmer, submitted that the law which they were now called upon to adopt was not the British law, but that which had been adopted by the usage of this house. On that ground he should sustain the decision of the chair.

Mr. Cushing was of opinion that there was an existing parliamentary law, and he was in favor of sustaining it.

The speaker having again defined the limits of the debate—

Mr. Charles Brown thought, he said, that the house was again moving in the same circle as it had done heretofore. He was in hopes that they had met in a different spirit; but since there was a determination evinced to go round in this same circle, he would say something of a character similar to that which he had said on a former occasion. He wished to know where the parliamentary law was to be found.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Cushing) had said that he was anxious to admit of discussion in the speaker. So, also, was he, (Mr. B.) If the speaker would point to the book—to the written code of parliamentary law, by which his decisions were guided, he (Mr. B.) might possibly be willing to adopt it. But until that was done by the speaker, it was undoubtedly within the discretion of the speaker to determine as he thought proper every question that might arise having reference to the order of the house. If ex necessitate, they were to adopt any temporary law, then it was the law of the last session. He was opposed to this parliamentary law, because it was not where it was; and he was in favor of leaving it to themselves, as the representatives of the people, to be governed by their own sense of what was right, until proper rules should be agreed upon. He was opposed to the previous question—it was calculated to throw the house into a state of irritation. He trusted that the house would allow itself to be governed by the law of the house, and that it would then adopt such rules as would conform to its own peace and harmony, and to the transaction of the public business.

Mr. Wise said he perceived that if they began this debate, they would be very apt to delay the business of the house and the nation beyond a reasonable time. The senate had already organized, and courtesy demanded that the house should respond to its message; and, that something might be done besides discussion, with the general consent of the house, he would move that a committee be now appointed to join such committee as should be appointed on the part of the senate, to wait on the president of the U. States and inform him that the two houses of congress were now assembled, and ready to proceed to business. He made this motion, as it was the most favorable moment; as otherwise, if they became involved in this debate, they would not get the message of the president to-morrow.

Mr. Briggs appealed to the gentleman from Virginia to enable him to offer a resolution, which should now be received with general consent, out of courtesy to the senate. Mr. Wise, in response to this request, Mr. B. sent to the chair a resolution providing that a message be sent to the senate informing that body that a quorum of this house had assembled, and that the house was ready to proceed to business; which resolution was adopted.

Mr. Wise then offered the following resolution, which was read by the clerk:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of this house, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the senate, to wait on the president of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two houses is assembled, and that congress is now ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

Mr. Lewis Williams said if they received the message they could do nothing without rules.

Mr. Briggs said the speaker had decided that the parliamentary law existed.

The question was then taken, and the resolution offered by Mr. Wise was adopted; and Messrs. Wise, Briggs and Clifford, were appointed the committee.

The question now recurring on the appeal taken by Mr. Adams from the decision of the chair.

Mr. Adams said he was satisfied that the gentleman from Massachusetts had been in a serious strain the force of parliamentary law in this house while he occupied the speaker's chair. It would be acknowledged that at the beginning of every previous congress, the existence of parliamentary law had been recognised by the government of the house.

Mr. Adams said, whenever the government of any parliamentary law took place during the time and the honor of sitting in the speaker's chair, it was by

RIGHT OF SEARCH—Correspondence between Lord Palmerston and Mr. Stevenson.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS.

CHRONICLE.

THE names of the members composing the committees of the two houses of congress, will be found on pages 254 and 255.

THE RIGHT OF VISITATION. The correspondence between Mr. Stevenson our late minister in London and Lord Palmerston late minister and Lord Aberdeen, the present minister of foreign affairs, in relation to the difficulties growing out of the slave trade, will be found in the present number.—The difficulty is susceptible of amicable adjustment. The N. York Commercial Advertiser of Tuesday says, in relation to a reciprocal right of search—"We have reason to believe that a proposition for this object, capable of being made entirely unobjectionable on our part, is now or soon will be taken into consideration by the British government, and in due season presented to the government of the United States. With the principle of the measure we are thoroughly acquainted, and can see no fault in it; but, until its details are perfected, we do not feel at liberty to say more."

MEXICO—YUCATAN.

THE TEXAN EXPEDITION TO SANTA FE CAPTURED BY THE MEXICANS. The last New Orleans Bulletin contains accounts from the capital of Mexico which corroborates a previous account. It says: "We have been shown a semi-official letter from a high public functionary in the Mexican capital, which states explicitly that the Texans had been captured entire, and were held as prisoners by the Mexican troops. We vain would hope that these accounts may not be well founded—that our brave friends may not have been overpowered by ruthless numbers and that they may yet return in safety and freedom. But our hope was weak."

We learn verbally by the same arrival, that information had been received of the arrival in Yucatan of five Mexican commissioners, charged with special powers for arranging with that state the terms on which she would recognize a neutral status of the Mexican republic, now that the mother country has resumed her acknowledged duty, and embraced the federal republicanism of 1824. Most of the Mexicans believe that Yucatan would readily agree to return and again become a Mexican state. We shall shortly see.

STATES OF THE UNION.

FACILITIES FOR TRAVEL AND TRANSPORTATION. The Bostonians are going ahead not only in competition with the New York for the steamboat lines which connect us with Europe and promise in a short time to make that connection still more frequent and convenient, (more so perhaps than may be wholesome), but also, towards securing a large share of the travel and trade with the lakes, and with the vast region of the west, which the New Yorkers supposed they had a clear title to, at least north of Hudson.

The New York American of the 24th ult. says: "The eastern rail roads connecting with Albany are in such rapid progress of accomplishment, that before the winter frost sets in, the whole line, from Boston to Albany, will, it is understood, be completed, and that from Bridgeport Connecticut, following the beautiful valley of the Housatonic, will connect with the Massachusetts road at West Stockbridge, excepting, perhaps, a section of fifteen or sixteen miles, which, until spring, will be traversed by coaches.

Already there is a regular daily line from Hudson to Boston.

The city of New York seems to look snipely on all this, as though natural advantages, without any effort on the part of those who enjoy them, would suffice to guard us against any danger from the intelligent, enterprising and active competition of our northern neighbors. To be sure, the practical benefit derived from the working of the first link in the Erie rail road has somewhat aroused the attention of our citizens, and they begin to feel that, as a city, New York must bestir herself in accelerating the completion of this great enterprise. But meanwhile, let us derive such benefit as we may from the eastern roads. The Housatonic rail road offers in the way of winter travel and transportation to Albany, the best route that can be followed.

Bridgeport harbor is always accessible to steamboats, whenever they can pass the narrow strait of Throgs neck; and thus by steamboats and rail roads, the journey to Albany may be performed with only 16 miles of staging. When the perils of winter traveling through our Highlands (greater than those of a voyage to Europe and back), are considered, it will be deemed no small advantage to be able to reach the state capital by a safer though more circuitous route; and as Albany will overflow this winter with a fresh class of the "spoilsmen," we think it only reasonably philanthropic to apprise them thus early that the Bridgeport route offers greater security, and despatch too, probably, than in the Red Bird coaches, or coaches of any other line or company. As to the New York and Albany rail road project, that seems to have been pretty effectually quarrelled out of existence; and perhaps the best substitute under the circumstances would be for the Harlem rail road to seek a connection with the Housatonic rail road. That would be the quickest and cheapest, though systems, it may be deemed less consistent with state pride.

WINTER ROUTE TO NEW YORK. The Highlands will be avoided, hereafter, as a winter route to New York. Rail road improvements will have opened three new routes. The first and quickest will be by the western rail road to Stockbridge, then by stage 23 miles to Canaan; thence by the Housatonic rail road to Bridgeport; and thence by steamboat to New York—distance 180. The next is by rail road from Albany to Springfield; thence by stage 23 miles to Hartford; thence by rail road to New Haven, and thence by steamboat to New York—distance 200 miles. The third route will be by stage to Groton, Orange county, and thence by the New York and Erie rail road to New York, distance 170 miles.

The messages of the governors of Virginia, Ohio and Indiana have been received. The accumulation of national documents precludes farther reference to them at this week. The education convention assembled at Richmond, closed their labors on December 11th. On that day they were in session from 9 A. M. to 7 P. M. The Enquirer states that—"They have recommended to the legislature some of the wisest reforms, of which our present system appears at this time to be susceptible—the district free school system, its more efficient and consistent modification, as far as such a system is practicable;—preserving until the innovation proposed can go into effect, the present system which, in spite of its defects, has been productive of so much benefit. They have recommended the intermediate institutions to the state to be wiser. The education convention assembled here through their instrumentality to the production of better teachers for our elementary schools. They have recommended an enlargement and modification of the military institute system, having an eye also to the same wise provision; the manufacturing of the raw material of mind, (taken from the great body of our youth, selected, according to merit), into excellent teachers, to be returned to the great mass again, in order to manufacture that raw material itself.

PHILADELPHIA. POTTSVILLE RAIL ROAD. We may now announce with every certainty, that the Philadelphia and Pottsville railway will be completed to the mines before the close of the year 1841, or in the course of the next two months. No greater

GEORGIA.

We copy from the Augusta Constitutional of December 7, the following message of the governor.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,

Montpelier, Dec. 1. 1841.

With my message of the 3d ult. I had the honor to communicate to you the copy of a correspondence with the governor of New York, relating to a demand which I had made upon him, for the arrest and delivery of John Greenman, a fugitive from the justice of this state, charged with the larceny of a slave, upon the affidavit of Robert W. Flournoy. At a superior court of Chatham county, held after the making of the affidavit by Mr. Flournoy, John Greenman was indicted for his offence by the name of Alanson Greenman, a name assumed by him, doubtless to escape detection. To remove the difficulty and scruples of the governor of New York, in relation to the sufficiency of the charge contained in the affidavit, I renewed the demand, based upon the indictment, a copy of which, authenticated as required by the act of congress, was transmitted. You will perceive, from the correspondence, a copy of which is herewith transmitted, that another protest has been raised by Governor Seward for evading the performance of his constitutional obligations. It is pretended by him that the bill of indictment is defective, and he has undertaken the office of counsel for the accused, by taking untenable technical exceptions to the proceedings. I have answered them, as you will perceive, but I have been obliged to add, that it was unnecessary to adduce either argument or reason to his understanding, or to remind him of the necessity of executing, in good faith, according to the letter and spirit, the wise provisions of the constitution, by which the states are enabled, in giving efficiency to their criminal laws, to maintain the peace and safety of society.

While he declines complying with my demand, on the ground of a pretended defect in the indictment, he indicates the intention, in no equivocal terms, should his objections to our judicial proceedings be overcome, to sustain his refusal on principles no less unwarranted by the constitution, than offensive to the people of our state.

There should be no longer delay in settling authoritatively the manner in which fugitives from justice are to be delivered, when they are found in another jurisdiction. Congress has the unquestionable authority, under the constitution, to regulate this matter, and it is clearly the duty of the general government, to cause fugitives from justice, who escape from the state in which the crime was committed, and are found in another, to be delivered up, upon the demand of the executive authority of the state having jurisdiction of the offence. But inasmuch as the mode provided by congress, for discharging this high obligation, is defective, and the safety of society, and the security of property, has proved inefficacious, and as no disposition is manifested by the federal government to remedy the defect, the subject is of sufficient importance to justify a convention of the states, to take it into consideration.

But we should not infer, for a moment, the adoption of measures for our own safety. The regulation heretofore recommended by me, would ensure the safety of our property, and prevent all interference with our slave population. Any other constitutional measure, however, which your wisdom may suggest, as expedient and proper, for the attainment of these desirable objects, shall have my concurrence.

CHARLES McDONALD.

ALABAMA.

Extract from an address delivered before a literary society in the university of Alabama, by Alexander B. Meigs, esquire.

"The overthrow of Napoleon was followed by the expatriation of many thousands of those who had been the most conspicuous maintainers of his colossal power. Of these a large number came to the United States. Among them were generals, who had love of justice, no less than a sense of duty to the people, may induce you to give me a privilege in your columns especially as I know the Reporter circulates very widely throughout the west.

The excellent memorial people of Illinois relative to the growing state liabilities, has been spontaneous, and so far as my observation extends, universal, particularly among the farmers. The charge brought against me of originating this excitement, is peculiarly inapplicable, since the discussion of the subject in this county which led to the adoption of the memorial was commenced some time before my knowledge. A county meeting was called, which assembled in this place on the 17th Feb. last, at noon day, in the court house, which was filled to overflowing, when the memorial so much condemned was brought forward and adopted with almost unparalleled unanimity. Seven persons were voting in the negative. This memorial was published with notice of the vote and other proceedings, and the signatures of the president, secretary and committee of seven, who reported the memorial attached. Several hundred copies were distributed among the people of this county, and a portion sent to other parts of the state and the country. The memorial and its proceedings, that are no less strong in denouncing the transactions under which the state debt was incurred than those of Bood, and were no less extensively circulated, were published about the same time.

By this mail I inclose you printed copies of the proceedings of the above mentioned county meeting. It is not extraordinary, that after the lapse of eight months, "ten citizens of Illinois" in the city of New York, should discover that this public demonstration, so unfavorable to the sale of state bonds, was a mere "farce," and the work of one disorganized.

The Bond county memorial ought not to be condemned by those who have never read it, nor by those who do not understand the circumstances under which the state debt has been created. One very important misapprehension exists relative to the character of this debt—that is,—in classing it with other state debts. It has been deliberately constructed, with the knowledge and consent of the people,—that are not excessive in amount,—and that are correctly and judiciously invested. To divert the proceeds of such an investment from a public creditor, would require a degree of moral obliquity which it is to be hoped the people of no American state possess. It is to be hoped, that the Illinois state debt is entitled to no one attribute of this category. On the contrary, that it has been inconsiderately made, without the knowledge or consent of the people,—that it is overwhelming in amount,—and that the money procured has been wretchedly squandered.

It is very important to the holders and to the purchasers of Illinois bonds to possess a correct knowledge of our state debt, and of the ability and disposition of the people to pay it. I will not say that the "ten citizens of Illinois" in their address to bond holders have wilfully misrepresented or withheld facts, but were I required to give an opinion of their statements I should pronounce them altogether erroneous,—and no honest man who is aware of the wide spread misery which falls upon the innocent purchasers of such security, or upon their destitute and helpless families, can remain silent whilst so fatal a misconception on this subject prevails.

The obstinacy of the people in sustaining a delusion relative to the value of stocks, has been too well exemplified in the case of the late bank of the United States. An experienced dealer, however, is thoroughly aware of the fact, that that stock which declines in the market to fifty cents or less on the dollar, and continues to decline, after sufficient time has been allowed to inquire into its intrinsic value, never rises again, but must continue to sink, until the market is relieved of the nuisance. Yet he will buy and sell so long as dupes may be found to purchase.

In November, 1840, a statement made by Dr. Barrett fund commissioner, disclosed to the people of Illinois the true state of the public debt, amounting to thirteen millions six hundred and forty thousand dollars. The message of Governor Carlin to the legislature corroborated this fact. About twenty-six hundred thousand dollars of this amount was supposed to be at the disposal of the state bank. With regard to the balance, it can be enough here to say that it was instituted like many others of less magnitude under the illusory impression that the legitimate object of banking was not to afford the opportunity for those who had money to lend, to effect that object with safety and convenience to themselves and advantage to the public,—but for the purpose of furnishing means to men anxious to extend their business, whose spirit of enterprise outrun their credit. It is known that a considerable portion of these bonds were not under the control of the bank a year since, and that the state bonds have been sold at fifty-six cents on the dollar, whilst the bank stock has been at no time higher than thirty-five since that period. The bank is now under its fourth year of suspension. The dividend last year accruing to the state from this institution was six thousand five hundred dollars.

It is perhaps in the power of no one to determine the present amount of liability incurred by the profuse issue of bonds, state scrip and drafts, no official account having reached the public since the suspension of the legislative session in November 1840. Among the wild provisions of the unconstitutional revenue act of February last, the governor is required to issue bonds for the purpose of paying interest on the state debts, which bonds shall be sold by the fund commissioners "for the best price they will command."

By an act of the preceding December, bonds to the amount of three hundred thousand dollars were hypothecated to meet the interest due in January on a portion of the state debt. The amount of state scrip issued for other purposes during the session of 1840-41, or of unregistered bonds, scrip and drafts issued since that time, is unknown to the people. In August last the appearance of a new issue to the amount of one million was announced in the New York American. It is to be hoped that the eight hundred and thirty-four thousand to McAlister and Stebbins may be included in this new issue. It is a well known fact that the works upon the Illinois and Michigan canal have been diligently prosecuted throughout, during this season, and that the rail road to connect Springfield with Jacksonville and the Illinois river has also been prosecuted and its completion promised during the present year. There appears to be no direct appropriation by law now in existence for the prosecution of the canal, but it is well understood that under the divers enactments, re-enactments, repeals, partial repeals and provisos, engendered by the internal improvement system, an authority may be found, at least by implication, for any issue which the executive can be induced to make.

In Governor Carlin's message already alluded to of November 30, 1840, he makes the total amount of state liabilities $13,643,601 83. He then remarks, "deducting from the above amount 1,336,419 44 being the amount of surplus revenue, and bonds sold which are not paid for, and the state pays interest upon 13,307,182 39 annual interest thereon 732,430 92." So that he does not even expect that this statement. It will be remarked that the recent hypothecation of bonds to meet the semi-annual interest to July last upon eleven millions due in Europe was at the rate of forty cents upon the dollar. We will now add the debt and interest together up to January 1842.

Amount of debt November 30, 1840, by report of the governor and fund commissioner	$13,643,601
Amount of bonds issued under act of Dec. 1840, to meet interest	300,000
Amount of specific appropriation for Northern Cross rail road	100,000
Amount of 1 year's interest on 12,607,000 to be met by hypothecation of state bonds at 40 cents on the dollar	5,990,000

This view will show us that the debt on the approaching winter cannot be less than six millions. To this must be added the whole expense of works on the Illinois and Michigan canal for the present year. This amount may be conjectured from that of the last year, which was about fourteen hundred thousand dollars. Allowing the labor to be more economically applied, the state bonds, which comprise the whole stock in trade, have depressed in market value not less than 25 per cent. since November last. It would be safe to add one hundred thousand to the appropriation for the Northern Cross rail road, since the labor heretofore done upon that road required a million.

The unknown amount of bonds, scrip and drafts may prove to be some hundreds of thousands, but we will call it one hundred thousand dollars only. It will thus appear that the probable addition should not be less than the following:

For work on the Illinois and Michigan canal for 1841	1,400,000
Additional allowance for Northern Cross rail road	100,000
Miscellaneous	100,000
	1,600,000
To add this undoubted amount for 1841 to shown above	15,900,000
Total of indebtedness to Jan. 1842,	17,500,000

To meet this indebtedness of seventeen and a half millions, there will be the Springfield and Mercedia rail road, and a still unfinished canal. Can any thing be reasonably expected from these sources during the present year? Something may be realised from the bank stock, but it cannot be otherwise than trifling. Yet it would be unjust to cast an indiscriminate censure upon the management of that institution. Its officers are among our best citizens, and its supposed insolvency is an unavoidable consequence of the present principle upon which it is instituted, prematurely developed by the general explosion of the credit system. The next regular session of the legislature will be held in December, 1842. Should the present system be pursued, and nothing can check it but the impracticability of selling state bonds at any price, the liabilities must be rendered to the people. No means can be devised to meet this debt but a resort to direct taxation. Are the people able and willing to bear it?

This state counts a population of less than half a million, and yet probably less than seventy thousand art tax payers. The mass of the people live in the first rude log house which was thrown up to protect them from the weather. They have everything to buy, and but little to sell. All that we bring with us is expended in purchasing land, and in making such improvements as are indispensable to the sustenance of our communities. Compare our means with those of the state of New York. The whole trading capital of this state does not exceed two and a half millions in amount, whilst that of New York cannot be estimated at less than one hundred millions. The present state debt of New York is estimated at $10,000,000. Let her securities sell at a discount of fifteen per cent. What, then, should be the discount on ours?

Our population is thinly scattered over a large territory; ~~straggled~~, not only to the country, but to each other, and but little acquainted with the men who compose the legislative body, and with the motives, welfare, and aims of the government. The general feeling, that those which should promote the general welfare, are in the hands of a few, has produced the ruinous proceedings, has been accused of submitting to bank dictation. The bank is the fiscal agent of the state by a law of 1837; and the whole revenue of the state is paid immediately into the bank. The officers of the government—not only the executive and legislative bodies, but the judicial—cannot receive their pay only by the auditor or warrant drawn upon the state bank of Illinois; which that bank may, and does, honor or reject at pleasure! The mass of our people have no means of obtaining a direct knowledge of these degrading, but important facts—does it follow, that they shall be misled to the amount of all they are to be required to contribute to the support of the constitution of the U. States, and of their own state are an ample guarantee against such legislative excesses. The men who compose the legislative body are the agents of the people; the powers of these agents are defined by written constitutions, which are published, and accessible to every intelligent man, whether in Europe or America. Can it be held that this safeguard is not sufficient, but that the people shall assemble in mass at the seat of government, during their legislative session, to keep their servants within the pale of the constitution? These agents possess no power by which a debt of ten, twenty, and a hundred millions can be incurred, without the sanction of the people. Not a debt has been incurred by any member of this confederacy, without a palpable violation of the constitution which binds these states together. Yet the people of Illinois would not appeal to the constitution for protection did they suppose that they were under a moral obligation to discharge these debts, or that they were under any such shameful deception practised upon the people by their agents. I recommend the perusal of the report of the select committee, appointed by the house of representatives to investigate the scrip accounts of the board of public works during the last session, to the friends of the people, especially to Messrs. A. W. Crary, W. H. Henderson and W. A. Mirshall.

The object of the bond county memorial was to put the legislature and the public on their guard against the further issue of state bonds. The people of Illinois may feel little inclined to do this, but by allowing the amount to increase, all hope of future payment might be wholly extinguished; yet no honest man should remain silent whilst the market is flooded with issues which he must condemn as fraudulent, under the known impossibility of ultimate redemption. And the innocent holders may rest assured, that the very citizens of Illinois may now so anxious to maintain the credit of this preposterous issue, will be the first to turn their backs upon them, when it is ascertained that no more mo-new cash, raised upon the pretense of a debt of colored people. The legislature may not recognize the debt, but the people will never pay it. The present generation could not do it and were it possible to apply any compulsory process to effect a payment, it would result, not in accomplishing that object, but in degrading the state. Will the people of the next generation assume a debt which their fathers pronounced a fraud?

No unjust personal attack injures no one but the assailant. If I have succeeded in showing the legitimacy and propriety of the bond county memorial, or assisted in opening the eyes of an innocent public to the true value of Illinois bonds, I shall be gratified at having accomplished the object of my letter. Respectfully,
WILLIAM S. WAIT.

From the St. Louis Pennant.

The condition of Illinois is truly deplorable. We first see her sinking in internal improvement funds squandered by profligate legislatures, as commissioners, so that, after an investment of over $10,000,000 for public works, scarcely a mile of her canals and rail roads has yet been completed so as to afford an income to the state; now comes a ruinous negotiation of her bonds through an agent, and last, though not the least, she has the astounding intimation from an agent in London forced to give up the bonds which were placed in his hands for negotiation.

The editor of the Alton Telegraph says that hitherto he has been in favor of paying the interest on the state debt, but now he thinks the only course to pursue is to follow the example of Indiana and stop the bonds. This interest, unless the bond holders will receive the bonds at par, cannot be paid. He remarks: "The impracticability of laying a direct tax upon the people, at this time, the depressed rates of our bonds in the market, notwithstanding the hitherto prompt payment of our interest; and the constant increase of that debt by the continual issue of more bonds which are sacrificed at ruinous rates to pay interest, are all considerations which have awakened in the public mind the most intense solicitude. One thing is very certain, and that is, the people of this state will no longer countenance payment of our interest upon the terms in which it has been done for the last twelve months. The course is a suicidal one, which neither sagacity nor reason can sustain; and the quicker a step is put to it the better it will prove both for our creditors and us."

DOCUMENTS ACCOMPANYING THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

CORRESPONDENCE

RELATING TO THE DETENTION OF AMERICAN VESSELS ON THE AFRICAN COAST BY BRITISH ARMED CRUISERS.

LORD PALMERSTON TO MR. STEVENSON.

Foreign office, August 5, 1841.
The undersigned, her Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, has received two notes, addressed to him on the 13th of November, 1840, and on the 1st of March, 1841, by Mr. Stevenson, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States, complaining of the search and detention of the United States vessel "Douglas," and of the ill treatment of the crew by Lieutenant Seagram, of her Majesty's brig "Ternagant," employed on the coast of Africa in suppressing the slave trade.

In these two communications from Mr. Stevenson it is stated that on the 21st October, 1839, Lieutenant Seagram boarded the "Douglas" while she was pursuing her voyage on the coast of Africa, examined the ship's papers and the passengers' passports, broke open the trunks, hauled down the American flag, and seized the vessel as a slave ship. On the 21st of November, 1839, the "Douglas" was kept on board until the 21st of November, 1839, the 29th of the same month; that the officers and men of the "Douglas" became ill from their exposure to the sun, and that, in consequence, three of them died, and the captain is still in ill health. And Mr. Stevenson expresses the confident expectation of the president of the United States that her Majesty's government will make prompt reparation for the conduct of Lieutenant Seagram in this case, and will take efficient means to prevent the recurrence of such abuses.

The undersigned has, in reply, to state that, in pursuance of the wish expressed by Mr. Stevenson on the part of his government, a strict investigation has, by order of the lords of the admiralty, been made into the particulars of this case, and the result is as follows:

Lieutenant Seagram, commanding her Majesty's ship "Ternagant," employed in suppressing the slave trade on the coast of Africa, had been apprized by the commanding officer of the American ship "Douglas" that coast of an agreement entered into by that officer with Commodore Fairfax of the United States navy, for searching and detaining ships found trading in slaves under the United States flag; and Lieut. Seagram having, on the 21st October, 1839, met with the ship "Douglas," carrying the flag of the union, he boarded her, and made inquiries as to the voyage for which she was bound. Lieutenant Seagram was received on board the "Douglas" with great civility, and a disinclination was shown to reply to any questions relating to her voyage; but he ascertained that she was bound to the river Brass, and he found on board of her seven Spaniards who were going to that river, where no trade but the slave trade is carried on.

Lieutenant Seagram requested to see the papers of the "Douglas," but the captain of the "Douglas" could produce no custom house clearance, and had made an entrance on his log that, on leaving the Havana, he could not procure one, and that he had returned to the harbor to obtain such a paper, but had left the harbor again without it. This circumstance appeared suspicious to Lieutenant Seagram; and, on the 22nd of October, the papers produced by the captain of the "Douglas," he found that the "Douglas" was consigned to a well known slave trader, Don Pablo Teles, who was then on board of her, and to whom the slaving vessels "Asp" and "Lark," which had been recently condemned for slave trade, had been consigned.

Lieutenant Seagram pressed for permission to examine the hold of the vessel, and the consignee gave him permission to examine the hold, because he conceived it was protected by the United States flag; and, under the same impression, he acknowledged to Lieutenant Seagram that her cargo was Spanish, and had been shipped as American solely for the purpose of avoiding seizure.

The hatches of the vessel having then been opened, and Lieutenant Seagram having proceeded to examine her, it was discovered that she was fitted out for the slave trade, with leaguers, loops and staves, a slave deck, in plank, and three complete slave coppers.

Lieutenant Seagram reports that, under these circumstances, he should have sent the "Douglas" to the United States, to be delivered up to the authorities of that country; but that he had received orders from the commanding officer of her Majesty's vessels on the coast of Africa not to send any vessels to the United States until he should have been informed what course the United States government took as to the slave vessels "Eagle" and "Clara," which had been on the United States by the commanding officer, with a view to assist the American government in preventing the abuse of the national flag of the union.

But Lieutenant Seagram, not having received any information on this point at the end of eight days after the detention of the "Douglas," thought it his duty then to release the "Douglas," instead of detaining her longer, or sending her to the United States.

From the facts above stated, there appears little doubt that, if the "Douglas" had been sent to the United States, she would have been condemned for trading in slaves under the flag of the union. And she had been tried by the mixed commission at Sierra Leone, the proofs that the slave trading voyage on which she was engaged was in fact a Spanish enterprise were strong enough to have warranted her condemnation in the British and Spanish courts as a Spanish slave ship.

With respect to the assertion that three men died from the effects of exposure to the sun, in consequence of the detention of the vessel, the undersigned has to state that it appears that the vessel remained, on her own account, in the African seas two months after her detention by Lieutenant Seagram; and that, of her men, two men died until after those two months, there seems no reason to suppose that the death of the two men in question was occasioned by the detention of the vessel by Lieutenant Seagram.

With respect to the statement that Lieutenant Seagram ordered the American flag to be hauled down, it is to be observed that the master of the "Douglas," in his protest declares that he himself, and not Lieutenant Seagram, ordered the United States flag to be hauled down.

As to any loss of provisions or stores, it is stated by the American master that the English prize crew brought their provisions with them to the "Douglas," and he does not even assert that they consumed any provisions belonging to the "Douglas," or that any of the stores of that vessel were lost.

With respect to the allegation of the American master that the prize crew had secreted one demijohn of rum, forming part of the cargo of the vessel, it seems probable that there is an error in that allegation, because the hatches of the vessel were opened and cleared again in the presence of Lieutenant Seagram, and no complaint was made to that officer, either by the master or the consignee, that any loss or damage had been done to the cargo.

Indeed, the master, on resuming the charge of his vessel, declared to Lieutenant Seagram that he had no complaint to make.

From the foregoing statement, it will appear that the visit, the search, and the detention of the "Douglas," by Lieutenant Seagram took place under a full belief, on the part of that officer, that he was pursuing a course which would be approved by the government of the United States; and in his conduct towards the crew of the vessel he appears scrupulously to have avoided any act which would justify any cause of offence to a friendly power.

The undersigned has therefore to express the confident hope of her Majesty's government that, upon a consideration of the whole case, the government of the United States will be of opinion that, although the act of Lieutenant Seagram in detaining a United States slave-ship—indeed, a United States ship—regular, yet the impression under which he did it, and the motives which prompted him to do it, exempt him from any just blame.

But the undersigned cannot refrain from requesting Mr. Stevenson to draw the serious attention of the government of the United States to this case, which affords a striking example of the manner in which the vessels and flag of the United States are employed by Spanish, Portuguese and Brazilian criminals, to protect their piratical undertakings, in utter contempt of the laws of the union, and in open defiance of the federal government.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Stevenson the assurance of his distinguished consideration.
PALMERSTON.

A. STEVENSON, ESQ., &c. &c. &c.

LORD PALMERSTON TO MR. STEVENSON.

Foreign office, August 5, 1841.
The undersigned, her Britannic Majesty's secretary of state for foreign affairs, has received the note which Mr. Stevenson, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States of America, addressed to him on the 27th of February last, complaining that the schooner "Iago," bearing the United States flag, and commanded by Mr. Adolphus Dupuy, had been detained by her Majesty's brigantine "Ternagant," Lieutenant Seagram, and that the schooner "Hero," under the United States flag, and commanded by Mr. B. McConnell, had been detained by her Majesty's brig Lynce.

Mr. Stevenson complains, in the first place, that injury was done in these cases to the purposes of the voyage, and to the cargo and stores on board the vessels detained; and he contends, in the second place, that her Majesty's naval officers had no excuse, and much less any justification, for detaining these vessels; and he adds that it is wholly immaterial whether the vessels detained were equipped for, or actually engaged in, slave traffic or not.

With regard to the allegation of damages done to the cargoes of these vessels, the undersigned begs to remind Mr. Stevenson that the papers which he transmitted to the undersigned show that, in the case of the "Iago," the money which was lost was stolen by the crew of the "Iago" while the master was absent on shore, and that it was not abstracted by the crew of the detaining vessel. And it is fair (to suppose) that the chronometer and the watch which were taken on board the vessel, were taken by the same persons who stole the money.

With regard to the damage said to have been done to the cargo of the "Hero" during the search of that vessel, the undersigned has requested the board of admiralty to cause inquiries to be made upon that matter, and he will acquaint Mr. Stevenson with the result.

With respect to the justification which the British officers are desirous of obtaining these American vessels, with regard to the detention of which Mr. Stevenson says that there is "no shadow of pretence for exercising much less justifying, the right of search or detention of vessels under the United States flag by vessels of her Majesty's navy," the undersigned has to state that the "Ternagant," which was taken on board on the 11th March, 1840, by the commanding officer of her Majesty's ships on the coast of Africa, and the officer commanding the vessel sent by the United States government to suppress the slave trade of the United States on the African coast; and by that agreement those officers, for the purpose of the investigation, were taken by the respective governments respecting the suppression of the slave trade, requested each other, and agreed to detain all vessels, under the United States flag, found to be fully equipped for and engaged in the slave trade; and it was agreed that such vessels should eventually be handed over to the United States cruisers, if proved to be United States property, and to British cruisers, if proved to be Spanish, Portuguese, Brazilian or English property.

The undersigned would therefore submit that the commanding officers of her majesty's vessels had no reason to suppose that, when giving effect to this agreement by detaining vessels bearing the United States flag and engaged in the slave trade, they were doing a thing which would be disagreeable to the government of the United States.

With respect to the "Iago," the undersigned has to observe that that vessel was fully equipped for slave trade; that the papers found on board of her were of a suspicious character; that the crew but two were Spanish. And her majesty's advocate general, to whom the case was referred, has reported it to be his opinion that the commissioners at Sierra Leone would have been justified in proceeding to the adjudication of the vessel, and that, if the case had been investigated by them, sufficient proof would have been afforded that the vessel was really Spanish, and not American property, and that consequently she was liable to condemnation.

The undersigned trusts that the foregoing statement will show that there is good reason for doubting that any willful damage was done to the cargo of either of the two vessels detained, and that, although it is inadmissible that British cruisers have no right, as such, to search and detain vessels which are the property of citizens of the United States, even though such vessels may evidently be engaged in slave trade, yet in those cases the officers of our cruisers are warranted in pursuance of a special agreement with a naval officer of the United States; and they were, therefore, justified in believing that, instead of doing any thing which would be complained of by the government of the United States, they were furthering the views and forwarding the wishes of that government.

Such cases, however, cannot happen again, because positive orders were sent by the admiralty, in February last, to all her majesty's cruisers employed for the suppression of the slave trade, not again to detain or meddle with the United States vessels engaged in the slave trade. These orders have been received by her majesty's government with great pain and regret, but as an act due by them to the rights of the United States.

Her majesty's government, however, cannot bring themselves to believe that the government at Washington can seriously and deliberately intend that the flag and vessels of the United States continue to be, as they now are, the shelter under which the malefactors of all countries perpetrate with impunity crimes which the laws of the union stipulate as piracy and punish with death.

But, unless the United States government shall consent to make, with the other powers of Christendom, some agreement of the nature of that which their naval officer on the coast of Africa spontaneously entered into with the British naval commander on that station, these abuses will not only continue to exist, but will increase in magnitude every day; and the end will be, that the slave trade will be carried on exclusively under the shelter of the flag, and that the special provisions of the United States government of that nation, whose legislature was among the first to pronounce the crime infamous, and to affix to it the severest penalties.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Stevenson the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

A. STEVENSON, ESQ. &c. PALMERSTON.

P. S. I return to you, according to your request, the original papers enclosed in your note of the 27th of February last, on the subject of the "Iago."

MR. STEVENSON TO LORD PALMERSTON.

32, Upper Grosvenor street, August 9, 1841.

MY LORD: On my return to London, after a temporary absence of a few days, I found the two communications which your lordship did me the honor to address to me, under date of the 5th instant, in answer to my notes of the 13th of November, the 27th of February, and the 1st of May last, complaining of the seizure and detention of three American vessels, the "Douglass," "Iago," and "Hero," and the ill-treatment of their crews, by her majesty's cruisers employed on the African coast in suppressing the slave trade.

Having, in my previous communications, said all that I deemed important on the subject of these repeated aggressions upon the vessels and crews of the United States and the rights of their flag, I can have no inducement at this time to trouble your lordship with any further remarks, and I shall therefore content myself with transmitting to my government, at the earliest day, copies of your lordship's notes, with whom it will rest to decide upon the sufficiency of the explanation which they contain in justification of the conduct of the commanders of her majesty's brig's of war, the Ternagant and the Lynx.

It is proper, however, that I should seize the earliest opportunity to acquaint your lordship that, in relation to the agreement which it is alleged was entered into between the commander of the British squadron on the African coast and the officer in command of the vessel sent by the government of the United States to suppress the slave trade, allowing the mutual right of searching and detaining all British and American vessels found trading in slaves, I have no other information than that communicated in your lordship's notes, and have no reason to suppose that such authority has been conferred by the American government to any of its officers.

I pray your lordship to accept assurances of my distinguished consideration and respect.

A. STEVENSON.

LORD PALMERSTON TO MR. STEVENSON.

Foreign Office, August 17, 1841.

Viscount Palmerston presents his compliments to Mr. Stevenson, and, with reference to Mr. Stevenson's note of the 9th instant, has the honor to transmit, herewith, to Mr. Stevenson, a copy of the agreement entered into between the commander of her majesty's sloop "Wolverine," and Lieut. Payne, of the United States ship of war "Grampus," which was referred to in the notes addressed by Viscount Palmerston to Mr. Stevenson on the 5th instant, on the subject of the detention of the vessels the "Douglass," the "Iago," and "Hero," by her majesty's cruisers.

A. STEVENSON, ESQ. &c.

LORD PALMERSTON TO MR. STEVENSON.

Foreign Office, August 27, 1841.

The undersigned, her majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, has had under his consideration the note which Mr. Stevenson, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the U. S. States, did him the honor to address to him, under date of the 15th of May, 1840, complaining of the detention of a brig under American colors, called the "Mary," by her majesty's ship Forester.

In the note Mr. Stevenson requested the information furnished to the United States government by Mr. Trist, their consul at the Havana, to be complete and correct, prefers a claim for indemnity to the owner of the "Mary," and asks for the exemplary punishment of the commander of the "Forester." In the note Mr. Stevenson also requested that the officer against the Mary—proceedings which, in Mr. Stevenson's opinion, seem to want nothing to give them the character of a most flagrant and daring outrage, and very little, if any thing, to sink them into an act of open and direct piracy.

The undersigned has now the honor to inform Mr. Stevenson that the above particular information which has been furnished to her majesty's government, as to this vessel, places the question in a very different light from that in which it has been presented to the government of the United States; and the undersigned trusts that the following statement will satisfy Mr. Stevenson, that, although the vessel Forester was in the night, in the possession of the United States, she was in reality the property of a Spanish slave dealer, and was employed by him for the purposes of slave trade.

The papers found on board this vessel by the commander of the "Forester" showed that, on the 24th of January, 1839, a bill of sale was prepared at the Havana by Mr. J. A. Smith, the vice consul of the United States at that port, setting forth that a permanent American register (No. 48) had been granted to the brig "Mary," of Philadelphia, on the 17th of June, 1837, and that the brig was at that time owned by Joseph A. Snowden, of Philadelphia, and was commanded by J. H. Haven.

Joseph J. Snowden, the original owner, then gave a power of attorney and substitution to Charles Snowden, who again nominated Pedro Manegat, the notorious slave dealer, but who was described in that power of attorney as a merchant at the Havana, to sell and transfer the "Mary."

Eight days afterwards, Pedro Manegat professedly sold the "Mary" to a person named Pedro Sabate, of New Orleans, who, on the 2d of May, appointed as her master Charles Snowden, the same person who, three months before, had named Pedro Manegat as agent for the "Mary"; and on the 15th of June, Pedro Sabate replaced Snowden by appointing David Tomlinson to the command.

This Pedro Manegat, the pretended seller but real purchaser of the "Mary," was the same individual who, in like manner, owned the following nominally American vessels, namely, the "Hyperion," which left the Havana in December, 1838, as an American vessel, and was afterwards condemned as the Spanish schooner "Isabel," the schooner "Hazard," which was detained at St. Thomas on the 28th of February, 1839, under circumstances similar to those which mark the case of the "Mary," and the "Odetaria," also condemned as Spanish property—which last named vessel Pedro Manegat had only employed, as he did the "Mary," namely, to carry goods for the purchase of slaves, on the coast of Africa.

The Spanish master, Thomas Escheverria, and a Spanish crew, were shipped on board the "Mary," as passengers; among them were several individuals who were recognised as having been formerly captured in slave vessels—Escheverria himself having been master of the Spanish schooner "Norma," when that vessel was captured with 234 slaves on board. The ship's articles set forth that the crew was engaged to navigate the "Mary" from the port of Havana to the Gallinas, or wherever else the master may direct.

In two of three papers which the master, David Tomlinson, produced to prove his American citizenship, he is styled Pits B. Tomlinson, and the third P. B. Tomlinson; while in the log, enclosed in Mr. Stevenson's note, he is called Captain Thomson.

The clearance and bills of lading show that the owners of the cargo were Black & White, John Martinez & Co., Pedro Manegat, and Thomas Escheverria, the Spanish captain, all well known slave traders; and the consignees, Tomas Rodriguez Baron, Ignacio P. Rolo and Theodore Cautot, of the Gallinas, long and well known to the naval officers employed in the suppression of the slave trade on the coast as factors for the purchase and shipment of slaves.

The papers produced to the captain of the Forester, by Tomlinson, were of themselves sufficient to show that this was one of the then frequent cases in which the flag of the United States had been fraudulently assumed, and all doubt was removed as to the real character of the undertaking in which the vessel was employed, when, on further search, the crew were found on board of her slave coppers, two bags of shackles, large water leaguers, and a slave deck, the latter being noted as shipped under the denomination of 500 feet of lumber.

In these circumstances, the undersigned is of opinion that the commander of her majesty's ship "Forester" was fully justified in considering the "Mary" to be a Spanish vessel, and consequently, in taking her before the British and Spanish court; and, accordingly, when the British commissioners reported to him that the Spanish court had refused to allow the "Mary" to be libelled in that court, under the impression that the mere fact of her having the American flag hoisted should have protected her from visitation and search by a British cruiser, the British commissioners were told that there was, in the opinion of her majesty's government, reason to suppose that the "Mary" was a Spanish, and not an American vessel, and that the undersigned, therefore, to have allowed her to be libelled in the British and Spanish court; for that, although British ships of war are not authorised to visit and search American vessels on the high seas, yet if a vessel, which there is good reason to suppose is in reality Spanish property, is captured and brought into a port in which a British and Spanish court is sitting, the commissioners may properly investigate the case; and, upon sufficient proof being adduced of the Spanish character of the vessel, and of her having been guilty of a breach of the treaty between Great Britain and Spain for the suppression of the slave trade, the court may condemn her, notwithstanding that she was sailing under the American flag, and had American papers on board.

With respect to the general question of the search of vessels under the American flag by British cruisers, the undersigned begs to refer Mr. Stevenson to his other note of this day, in which he has referred to the case of the "Susan," in which the undersigned has formerly and he hopes satisfactorily, replied to the representations made by Mr. Stevenson on that subject.

The undersigned begs to return to Mr. Stevenson the log kept by John Hutton, while acting as mate on board the "Mary," and avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Stevenson the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

PALMERSTON.

LORD PALMERSTON TO MR. STEVENSON.

Foreign Office, August 27, 1841.

The undersigned, her majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note from Mr. Stevenson, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States at this court, dated the 14th August, 1840, in reply to the note of the undersigned dated 23d April, 1840, on the subject of a complaint made by the American government against the officer in command of her majesty's brig "Grecian," for having boarded the American merchant ship "Susan," when off the light of Cape Frio, in the month of April, 1839.

The undersigned begs leave to state to Mr. Stevenson, in reply to the remarks contained in his last note, that her majesty's government do not pretend that her majesty's naval officers have any right to search American merchantmen, met with in time of peace at sea; and if in some few cases such merchantmen have been searched, when suspected of doing being engaged in slave trade, it has been done solely because the British officer who made the search imagined that he was acting in conformity with the wishes of the United States government in endeavoring to hand over to the United States tribunals ships and citizens of the union found engaged in a flagrant offence.

Such things, however, will not happen again, because orders have been given which will prevent their recurrence.

But there is an essential and fundamental difference between searching a vessel and examining her papers to see whether she is legally provided with the usual customs and other papers required by the country, and especially of the country whose flag she may have hoisted at the time. For though, by common parlance, the word "flag" is used to express the test of nationality, and though, according to that acceptance of the word, her majesty's government admit that British cruisers are not entitled, in time of peace, to search merchant vessels sailing under the American flag, yet her majesty's government do not mean thereby to say that a merchantman can exempt himself from search by merely hoisting a piece of bunting with the United States emblems and colors upon her mast. Her majesty's government mean to say, that the rights of the United States to exempt a vessel from search, when that vessel is provided with papers entitling her to wear that flag, and proving her to be United States property, and navigated according to law.

But this fact cannot be ascertained unless an officer of the cruiser whose duty it is to ascertain this fact shall board the vessel, or unless the master of the vessel shall produce the usual papers required by the cruiser; and this examination of papers of merchantmen suspected of being engaged in the slave trade, even though they may hoist a United States flag, is a proceeding which it is absolutely necessary that British cruisers engaged in the suppression of the slave trade should continue to practice, and to which her majesty's government are fully persuaded that the United States government cannot, upon consideration, object; because what would be the consequence of a contrary practice?

What would be the consequence, if a vessel engaged in the slave trade could protect herself from search by merely hoisting a United States flag? Why, it is plain that in such case every slave trading pirate, whether Spanish, Portuguese, or Brazilian, or English, or French, or of whatever nation he might be, would immediately sail under colors of the United States; every criminal could do that, though he were a pirate of pure genuine American papers; and thus all the treaties concluded among the Christian powers, for the suppression of slave trade, would be rendered a dead letter. Even the laws of England might be set at defiance by her own subjects, and the slave trade would be invested with complete impunity. Her majesty's government are persuaded that the United States government cannot maintain a doctrine which would necessarily lead to such monstrous consequences; but the undersigned is bound in duty frankly to declare to Mr. Stevenson that to such a doctrine the British government never could or would subscribe. The cruisers employed by her majesty's government for the suppression of slave trade must ascertain, by inspection of papers, the nationality of vessels met with by them under circumstances which justify a suspicion that such vessels are engaged in slave trade, in order that, if such vessels are found to belong to a country which has conceded to Great Britain the mutual right of search, they may be searched accordingly; and that, if they are found to belong to a country which, like the United States, has not conceded that mutual right, they may be allowed to pass on, free and unexamined, to consummate their intended iniquity. Her majesty's government feels convinced that the United States government will see the necessity of this course of proceeding.

But her majesty's government would find hope that the day is not far distant when the government of the United States will cease to confound two things which are in their nature entirely different: will look to things, and not to words, and, perceiving the wide and entire distinction between that right of search which has heretofore been a subject of discussion between two countries, and that right of search which almost all other christian nations have mutually given each other for the suppression of the slave trade, will join the christian league, and will no longer permit the ships and subjects of the union to be engaged in undertakings which the law of the union prohibits as piracy.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Stevenson the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

A. STEVENSON, Esq. &c.

MR. STEVENSON TO LORD ABERDEEN.

32, Upper Grosvenor street, Sept. 10, 1841.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States, has the honor to acquaint the earl of Aberdeen, her majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, that he had the honor to receive the two communications addressed to him by Lord Viscount Palmerston, her majesty's late principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, under date of the 27th ultimo, upon the subject of the improper and harassing conduct of British cruisers in the search for slave ships, and the rights of States in the African seas. In communicating the decision of her majesty's government upon the claims submitted to its consideration, it would have given the undersigned great satisfaction to have represented that decision as one calculated to do justice to the United States interests, and in accordance with the just rights and interests of his country. He had indulged a confident hope that the complaints which had been made upon the subject would have been followed not only by suitable atonement and reparation, but by an immediate abandonment of the system of wrong and violence to which the vessels and commerce of the United States had been so long exposed, through the misconduct of British cruisers in the African seas.

This course he had expected, not less from the justice of her majesty's government than the friendly relations subsisting between the two countries.

It is, therefore, with painful surprise and regret that the undersigned now learns from Lord Palmerston's communications that the rights of the United States and her majesty's cruisers have not only been approved and justified, and the injuries which ensued to remain unredressed, but that a right is now asserted by her majesty's government over the vessels and flag of the United States, involving high questions of national honor and interest, of public law and individual rights.

Having heretofore, in his correspondence with Lord Palmerston, discussed the merits of these claims and the principles involved in them, and presented the views and expectations of his government upon the subject, the undersigned does not feel it incumbent upon him, at this time, to open again the general discussion, or recapitulate the particular circumstances by which these cases might justly claim to be distinguished. Referring Lord Aberdeen to the previous correspondence which has taken place, the undersigned will refrain from the further discussion of the individual cases, and content himself with a brief examination of those parts of Lord Palmerston's communications in which the great question of distinction is asserted by her majesty's government over the vessels and flag of the United States, in time of peace, on the high seas. In order to ascertain the precise nature and character of this new and extraordinary power, it may be proper to quote those parts of his lordship's communication in which it is asserted—

"They are in the following words:—

vessel from search when that vessel is provided with papers entitling her to wear that flag, and proving her to be United States property, and navigated according to law." And again:—"The cruisers employed by her majesty's government for the suppression of slave trade must ascertain, by inspection of the papers, the nationality of vessels met with by them under circumstances which justify a suspicion that such vessels are engaged in slave trade, in order that, if such vessels are found to belong to a country which has conceded to Great Britain the mutual right of search, they may be searched accordingly; and that, if they are found to belong to a country which, like the United States, has not conceded that mutual right, they may be allowed to pass on, free and unexamined, to consummate their intended iniquity."

Here is a direct assertion of a right, on the part of British cruisers, to board and detain all vessels sailing under the flag of the United States, whether American or not, for the purpose of ascertaining, by an examination of their papers, their national character, and deciding whether they are entitled to the protection of the flag of the country under which they sail. Now, it is proper to remark that the attempt which Lord Aberdeen has made to disguise the character of search (a right, however, which he disclaims) and that which he asserts, is wholly fictitious. They are essentially the same, for all the purposes of the present discussion. Indeed, the right to board, detain, and decide upon the national character of vessels navigating the ocean in time of peace, is precisely regarded as an equal and identical right, and giving place to wider and more important injuries, than the right of search, which is purely a belligerent right, and cannot be enforced in time of peace. But if the distinction was admitted to be a sound one, yet nothing would be gained in support of the right which Lord Aberdeen asserts, by the mere admission of the distinction. The inquiry must still arise, whether a power even of visit or detention can be rightfully and lawfully exercised by one nation over the ships of another, in time of peace, upon the high seas. That it cannot, the undersigned will now proceed briefly to show.

And, first, as to the principles of public law, and the usage of nations, by which it is expressly declared that the vessels of all nations, in time of peace, navigating the ocean, shall be exempt from every species and purpose of interruption and detention, unless engaged in some traffic contrary to the law of nations, or expressly provided for by treaty or compact. Now, although piracy is a crime, and therefore punishable in every country, and by every nation, no matter where committed, it must yet be borne in mind that all piracies are not offences against the law of nations. Piracy, therefore, by international law, and that which may be made so by the municipal law of particular nations, is a crime of a different character, and to be treated accordingly. Hence it is that offences declared to be piracy by the municipal laws of any state can only be tried and punished by the country within whose jurisdiction, or on board of whose ships on the ocean, the offence may have been committed. Now, slave trade is not cognizable under the law of nations. Although prohibited by most nations, and declared to be piracy by their laws, and especially by the statutes of Great Britain and the United States, it is yet not an offence against the public law, and its interdiction cannot be enforced by the ordinary right of visit, detention, or search, in the manner that might be the case with piracy.

That it is the acknowledged doctrine of international law cannot, it is presumed, be doubted. It is so expressly declared by all writers upon the law of nations, and has been acknowledged by the British government, through its highest judicial tribunals. Her annals are full of instruction on the subject. The following are a few passages held by one of her most distinguished jurists:

"We are disposed to go as far in discountenancing this odious traffic as the law of nations and the principles recognised by English tribunals will allow us in doing; but beyond these principles we do not feel at liberty to travel. Formal declarations have been made and laws enacted in reprobation of this practice, and yet the same nations have been taken to induce other countries to follow our example, but at present with insufficient effect; for there are nations which adhere to the practice, under all the encouragement which their own laws give. What is then, the doctrine of our own courts, of the law of nations, which they have taken to be respected? That slaves, if taken, are to be restored to their owners; and, if not taken under innocent mistake, to be restored with costs and damages." Again:—"It would be, indeed, a most extravagant assumption, in any court of the law of nations, to pronounce that this practice, the tolerated, the approved, the sanctioned slave trade, is a crime, and that man became subject to law, was legally criminal."

Does her majesty's government now mean to contend that the slave trade is contrary to the law of nations? On the contrary, is not the trade lawful to all governments who have not forbidden it, and, consequently, no right given to any one nation over the slave ships of another in time of peace, independent of express treaty stipulations by which the extent of the power to be exercised must be regulated? The right, then, which Lord Palmerston asserts, derives no support from the principles of the public law, but is left to stand upon the grounds of expediency and necessity, as the means of executing the existing treaties for the suppression of the slave trade, and without which his lordship avers, the execution of these treaties would be a dead letter. Whether this be so or not, the undersigned has no means of judging, and deems it, therefore, unnecessary either to admit or deny it.

The question is not whether the power asserted might be necessary or expedient, but whether any such power exists. It is incumbent upon her majesty's government to show upon what principles of justice and right it claims the power of deciding upon the right of an independent nation to navigate the ocean in time of peace; and this, too, for the purpose of executing treaties by which such nation is not a party, and consequently not bound by the signature of Lord Palmerston, in assuming the necessity and expediency of the power as proof of its existence. Was such a power ever before asserted in the manner or to the extent which is now done? On the contrary, has not the right of visitation and search been always regarded as exclusively one of a belligerent character? In practice, the undersigned never only refers Lord Aberdeen to the authority of Great Britain herself on the subject:

"I can find no authority" (says the late Sir William Scott) "that gives the right of interruption to the navigation of states upon the high seas, except in those cases in which the right is given by treaty against neutrals. No nation can exercise a right of visitation and search upon the common and unappropriated parts of the ocean, except upon the belligerent claim." And again: "No nation has the right to force their way for the liberation of Africa, by trampling upon the independence of other states on the pretence of the right of commerce by mail, or, unlawfully, or to press forward to a great principle by breaking through other great principles which stand in their way."

Now, of all the principles ever attempted to be established in the past history of the dominion of the sea, few probably could be selected of more offensive and objectionable character than those now asserted by the undersigned. Indeed, it is difficult to believe that his lordship or her majesty's government could seriously expect that any independent nation could for a moment acquiesce in doctrines involving the extravagant supposition of yielding to another the right of determining upon the terms and conditions upon which she should maintain peace, and in time of general and profound peace. Such a power once submitted to, and there would be no species of national degradation to which it might not lead. That such would be the consequence, the undersigned feels himself at liberty to suppose. But if it were admitted, for the purpose of illustration, that such a right was even doubtful, still the U. States, as well as other commercial nations, would be bound to demand its discontinuance, if attempted to be exercised in the manner indicated in Lord Palmerston's note. Under what restrictions and limitations could such a power be enforced? What competent tribunals there would be to determine upon the just suspicion which is to justify the boarding and detention, and the right of determining the national character of all vessels under the flag of the U. States? Would it not make every subordinate commander of a British cruiser the exclusive judge, and not only lead to angry and exciting irritations upon the ocean, but to painful discussions between the two governments? What security would American merchants have against decisions made without evidence, or where all the rules of evidence might be violated with impunity? Would it not, from its very nature, be a power the exercise of which, in whatever form it might be guarded, could and of no just limitation? The answer to these questions will best show how inconsistent with the peace of Great Britain and the rights of other states the exercise of any such power would be attended. But it is unnecessary to press this view of the subject further upon Lord Aberdeen's attention. The undersigned is of the principle, and of no exception, and is, therefore, wholly incapable of being overcome by the manner or discretion with which the power might be exercised, or the limitations thrown around it. However softened in terms, or restricted, it must still be regarded as imposing restrictions upon the national autonomy and independence, and an intervention upon the liberty of the seas; a power which no independent state could ever submit to without surrendering its independence and sovereignty, and disregarding the high obligations of duty which it owes to itself and the other nations of the world. Nor is there any force in the view alleged by Lord Palmerston, and upon which great reliance is placed, that the flag of the union is grossly abused by other nations to cover their slave traffic. To what extent the flag of the United States may have been used for this purpose, the undersigned and his government have no means of judging. That it has been grossly abused, however, there is too much reason to believe; and deplore; but, whatever this abuse may have been, it can have no just influence either to strengthen, or weaken the right asserted by her majesty's government.

In relation to the conduct of other nations, who seek to cover their infamous traffic by the fraudulent use of the American flag, the government of the U. States cannot be responsible. It has taken the steps which are necessary to protect the American character from abuse, and will follow it up by such other measures as may appear to be called for.

The government of the United States are not insensible to the force of the considerations which belong to the subject of the African slave trade, nor has the undersigned any doubt that it is a subject which ever concerns its abolition. Nothing is further from the wish of the American government than a desire to increase the difficulties or throw obstacles in the way of the execution of the existing treaties for its final extinction. This the undersigned has upon every occasion solemnly and most assuredly, her majesty's government, and takes leave now to repeat to Lord Aberdeen. Anxious, however, as the government of the United States are to promote the views of her majesty's government on this subject, it cannot consent to do so by sacrificing the rights of its own government to the flag.

Her majesty's government cannot be insensible of the importance and value of guarding the rights of neutrality from every species of violation. This duty belongs especially to great and powerful nations, such as Great Britain and the United States, not only as the best means of preserving peace, but giving to the world an example and a standard of impartial justice. Among neutral nations there is probably not one more deeply interested than the United States. Their attitude is that of a neutral and peaceful power. The consistent and persevering policy of their government has been displayed in defence of the rights of neutrality and in the maintenance of the strictest impartiality and good will to all nations, and maintain with each not only relations of the most perfect amity, but those of a commercial character, upon the basis of a fair, equal, and just reciprocity, the United States will continue to give to their system of policy a sincere and steady adherence. Upon this basis the relations between Great Britain and the United States, as well as all other nations, can alone be expected to continue. The undersigned, therefore, is happy to see in these relations, as well as the justice of her majesty's government and the firmness of his own, the best reason to expect not only an abandonment of the policy which is now asserted, with the whole system of vexatious interruption and surveillance to which the vessels and commerce of the U. States have been subjected, but the future relations of the two countries placed upon the solid foundation of mutual interest and comity, and a more enlarged and liberal policy.

These views, which the undersigned has deemed it his duty to submit to Lord Aberdeen's consideration, upon the doctrines contained in Lord Palmerston's note, of a character so new and alarming to national sovereignty and sensibility, and the friendly relations of the two countries. He has presented them with the frankness and earnestness which their importance demand, and with the respect due to her majesty's government. He has, therefore, no other duty now to perform than to transmit copies of Lord Palmerston's communication to his government, and to protest, in the most solemn manner, against their doctrines, as alike inconsistent with the principles of public law, with the rights and sovereignty of the United States, and with that sense of justice and right which belong to the British nation.

The undersigned prays Lord Aberdeen to accept assurances of his high consideration and respect.

A. STEVENSON.

To the right hon. the Earl of Aberdeen.

LORD ABERDEEN TO MR. STEVENSON.

Foreign office, October 13, 1841.

The undersigned, her majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, has had the honor to receive the note of Mr. Stevenson, envoy extraordinary and plenipotentiary, in relation to the African slave trade, dated on the 10th of September, in continuation of a correspondence with the predecessor of the undersigned in this office, bearing relation to the visitation of vessels bearing the American flag and suspected of being engaged in the African slave trade.

If the undersigned feels it necessary to offer some remarks upon the note of Mr. Stevenson, he is desirous of doing so in a manner best calculated to ensure a candid and impartial consideration for the would deeply regret that any harshness or asperity of expression should aggravate the difficulties of a subject which is, at all times, but too liable to produce excitement and irritation. The undersigned is aware of the susceptibility of national feeling to all that affects national honor, and he repeats that Mr. Stevenson to believe that it is with the most unfeigned respect for the rights, honor and independence of the United States, that he now proceeds to address him.

The undersigned will forbear from entering into any particulars of the visitation of the vessels which has formed the principal matter of Mr. Stevenson's complaint to her majesty's government, and which has been fully discussed in his correspondence with the predecessor of the undersigned.

That proceeding may have been justifiable or otherwise, and the undersigned will be prepared, if necessary, to enter with Mr. Stevenson into the details of the question; but his present object is that of a more general nature. He is desirous of placing very briefly before Mr. Stevenson the consequences of those principles which he has laid down, and to appeal to his candor—the undersigned had almost said to his justice, that for the same purpose, would reject such a conclusion as that which must necessarily flow from the argument contained in Mr. Stevenson's note.

Mr. Stevenson claims for the American flag an absolute exemption from all interference, and utterly denies to the British government any right to visit, under any circumstances whatever, to visit in time of peace, merchant vessels bearing the flag of the union.

Mr. Stevenson quotes the opinion delivered by Lord Stowell upon this subject, who declares that, in order to extirpate this odious traffic, it would be lawful to capture vessels, even if they had slaves on board, and to dictate the price of the season in order to render such a conclusion as that which must necessarily flow from the argument contained in Mr. Stevenson's note.

Now the undersigned is the last person who would presume to question the authority of the distinguished jurist to whom Mr. Stevenson has referred. But Mr. Stowell was not acting as a jurist, but as a judge of Lord Stowell was delivered in the case of a French vessel which had actually been captured, and was condemned by a British tribunal. The sentence was reversed by Lord Stowell in the year 1817. At that period, Great Britain had no reason to presume that the slave trade was regarded as criminal by the whole civilized world, or that all nations had united their efforts for its suppression. And, even if such had been the case, it would have been very far from affording any justification of the sentence reversed. But the undersigned must observe that the present happy concurrence of the states of Christendom in this great object not merely justifies, but renders indispensable, the right now claimed and exercised by the British government. The undersigned readily admits that to visit and search American vessels in time of peace, when that right of search is not granted by treaty, would be an infraction of public law and a violation of national dignity and independence. But no such right is asserted.

We sincerely desire to respect vessels of the United States, but we may reasonably expect to know what it really is that we respect. Doubtless the flag is prima facie evidence of the nationality of the vessel; and if this evidence were in itself conclusive and irrefragable, it ought to preclude all further inquiry. But it is sufficiently notorious that the flags of all nations are liable to be assumed by those who have no right or title to bear them.

Mr. Stevenson himself fully admits the extent to which the American flag has been employed for the purpose of covering this traffic.

The undersigned joins with Mr. Stevenson in deeply lamenting the evil, and he agrees with him in thinking that the United States ought not to be considered responsible for this abuse of their flag. But if all inquiry be resisted, even when carried no further than to ascertain the nationality of the vessel, and impunity be claimed for the most lawless and oppressive of measures in the commission of this fraud, the undersigned feels greatly that it may be regarded as something like an assumption of that responsibility which has been deprecated by Mr. Stevenson.

While Mr. Stevenson deprecates the prevalence of this abuse, and the nefarious character of the trade, could he be satisfied that no remedy should be applied or attempted?

The undersigned hopes and believes that the number of bona fide American vessels engaged in the trade is very small, and thus the danger of interference with such vessels by British cruisers must be of rare occurrence.

Mr. Stevenson will admit that his objection to this interference would, under any circumstances, be in its consequence, to the protection of an enormous traffic, stigmatized by the whole Christian world; but the confession of Mr. Stevenson that the trade is extensively carried on under the fraudulent use of the American flag, does in truth justify the whole claim put forward by the British government. It constitutes that reasonable ground of suspicion which the law of nations requires in such a case. The admitted fact of this abuse creates the right of inquiry.

The undersigned renounces all pretension on the part of the British government to visit and search American vessels in time of peace. Nor is it as if the British government were the only one to whom it has been the invariable practice of the British navy, and, as the undersigned believes, of all navies in the world, to ascertain by visit the real nationality of merchant vessels met with on the high seas, if there be good reason to apprehend their illegal character. In certain latitudes, and for a particular object, the vessels referred to are visited, not as American, but either as British vessels engaged in an unlawful traffic, and carrying the flag of the United States for a criminal purpose, or as belonging to states which have by treaty conceded to Great Britain the right of search, and which right it is altogether to defeat by fraudulently bearing the protecting flag of the union; or, finally, they are visited as piratical outlaws, possessing no claim to any flag or nationality whatever.

Now, it can scarcely be maintained by Mr. Stevenson, that Great Britain should be bound to permit of her own subjects, with British vessels and British capital, to carry on before the eyes of British officers this detestable traffic in human beings, which the law has declared to be piracy, merely because they had the audacity to commit an additional offence by fraudulently usurping the American flag.

Neither could Mr. Stevenson, with mere grating, affirm that the subjects of states which have granted to Great Britain the right of search should be enabled to violate the obligation of their treaties, by displaying the flag of the union, contrary to the will and in defiance of the American government itself. Still, would Mr. Stevenson pretend to claim immunity for a piratical adventure, and would endeavor to shelter their lawless proceedings under the ensign of the United States.

But unless Mr. Stevenson be prepared to maintain these propositions, the whole fabric of his argument is to be grounded. For the undersigned admits that if the British cruiser should possess no knowledge of the American character of any vessel, his visitation of such vessel would be entirely unjustifiable.

He further admits that so much respect and honor are to the American flag, that no vessel bearing it ought to be visited by a British cruiser except under the most grave suspicion, and well founded doubts of the genuineness of its character.

The undersigned, although with pain, must add, that if such visit should lead to the proof of the American origin of the vessel, and that she was avowedly engaged in the slave trade, exhibiting to sight the manacles, fetters and other usual implements of torture, or had ten thousand of these unfortunate beings on board, no British officer could interfere further.

He might give information to the cruisers of the United States, but it would not be in his own power to arrest or impede the prosecution of the voyage and the success of the undertaking.

It is obvious, therefore, that the utmost caution is necessary in the exercise of the right claimed by Great Britain. While we have recourse to the necessary, and indeed the only means for detecting infraction, the practice will be carefully guarded, and the success of the long suspicion. The undersigned begs to assure Mr. Stevenson that the most precise and positive instructions have been issued to her majesty's officers on this subject.

The United States have stigmatized this abominable trade in terms of abhorrence as strong as the people of this country. They are also actively engaged in its suppression. But if, instead of joining their voice to the voice of Great Britain, and laboring with her for the attainment of the great object to humanity, the United States had wished to follow a different course, the reasoning employed in Mr. Stevenson's note is precisely such as would be resorted to for its defence and justification.

The undersigned, with his conviction of the perfect good faith and sincerity of the government of the U. States, would almost fear to offend Mr. Stevenson even by disclaiming any such suspicion; but he believes Mr. Stevenson will be willing to admit that the effects of the policy of the United States should have any tendency to create a different impression in the minds of those who are disposed to think less favorably and less justly upon the subject.

Great Britain makes no pretension, claims no right, which she is not ready and desirous to concede to the United States.

A mutual right of search, regulated in such a manner as to prevent the occurrence of any irritating circumstances, has always appeared to the undersigned to be the most reasonable, the most simple, and most effectual method of attaining the great object which the governments have in view.

But this has already been rejected by the United States, and the undersigned is not instructed again to offer it for consideration.

It is for the American government alone to determine what may be due to a just regard for their national dignity and national interests; but the undersigned is permitted to express his conviction, that rights which have been mutually conceded—such as by the governments of Great Britain and France can scarcely be incompatible with the honor and independence of any state upon the face of the earth.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to request of Mr. Stevenson to accept the arguments of his distinguished consideration. ABERDEEN.

A. STEVENSON, ESQ. &c.

MR. STEVENSON TO LORD ABERDEEN.

32, Upper Governor street, Oct. 21, 1841.

The undersigned, enjoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States of America, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note which Lord Aberdeen, her majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, did him the honor to address to him, under date of the 13th instant, in answer to the one from the undersigned of the 10th of September relative to the United States of America, to which the vessels and commerce of the United States have been subjected by British cruisers in the African seas, and which has been made the subject of complaint to her majesty's government; and, having considered with the attention which their importance merits the arguments presented by Lord Aberdeen, the undersigned is permitted to venture to submit to his lordship's consideration the observations which he feels himself called upon to make.

Before proceeding to do so, however, the undersigned will take occasion to remark that he shares fully in the opinion expressed by Lord Aberdeen as to the importance of avoiding, in the discussion of grave questions of national character, every thing calculated to embarrass or throw difficulties in the way of impartial and dispassionate consideration.—The undersigned, therefore, with great sincerity, assures Lord Aberdeen of the readiness and zeal with which he is disposed to conduct the negotiations between the two governments on his part, in a manner the most conciliatory and best calculated to preserve peace; and that he should equally deplore with Lord Aberdeen that any harshness or asperity of expression should be suffered to mingle in the discussion of a question involving national sensibility of feeling, and so liable, as his lordship justly supposes, to produce excitement and irritation. He trusts, therefore, to believe that it is under the influence of such feelings, and with the most perfect respect both for himself and for her majesty's government, that he now proceeds to reply to those parts of his lordship's note which he deems it his duty to notice.

To enable him to do this, it may be important to ascertain what is the real question at issue between the two governments, and the precise nature of the power asserted by her majesty's government over the vessels and commerce of the United States. It may be thus briefly stated:

The government of Great Britain, with that of other European states, claims the African slave trade as a great evil, united in measures for its abolition. To that purpose, laws were passed and treaties concluded giving to the vessels of each of the contracting parties the mutual right of search, under certain limitations. Independent of these treaties, and under the principles of public law, this right of search could not be exercised. The United States were invited to become a party to these treaties; but, for reasons which they deemed satisfactory, and growing out of the peculiar character of their institutions and systems of government, they declined doing so. They claimed, if inexpedient, under any modification or in any other form, the right of lawfully visiting vessels searched or interfered with, in time of peace, upon the high seas. With the history of the negotiations which took place on this subject, between the two governments, Lord Aberdeen is doubtless informed. In the mean time some of the powers who were parties to these treaties, and others who refused to become so, continued to prosecute their slave traffic and, to the extent of their power, to make the proper resort to the use of the flags of other nations; but more particularly that of the United States. To prevent this, and enforce her treaties, Great Britain deemed it important that her cruisers in the African seas should have the right of detaining and examining all vessels suspected of carrying the flag of any of the nations, not parties to the treaties, for ascertaining their national character. Against this practice the government of the United States protested, and the numerous cases out of which the present discussion has arisen, became subjects of complaint and negotiation between the two governments. Her majesty's government, however, having refused to make any concession of any of the claims, and still asserting the right of her cruisers to continue the practice of detaining and examining all vessels on the coasts and in the African seas, it becomes important that the precise character and extent of the right thus claimed should be clearly ascertained. In the last note which the undersigned had the honor of addressing to Lord Aberdeen, he attempted to show, in the first place, that the right asserted by her majesty's government, in Lord Palmerston's note of the 27th of August, was substantially a right of search; and in the next place, that, if it was not, still the right of interference in the manner asserted by the vessels or flag of other nations, not parties to these treaties, was not less unlawful and unjustifiable.

Now, Lord Aberdeen disclaims the right of searching American vessels upon the high seas, and admits that to do so would be a gross infraction of the public law, and a violation of national sovereignty and independence. He also disclaims the right of requiring vessels sailing under the flag of the United States to submit to the operation of examination, in the manner and for the objects proposed by his government, there would be no violation of national rights or honor, and, consequently, nothing to which the government of the United States ought rightfully to object. Upon this branch of the subject the undersigned does not intend to repeat the arguments contained in his previous correspondence with her majesty's late principal secretary of state for foreign affairs. Referring Lord Aberdeen to that correspondence, he will content himself with submitting such additional observations as his lordship's last note has rendered necessary.

Is the right, then, claimed by her majesty's government less an infraction of the principles of public law and the rights of independent states than that of search, which is disclaimed?

Now, Lord Aberdeen will remark, that the right asserted by his excellency for her majesty's government is clear and explicit, and is thus stated in Lord Palmerston's note: "That her majesty's government have decided that the flag of the United States shall exempt no vessel (whether American or not) from search by her majesty's cruisers in the African seas, unless such vessel shall be found provided with papers entitling her to the protection of the flag she bears, and, in time of peace, without being subjected to detention and examination, and without proof of their being the property of citizens of the United States, and documented according to law." It constitutes the commandant of every British cruiser the exclusive judge to decide whether such vessels, in the African seas, are lawfully entitled to carry papers entitling them to the protection of the flag they bear, and proving them to be United States property, and navigating the ocean according to law." What essential difference, then, is there between the right of search, in its harshest form, and that of arresting the vessels of an independent nation on their voyage, and compelling them to submit to a search, without subjecting them and their papers to the examination and decision of every subordinate naval commander? Is it not the right of placing British cruisers on any part of the ocean that her majesty's government may select, and prescribing the terms upon which other nations are to participate in the freedom of the seas? Is it not, in effect, a claim of jurisdiction over the whole of the African coasts and seas, as exclusive as that which could only be enjoyed within the acknowledged limits of local sovereignty? To these questions but one answer can be given. It must be in the affirmative. But to what consequences would not such a claim lead, if the suitors of the world would it end? If Great Britain can exercise such power, why may not other nations do the same? What is there to prevent those states, especially, which have entered into treaties for the abolition of slavery, from subjecting the vessels and commerce of the United States to similar interruptions and embarrassments.

Why should not Hayti (who has lately been induced to prohibit the slave trade) authorise her cruisers to follow the example of her majesty's government? By one of her recent laws upon the subject, she did give a similar right; but it was afterwards changed, and, at the instance of Great Britain, upon grounds to which no nation had the right in time of peace to enforce the provisions of their laws and treaties against states who were not parties to them, and consequently not bound by them. In the note addressed by the undersigned to Lord Palmerston, under date of the 17th of September, 1841, and referred to by the one to Lord Aberdeen, allusion was made to the proceedings of her majesty's government, under which the Haytian government were induced to change their laws. At that time at least, it is presumed, her majesty's government had not determined to assert this right of dominion over the seas. But, again, why might not the right of search for sea robbers and pirates, and that of impressment, be defended upon the principles of the present claim? Let it be supposed, for purposes of illustration, that Great Britain had entered into treaties with other nations, by which the right of search for sea robbers and deserters was given to the vessels of each other, and that, in the contracting states, in order to evade their engagements, should resort to the fraudulent use of the flags of other nations. And suppose, also, that with the view of enforcing these treaties, it should be deemed expedient to assert a right of boarding and examining, upon the high seas, the vessels of nations who had not surrendered the right and who were not parties to the treaties? Does Lord Aberdeen or her majesty's government believe that such a power would be tolerated by any independent nation upon the face of the earth? And yet, what difference would there be between such a case and the one under consideration, except that the vessels of nations, as to slavery and the other to impressment—subjects, probably, equally important in the view of her majesty's government.

It was against the exercise of any such right that the distinguished jurist, to whom reference has been made, observed in his sitting as arbitrator, in the law of nations, "that no authority could be found which gave any right of visitation or interception over the vessels and navigation of other states, on the high seas, except that which the right of war gives to belligerents against neutrals; and that Great Britain had no right to assert a right to the liberation of Africa, by trampling upon the rights and independence of other nations, for any good, however eminent."

Upon what principles, then, of public law or of common right or justice, such a power as that now asserted is to be defended or justified, her majesty's government have not deemed it expedient to state.—Let it have been left to stand for its whole efficacy upon the grounds of expediency. The undersigned must therefore repeat the opinion, expressed in his note to Lord Aberdeen, that there is no essential difference whatever between the right of search and that now asserted for her majesty's government.—But Lord Aberdeen contends that, in resisting the exercise of this right in the form in which it has been made, the undersigned is necessarily compelled to claim, not only immunity for the flag of the United States and all the piratical adventurers who are endeavoring to shelter themselves under it, but to maintain that Great Britain herself could be bound to permit her own subjects, with British ships and British capital, to carry on the traffic under their own eyes, provided it was done under the fraudulent use of an American flag; and his lordship further declares that unless the undersigned is prepared to maintain to their full extent these propositions, the whole fabric of his argument will fall to the ground.

Now, the undersigned begs to observe that Lord Aberdeen has greatly misapprehended the principles and arguments contained in the note which he had the honor of addressing to his lordship, and which it becomes proper to seize the earliest moment of correcting. This the undersigned will the more readily do, because he is persuaded, from the spirit in which Lord Aberdeen has written, that he will take pleasure in correcting any misapprehension into which he may unintentionally have been drawn.—Indeed the undersigned must have expressed himself very imperfectly if, in denying the right of interfering with vessels under the American flag, he did not express his opinion that he intended to be well objection to vessels bona fide American, and not to those belonging to nations who might fraudulently have assumed the flag of the United States. With the vessels of other nations, whether sailing under their own or another flag, the government of the U. States can exert no authority or desire to interfere. The undersigned, therefore, did not mean to be understood as denying to Great Britain, or any other nation, the right of seizing their vessels or punishing their subjects for any violation of their laws or treaties, provided, however, it should be in accordance with the principles of public law or the rights of other nations. Nor are such the consequences which can fairly be deduced from the argument which he had the honor of addressing to Lord Aberdeen, and, which his lordship seems so greatly to have misapprehended. All other nations, to detain and punish the vessels of their own subjects, whether slaves or not, and whether with or without a flag purporting to be that of the United States; but, in doing this, it must be borne in mind that they have no color of right, nor will they be permitted to extend such interference to the vessels or citizens of the United States sailing under the protection of the flag of their country.

If Great Britain or any other nation cannot restrain the slave trade of their own people upon the ocean without violating the rights of other nations and the freedom of the seas, then indeed the impunity of which Lord Aberdeen speaks will take place. This may be deplored, but it cannot be avoided. But Lord Aberdeen asserts that it has been the invariable practice of the British navy, and he believes of all the navies in the world, to ascertain by visit the real character of merchant vessels met with on the high seas, if there be ground to suspect them of illegal character. Now, the undersigned must be excused for doubting whether any such practice as that which Lord Aberdeen supposes, certainly not to the extent now claimed, has ever prevailed in time of peace. In war the right of visitation is admitted by the law of nations, authorised by the laws of nations, but not in peace. With respect to nations that Great Britain has ever asserted or attempted to exercise if: None, it is believed. There is another misapprehension, also, into which Lord Aberdeen seems to have fallen that it may be important to correct. It relates to an admission which his lordship has made, and which he has endeavored to extend to the abuse of the American flag for purposes of slave traffic. Now, the undersigned would submit, that he did not intend to express, nor did he, any opinion as to the extent to which the flag of the United States was abused by other nations. For, as he has expressed, that Lord Aberdeen will perceive by reference to his note, that he does not nor his government had the means of forming any opinion upon the subject. He admitted the abuse of the flag, and deplored it, but to what extent he gave no opinion.

Can the undersigned yield to the force of the reasoning employed by Lord Aberdeen, arising out of the limited number of bona fide American vessels engaged in the slave trade, to prove that the danger of interference with American vessels will be of rare occurrence. He readily admits, with Lord Aberdeen, that there are few American vessels, if not the slave trade, engaged in it. In admitting the fact, he does not perceive very clearly what bearing it can have upon the present discussion, or how the smallness of the number of American slaves can at all guard against the evils which Lord Aberdeen supposes. For, if it be true, as his lordship has admitted, that the abuse of the flag of the United States is one of increasing extent, and that it can in no way be prevented but by the examination of all vessels sailing under the flag of the United States; and as it must also be admitted that there are numerous American vessels engaged in commerce in the African seas, which, with other vessels, are subjected to the same examination, what possible effect can the number of American slaves have in preventing the interference to that more numerous class of merchantmen who are to be found engaged in commerce throughout the whole of the African sea? If there was not a single vessel of the United States engaged in the slave trade, the evils and interruptions which Lord Aberdeen is so desirous of avoiding must still take place, whenever the right shall be attempted to be enforced against those vessels that are not slaves. But the great question which is to be observed in the exercise of the right of visitation, and which must be guarded, is greatly relied on by Lord Aberdeen in its defence. Indeed, his lordship declares that so much honor and respect are due to the flag of the United States, that it is only to be exercised in certain latitudes, and exclusively confined to cases where there is the strongest suspicion and well founded doubts exist.

Now, the undersigned would respectfully ask of what consequence it can be to the United States, if their rights or the honor of their flag are violated, whether it be done upon one part of the ocean or another? In relation to the well founded suspicion to which Lord Aberdeen refers, it might have been desirable (if the manner of exercising an unlawful power can excuse it) that his lordship should have stated what the particular character and degree of the suspicion was to be which was alone to justify the interference of her majesty's cruisers. That such a right as that claimed, if it existed, could not safely be reposed in the hands of her majesty's cruisers who have heretofore been in the habit of exercising it, the undersigned feels himself warranted in assuming. This, he presumes, will be satisfactorily shown by the cases which he has heretofore presented to her majesty's government, and for which no reparation has yet been made. These cases will show the embarrassments arising from the interference with the trade and commerce of the United States, through out the whole of the African seas, have already been subjected by the vexatious seizures and detentions of her majesty's cruisers, and in most of them without justification or excuse.

That the right asserted by her majesty's government may be considered as important, may not be doubted. Indeed, the undersigned would not act faintly towards Lord Aberdeen if he were to pretend that the exercise of refusing the exercise of the right of visitation by the American government might not throw very great difficulties in the way of enforcing the existing treaties for the abolition of the slave trade; but, as he has taken occasion heretofore to observe, the admission can neither strengthen the claim of right nor diminish the force of the objections to it on the part of the United States.

There remains only one other point which Lord Aberdeen's note which the undersigned deemed it necessary at this time to notice. It is that in which his lordship expresses the opinion that any right of search which has been conceded by two such governments as France and Great Britain, can scarcely be considered as incompatible with the honor and independence of any nation upon earth. Now, if Lord Aberdeen's remark was intended to apply to the proposal which was made by her majesty's government to that of the United States for a mutual right of search, secured and guarded by treaty stipulations, the undersigned has no objection to making; but if his opinion of his lordship was intended to apply to the right now asserted by Great Britain, and proposed by her government to be exercised in the absence of all conventional arrangement, then the undersigned must be allowed to express his decided disapproval of such an exercise of mutual rights, properly secured, might not be incompatible with national honor and sovereignty he readily admits, inasmuch as the contracting parties would stand upon the footing of equality and security. This he presumes to be the case between France and Great Britain but not the case between Great Britain and the United States.

The undersigned must, therefore, after the most careful consideration of the arguments advanced in Lord Aberdeen's note repeat the opinion which he has heretofore expressed, that if a power such as that which is now asserted by her majesty's government shall be enforced, not only without consent, but in the face of a refusal to concede it, it can be regarded in no other light by the government of the United States than a violation of national rights and sovereignty, and the incontestable principles of international law. That its exercise may lead to consequences of a painful character, there is no room to apprehend. In cases of conflicting rights between nations, the precise line which neither can pass, but to which each may advance, is not easily found or marked; and yet it exists, whatever may be the difficulty of discerning it. In ordinary cases of disagreement there is little danger; each nation may and does give something to the other. Still, however, it is to be feared, in the present case, The preponderance of the power asserted, and the consequences which may be apprehended from its exercise, make it one of an important and momentous character. Involving, as it does, questions of high and dangerous sovereignty, it may justly be regarded as one of the most delicate and important understandings of the two countries. Ought her majesty's government, then, under such circumstances, to insist upon its enforcement? That it will not, the undersigned cannot permit himself to doubt. He will therefore continue to cherish the hope that, upon the careful consideration of the whole subject, her government will see the importance of adopting other measures for the suppression of the slave trade than those now proposed, and which will be far better calculated, not only to accomplish the object desired, but to preserve the friendly relations of the two countries on terms consistent with the interest and honor of both.

The undersigned avails himself of the occasion to renew to Lord Aberdeen assurances of his distinguished consideration and respect,

A. STEVENSON.

To the Earl of Aberdeen.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, DECEMBER 1, 1841.

SIR: The report of the major general commanding the army, and of the heads of the different bureaus, attached to this department, upon the several subjects committed to them are herewith submitted. Consisting of the information, and the fullness of the views thus exhibited, will render superfluous any extended observations from one but recently called to the consideration of the various matters so well presented by officers of great experience and acknowledged ability.

I am, Sir, in the course of the following statement of the general results derived from these reports.

From the general return of the army, contained in the report of the major general, commanding in chief, it appears that the whole number of troops now in service, is ten thousand six hundred and ninety-four, consisting of seven hundred and twenty-eight commissioned officers, and nine thousand nine hundred and sixty-six non-commissioned officers, musicians and privates. The aggregate exceeds the number specified in the report of 1840, by one hundred and twenty-four. Of the whole number, nine thousand eight hundred and eighty-two are reported as present, and the residue, eight hundred and twelve, are absent or sick; of whom four hundred and forty-seven are absent on detached service. To complete the organization of the army, eighteen hundred and thirty-four recruits are required.

During the past year the whole number recruited was four thousand nine hundred and twenty-two.

It is gratifying to find that the number of deserters, within the year, as compared with the number enlisted, has largely diminished.

The disposition of the troops intended for the protection of our inland frontiers, and for garrisoning the forts on the Atlantic, is given in the report.

The residue of the army, consisting, at the last returns of about three thousand five hundred men, but which is now, or will be, reduced soon to three thousand, is employed in the protection of the inhabitants of the United States, and in the offensive operations carried on at that territory.

On the western frontier, the Indians have been kept from wars among themselves, and from hostile acts against our citizens. With the exception of some depredations alleged to have been committed in Texas by the Comanches, and some depredations in California, it is more reasonable than we are, the native tribes appear to be quiet, and indicate no disposition to commence aggressions. On the northern frontier, the presence of the troops has been, and, doubtless, will continue to be, of eminent service in preserving the peaceful relations of the countries, within the adjacent territories of Great Britain. At the northern point, the small force stationed near the disputed boundary line seems required for the same purpose.

Within the year a new aspect has been given to the military operations in Florida. The minuteness and accuracy with which they are detailed in the report of the commanding general, render any other account of them unnecessary. It would be unjust, however, to withhold the expression of that cordial approbation, which is felt by this department, and, it is believed, by the whole country, of the gallant enterprise and patient endurance of the troops and their able commander, Colonel Worth. The numerous engagements which a contest with such enemies must produce in the soldiers of a civilized country, and consulting only the high dictates of duty, they have persevered in a contest which, in the only means of conducting it, more resembles the pursuit of animals, than a warfare with human beings, and in which the triumphs of arms are mingled with pity, not far removed from contempt, for an inglorious foe.

The last advices from that quarter confirm the expectations of a speedy and successful result to the campaign. All that high intelligence, devoted zeal, consummate bravery, and irrepressible energy, can contribute to the success of the military operations, by the troops and their gallant commander, for whom the difficulties of a contest, without resemblance in the history of war, seems to have no terrors.

The suggestions, in the same report, of the commanding general, respecting officers holding appointments at the same time, both in the line and in the staff, with the view of promoting, in each, and respecting the inequality of pay between officers of the same grade, in the different branches of service, are worthy of great consideration, emanating as they do from long experience, the result of intelligent and disinterested observation. And the recommendation of the present general-in-chief, concurring with those already made, and distinguished by the high consideration to pensions, will doubtless attract the attention of congress to that subject.

The very moderate increase of two regiments to our army, recommended in the same report, will unquestionably be received with all the confidence due to any suggestions from such a source. The necessity for such an increase, to man the forts, posts, and fortifications, on our inland and maritime frontiers, will be apparent on a consideration of the plans for the national defence which have been proposed, and wholly or partially adopted. A brief and connected view of those plans seems appropriate and necessary for that purpose, and to a full understanding of those parts of the reports herewith communicated, which are necessary, also, in explanation of the estimates submitted for appropriations to continue and complete the means of protection and defence. In presenting such a view, the occasion will be taken to make such observations as may seem to be required.

The defenses of the country may be regarded under three distinct heads. First, for the protection of the western frontier against Indian hostilities. Second, precautions against aggressions from the colonial possessions of foreign powers in our vicinity, at the north. And third the defence of our maritime frontier.

Under the first head, the plan communicated to the senate, on the 3d day of January, 1838, in pursuance of a resolution of that body, and recommended by the then head of this department, was approved in its general outlines by the board of officers—who reported on the subject in May, 1840, and appears to be well adapted to the purpose. It contemplated a line of exterior posts or advanced posts, Indian frontier, beyond the boundary of existing cessions, for the purpose of overawing and repressing hostilities among the Indians, or against our own settlements; and an interior line of posts, as places of refuge in cases of danger or alarm, with depots for arms and supplies.

There seems to be no reason so far as the exterior line of posts is concerned, why the posts should not be established at those points, should be constructed of wood, so abundantly furnished by the country, or of stone, or other equally indestructible material. From the information which has been received, and from the uniform practice in Indian wars, the better opinion would appear to be, that the detached forts with log houses, would afford sufficient protection against an enemy unprovided with artillery. The rapidity and economy with which they could be erected, in many cases chiefly by the labor of the troops, would give them a decided preference. It is not perceived why the interior line of posts should not be established at those points, nor should also be used as depots of subsistence and military supplies. Six or eight of the exterior line, and eight interior forts, are deemed sufficient. The following are the forts established, which may be considered as forming parts of this plan of defence. Fort Jessup, 35 miles south of Fort Smith, on the road to Texas; Fort Towson, near the confluence of the Kiamichi and Red rivers, in the Choctaw nation, 325 miles from Fort Jessup, and about 50 miles from the western boundary of Arkansas; Fort Smith, situated on the Arkansas river, partly in Arkansas and partly in the Cherokee nation; Fort Gibson, about 60 miles northwest of Fort Towson, on the Arkansas river, and 307 miles from Fort Towson; Fort Wayne, on the Illinois river, in the Cherokee nation, not far from the western boundary of Arkansas, 60 miles from Fort Gibson; Fort Leavenworth, on the right bank of the Missouri river, 286 miles from Fort Smith; Fort Snelling, at the junction of the Mississippi with the Minnesota river, 300 miles from Fort Leavenworth; Fort Crawford, 300 miles below Fort Snelling, on the Mississippi river, about 5 miles from the mouth of the Wisconsin; Fort Winnebago, at the portage between the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, about 130 miles from Fort Crawford; Fort Howard, at the mouth of Green Bay, in Wisconsin; Fort Winnebago; Fort Mackinac, on the island of Michilimackinac, at the outlet of Lake Michigan; Fort Brady, on the St. Mary's river, at the outlet of Lake Superior; and Fort Gratiot, on the St. Clair river, at the outlet of Lake Huron.

Barrecks are in progress at Turkey river, in the Winnebago country, at Fort Smith, and at Fort Leavenworth. At the latter place, a new line of forts extends from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. It is in immediate contact with numerous wild and warlike Indians, who are capable of bringing into the field a number of warriors, estimated at from twenty to thirty thousand. From the intercourse which subsists between them, and the great number of emissaries of foreign nations they may be rendered as formidable as any description of force that could be brought against us. To secure a proper influence over them in peace, and to counteract and control their dispositions in war, to secure our own territory and to protect our traders, it is indispensable that a chain of posts should be established, extending from the Council Bluffs to the mouth of the Columbia river, so as to command the avenues by which the Indians pass from the north to the south; and at the same time maintain a communication with the territories belonging to us on the Pacific.

The present state of our relations with these Indians, already considered, as they must be designed for protection against a powerful enemy, possessing all the means of warfare along a distance of more than two thousand miles. Naval forces on the lakes undoubtedly afford our chief reliance for defence and offence.

To furnish them shelter from tempests, the harbors must be enlarged, and the need of a chain of posts, to secure their supplies, as well as the property and lives of our citizens from an enemy, those harbors, and the most important of the straits and rivers connecting the lakes, should be fortified. The comprehensive and able views of the board of officers on this subject, in their report of May, 1840, already mentioned cannot be strengthened by any remarks from this department.

The omission to make the necessary appropriations, has prevented any thing more than a partial execution of the defence of the northern frontier. Fort Niagara has been reported ready for armament, and a company has been ordered to garrison it. So much has already been done at Fort Oswego, as to justify the belief that it will be soon ready for service. The condition for effective service. Under the appropriations made in September last, for the defensive works at Detroit, Buffalo and the outlet of Champlain, means have been taken to select for their construction, which will be commenced as soon as the titles to those places shall be secured.

The third division of our national defences, those relating to our maritime frontier, presents a subject of the deepest interest.

A board of engineers was organized in 1816, and has continued in existence ever since, to which was specially assigned the duty of preparing a general system of defence for the seaboard. It made personal examinations of every harbor on the whole coast (excepting only a few in East Florida) accessible to sea-going vessels. While the board was thus employed, settling the general principles of defence and selecting positions, its number was augmented by the addition of officers of the navy, generally two post captains. During a portion of this time the functions of the board were extended to embrace the selection of suitable sites for a great northern and southern naval depot. Reports of progress were made in 1817, 1819, 1820, 1821, 1822, 1823, 1824 and 1835; and at two different times, namely, in 1826 and 1836, a summary report was presented to the executive, and sent to congress, describing the system bricly in its application to the several parts of the coast.

The board has been comprised of officers of high rank in the corps of engineers, together with general Bernard, during the thirteen or fourteen years he was in the service.

In pursuance of a resolution of the house of representatives of April 9, 1840, a report from the department was made on the twelfth day in the same year, transmitting one from a board of officers assembled for the purpose of considering the subject, which had been previously reported upon another plan of defence submitted by a distinguished military commander, and gave their reasons, at large, why it ought not to be substituted for that already mentioned, which had been presented by joint commissions of naval and military officers.

To the formation of that system, the greatest military talent and experience of the country have been devoted, and it would ill become one whose pretensions to either are so limited, to attempt a comparison of it with any, or to sustain it by any views of his own. It may be remarked, however, that, so far as the judgment of congress can be gathered from its acts, and so far as an intelligent public opinion has been formed, it is in full and decided favor of the system which has been so deliberately considered, and so long matured; and it may now be regarded as the settled policy of the country.

The elements of that system are, first, naval forces; second, fortifications; and third, interior communications.

As to the first, independent of all other considerations, it is supposed that floating batteries of any description that are to remain stationary at the exposed points cannot be expected, because the aggregate expense of providing and maintaining the large force that would be required for the numerous points of our coast, would be beyond our means. An inconsiderable force at each point would be wholly inadequate to meet that which might be brought against it; and the defence of a few, only, of the most important, would neither answer the expectations of the country, nor fulfil the obligations of the government. A navy, which would cause the war into every sea where the enemy's commerce was to be found, would effectually keep him from our coast, by rendering his presence necessary elsewhere. For the defence of inlets and harbors, whose entrances are shallow, a class of steam vessels, of light draught, would doubtless be necessary; but the number of such vessels would be enormous, such vessels would be indispensable. But where a large number of enemy's ships can find harbors of easy access, and sufficiently capacious to contain them, they cannot be successfully met by an inferior force; and as there is no probability of the capture of the enemy's ships, in the magnitude of their naval establishments, the only resource left us is, in fortifying our harbors and roadsteads.

The second element of defence consists, therefore, in permanent fortifications. While they are more effectual for defence, in certain positions, than floating forces, they are less expensive in construction, more durable, and requiring an outlay in repairs utterly insignificant, when compared with the expense of maintaining ships, and renewing them.

They are deemed indispensable for the purposes of covering the military and naval depots, and all other public or private establishments which would invite the enterprise or the cupidity of a foe, and of excluding him from strong positions, where his naval superiority might enable him to maintain himself, and from which he might make incursions into the interior, or assail an extensive line of coast.

They are deemed necessary to the security of our fortifications along the whole Atlantic coast, from Passamaquoddy bay to Cape Florida, and along the gulf, from that cape, to the mouth of the Sabine, were indicated in the report before mentioned, and the reasons for their selection, the extent and nature of the required works, and the expense of them. The completion of all these works could not be simultaneous, the order of succession was regulated by reference to the value of the object to be covered, to the nation, or to an enemy; its exposure by isolation; its accessibility, depending on distance, time, or climate; the means, sources, and time required for their construction. Most of the existing defences. The order thus established has been adhered to with a few exceptions, occasioned by different views on the part of congress. Great progress in the execution of the system has already been made, of which the details are given in the reports of the ordnance and engineering bureaus. Most of the primary importance, including the largest and most expensive, are nearly completed. About $14,000,000 have been expended, and $9,000,000 more will finish all but those deemed of minor importance, and which may be postponed without risking serious consequences.

More extended remarks upon the system of national defence, but particularly on that part depending on fortifications, are rendered unnecessary by an able and comprehensive report on this subject, prepared by my immediate predecessor, in pursuance of a resolution of the senate of the 3d of March, 1841, and which will be transmitted to that body. Concerning generally, the views expressed in the preceding addition to their strength, could be made by any observations of the undersigned. As the system cannot be abandoned, what has been commenced should be completed; the works intended for the more remote southern portion of our territory, particularly require attention. Indications are given in the design of the fort at St. Augustine, against that region, in the event of hostilities from a certain quarter, to which we cannot be insensible. The estimates submitted, with the means on hand, for the completion of the works at Beaufort and at the mouth of the Cape Fear river, in North Carolina, at Charleston, Savannah, and St. Augustine, will furnish adequate defences to those places. In consequence of the delay that will necessarily attend the completion of Fort Calhoun, in Hampton Roads, the effectual defence of that position would require that a strong field work should be thrown up at Willoughby point, in the event of hostile appearances; and an appropriation of $50,000, at this time; for that purpose, would be important, as its application would be suspended until required by circumstances. In the gulf coast, Pensacola, Mobile bay, and most of the avenues to New Orleans, are fortified. In relation to the fortifications on both these sections of coast, it is believed to be our first duty, as it is certainly the strongest desire of this department, to place the existing works in a state of permanent defence, in the shortest possible period. At this end, such means have been asked, as, without making exorbitant demands upon the treasury, will allow the labor to be carried on vigorously. The winter season is known to be the most favorable to such operations in the latitudes where those works are situated, and the facilities have been improved. Indeed, unless appropriations are made before the month of February, no use can be made of them in those latitudes within a year from the time they are asked. To provide for the points still remaining unprotected, in the event of hostilities being threatened before the facility of fortifications is complete, a resort to steam-vessels of light draught will be necessary; and, in reference to some points, where fortifications would not avail, as already indicated, that species of defence will be indispensable. Five of these in the gulf of Mexico, and seven on the southern part of the Atlantic coast, are deemed necessary by the chief engineers. Their use, however, will be greatly aided by the existence of defended points near at hand, under which the vessels could rendezvous, and which would, at the same time, protect the harbors for the service of our military and commercial marine. An appropriation of $40,000 for the completion of the work at the mouth of Cumberland sound, and a similar sum for a work at or near the outlet of St. Simon's sound, these being the best harbors on that part of the coast within the state of Georgia, would, in this point of view, be highly expedient. The security of Mobile bay would be greatly promoted by a work on Dauphin or Pelican island, and one at Pas au Heron, and these works would add greatly to the protection of the coast passage along the gulf. An appropriation of $60,000, for these, would be judicious. The appropriations now suggested, are in addition to the general estimates from this department, for the construction of any of the works indicated, a preliminary survey of their positions will be directed; and the propriety of such a direction being now given, is under consideration.

A third element, of great importance in the consideration of the defences of the sea coast and of the northern and northwestern frontiers, consists in the facility and rapidity of interior communications. They are strictly means of defence, and incapable of being perverted to any purpose of conquest; a feature which commends them to every friend of our institutions. The facility afforded by the ocean to movements for the purposes of attack, is met by a corresponding facility to the defence, by the employment of gunboats and in the application of steam-power to land carriage, and in the construction of lengthened lines of canals. The speed with which troops can be moved, obviates the necessity of embodying large masses of them at any point; and the amount of force required for the defence of any point, is thereby greatly diminished. In proportion to the reduction in the time necessary to concentrate it. The whole force along the whole line may be rendered available for the defence of any point in that line; while, without such means of communication, a separate army would be required at each point, and for military purposes, the country would be defended. This may be illustrated by facts within the knowledge of all. Troops may now be brought from New York to the city of Washington in eighteen hours, in a condition requiring little or no repose to fit them for immediate action. And the whole physical force of the population of the country between these points, may be concentrated at any intermediate place in a few hours. Were Philadelphia assailed or threatened, a movement of military force from Pittsburg, which but a short time since would have occupied from twenty to twenty-five days could now be accomplished in five. Similar facilities would be furnished by various rail roads, and canals in different parts of the country. And as the great secret of success in war is supposed to be the ability to oppose the many to the few, it is evident that, in any defensive operations, we shall be able to compete with and to conquer any power that may be brought against that portion of our territory which is intersected by these interior communications. Another consequence of no little moment flows from the same cause: the power to defend ourselves with armies of very diminished numerical force, compared with those which have heretofore been necessary in our national conflicts, or those which are usually employed on the European continent.

The facilities afforded by canals and rail roads to collect, with any desirable expedition, the supplies of an army from a country abounding with them, and to transport them to the proper points, render large depots unnecessary. An object of attack to an enemy, is thus removed, and the consequences of the capture of large collections of munitions of war, or of subsistence, by a hostile force, thus enabled to maintain itself, are obviated.

The expense of military operations will be reduced beyond what could have been expected, aided by the same facilities. During the last war with Great Britain, the cost of transportation from New York to Plattsburg, Sackett's Harbor, and Buffalo, was from five to twelve dollars per hundred. The present cost to Plattsburg is thirty cents, and to the other point named, sixty cents per hundred. A twelve pounder, which, at the cheapest rate, could not have been carried to Buffalo for less than two hundred dollars, may now be transported to the same point, in one-fifth or one-eighth of the time, for twenty-four dollars. In every point of view in which these works can be considered, their cost is so much actually added to the defensive means of the nation, without any expense to the general government other than the subscriptions it has authorized to a few of them; and it may be affirmed, without exaggeration, that the aggregate of saving, in any future war in which we may be engaged, will be a very small amount of military force that will be necessary for defence, and in the cheapness of transportation afforded by rail roads and canals now in existence, will be equal to the cost of their construction. If, then, the making of these works has been premature or imprudent, in reference to the means of the states that undertook them, and have involved them in pecuniary embarrassments, the national government should not complain of an enterprise that has placed these incalculable advantages in its hands; and if it cannot relieve, will at least sympathize in their necessities, which have resulted from such efforts. The report from the ordnance bureau, explaining the measures which have been taken for the armament of fortifications, and the forts which have been wholly or partially armed. This object will be steadily and vigorously pursued, to the extent of the means provided by congress. The estimate for that purpose is the amount of the annual appropriation being necessary to the completion of the armaments so rapidly as the nature of the service would permit. It is to be hoped that in view of the great importance of the object, no reduction of the estimate will be made.

The attention of congress has, for the last ten years, been repeatedly invoked to the necessity of a foundry for cannon, belonging to, and under the charge of the government; but, from an apprehension of the great expense which it was supposed would be incurred by such an establishment, or from a doubt of its necessity, nothing has as yet been done. Besides the great expense, which such a plan might be devised on a much more limited scale of expense, which would attain the principal objects in view, the ordnance bureau was directed to consider and mature such a plan, and estimate the cost of its execution. The accompanying report, (No. 12), from that bureau presents such a plan, explains the important use to which it is proposed to be put, and from its adoption, and furnishes estimates of the expense of its execution. Some additional views in its favor are presented in the accompanying letter of the chief engineer. I cannot hesitate earnestly to recommend its execution. It is known that there are some products of the present mode of manufacturing our mines, of various qualities, and adapted to different uses. While one species may be valuable for many purposes, it is utterly unfit for others. It is supposed, also, that its value may depend much on the kind of fuel used in its fabrication. It is not to be expected that the propriety of the plan, or of these and various other matters connected with the manufacture of cannon of the best quality can be made at private expense. Nor, if they were, could such entire reliance be placed on their results as if they had been conducted by disinterested public officers. Besides, the government is almost exclusively the purchaser of the article, and has the deepest interest in its quality. It is, therefore, peculiarly its interest as well as duty to assist, by all proper means, the manufacture, in the cheapest manner, of the best material. The experience already obtained of the great improvement in our arms, which has resulted by the operations of the national armories, affords the guarantee that similar results will attend the employment of similar means in the construction of cannon. As it is not proposed to take the business into the hands of the government exclusively, but to continue the purchase of cannon from private establishments, the expense of executing the plan will be comparatively unimportant. The foundry may be connected with one of our arsenals, so as to be under the charge of officers already in the public service, by which the cost of construction and supervision may be essentially diminished. Admonished, as we are, by the efforts of other nations to improve the weapons of destruction, it would seem that no time should be lost in the necessary incipient measures—to select and purchase a site for a foundry, on the limited scale suggested, but equipped and supplied according to future exigencies; and it is therefore hoped that the sum estimated for that purpose will be appropriated at the coming session of congress.

In the report from this department submitted to congress with the president's message at the last session, the objections to the existing and proposed national armories were fully stated, and the propriety of dispensing with such agencies, was forcibly urged. A board of very competent citizens was appointed, on the 19th of August last, to examine the armory at Springfield, and their very able report fully justifies the objections that had been thus made. It shows, what might indeed have been expected, that the immediate and direct responsibility secured by the employment of the regular officers having charge of every other branch of the military service, was wanting in this, and that it could not be attained so long as a person was employed as superintendent, who is not free from obligations to his superior officers. System and regularity in the hours of labor, are as essential in this as in any other workshop.—The 9th section of the act of February 8, 1815, and which section is still in force, places the different public armories under the direction of the ordnance department, in order "to ensure the uniformity and regularity in their operations." There were officers of that department who could be spared from other service to take charge of the armories, and they were detailed for that purpose by the head of this department who immediately preceded the present incumbent. It is to be regretted that the uniformity with the spirit of the law, and finding its propriety confirmed by the evidence afforded by the report already mentioned, it has been adhered to. The office of superintendent, therefore, has been left vacant from a consideration of its being not only unnecessary, but positively injurious to the distribution of small arms to the several states. Great inequalities exist, and great injustice is done to many of the states in the present mode. The recommendations in the report relating to an increase of force in the office, and the regulation of the pay of the clerks, may doubtless receive the consideration to which they are entitled.

The proceedings of the ordnance board in revising and amending the armament of the troops, are stated in the report. The advantage already derived from the information acquired by the officers who were sent to Europe has evinced the wisdom of that measure.

The danger to the populous places in the vicinity of the stores of gunpowder belonging to the government, and the hazard to which those stores are exposed by such contiguity, suggested the propriety of an inquiry whether a depot for the reserved powder, and a warehouse for ordinary stores, might be established in some spot where it would be as secure as human art could render it, and where in case of explosion, the least possible injury would be produced. A board of officers was accordingly appointed to make such inquiry; whose report is herewith submitted. (No. 13.) The indications of the report are strongly suggested by them is respectfully recommended.

The quartermaster general's report exhibits the very extensive operations of that department during the past year, and the efficiency and energy with which they have been prosecuted. They embrace so much of detail as to preclude an enumeration of them in this paper. The various recommendations which are made by the distinguished officers at the head of that department, will doubtless receive all the consideration which is due to the suggestions of great experience and high military talent. Among those which appear to the undersigned as most deserving immediate attention are the following:

The recommendation of a military road within our acknowledged limits, to supply subsistence and other stores to Fort Kent and Fairfield, in the state of Maine. Circumstances of a peculiar character seem to demand that no time should be lost in the commencement of this work.

The establishment of a strong fort at Fort Brady, with commodious barracks, commanding the communication with Lake Superior, seems also indispensable.

And a post on the Missouri frontier, south of Fort Leavenworth, is necessary, in connection with the plan of defence for that portion of our territory.

The propriety of commencing the erection of permanent works in the keys or on the peninsula of Florida, is strongly presented.

Of the utility of opening and improving some, if not all, the interior communications mentioned in the report, at some time, there probably can be little doubt; whether that time has arrived, will be for the wisdom of congress to decide.

The delay in the settlement of the accounts of officers, alluded to in the same report, is unquestionably a great source of evil. A report from the second auditor has been made, pursuant to a call from this department, by which it appears that there are 1,173 accounts remaining in his office unsettled; of which ten were presented prior to 1839, four in that year, sixteen in 1840, and 1,143 in 1841. A similar report from the third auditor shows that there are 1,344 accounts in his office unsettled; of which 257 were presented prior to 1839, 373 in that year, 436 in 1840, 738 in 1841. Whatever may be the cause of this delay, (which is believed not to be in any want of efficiency in the auditors or their clerks, but rather in the inordinate amount of business and the more frequent calls for information), its existence is most injurious to the government, and often ruinous to the individuals concerned. If the remedy is to be found in an increase of force in those offices, there can be no doubt of the necessity of its prompt application.

A change in the mode of accounting for property in the hands of officers, suggested in the same report, is earnestly recommended, as equally necessary to the protection of the government and the security of its agents. Such a change will do much to diminish the labors of the auditors' offices.

The increase in the number of the troops called into service in Florida, in 1839, by the governor of that territory, seem to be just. There is a difficulty, however, in directing their payment by this department, in consequence of the only appropriation on the subject—that made by the act of September 9, 1841—being, by its reference to the act of 1836, limited to the troops called into service under the authority of the war department. Although such authority was given for a larger number than was actually raised, yet the troops in question seem not to have been called into service under it, but under an act of the territorial legislature, and were not mustered into the service of the United States. The remedy requires the interposition of congress, as well to defray the charges for subsistence, as to provide for the pay of the troops; and it is hoped that no objections of a merely technical character will prevent full justice being done to the militia who obeyed the call of the government.

The strong appeal made by the quartermaster general to the justice of the country to redeem the pledge given by him to the Creeks, as a consideration for their removal to the west, and of their raising a regiment of warriors who served faithfully in Florida, cannot be resisted consistently with any regard for the principles which it is the object of our institutions to maintain. Infidelity to our engagements, and a refusal to remunerate faithful service, will not increase either the confidence or respect of the Indians who have relied on our honor. It is to be hoped that the subject will be examined, and full justice rendered by congress to the warriors.

The progress which has been made in the construction and improvement of the fortifications at the different harbors on the sea coast will be seen from the report of the chief engineer. The means for these purposes having been appropriated at the extra session of congress, but little time has been given for the employment of the troops. It will be seen that the works have been vigorously prosecuted, and that probably more than was contemplated has been accomplished.

It will be seen that some of the most important works for the defence of the harbor of New York were commenced, and that the appropriations for them were recommended at the late session. It is of the utmost consequence, to the protection of that city, that prompt and decisive action should be had upon the subject.

The same report shows what has been done toward the completion of the various improvements, and the continuation of roads heretofore undertaken by the government, and in charge of the engineer department. The want of appropriations has arrested these works and exposed some of them to the inevitable injuries consequent upon their being left in an unfinished state. Every consideration of policy and justice seems to require that these should no longer remain, either as memorials of any inprovidence in undertaking them, or of an instability of purpose in refusing to prosecute works of unquestioned usefulness. If any of them are of such a character that they ought not to be completed, they should be discontinued directly and unequivocally; and those which are worthy the enterprise of a liberal and paternal government, should be vigorously prosecuted and finished.

The presentation of the military academy at West Point is exhibited in the report of the chief engineer and in that of the board of visitors, selected from the different portions of the United States, to scrutinize all its affairs. There is great reason to congratulate the country upon the success which has attended the measures adopted by the government to furnish the means of military instruction to our youth, and of preserving and improving that science upon which our safety in war must at all times depend. In an age remarkable for the extent to which human inventions, in all departments, have been carried, and in which the art of war has undergone essential modifications, from the introduction of new agents and the improvement of those previously existing, it would indeed be a reproach to the intelligence of our country, and a reflection upon the tendencies of our free institutions, if we refused or neglected to avail ourselves of the only means by which we can give to the bravery of our citizens the aid of that science which is alone necessary to render them equal to the skillful cohorts that may be sent to our shores by a European nation. The time has long since passed, if it ever existed, when mere valor could compete with discipline and science. If education be necessary to prepare for any profession, surely that of arms cannot be an exception. As it is, in its nature, one that cannot derive any support from private interests or individual employment, but is wholly public in its uses, the provision for acquiring it must be made by the government, or it will not be made at all, or not in a manner and to an extent adequate to the service.

By imparting the highest degree of military science to the young men who are annually sent forth from the academy, the country gains not only a large number of accomplished individuals, but the information which they possess becomes diffused among the body of the army, and the dissemination of the science for the improvement of the militia. Indeed, that sure ultimate resource, in any conflict in which we may be engaged, will be indebted for its advancement more to the establishment of an institution in which the military knowledge of the world is collected, preserved, and taught, than to any one other cause. The spirit the improved discipline, and the furnished alignment for the instruction of the militia. Indeed, that sure ultimate resource, in any conflict in which we may be engaged, will be indebted for its advancement more to the establishment of an institution in which the military knowledge of the world is collected, preserved, and taught, than to any one other cause. The spirit the improved discipline, and the furnished alignment for the instruction of the militia.

The improvements recommended by the board of visitors, which are within the competency of this department, will receive the careful consideration to which the high source from which they emanate entitles them. Those which depend on the action of congress, it is hoped, will meet the favor of that body.

The suggestion that provision be made for an additional instruction, and that the government should employ some of its present duties, that he may devote more time to the moral instruction of the pupils, will commend itself to every mind that reflects on the dangers to which they are exposed in consequence of their being "separated from the wholesome restraints of friends and kindred, and deprived of parental guidance."

The remarks of the visitors on the indispensable necessity of new and enlarged barracks, as well for the health as the intellectual improvement of the cadets, present the subject so strongly as not to admit of any further observations in their support, other than that, in any war in which this country may be engaged, it is a recommendation that has already been strenuously urged upon the attention of congress.

The course of instruction at West Point is, however imperfect in one essential particular—the means of acquiring practical knowledge of the duties of sappers, miners and pontooners. Although it is not deemed that, in any war in which this country may be engaged, we shall have occasion to attack many other fortifications than such as may be captured from us by an enemy; yet, while the knowledge referred to would be indispensable even for such a purpose, the defence of such places equally requires the knowledge of the duties of sappers, miners and pontooners. It would be assumed, that we may be prepared to counteract them. But in any warfare which should be carried on upon our territory, the most effectual means of crossing streams by the construction of bridges, or otherwise, with the greatest expedition, of embarrassing an enemy in his march or retreat, and of protecting our own forces, would be elements of the greatest importance, and like all other operations of human agency, they are to be improved and perfected only by the combination of science with practical experience. It is earnestly hoped that these considerations, with those so powerfully stated in the report of the chief engineer, and those so repeatedly urged by my predecessors, will induce congress to make the necessary appropriation for the establishment, at West Point, of a corps of sappers, miners, and nonpointers.

The report of the officer having charge of the bureau of topographical engineers, affords us the most satisfactory evidence of the great ability and usefulness of that corps. Having been very recently organized, and not being furnished with means for any extensive operations until within the past year, its capacity and utility are now, for the first time, fully demonstrated. The most important months of its career, of the boundary line between us and Texas, from the mouth of the Sabine to Red river, and of the Des Moines and Iowa rivers, have been completed, while the most difficult part of the boundary between Michigan and Wisconsin has been finished. The surveys of the lakes, and that of the northeastern boundary, are in progress. The means of preparatory operations, and the remainder of the important work are detailed in the report, and that important work will be prosecuted with vigor.

It will be perceived that the works for the improvement of harbors already authorised have been arranged into two classes: first, those of great importance and immediate necessity; and second, those of perhaps equal importance, but in respect to which there are no peculiar circumstances so urgent for speedy action as in the first class. The plan of proceeding gradually, with a due regard to economy and the condition of the treasury, and with reference to the means and equipment of the different parts of the country, will it is believed, be more likely to accomplish a greater amount of the desired improvement than any other mode.

The total estimates for the works of the first class is $575,000, while the very moderate sum of $30,000 is asked to preserve those of the second class from decay. It should not be inferred that any intention exists of abandoning many most valuable and important works, for which no specific estimates are submitted. On the contrary, the very recommendation to preserve them proceeds from a desire for their completion at the proper time, and in due course, in reference to the principles before stated.

The works for which specific estimates are submitted are upon the Atlantic and lake coasts, of which by far the largest amount is for the former.

While justice is thus done to the maritime frontier, in the improvement of its harbors and in the provisions for its military and naval defenses, the exceedingly important and rapidly increasing commerce of the lakes is fairly entitled to consideration and assistance, by rendering accessible the harbors universally obstructed by natural impediments, and by affording light houses for a hazardous navigation. At the present time, this commerce, based on the productions of seven states and one territory, must annually exceed $10,000,000; and as it expands and increases it will give additional value to the public domain, which will soon add its tributary streams to the great tide of internal trade that flows from Lake Superior to the Atlantic.

Having now two corps of officers, composed of gentlemen of the highest scientific acquirements, combined with much experience, there can no longer be any reasons for making appropriations to improve harbors or rivers, in the absence of full and accurate information from those equally competent and disinterested. I concur, therefore, entirely in the remark made by a predecessor in 1839, that the whole system may be brought into deserved disrepute, unless examinations are directed, and reports had, previous to any appropriations for such purposes.

The report of the paymaster general and the acting surgeon general, show the operations of those departments and the activity that prevails in them.

The reports of the commissary general of subsistence exhibits several gratifying results. The expense for subsistence will be considerably diminished the ensuing year. There has been great promptness in the rendering of their accounts by the disbursing officers, and in the settlement of those of the army and special contractors; and not a cent has been lost during the year through the regular disbursing officers of the department, or its temporary agents.

The report of the commissary of purchases contains the usual statements of the quantity of materials of clothing on hand and procured during the year, the quantity made up, and the balance remaining; the quantity of each of the different articles made up at the clothing establishment and issued, and the quantity on hand; and the quantity of clothing, and of camp and garrison equipage on hand and purchased during the year, the quantity issued and the balance on hand. There is also a statement of the comparative cost of the different articles of clothing, &c. for the last three years, from which it appears there has been a reduction in the cost of nearly all of them during the last year.

Deeming the establishment of a clothing bureau at the city of Washington, in conflict with the provisions of the act of May, 1826, by which the quartermaster's department is charged with the duty of receiving from the purchasing department, and distributing to the army, all clothing and camp and garrison equipage, it has been discontinued, and its business will hereafter be conducted under the supervision of the quartermaster general. By this arrangement a more effectual accountability is secured.

From the report of the commissioner of pensions, it will be seen that during the last year, the number of pensioners on the rolls has diminished more than one third, the greatest proportion having occurred among the invalids, the revolutionary pensioners under the act of 1818, and the widows of certain persons who served in the war of the revolution, under the act of 1792. The whole number of all descriptions on the rolls at the date of the last annual report, was forty-four thousand three hundred and ninety-four. The whole number at present is twenty-six thousand five hundred and thirty-one, of whom two thousand six hundred and five are invalids; three thousand nine hundred and fifty-eight receive pensions under the act of 1818; four hundred and thirty-six under the act of 1828; sixteen thousand six hundred and eighty-two under the act of 1792; and three hundred and three under the act of 1836; and five hundred and forty-seven widows under the act of 1838.

The vexatious operation of the act of 1838, which requires pensions, unclaimed for eight months, to be returned to the treasury, has heretofore been presented to the consideration of congress, and I cannot but concur in the recommendation for its repeal.

I cannot refrain from calling attention to the case of the wounded Cherokee Indians, to whom the faith of the nation was pledged by the 14th article of the treaty with the Cherokees, of the 29th December, 1835, to provide pensions to such as were engaged on the side of the United States, in the late war with Great Britain and the southern tribes of Indians, and who were wounded in such service. The few who remain have applied in vain to the pension office for the promised remuneration; but it is to be hoped that justice, although tardy, will now be rendered to them.

Justice, although not a part of the late first clerk of the boundary land office, it appears that about twenty claims for warrants, for revolutionary services, have been filed and duly established since the 1st day of January, 1840, on which day the last law for extending the term of the warrants expired. It is also ascertained that one hundred and fourteen claims for warrants on account of services rendered in the late war with Great Britain, have been deposited and established, although the act authorising such warrants expired on the 26th day of May, 1839. The act authorising the issue of warrants for Revolutionary services, expired on the 30th of September, 1839, it appears that thirteen claims of a similar character were presented and substantiated in that year, after the expiration of the act: and by a like report, for the year 1840, it appears that seventy-six claims were established, and that the act authorising the issue of the same expired act; making the total number thus established, up to the 15th November last, two hundred and three. The authority for issuing these warrants having expired, it is difficult to perceive on what ground the claims have been established. It is to be feared that the validity of the proofs that may have been taken since that authority ceased.

The same remark applies to the claims for services rendered in the war of the revolution. The attention of congress having been repeatedly called to the fact, that the laws on the subject of both these descriptions of claims had become obsolete, and no act reviving them having been passed, the utility of maintaining a distinct bureau for their examination was not perceived; and whatever business remains to be done, has been placed under the supervision of the commissioner of pensions, with his assent.

commissioner or secretary a dereliction of duty to omit calling the attention of congress to a subject to which it has been so often invited by a predecessor in this department, namely, the insecurity and inconvenience of the buildings in which, for want of room in the war office, the offices of the paymaster general, of the ordnance bureau, of the chief military engineer, of the topographical engineers, and the commissioner of pensions are kept. Models, curves, maps, reports and other documents of incalculable value, belonging to these bureaus, are imminently exposed. Some immediate provision for a suitable building seems indispensable.

By a joint resolution of congress, approved February 13, 1829, the secretary of war was authorised to contract for the purchase of the island at the confluence of the St. Peter's and Mississippi rivers; and to report his proceedings to congress, subject to their approval or rejection. On the 12th March, 1839, the contract was made, and the sum of $12,000 agreed to be paid for the property. The land was to be used for military purposes, being adjacent to Fort Snelling, an estimate for an appropriation for its purchase has been submitted, in a form which will relieve the subject of all difficulty respecting the title to the land, by leaving it to the proper department to ascertain the persons entitled to the purchase money. A communication of my immediate predecessor to the secretary of war, dated at Washington the 23d September, 1841, will furnish all the information on the subject in the possession of this department.

Pursuant to the appropriation in the act of September 9, 1841, for defraying the expenses of selecting suitable site on the western waters for the establishment of a national armory, a board of officers, consisting of Brevet Brigadier General Armistead, Lieutenant Colonel Long, of the topographical engineers, and Surgeon General Lawson, has been appointed to make the necessary examinations. They are now engaged in that duty, and their report on the subject will be laid before you as soon as it shall be received.

The report of the commissioner of Indian Affairs presents much valuable information concerning the very important matters in charge of that bureau. The absence of the commissioner in the negotiation of a treaty, when the undersigned was called to the report, was an unfortunate circumstance. Afterward, in the report, the very short time allowed for the examination and consideration of the various and complicated relations with the Indian tribes, will account for the omission. In this report, of views and opinions which might be otherwise expected. Believing it to be the duty of the undersigned to call to the attention and mature deliberation, it will not cease to engage the most strenuous efforts to improve its administration, and promote the interests of the helpless people who are the objects of its care; and, on occasion should require any suggestions for those purposes, they will hereafter be the subject of a special report.

The amendments made by the president and senate to the treaty with the Miami tribe, were assented to by them in the month of June last; thus extinguishing the Indian title to lands throughout the whole state of Indiana. An arrangement has also been made with the Saganaw Indians, by which certain omissions in the treaty of 1837 have been supplied, and the cession of their lands intended to be embraced in it, has been completed.

Since the adjournment of congress, a treaty has been concluded with some of the bands of the Sioux, for lands not included in any previous negotiation, and another has been made with the half-breeds of the Sioux, for a session of the lands set apart to them by the 9th article of the treaty held at Prairie du Chien, on the 15th of July. 1838.

A treaty is now negotiating with the Wyandots for their lands in the state of Ohio, which, it is believed, will soon be brought to a conclusion. The attempt to negotiate with the Sacs and Foxes has utterly failed. As the causes of this failure are believed to be temporary, or such as may be removed by arrangements with other tribes, a renewed effort will be made when a propitious occasion shall offer.

And when I regret that the information respecting the state of the Indian schools is so scanty and imperfect. Few subjects command themselves more strongly to all our sympathies as men and Christians, than the education and civilization of the Indian population. The obligations of partnership in the sacred obligations resulting from the provisions made in various treaties for that purpose, and from the appropriations by congress, shall be faithfully discharged. The recommendation of the commissioner to revive the school at Dancing Rabbit Creek, under the 14th article of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, and that proposing that authority should be given for the sale of lands at once, upon their being ceded, on which buildings have been erected, or improvements made, shall be faithfully and promptly and respectfully commended to the consideration of congress.

The condition of the accounts of the disbursing agents must attract prompt attention. There appear to be a large balance against some of those agents, who are supposed to be entitled to credits of equal amounts for expenditures, but which credits cannot be allowed under existing laws in consequence of the sums thus expended being taken from other funds. Some law like that suggested by the commissioner, authorizing transfers of appropriations, seems indispensable; and the interest of government as well as of the agents, requires that it should be passed as speedily as possible.

Measures have been taken to execute the act of 1834, in relation to intrusions on Indian lands, for the purpose of preventing the sale of liquor and unlicensed trading, which it is hoped may prove successful.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN C. SPENCER.

TO THE PRESIDENT.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

DECEMBER 9. Mr. Woodbridge, of Michigan, appeared in his seat.
On motion the 34th rule of the senate was so far suspended as to admit the chair to appoint the standing committees.

The senate then adjourned to Monday, 12 o'clock.

DECEMBER 13. Mr. Sevier, of Arkansas, appeared in his place to-day.
A message was received from the president of the United States, covering a report from the secretary of war, made in compliance with a resolution of the senate of the 3d of March last, showing the comparative condition of the public defenses. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The president of the senate laid before that body a report from the secretary of state, made according to law, showing the incidental and contingent expenses of that department ending on the 30th September, 1841. Also, from the secretary of the navy, exhibiting the contingent expenses of the secretary of the navy and navy commissioners' offices, which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Mangum gave notice that to-morrow he would introduce a committee in relation to the appointment of a committee to investigate or regulate the public printing.

A message was received from the house of representatives, stating that it had passed a resolution appointing on its part a committee of three members to direct the expenditure of all moneys appropriated for the purchase of books for the library of congress.

Mr. Clayton moved that the resolution be concurred in, which motion was adopted.

Mr. Sevier expressed at the same time a desire that he might not be appointed on the committee on the part of the senate, as he desired to be relieved from the duties. He would move that the chair appoint the committee; which motion was concurred in.

On motion, the senate proceeded to the election of chaplain. Twelve yeas and four nays were given, thirty-four yeas, number the Rev. Mr. Tustion received 28; the Rev. Mr. Gurley 3; the Rev. Mr. Clarke 2; and Rev. Mr. Bullfinch 1. The senate then adjourned.

DECEMBER 14. The president of the senate laid before the body a report from the secretary of the treasury, made in compliance with the act of 2d March, 1831, in relation to certain insolvent debtors of the United States.

A report from the secretary of war, made according to law, accompanied by abstracts of the expenditures of the contingent funds of the department and its offices for the year 1841.

The president of the senate announced the following as the standing committees of the 2d session of 27th congress:

On foreign relations—Mr. Rives, chairman, Preston, Buchanan, Tallmadge, Choate.
On finance—Mr. Evans, chairman, Berrien, Woodbury, Mangum, Bayard.

On commerce—Mr. Huntington, chairman, Woodbridge, King, Barrow, Wright.
On manufactures—Mr. Simmons, chairman, Archer, Miller, Buchanan, Morehead.

On agriculture—Mr. Linn, chairman, Bates, Barrow, Sturgeon, Simmons.

On military affairs—Mr. Preston, chairman, Merrick, Benton, Archer, Pierce.

On the militia—Mr. Phelps, chairman, Fulton, Smith, of Indiana, Williams, McRoberts.

On naval affairs—Mr. Mangum, chairman, Archer, Williams, Choate, Bayard.

On public lands—Mr. Smith, of Indiana, chairman, Tallmadge, Walker, Huntington, Prentiss.

On private land claims—Mr. Henderson, chairman, Linn, of Tappan, Fulton, Dixon.

On Indian affairs—Mr. Morehead, chairman, White, Sevier, Phelps, Benton.

On claims—Mr. Graham, chairman, Wright, Woodbury, Woodbridge, Phelps.

On resolutions—Mr. Smith, of Indiana, chairman, Clay, Smith, of Connecticut, Allen, Cutbush.

On the judiciary—Mr. Berrien, chairman, Clayton, Prentiss, Walker, Kerr.

On the post office and post roads—Mr. Merrick, chairman, Simmons, McRoberts, Mouton, Miller.

On roads and canals—Mr. Porter, chairman, White, Young, King, Cutbush.

On pensions—Mr. Bates, chairman, Pierce, Allen, Graham, Sevier.

On the District of Columbia—Mr. Bayard, chairman, Clayton, King, Kerr, Rives.

On patents and the patent office—Mr. Prentiss, chairman, Forter, Henderson, Mouton, Sturgeon.

On the public buildings—Mr. Kerr, chairman, Fulton, Evans.

On engraving bills—Mr. McRoberts, chairman, Miller, Sturgeon.

On enrolled bills—Mr. Porter and Mr. Williams.

On library—Messrs. Preston, Tappan and Choate.

On the contingent expenses of the senate—Mr. White, chairman, Tappan, Evans.

Memorials and petitions were then presented and referred.

The following bills were introduced on leave, read a first and second time, and appropriately referred:

By Mr. Prentiss: A bill to establish a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States.

By Mr. King: A bill to establish an additional land district in the state of Alabama.

By Mr. Williams: A bill to provide for settlement with the state of Maine for her claims for the services of her militia.

By Mr. Pierce: A bill to provide for the payment of invalid pensions of certain Cherokee warriors, under the 14th article of the treaty of 1835.

By Mr. Fulton: A bill allowing drawback upon foreign merchandise exported in the original packages to Chihuahua and Santa Fe, in Mexico.

By Mr. Berrien: A bill to provide for the payment of the claims of the state of Georgia, for the services of her militia, called out in cases of emergency to suppress Indian hostilities.

By Mr. Woodbury: A bill for increasing the pay of certain officers of the revenue cutter service when serving in the navy of the United States.

Mr. Mangum said, in accordance with the notice he gave yesterday, he would now present the following resolution:

Resolved, That a standing committee of the senate be appointed, to whom shall be referred every question on printing of documents, reports or other matter transmitted by either of the executive departments, and all memorials, petitions, accompanying documents, together with all other matter, the printing of which shall be moved, except bills originating in congress, resolutions offered by any senator, and motions to print, by order of the standing committees of the senate, of reports, documents or other matters pertaining to the subjects referred to such committees by the senate; and it shall be the duty of such committee on printing to report in every case, in one day, or sooner, if practicable.

Mr. Mangum said that he supposed the resolution would lie upon the table one day. He had made some alteration in the resolution, which made an exception in favor of all the regular business, reports of bills, resolutions of the standing committees, petitions, &c. The design of this resolution was to supersede the committee on printing, and such matters as came from the departments. It was not courteous to the standing committees that such matters should be referred, and for that purpose the appointment of a standing committee had been moved. The object was to cut off that branch of printing, a great deal of which was done, and which was unnecessary for the country.

Mr. King suggested that it lie over and be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. Linn submitted the following:

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to improve the navigation of the Ohio, Mississippi, and Missouri rivers, by the removal of snags, sawn trees, and other obstructions in their beds, which annually destroy a great number of steamboats and other water craft, and a vast amount of produce and merchandise.

Mr. Mouton submitted the following:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform the senate what amount of public lands are now surveyed and prepared for market in the state of Louisiana, and what amount of lands in said state have been advertised for sale by proclamation, and the sales afterwards suspended.

And then the senate, after a short executive session, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, DEC. 9. [The following members attended on Wednesday, in addition to those previously named:—Mr. Woodbridge, v. z. Messrs. Southers, P. C. Caldwell, Ferris, McKay, S. H. Butler, Mallory, John Hastings, King, W. Butler, Sprigg, Baker and Egbert.]

The hon. Joseph R. Ingersoll, member elect from the state of Pennsylvania, vice the hon. John Sergeant, resigned, introduced to the house by Mr. Toland, was qualified and took his seat.

The following members also appeared: Messrs. C. J. Ingersoll, Elisha H. Allen, David Bronson and John Thompson Mason.

Mr. Fillmore rose and submitted resolutions providing for the distribution of the message to the proper committees, upon which some debating ensued, which led to no material issue. He urged the importance to the speaker of knowing what select committees were to be raised.

Mr. Gilmer said that every member knew what regular standing committees must be raised. On that point no further debate was necessary. He desired that the speaker should first announce the standing committees, and the house could then better judge of the propriety of appointing special committees with a view to particular subjects.

A message was received from the senate by A. Dickens, ex. secretary, stating that that body had passed a resolution providing "that two chaplains, of different denominations, be elected to congress during the present session, one by each house, to interchange weekly," and asking the concurrence of the house thereon.

A message in writing was received from the president of the United States, by the hands of Robert Tyler, ex. his secretary.

Mr. Clifford rose and addressed the chair, when the speaker reminded him that debate on the resolutions of the gentleman from N. York (Mr. Fillmore) was not in order, they not having been received.

Mr. Lawrence, of Pennsylvania, then rose and addressed the house in the following words:

"MR. SPEAKER: I rise to perform the melancholy duty of announcing to the house the death of a respected colleague, the hon. HENRY BLACK, late a member of this house from the state of Pennsylvania."

He died on the 28th of November, of apoplexy, at his residence in Somerset county.

But a few months had passed away since my colleague from Adams was called upon to announce the death of the predecessor of Judge Black, the hon. Charles Ogile. To supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Ogile, Judge Black was elected by a very large majority of the people of the district. He took his seat in the house during the late extra session at an advanced stage of the session, but still in time to participate in most of the important measures passed upon by congress during that period; and although the time allowed to him here was too short to form a general acquaintance with all the members, still all who knew him must have been struck by the calmness and wisdom of his mind, and the mild and amiable in his temper, modest and unassuming in his character and intercourse, unyielding in his integrity, with principles firmly established, yet with a mind always open to reason. Honored in early life with the confidence of the people of his district, he was elected a member of the legislature of his native state, where he served with honor. Subsequently he was appointed a judge of the court, where he remained until his destiny was changed by those who "delighted to honor him," by giving him a seat on this floor, where he has filled the measure of his public service.

Mr. Speaker, while, in common with my colleagues, I feel deeply sensible on the occasion, yet I stand in a relation to the deceased peculiar to myself. He was the companion of my boyhood, my acquaintance in riper years, my friend in private and my associate in public life. I knew his worth, and I feel his loss.

It was day previous to his death he was the enjoyment of usual health, with a fair prospect of a vigorous old age, surrounded by his family and friends, expecting shortly to exchange the sweets of domestic enjoyment for the bustle of public life. But the decree had gone forth; another day, and he is in the world no more.

This suddenly has his family and numerous friends been plunged into deep distress by the loss of an affectionate husband, a tender parent, and a devoted friend. I will conclude by offering for the consideration of the house a resolution which I hold in my hand:

Resolved, That this house has heard with deep regret the announcement of the death of the hon. HENRY BLACK, of PENNSYLVANIA, late a member of this congress, and that the members of this house will testify their respect for his memory by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days."

Which being adopted the house adjourned.

FRIDAY, DEC. 10. The speaker stated that there were several executive communications on his table, but that as the house, he would now proceed to lay before it.

The speaker presented a communication from the navy department, on the subject of the expenditures therein, but suggested that on reflection it would be better to let the communications remain as they were, until the committees should have been appointed, which suggestion the house adopted.

The speaker announced that the first order of business would be the presentation of petitions.

Mr. Care Johnson was understood to inquire of the speaker whether the special order (being the consideration of the report of the select committee on the rules) would not come up first in order.

The speaker said that business would be strictly in order.

Mr. Wm. Carl Johnson moved that the said report be laid on the table.

Mr. Jarned asked the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table, which were ordered, and, being taken, were as follows: yeas 96, nays 88.

Mr. Care Johnson, with a view, he was understood to say, to give the speaker an opportunity of appointing the committees, and thus completing the organization of the house, moved that when the house adjourn it adjourn to meet on Monday next; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. Cushing moved, therefore, that the house now proceed to the election of chaplain.

Mr. Lewis Williams then moved that the consideration of the motion to go into the election of chaplain be postponed until Monday next.

The yeas and nays were asked and ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 108, nays 95.

When the question, "shall the decision of the speaker stand as the judgment of the house," was taken, and decided in the affirmative; yeas 101, nays 51.

The question then being on the adoption of the resolution offered by Mr. Fillmore—

Mr. Stedley rose and said, that with great reluctance he would move the previous question. He should feel free to do so, inasmuch as the ordinary course of business, but this was a different state of things. The house had not yet organized, and they had had warning enough in the fifteen days that were consumed last session in its organization to avoid a repetition of such a course. He had desired to observe that what had been made, but he had foreborne, and, reserving for another occasion an answer to some remarks made by the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Preffick), he moved the previous question.

Mr. W. F. wanted to get a little information before he voted on this matter, and appealed to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Stedley) to withdraw his call for the previous question, pledging himself to renew it before he took his seat.

Mr. Stedley declined a compliance with the request.

The question then being on seconding the demand for the previous question, and tellers having been called for, Messrs. Care Johnson and Talliferro were appointed tellers, and the demand for the previous question was seconded, by yeas 101, nays 51.

The question, "shall the main question be put?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative without a division.

The question then being on the main question, (i. e. the adoption of the resolution.)

Mr. W. F. asked for a division of the question, so that the house might vote on the formation of each of the select committees separately.

The question having been accordingly divided, and the yeas and nays having been called and ordered on the first division, viz: that providing for the appointment of a select committee on "the plan of finance recommended in the president's message," the question was taken, and decided in the affirmative as follows: yeas 113, nays 53.

So the first division of the resolution was adopted.

Mr. W. F. here said, unless some other gentleman desired it, he would withdraw his call for a division of the question, so that the vote on the remaining divisions might be taken together; which having been done, the question was taken on the appointment of select committees on the apportionment of representatives and on the Smithsonian legacy, and decided in the affirmative without a division.

Mr. Wm. Carl Johnson, in pursuance of notice previously given, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee of nine be appointed by the speaker on the subject of establishing a national fund for the fabrication of ordnance for the use of the army, navy, and navy of the United States, and for testing improvements in models in arms for the national defence, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Which was adopted without a division.

Mr. W. F. moved that the house adjourn; which motion prevailing, the house adjourned to Monday at 12 o'clock.

MONDAY, DEC. 13. The speaker announced the following standing committees.

Committee of elections.—Messrs. Halsted, Blair, Cravens, Benj. Randall, Borden, Barton, Torney, Houston and Reynolds.

Committee on mileage.—Messrs. Thomas W. Williams, Meriwether, John C. Edwards, Westbrook and Egbert.

Committee on the library on the part of the house.—Messrs. Tillinghast, Ayer, and Sumter.

The speaker also announced the following select committees, appointed under the order of Friday last:

Select committee on finance and the currency.—Messrs. Cushing, John P. Kennedy, Gilmer, G. Davis, Wise, Roosevelt, Proffit, McKay and Wm. W. Irwin.

Select committee on the apportionment of representatives.—Messrs. Everett, Childs, Caruthers, Summers, Pearce, John H. Stuart, Miller, Cross and Weller.

Select committee on the Smithsonian legacy.—Messrs. J. Q. Adams, Habersham, Truman Smith, Underwood, Benj. Randall, Charles J. Ingersoll, Hunter, Houston and Bowne.

Select committee on the national fund.—Messrs. Wm. C. Johnson, Stuart, Miller, King, Randolph, Mallory, Hunt, Keim, Parmenter and Care Johnson.

Mr. Briggs offered the following resolution, which was adopted unanimously:

Resolved, That the clerk of the house pay the funeral expenses of Col. John W. Hunter, late assistant doctor of the army.

Mr. B. then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the office of assistant doorkeeper is not necessary for the service of this house, and that the same be hereby abolished.

Mr. Care Johnson asked the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution, which were ordered, and, being taken: yeas 177, nays 23. So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. Talliferro offered the following resolution, which was read for information:

Resolved, That the several memorials, petitions and resolutions presented to the house of representatives at the last congress, and which were not finally acted on, also bills which were reported, acted on, and lost in the senate, and which were referred to committees and not reported on, be again referred to the committees to which the same were respectively referred at the last congress, a written request to that effect being handed by any member to the clerk of the house, whose duty it shall be to enter the same upon the journal as it presented in the house.

And the resolution was adopted.

Mr. Underwood desired to offer the following resolution, which was read for information:

Resolved, That the speaker engage the services of four stenographers, at a compensation not exceeding $8 per day for each, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the house, whose duty it shall be to report the debates and proceedings of the house daily, and truly, for insertion in the newspapers published in this city. The stenographers so engaged shall regulate among themselves the time which each shall employ in taking short-hand notes of the debates and proceedings, and preparing the same for the press. They shall also be provided with public printers, with all practicable despatch, a copy of their report for insertion in their paper, and such printers shall publish the same at length in the newspaper edited and published by the speaker, and at the same time, and in case they decline doing so, the reports of the stenographers shall be delivered to such other printer or editor as the speaker may designate who will insert the reports in the newspaper so employed as the stenographer so employed may be removed by the speaker, and any and another employed in his place. The speaker shall locate the stenographers so employed in such place in the hall as he may deem proper. The stenographers shall make known to any member which of them reported any speech attributed to such member.

On motion of Mr. Barnard, the house proceeded to the election of chaplain, (viva voce, as required by the rule).

The Rev. John N. Maffitt received 133 votes, the Rev. Mr. Hawley 12, and the Rev. Mr. French 23.

So the Rev. Mr. Maffitt, having received a majority of all the votes, was declared duly elected chaplain on the part of the house for the present session.

The speaker presented to the house sundry executive communications, among which were the following:

1. A letter from the secretary of war, transmitting a report of the number of small arms of every kind which belong to the United States, and are in the several arsenals and depots, including those in the use of the army; the number lost or destroyed annually; and also the number annually manufactured at each of the national arsenals, Keim, made up to the resolution of the house of representatives of the 2d September last; which letter and report was ordered to lie upon the table.

2. A letter from the secretary of state transmitting statements of the expenditure of the contingent fund of the department; referred to the committee on public expenditures.

3. A letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a report in relation to certain insolvent debtors of the United States; ordered to lie on the table.

4. A letter from the clerk of the house of representatives, transmitting the statements of the expenditures for the preceding year from the fund appropriated for the contingent expenditures of the house; referred to the committee of accounts.

5. A letter from the secretary of the navy, transmitting the expenditures on account of the secretary of contingent expenses of the offices of the secretary of the navy and the navy commissioners for the year ending September 30, 1841; which were laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. Barnard, the house adjourned.

THE EXCHEQUER BILL.
ANNUAL REPORT OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.
ANNUAL REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF NAVY.
PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS.

We have preferred giving the exchequer report and bill submitted by the secretary of the treasury together, to the exclusion of his annual report on the finances of the country, as they reached us too late to get all three in type for this number. From the latter we ascertain that the receipts into the treasury for the first three quarters of this year, including $4,781,636 in treasury notes and $3,329,940.86 of the loan, have been $8,111,576.86; the total of the receipts for the 4th quarter $6,943,095.25; total 31,397,512.80.

The disbursements ascertained of the first three quarters are over 24 millions; the total of the year are estimated at $32,025,070.70.

The expenditures for the ensuing year including seven millions to redeem treasury notes, are estimated at $32,731,010, and the receipts are estimated at $19,200,000—deficiency, $14,218,570. For this the loan authorised at the extra session will, supply $6,500,000, and he proposes to reissue treasury notes to the amount of five millions. The balance of $2,718,570 as well as two millions deemed always proper to have in the treasury for exigencies, he proposes shall be raised by additional duties upon imports.

Upon the subject of the TARIFF the secretary is orthodox, as we conceive. He argues in favor of discriminating duties for the purpose of ensuring an equality with other countries in trade and commerce, and repudiates the idea that we should allow free trade to such countries as either interdict or unmercifully tax our commodities.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

REPORT UPON THE FISCAL AGENT,
Transmitted on Tuesday the 21st instant, in compliance with their request, to both houses of congress.

The secretary of the treasury, in compliance with the resolution of the house of representatives of the 15th instant, has the honor of submitting the draught of a bill for the establishment of a board of exchequer, at the seat of government, with agencies in the several states and territories.

In preparing this bill, it has been his intention to keep within, and to fill up, the general outline of the measure, as proposed in the message of the president at the opening of the session; but he does not flatter himself that it will be found so perfect in its details as not to require modifications and careful revision by the two houses of the legislature.

As this measure has, necessarily, been for some time under the consideration of the president and his constitutional advisers, the undersigned is directed by him to accompany the bill with a general exposition of the views entertained by him, and concurred in by them, respecting it.

In what manner and under what securities the public money shall be kept; in what manner, or whether in any manner, this government shall attempt to supply a sound paper medium for payments to the treasury, and for the general uses of the people; in what manner, and under what securities, it shall attempt to benefit the general business of the country by furnishing facilities of exchange, are questions which have not ceased to agitate the community for eight years. Upon these questions much opposition has been manifested, and abundant and interesting political controversies and struggles have been founded. It is time that this state of things were brought to an end. It is time that such provisions were made for the custody of the revenue, as that the people should feel that the treasury was safe. It is time, that the government in the current and future exchange, individuals may know what they have to expect, or whether they may expect any thing from the measures of government. Doubt and uncertainty in this respect constitute the worst of all conditions. It is time that the government should be enabled, instead of giving encouragement, and applying a stimulus to individual exertion and effort, check the hand of industry, oppress the spirit of enterprise, and bring stagnation and paralysis upon the productive powers of the country. It is time that the people, connected with man's personal and domestic welfare, the people have a right to require that what is to be done should be done without further delay, in order that they may accommodate themselves to the policy of the government, whatever that policy may be, and be prepared to pursue corresponding directions in their own industry and business.

The great credit of the country is the want of confidence: confidence in the steadiness and stability of the policy of the government; confidence in that which regulates the value of property and the wages of labor; and confidence in the establishment and preservation of the necessary and ordinary means of maintaining the currency. It is, therefore, in buying and selling with security, so that the intercourse between different parts of the country may be carried on with its former activity and usefulness. The object of the plan suggested to congress in the president's message, and now presented for its consideration in the form of a bill, is to establish confidence in the government, and in its policy. It is designed to terminate contentions of long standing, and to restore the peace, quiet, and satisfaction with the state of public affairs, without which men cannot pursue their vocations either with cheerfulness or with success. Amidst the conflict of widely differing opinions, a measure is recommended which will, it is believed, which they will advance, or, at the least, than many think it desirable that government should do, or attempt to do, and at the same time far more than others are ready to recommend. It aims at a just medium, a common ground, on which those may consistently stop who might yet wish to go further, and which they may advance without the self-reproach, who would nevertheless have desired to fall short of it. It does not attempt to collect a capital by private subscription, for the general purposes of loans and discounts, and therefore does not propose to perform the ordinary functions of a bank. On the other hand, it does not propose to collect a capital from the issue of bonds, or from the sale of public lands, or from the sale of collection to the time of disbursement, nor to demand specie for every debt due to the government; making no attempt, at the same time, to furnish the country with either currency or exchange, and entirely contenting itself with securing specie payments into the treasury, in order to enable the government to issue currency established by the law, now repealed, generally called the sub-treasury act.

It is not intended here to discuss the respective merits of these two systems, which may be regarded as extreme opponents of each other. But it may be proper to say, in regard to a Bank of the U. States, that the objection to such a bank, on constitutional grounds, is not a valid objection. It is true, that the creation of such a bank could nevertheless not have been recommended to Congress, in the present condition of things, as a measure likely to afford relief to the country. Such is the condition of the currency, in many of the States, that the demand for an expression of general credit, produced by that condition, is not met, not only by other causes, and such the existing pressure in the money market, arising, as is believed, in a great degree from want of confidence, that there is little probability that private subscriptions, payable in specie, could be obtained for any bank with an ordinary charter. This opinion is supported by the fact, that six per cent. stocks of the United States Bank, in the market, go slowly and heavily into private hands; and although this is doubtless partly attributable to the short period within which those stocks were issued, and redeemed, yet the general fact concurs with other facts in producing the same conviction that it would be useless, at the present moment, to attempt the creation of a bank, with a capital to be furnished principally by private subscriptions, and intended to discount, through its branches, bills and notes in all parts of the country, even if constituted in the most judicious way. And in regard to the sub-treasury system, it is perhaps enough to say that it is supposed a return to that system at any time hereafter, is an event highly impracticable.

Between these—a bank on the one hand, and the system of the sub-treasury on the other—the present plan is offered, seeking to avoid the objections which exist to each, and to accomplish, to some extent, the good designed by both. The plan, such as it is, will be received and considered, it is not doubted, in a spirit of candor and conciliation, and with a disposition, not so much to persist in the pursuit of what may be unattainable, as to turn to the greatest practicable advantage of the country the use of all these means the employment of which may be expected to meet the general concurrence.

The bill now submitted may be considered as having three principal objects in view:

- 1st. The safe keeping of the public moneys.
- 2d. The furnishing, as well for safe and conveni-

2d. The remitting, as well for sale and convenient payments to the treasury as for the use of the country, a paper circulation always equivalent to gold and silver, and of universal credit.

(3. A provision for supplying, to some extent, the means of a cheap and safe exchange in the commerce between the several states.

OF the high importance of the first of these objects, no one can entertain a doubt. The public moneys are received by government, from the people, for the necessary support of the country, according to the necessities and oughts of the public and sacred trust. They are earned by the industry of the people; and while safely guarded, and applied only to really necessary and constitutional purposes, will be cheerfully contributed by a patriotic community. But if the government should violate the good laws and a faithful administration can make them, against both waste and loss. It was the remark of the late president, striking by its brevity as well as its truth, that every dollar lost by unfaithfulness in the management of the public moneys, is a sin, and this truth cannot be kept too fully or too constantly in view.

Debts and dues accruing to the United States are paid, in the first place, into the hands of the appropriate collectors and receivers. In these hands the safety of the funds is supposed to be secured by the integrity and care of the officer, and the sufficiency of his official bonds, and by the enforcement of a strict system of frequent accounting. In the early history of the government, and sometimes at more recent periods, when public moneys were to be used for their proper purposes, the drafts of the treasury had been made directly on these first recipients. At other times, and when there has been a bank of the United States in existence, the law has required that these moneys should be deposited in such bank.

* By the act of June, 1836, it was provided that public moneys should be deposited in certain state banks called deposit banks; and, finally, by the sub-treasury act, they were to be kept by the mint and its branches, and by certain officers called receivers general.

In all these modes of securing, or attempting to secure the safety of the public treasures, it is obvious that the main reliance, after all, is placed on the honesty and integrity of public officers; there being superadded, however, in the case of deposits with banks, the guaranty supposed to be afforded by their capital; and in the case of individuals, a security by the execution of official bonds, with responsible securities. But in none of these modes, and more than in any other, will become hereafter the subject of human trust in human hands, could it be affirmed that the funds were absolutely secured, and safe beyond all possibility of loss or danger. Committed to the care of the deposit banks, to the skill of their officers and the pledge of their capital, we know from experience, that the public money is not safe. Deposited with a bank of the U. States, although no loss ever actually happened from such deposit, we now see enough to know that there was danger, and that the safety of the public money depended upon a degree of discretion in the management of the institution, of the existence and co-existence of which we had not, and could not have perfect assurance. And, under the operation of the sub-treasury law, every thing resolved itself, at last, into confidence in the honesty and integrity of agents, and the sufficiency of their bonds. There were, it is true, chambers and vaults, with thick walls and strong bolts and burglar hands held the keys. Under that system of public custody, the same temptations existed which surrounded men of doubtful principles or wavering integrity in other institutions of public trust; and, if the system had continued, these temptations were as likely to have shown their power ever in the employed under it as they have done in others since.

It is confidently believed that the present bill contains all that is practicable, and can be useful, towards establishing a safe custody or place of keeping of the funds of the government. The system which it proposes will evidently possess some eminent advantages of safety over a bank. In banks, excessive loans, and a disposition, often prompted by their officers, to extend credit, to a large and often wholly unreasonable lengths, are a great source of danger. The board of exchequer will be free from this. It is to make no loans, and to give no accommodations. Operations in exchange, when founded in real business transactions, are usually safe in well conducted banks; but, when founded in speculation, and the safety of all banking transactions, and, in the respect, the present measure promises still greater safety than attends the same business in banks, from the strict limitations imposed on it, and the absence of all motive to run into excess. Banks, too, as we have seen, are sometimes induced to depart altogether from their proper sphere of business, and to engage themselves with commercial speculations. But into no such speculations will the board of exchequer enter.

There is plainly, therefore, less danger in the system now proposed than in a bank, so far as danger arises from the manner in which the public funds may be used; and, as to the advantages of the latter, these are equal to those of the best conducted banking institutions.

It may be said that it is hazardous, in all cases, to suffer the public funds to be employed, in any degree, in exchange or other dealing. If it be admitted that this objection is not without its force, it must be acknowledged, at the same time, that, on the other hand, that these funds would be used, not only for purposes of exchange, but, in general accommodation loans, and to a great and often dangerous extent, by any bank in which they should be deposited.

But, if, after all, it be regarded as possible that occasions may arise, in which it might be desirable, with the limitations provided in the bill it will be for Congress to decide, whether the danger so contingent shall induce it to reject the bill, and to prefer a system which looks up from all use every dollar of the public money, from its receipt to its disposal, or to permit it to be withdrawn so large a portion of the circulation from which it is the basis of society, by retaining it until wanted for disbursement, is manifestly a great evil, especially if the funds thus withdrawn be in the precious metals, it is ought not to be suffered to exist, unless the danger from the adoption of another system be equally enormous.

A plain, practical and important public good ought not to give way to dangers of doubtful occurrence, or, illicitly to be slighted in degree, if they should occur. Some risks must be run, whenever any thing important is attempted in regard to revenue and finance, as well as in other business of life; and the true question must always be, whether the danger of loss be so clear and so great as to overbalance the evident and certain benefits. And it is to be borne in mind, also, that although the present measure has no profit to government or augmentation of revenue for its object, yet that the operations of the exchequer are expected to reveal the true amount of earnings; so that, if occasional losses should occur, such earnings may make them good.

The board of exchequer, it is to be presumed, will be composed of men of high character, known to the country, and possessing its confidence.

It will be their duty to superintend and watch over the operations of the exchequer, to receive money from day to day, and to demand from all such agents proper bonds, with responsible sureties; and it will be their duty, also, to prescribe and enforce a system of regular and prompt accounting, which shall know neither indulgence nor delay. At the principal board, and at each agency, the business of every day may be closed, and each subordinate officer called on to account for his receipts, before the day itself closes. Over this board the secretary of the treasury will exercise a superintending power, by the right of calling for all accounts, general and particular, as often as he pleases. And, finally, the absolute authority of the board will be given over the whole; and it will have created no corporation; it will have conferred no privileges or benefits, except on the public; it will have granted no vested rights to individuals; it will have parted with no portion of its own power; but its authority will remain to amend, to supervise throughout, and to render the system, at all times, according to its own pleasure.

If entire trust can not be reposed in an institution thus guaranteed, it can only be because human beings can never be the objects of absolute confidence, nor human skill always adequate to the accomplishment of its objects.

Nor is the plan justly liable to the objection, that it is the union of the purse and the sword, giving to the executive the entire and the control of the public money. Far otherwise. The president cannot touch a dollar of the public money, by his own authority, nor change its custody. The secretary of the treasury cannot touch a dollar, nor change its custody, except to meet the occasions of the public service, or to pay the officers of the government. To come to the exchequer for money, must show the law of congress under which he comes; and no payment can be made but in compliance with such law. Until appropriations are made by law, the president will have no more authority than any other individual in the country to take a farthing from the exchequer.

The purse, then, is effectually severed from the sword; the executive power is confined to its proper function of executing the laws of congress, and discharging its other high constitutional duties; and the public funds will be in their proper place, entirely free from reach of control, or of congress shall appropriate them to their destined purposes. From that time they will go into the hands of disbursing agents, as the public service may require, protected still by official responsibility and adequate bonds, and still beyond any interference by the executive power. In the exchequer, therefore, the public treasure will be placed in the most secure and safe place of loss and danger, and safe from executive control.

But the exchequer is expected to do more than merely to keep safely the public money.

Its second object is to furnish a sound paper circulation, in which debts to the government may be paid, and which may also be useful to the commerce and the general business of the country. The first of these functions is purely fiscal; and the instrumentality of such a paper medium, in certain exigencies of the country, may become indispensable to the exercise of the highest duties of government.

In so reasoning upon this subject, as to come to some practical conclusion, it is necessary to consider a few general considerations. Among these, one of primary importance is, that a paper circulation exists in the country, and that there is not the least probability of its ceasing to exist. The states possess the power of creating banks of circulation; they exercise this power; many of them derive not only general business from the exercise, and some of them even have established banks, of which they are themselves proprietors. No man can reasonably expect to see the day when they will relinquish this power, or refrain from its exercise.

In the next place, experience has confirmed the truth, beyond the possibility of doubt, that, in the absence of any other medium of universal circulation and credit; there never has been, and there is not now, any one state bank whose notes pass partly from hand to hand, as equivalent to specie, over all parts of the country. Many of these local institutions are perfectly sound, are well administered, and their credit in their own neighborhood entirely good and unquestioned. But, from the very nature of things their credit is and must be local only. It can never be universal. The people are acquainted with the institutions of their own respective states, and generally understand the ground of the claims of such institutions, and are ready to give their respect and attention also to whatever is established by the general government, because they have an interest in the laws which it passes. But the people, that is to say, the great mass of the productive earners of one state cannot, generally speaking, be acquainted with the moneyed institutions of other states. In many cases, they do not even know such institutions by name. How, then, can they give them their confidence? We see they do not give it, even where it might be most safely bestowed. They prefer the paper of their own banks, though they know it to be depreciated, to the paper of other banks, because they have confidence in the institutions of their own state, and because they know the amount of depreciation on the paper of such banks, whereas, of the value of a note of a distant bank they are wholly ignorant. But this knowledge, which the great mass of the community does not possess, brokers and money dealers do, and they use it to their own advantage. A farmer of Virginia will hesitate to receive in payment a New York note. He will prefer Virginia paper, although he knows it is not equivalent to specie, because he can form some opinion of its value, while of the New York note he knows nothing. But the holder of a New York note, at the same time, is disposed of it at the first broker's office at a large premium.

Every man in the habit of observing what passes around him must see every day the existence of this state of things; and its inevitable consequence is, to throw the loss of depreciation on the laborious and good-faithful farmer, and the laborer who circulates it, is the industrious and the hard-working who suffer first, and suffer longest, and suffer most. But it is not intended to pursue this part of the subject further than to illustrate and confirm the truth, that no state bank, founded on whatever capital, administered by whatever degree of fidelity and skill, can obtain the confidence of the community, and that established and well-known credit, which shall give its bills circulation through all classes, in any amounts, and in all parts of the country.

Now another most important truth, equally well settled by experience, is, that paper issued for circulation, under the authority or with the sanction of the government, stamps the character, does acquire and retain this advantage of known and unquestioned character and universal confidence. No matter whether the note or bill present itself in Maryland or Missouri, Maine or Georgia, if it promise payment in specie, on demand, and that promise be supposed to be given, and accompanied by the credit of the government, it springs immediately to a value equivalent to specie. The impress of the national government, connected with the fact of its immediate convertibility, stamps the paper with a mark of perfect and universal reliance, because all the people, in all the states, are alike interested in the general government, alike acquainted with its proceedings, and have like faith in paper to which it gives its sanction. We seem to be called upon, therefore, to act on this subject with three important truths made clear before us: first, that a paper circulation will continue among us; second, that no paper circulation of universal credit can ever be furnished by state banks; third, that such a paper can be furnished under the authority of the government of the United States.

It is under the influence of these realities that it is now proposed to issue, to some extent, a paper currency, according to the provisions of this bill. Its uses are expected to be two fold. In the first place, as already stated, it will furnish a safe paper medium, in which payments may be made for the payment of taxes, and the immediate assessment of government, are sufficiently impressed with what would be the value of this in certain emergencies.

Debts to government are now to be paid in specie, or the notes of specie-paying banks. Let us suppose that some exigency should come suddenly upon the country, and that the immediate assessment of government taxes, and that the same exigency should compel all the state banks to suspend specie payments. In such a posture of affairs how could taxes be paid? Of specie there would be little to be had; of the bills of specie paying banks none. Government would be driven by absolute necessity, out of use of paper notes, and its credit, and created for the occasion. It would have no other resource. All must see how vastly useful the system now proposed would be, upon the happening of such an emergency. The exchequer would be found in operation, and in possession of a certain quantity of specie, and the public, in addition to its specie and its own established character, the amount of revenue, whatever that amount might be, to sustain its circulation. It would furnish notes for disbursement, and receive them for taxes. With these means, and by faithful and skillful management, though it might be embarrassed by the prostration of other institutions around it, it would still retain the power of credit, and that would be a striking and effectuating argument against general bight and barrenness.

But this part of the bill has another purpose equal, or still more important. The measure is intended for the people as well as the government. The issue of treasury notes always redeemable in gold or silver, and the use of them in payments for public credit, and in the discharge of public debts, cannot but be beneficial, it is conceived, in a high degree, to the whole commerce and all the business concerns of the country.

In this part of its operation the system presents itself as beneficent and productive of essential good. It seeks not government emolument, government convenience only, but the public good, the good of the people, in the largest and most comprehensive sense. Its effect is to give to the people, to their labor and their internal trade, the activity of funds which would otherwise be locked up, and to give them, in the place of the essential evils which these funds to sustain credit, to supply a sound currency, and to favor useful intercourse between the states. And it does this without assuming undelimited powers, without alarming the jealousy or wounding the pride of the states.

Yet it cannot with any justice or propriety be called government money. The essential evils which the bank are still wanting to it. Government seeks not to fill its own coffers by discounts, or to make gains by the use of its own credit, or to make the issues of the exchequer a substitute for revenues in order to meet its own necessities. Nor does it propose to influence the people the evils and the source of an irredeemable government paper, because no paper is to be issued which is not payable in gold or silver on demand—all paper thus resting on the double basis of immediate convertibility and the public faith. It is not easy to conceive how any paper intended for circulation could be more safe or more useful for the purposes of commerce, and it is believed that it is just such a paper as the wants of the country now loudly demand.

The extent to which this paper may be issued and circulated, it must be confessed, in some degree uncertain. This must depend on the amount of revenue collected, and on the degree of success which may attend the operations provided for by another part of the bill. But, whether the circulation of the notes of the exchequer be larger or smaller, it must, so far as that circulation shall extend, be favorable to all interests. It cannot but conduce to the public welfare that there should be, in every part of the country, some one institution, or some one agency, which shall be of undoubted credit, and whose issues, be they great or small, shall be equivalent to coin.

If the circulation of the notes of the exchequer from hand to hand, in the common business of life, should be found to be small, that fact will arise from one or the other of two causes, or from the combined effect of both. If the amount issued should be small, then of course it can only fill the channels of circulation to a limited extent. And while the paper of the state banks shall continue depreciated and yet remain in circulation, treasury notes, it is highly probable, will often be the results hoped to be produced by the use of the purpose of remittance. This limited circulation in such a case would arise from their superior value in comparison with the value of other paper. It would not be owing to want of confidence in them, but to their possessing the highest degree of good name.

But if such use of treasury notes should take place, and should diminish the amount circulated in daily transactions from hand to hand, yet that use itself would confer a general benefit of great importance, inasmuch as all such remittances perform the office of furnishing safe and cheap exchange, and co-operate directly with the results hoped to be produced by another provision of the bill. But if the exchequer and its agencies be allowed to deal in exchange, this use of its notes, although it might exist to some extent, would be far less considerable.

Among possible objections to the issue of redeemable treasury notes, one may be, that they will be retained to the extent of the demand for exportation. States and companies it is known, in every part of Europe, and these states and companies it may be fancied will obtain treasury notes, harass the treasury by demands for specie, and send the specie thus obtained abroad in discharge of their own obligations. A few words may dispel such imaginations.

The first and the strongest argument, if there be any thing, proves too much; for it proves that for the same reason all specie-paying banks ought to cease specie payments. But the truth probably is, that these states and companies find less difficulty in lighting on some convenient mode of remittance than on commanding at the present moment the means of making remittances in any form. The general depression, with the cooperation doubtless of other causes, has suspended the power of obtaining such means. We must continue to hope that, under a better state of things and in better times, this power will revive, and when it shall, we must look to our own profits, and to the general earnings of credit, and to the means of meeting the demand for specie abroad. In the mean time, since neither states nor companies can obtain loans of treasury notes, nor otherwise possess themselves of them than by buying and paying for them, we need not distress ourselves with apprehensions of runs on the exchequer from that quarter.

It remains to say something upon that part of the bill which authorises the exchequer and its agencies to buy and sell domestic exchange, under certain limitations and restrictions.

That an institution founded on a more extensive plan, with a larger moneyed capital, which should deal in exchanges on a broad scale, buying bills at long dates, or accepting bills on security, in order to afford capital and credit, as well as exchange, strictly speaking, might, but for the dangers attending it, produce more benefit than that now proposed, may be safely admitted. But such a scheme involves the idea of making loans and advances, of venturing largely on the success of personal security, and of exposing in no small degree to the hazards of commerce. No such purpose is intended by presenting the present bill to the consideration of congress. On the contrary, the utmost concern has been felt to guard the proposed measure against all tendencies to such a system of exchange operations.

In all its purposes, it looks to currency and to exchange, not to lending, or to security. And it may well be matter of serious consideration, whether such large powers of discount can be safely lodged in private institutions, with the power of making such discounts by the use of their own notes.

The supervision and regulation of currency belong to government; the business of commerce and the borrowing and lending of money to individuals. And perhaps no conviction is more rapidly and generally received, than that government should not commit the high and important function of superintending and regulating the currency of a country to the hands of those whose occupation consists in making loans and discounts, whether on promissory notes or bills on time. Whenever a bank makes a loan, or a discount, it is in the nature of bills, it adds so much to the circulating medium of the country; and, in the absence of all other regulation or restraint, several hundred banks, whose palpable interest it is to increase the amount of circulation, are to decide, each in the exercise of its own discretion, to what extent that augmentation shall be made. To such a system there must be some check, or that, in the absence of all such check, the emission of paper will be continually tending to excess, must be manifest to every reflecting mind. It is not proposed to enter fully into this subject at present; but as it has already in other countries, so it must necessarily be long in this, command the most serious consideration of government.

It is hoped that the measure now proposed to congress will have some effect, at least, in counteracting the tendency to excess in bank issues. While it may not accomplish all that is to be desired, it is believed it will effect something. To the extent of its means employed, its operation will be calculated to restrain issues and to correct excesses; because, in the first place, every section of government, and the general mass, tends either to render the bad worthless, so that in time it shall all give way to a better, or to compel those who issue such bad currency to raise its value by preparing for its redemption. If good currency could be put into circulation in such quantity, to meet the uses of the country, it is of course expedient the bad, or bring about a change of its character; although it is equally true that, while the great mass be bad while it is circulated, not having become entirely worthless, it is difficult for a small amount of good currency to share in the general circulation, since it is liable to be sold off for the market purposes which this mass will not answer. And, in the second place, the exchequer will act beneficially in this respect, by holding all state banks with which it may have dealings to a punctual performance of their obligations, and bringing them to an immediate settlement for such of their bills as they find their way into it, or into any of its agencies.

It is not intended to say that the proposed measure will of itself be able to arrest the progress of the great evil of excessive bank issues, or that government may not be obliged, hereafter, to adopt other measures. It is apprehended that these evils may yet imperatively call for other remedies. But it is believed that it will have a considerable effect, should its operations be as successful as is anticipated, in checking and limiting what it may not be able entirely to suppress.

But there is another very important consideration connected with the part of the subject now under the object of the whole measure is to furnish a sound currency, in the form of treasury notes, redeemable on demand in specie. These notes can get into circulation, and be kept in it, in two ways; first, by payment in such notes of debts and demands on the treasury; and, second, by buying domestic exchanges. And it is the latter of these modes which is most confidently looked to as furnishing an active and continual circulation of this paper. When issued in government payments, at distant points, the general tendency of the notes will be from those points to the great Atlantic cities, according to the course of trade, thus leaving the place of their first issue without the benefits of their circulation. But it is evident that if the agencies at those distant points shall be authorised to purchase bills of exchange, a new source for the issue of sound circulating paper will be opened, and the exchange thus bought would be settled, wherever the demands of trade should be made.

In a country of such varied productions as the United States, some parts being highly commercial, others manufacturing, and others yielding vast amounts in raw material, the current and course of exchange has periodical changes. It flows one way or the other, or in the same way more or less force, according to the seasons. Nor is this course always direct, but on some extraordinary often circuitous winding itself through several distant markets. Commodities in many parts of the west seek a sale in the south, not expecting payment in southern products, but in means available in the north and the east. The happy diversity of products, and these useful ramifications of trade, tend to make the demand for only a currency satisfactory to all, but the means, also of easy, cheap and safe dealing in exchange. And these two objects assist each other. A good currency enables him who needs exchange to buy it, and he who has exchange to sell, to sell it. Good currency and safe dealing together, all under proper limits and securities, form the most perfect system of paper circulation. The power to deal in exchange seems essential to any considerable circulation of treasury notes in the south and west. And it may be added, that nothing would tend more to counteract the contraction of the currency, and, on a few points, than the ability of buying domestic exchange with good paper, redeemable at the place of purchase. Commercial transactions, and the consummation of pecuniary engagements, naturally concentrate themselves in places where the currency is good. There is no remedy against this concentration so serious as the supplying of a good currency everywhere.

A safe system of exchange, though no more extensive than is contemplated by this bill, will be of great service to the commerce of the country in other respects, besides furnishing the means of keeping a good currency in circulation. The more direct advantages flowing from it are not innumerable. Although its object be to supply a capital of credit for the purposes of trade, or to make advances, although the whole system is limited to exchanges, strictly, yet it cannot fail to afford very important facilities, and to be productive of much general benefit.

The power or faculty of reaching funds already accumulated in a distant part of the country, and of bringing them to the place of their use, is a power or faculty of no mean importance, in the hands of those whose business leads them to form commercial connexions in such distant parts. This power or faculty the measure under consideration proposes to confer impartially on all, to the extent of its means. And its capacity for good in this respect, so confidently left to the judgment of those whose practical experience has rendered them most competent to decide.

As to any dangerous consequences from untoward influences in buying or selling exchanges, it is to be again observed that the exchequer can lend money to nobody, it can furnish no capital, it can carry on no other business; it only seeks to enable any one to place his funds where he needs them, and this, as it will be seen, is to be done under such restrictions as that all idea of accommodation, and therefore all idea of partiality or favor to individuals, is effectually repelled. All real borrowing and lending is excluded, and bills are to be taken on such time only as is necessary for ordinary notice, and the usual transmission of intelligence.

Such operations, begun and completed in so short a time, and which are to be carried on in the face of the commercial community—operations which allow so little of favor or accommodation to any—it is not likely that unjust or partial local influences, far less likely that any pernicious central influences, will exercise control.

It may be objected to all dealing in exchanges, that parties on bills will become debtors to government; that in case of any general pressure they will petition for relief, and thus embarrass government, as well by neglect of punctuality of payment as by impotency for indulgence. It is readily answered that the delicate relation of debtor and creditor should be avoided, as far as may be between government and the people. But in many cases it must exist. The imposition of every tax creates that relation; every custom house bond creates it, and it is found in many other forms. But a better answer to this objection is, that the credit so far as any arises under the operations of this bill, will be a commercial credit, of all others the most unlikely to be violated; of a few days continuance only, existing between the government and each individual, by himself, out of which no common cause, no common interest in delay, no common impotency for relief, can well arise.

As the great object of the whole measure is to put an end to controversies, and give repose, it is left to the states to prohibit the practice of private deposits and dealing in exchange within their respective limits, if any of them shall so see fit. Of such prohibition no apprehension is entertained. The whole example has been felt in recommending the provision, as it may avoid difficulties, by manifesting a disposition neither to tread on any questionable ground, nor to give rise to unnecessary differences of opinion.

The people will present itself to all the states and all the people. It proposes general benefit to all; and no fear is entertained lest either the states or the people should examine it with too close a scrutiny.

The section which authorises the secretary of the treasury to issue, if found necessary, five millions of stocks, is designed as a provision against contingencies incident to the fluctuations of the market. In an agent of government, such as is now proposed to be created, it is proper that there should exist every security for the maintenance of its credits. Misfortunes may fall on private institutions, in the revolutions of commerce and business, and they may be compelled to stop payment; but whatever is identified with the safe possible foundations. As the means of the country are most ample, its credit high, and the burdens of the people light there is wisdom in giving to the exchequer the power of immediate resort, in case of necessity, to the unimpaired and unquestionable faith of the nation. There should be no hesitation, no scruple, no lingering doubt, about the ability of the institution now proposed to be established, to fulfil with punctuality all its engagements, under any occurrences, not of force, to disturb the government itself.

Which are the general views of the important measure which now invites the consideration of the legislature.

The extremes of public sentiment on the subjects embraced in this bill, are embodied in the system of the sub-treasury on the one hand, and in a bank of the United States on the other. The great problem now propounded to practical statesmanship is, whether repose and reconciliation of opinion can be attained, whether an end can be put to distressing doubts and exasperated controversies, touching the policy of the government, by the adoption of an intermediate system; a system exercising no ungranted power, establishing no monopoly, bestowing no indiscriminate rights, attempting no divorce of the government from the people; but, on the other hand, converting the most austere, though the most indispensable and plainly constitutional duty of the government, the collection of the taxes, into the very means of sustaining the gains, of increasing the comforts, and increasing the interests of those by whom taxes are paid.

This intermediate position, the plan struck out in the president's message proposes to occupy. On the one hand, it performs one grand function which the sub-treasury could not and did not seek to perform. It asserts and preserves the constitutional duty of overseeing and sustaining the commerce between the states by all proper and constitutional means, and turns away from nothing within the limits of the constitution which may support general credit.

It admits the impolicy and impracticability, without violence to the business of life, of coercing an entire substitution of the precious metals for that convertible currency which has come to occupy their place.

But, on the other hand, it is not a corporation; it alarms nobody by the assertion of power to enter the states, to engross local business, or grasp at local gains, or measure from liability to local business.

If a treasury may be accomplished as the good sense, the fraternal sentiments, and the business necessities of the American people must lead them ardently to desire, by which existing elements of discord shall be withdrawn from national politics, and the country be suffered to enjoy tranquillity in things nearly affecting men's daily labor and daily bread, it is confidently believed that it may be natured, by the wisdom of the legislature, out of the general provisions of the bill now submitted to its consideration.

W. FORWARD, secretary of the treasury.

A BILL

AMENDATORY OF THE SEVERAL ACTS ESTABLISHING THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That there shall be, and hereby is, created and established in the treasury department, at the seat of the government of the United States, a board, to be called the exchequer of the United States, to be composed of the secretary of treasury for the time being, the treasurer of the United States for the time being, and three commissioners, to be appointed by the senate, one of the said commissioners first appointed, to be appointed for two years, one for four years, and one for six years, and vacancies subsequently occurring, to be so filled as that one vacancy shall regularly occur at the end of every period of two years; the said commissioners may be removed for incompetency, or neglect or violation of duty; and in case of any such removal, it shall be the duty of the president to lay the reason thereof before the senate. And on the first organization of the board, one of the three commissioners shall, by the members thereof, be elected president, who shall serve for two years, and after the expiration of a term of election shall be made, and in like manner a new election shall take place afterwards at the end of each successive period of two years. And the secretary of the treasury shall have authority to appoint all such inferior officers as in the judgment of the board the transactions of its business may require, the amount of their respective compensations to be fixed by the board, who may take bonds for the faithful discharge of their duty for such sums and in such manner as the secretary of the treasury shall direct. And each of said commissioners shall receive an annual salary of ——— dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said board of exchequer shall have power to establish agencies or offices in such of the cities or towns of the states and territories of the United States as it may judge expedient, not exceeding two in any state or territory, and also wherever congress may by law require the same to be established; and such officers and agents as may be required, shall be thought necessary for the management of such agencies, and the transaction of their business, shall be appointed by the secretary of the treasury on the recommendation of the board of exchequer; and the said board shall have power to fix the amount of the respective compensations for such officers, and to provide regulations for the government of such agencies, the transaction of their business, and the rendering accounts of all their proceedings. And in such regulations they shall so assign and arrange the duties of the officers of the said agencies as that one of those officers shall be a check and control upon the other, and in such purposes they shall require that the accounts and proceedings of each shall be entered in proper books. And any of the officers of the said agencies may be removed by the secretary of the treasury for physical inability, or incompetency, or neglect or violation of duty, but it shall be his duty to state every removal of any principal officer of any agency, with his reasons therefor, in his general annual report of the transactions of the board of exchequer.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said exchequer and its officers shall be the general agents of the government of the United States for receiving, and for the purpose they shall require, all moneys transferring and transmitting the same under the direction of the secretary of the treasury; and all public moneys received, from whatever sources, shall, under the same directions, be paid into the said exchequer or its agencies, and the principal officers employed in such agencies shall give bonds to the United States for such amount and in such form as the secretary of the treasury shall prescribe for the faithful performance of their duties. And the said board of exchequer and its several agencies shall pay all warrants, drafts, or orders made thereon by the treasurer of the United States, and by all disbursing officers and agents of the government having authority to make such drafts or orders. And every such payment shall be made, at the option of the person entitled to receive it, in gold and silver coin or in treasury notes.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said exchequer and its officers shall perform the duties of commissioners of loans, in receiving subscriptions, transferring stock, and paying dividends and interest thereon, under the directions of the secretary of the treasury, and shall render to the treasurer of the United States all necessary facilities for transferring and disbursing the public funds as shall be required by him, and shall perform all the duties of pension agents under the regulations prescribed by the secretary of war, and shall render and perform all other duties and services in relation to the collecting, keeping, and disbursing of the public funds as shall be prescribed by law or by the secretary of the treasury.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the said exchequer to receive, in gold, silver, and its several agencies, to receive on private deposits gold or silver coin or bullion, the property of individuals, to be held as in other cases of deposits made by individuals for convenience and security; and to issue certificates of the fact of such deposits having been made, which certificates shall always be redeemable on presentation to the board of exchequer, and the amount so deposited shall never exceed in the whole fifteen millions of dollars, to be distributed by the board among its several agencies according to the extent of their business respectively; and for issuing such certificates no higher premium shall be demanded than shall be sufficient to indemnify against the hazard of loss, and remuneration for the safe keeping the deposit, and in no instance to exceed the one-half of one per cent. But paper issued by the board and its several agencies, whether in the form of bills or of certificates of deposit, shall be redeemable only at the place where issued, unless the board shall so direct by its regulations.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said board of exchequer, within three months after its first organization, to establish such by laws and rules of proceeding as it may judge expedient and proper for the regulation of its concerns and the government of its agencies; and copies of all such by laws and rules shall be laid before Congress every year at its annual session.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be prepared treasury notes of denominations not less than five dollars nor exceeding one thousand dollars which notes shall be signed by the treasurer of the United States and countersigned by the president of the board of exchequer, and made payable to the order of the principal agent at each agency, and shall be by him endorsed when issued at such agency, and which notes shall be redeemable and shall be redeemed in gold and silver, on demand, at the agency where issued; and the treasury notes issued to be by him issued by the board of exchequer at the seat of government shall be, in like form, and shall be payable to the order of commissioners, and shall be endorsed by some one of them when issued, and shall be redeemable and redeemed, at said board, on demand, in gold and silver; and exact and perfect lists of all notes so signed shall be kept at the treasury, and all treasury notes issued under the authority of this act may, when redeemed, be re-issued by the board and its agencies respectively.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the amount of treasury notes issued and outstanding shall not, at any one time, exceed the amount of fifteen millions of dollars, and the secretary of the treasury is authorized by law, and the secretary of the treasury is authorized from time to time, on the application of the board of exchequer, to furnish for its own use and that of its several agencies a suitable amount of such notes, to be used in the transaction of its business; and all dues to the United States, or any office thereof, in treasury notes issued under this act, or in the notes of banks which shall be immediately convertible into specie at the place where received.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the board of exchequer at the seat of government, and all of its agencies, shall be authorized to open offices with all banks in their neighborhood whose paper they may have received, and pay or collect, as the case may be, all balances between the said banks; and no individual shall be allowed at any time to stand as debtor to the exchequer or any of its agencies in account, and it shall be the duty of the said board of exchequer, and each of its several agencies, at all times so to limit the issues that its gold and silver on hand shall be equal to one-third the amount of such issues outstanding.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the said board of exchequer may draw bills or drafts on any of its agencies, and may authorise any agency to draw bills or drafts on the board or any other agency, and may sell and purchase bills or drafts on such bills or drafts for a premium not exceeding the fair cost of remitting specie to the place of payment, and in no case to exceed two per centum on the amount of such bill or draft.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for said board of exchequer and each of its agencies to purchase domestic bills of exchange, subject to the following rules and regulations:

1. No bill of exchange shall be bought which is payable in the same state or territory in which it is drawn, nor any bill payable within less than ten miles of the place of drawing.

2. Bills drawn on places more than five hundred miles distant from the place of drawing shall not be drawn for a longer time than thirty days from date; and bills drawn on places more than five hundred miles from the place of drawing shall not be drawn for a longer time than thirty days from sight.

3. In no instance shall more be demanded from the seller of such bill, by way of interest or exchange, than an interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum for the time which the said bill has to run, and a rate of exchange never exceeding the cost of remitting specie, and in no case to exceed two per cent. And it shall not be lawful for said board of exchequer or any agency, to purchase any bill drawn by or upon any member or officer thereof, or in which such member or officer shall in any way be interested; nor to receive any deposit of any money belonging to any such member or officer. And no bill shall be purchased or draft sold at any agency, without the assent of at least two of the officers of such agency, nor by the board of exchequer without the assent of two of its members.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That no agency established in any state under the provisions of this act, shall be subject to any law which such state may enact, receive any other aid than that of the United States, or make or sell drafts, or purchase bills, other than such as shall be necessary in the collection, transfer and disbursement of the public funds.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That if at any time it shall be found necessary to carry on the operations of the exchequer board, and its agencies hereby created, the secretary of the treasury may cause to be prepared, issued, and delivered to the exchequer board certificates of stock of the United States, in the usual form, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding five per centum per annum, to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars, the interest of which shall be payable semi-annually, and the principal shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the government after the expiration of twenty years from the issue thereof. And it shall be lawful for the said exchequer board to sell and transfer the said stock for gold or silver coin, or for any other valuable consideration to the exchequer board to provide for the punctual payment of the interest on the said stock as it shall become due, and for the reimbursement of the principal from the profits and other means and resources of the board and its agencies. But the faith of the government, nevertheless, shall be pledged for the payment of the interest and the principal of such stock.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the board of exchequer and its several agencies shall keep separate and distinct sets of books, for the purpose of entering and recording, in one set, all transactions respecting the collection and disbursement of the public revenue, and transmitting the public money from place to place for the service of the government, and in another, all transactions and accounts arising from dealings in exchange and other transactions not on government account.

And all profits accruing from dealing in exchange on individual accounts, and from private deposits shall be applied in the first place to the payment of the compensations, and to defray all expenses incurred under the authority of this act, and the residue thereof shall be placed semi-annually to the credit of the treasurer of the United States: Provided, nevertheless, That the said board may defer all such credits to the treasurer, until the amount of profits derived beyond expenses shall exceed two millions of dollars, and may retain said amount of two millions as a fund to meet all contingencies chargeable on the exchequer and its agencies.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That if it shall at any time become necessary to bring suit on any bill of exchange or other debt or liability arising out of any transactions under the provisions of this act, such suit may be brought in the name of the United States in any circuit court of the United States, or any state court having competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That the necessary offices and vaults for the safe-keeping of the public moneys and for the transaction of the business of the board of exchequer and its agencies shall be provided by the treasury department at the city of Washington, and in the custom houses, mint, branch mints, and other public buildings belonging to the United States, so far as for the same can be furnished without detriment to the public service; and where the same cannot be so furnished, the said board may provide others.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the said board of exchequer to appoint as agent for the board any specie paying bank in any state in cases where it may not be deemed expedient to establish an office or agency of the said board, as hereinbefore provided; but such bank shall not be authorised in any event to receive deposits or to purchase or sell bills or drafts on account of the board of exchequer.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That full and exact accounts of the proceedings of the board and its several agencies shall be furnished by the board to the treasury as often as he may prescribe; and it shall be the duty of the said secretary to lay abstracts of the same before congress at the commencement of each annual session, and to furnish full and particular accounts and statements of the transactions of the board to any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, and the amount of treasury notes outstanding at the end of every quarter shall, so soon thereafter as the same may be ascertained, be published by the secretary of the treasury.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That if any member of the exchequer board, or any officer or clerk employed in its business or any of its agencies, shall at any time, with any view to his own private security deposited with or belonging to the said board or any of its agencies, or belonging to the United States, or any other person or persons dealing or depositing with the said board or any agency, he shall be deemed guilty of felony, and, on conviction thereon by any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a term not less than ——— nor more than ——— years, and to a fine equal to twice the sum or value of the property embezzled.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That if any officer or member of the board of exchequer, or any of its agencies established under the provisions of this act, shall give or sign a false certificate or deposit having been made with any agency, or shall issue or deliver any draft or bill of exchange without having received the full amount thereof, and cause the receipt of the same to be duly entered in the books of the said agency, or shall be guilty of any other mal-practice by which any responsibility of the said agency, or of the board of exchequer, or of the United States, shall be improperly created or increased, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a term not less than one year nor more than seven years, and to a fine equal to the amount of the false certificate so given, or of the bill or draft so issued or delivered, or to the amount of the responsibility so created or increased.

REPORT OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, DEC. 2, 1841.
TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

In the discharge of the duty of reporting to you the condition of the general post office, I have to regret that my recent induction into office will prevent me from giving you that full development at this time so necessary to a clear understanding of the various and extended operations of a department so important and interesting to every class of our fellow-citizens.

Unlike the other departments of government, which derive their support from the national treasury, the general post office looks for the means to continue and extend its operations to the income derived alone from a successful administration of the laws prescribing its duties and privileges. The general post office, at first almost the creature of administrative discretion, necessarily so remains, to a great degree, at the present time. In its infancy, it required the constant and vigilant superintendence of its head to direct its affairs in such manner as to extend the sphere of its usefulness, commensurate with the increase of the extent of population and business. Equal, if not greater, vigilance is demanded at the present day.

It is to be desired that, in the general administration of the government, as little of discretion as possible should be left with those charged with public trusts, and the more exact extent of the management of the department, at this time, is so limited as not to qualify me to suggest more specifically those improvements in the laws pertaining to it, whereby much of that discretion, heretofore exercised, might be restrained and profitably regulated by legislative enactment. The propriety of these remarks will be fully demonstrated by a recurrence to the history of the post office operations, from their commencement to the present time.

In 1790, the whole number of post offices in the United States did not exceed seventy-five; the number of miles of post road was 3,579; the revenue, $37,926; the expenditure, $32,140. In 1840, it will be seen that the whole number of post offices in the United States was 13,458; the number of miles of post road, 154,739; the gross revenue for the same year was $4,539,365, and the expenditure was $4,739,176. The necessity of guarding, as far as practicable, by specific legislation, such an amount of income and expenditure, and the duties and liabilities of so many agents, must be apparent.

As has already been remarked, the original design in the establishment of the post office department was that its income should be made to sustain its operations. That principle could never to be abandoned. Whilst the department should not be regarded as a source of revenue to the nation, it should never become an annual charge to its treasury. Upon assuming the discharge of the duties pertaining to the office of postmaster general, my first object was to investigate its financial condition; and it becomes my duty to inform you that I did not find it in that prosperous state which the demands upon it require.

The income of this department is always liable to be affected by the fluctuations of the business of the country, to increase or depressed in proportion to the increase or depression of that business. Besides this cause of fluctuation in its income, other causes of a reduction, more or less in every year, may be found in the increased facilities which the travel upon rail roads and the improvements for the transmission of letters and newspapers by private conveyance; secondly, in the great extension, to say nothing of the abuse, of the franking privilege; thirdly, in the recent establishment of what are called private expresses, upon the great mail routes of the United States; fourthly, in the frauds practised upon the department, in evading, by various devices, the payment of the postage imposed by law. While all these causes operate to lessen the revenue of the department, the expenses of transporting the mail are not affected or lessened by them; and I respectfully suggest whether the evils to which I have referred do not deserve the serious attention of congress, so far as to call for some more specific legislation, whereby they may be removed or suppressed.

The total gross revenue of the post office for the fiscal year commencing on the 1st of July, 1840, and terminating on the 30th June, 1841, was $4,539,317 78; the total expenditure for the same time was $4,739,176 39. In this year the expenditures exceeded the revenue by the sum of $187,930 61. A statement of the expenditures, more in detail, will in due time, as required by law, be reported to congress. The precise income and expenditure of the general post office cannot be known until the close of the fiscal year, and the settlement of all accounts have been completed. Consequently, any statement of expenditure and income, for the present year, is liable to the fluctuations and changes always incident to the peculiar character of the service.

The expenditures and income of the department for the current year may, upon estimate, be stated in round numbers as follows:
Total amount of revenue derived from postages, fines, and all other sources $4,380,000

Expense of mail transportation	3,145,000
Commission to postmasters, if the rates of per centage remain unchanged	1,015,000
Ship, steamboat, and way letters	20,000
Incidental expenses, including blanks, stationery, printing, &c.	310,000
Total estimated expenditure	4,490,000
Total estimated income	4,380,000

Thus it will be seen that the probable amount of expenditure will exceed the amount of revenue, as estimated, by $110,000.

With this deficit presenting itself so palpably to my mind, I have essayed to infuse into the administration of the service a rigid economy; yet, with all the savings which may be possible to make by the most rigid economy, I am satisfied the expenditure cannot be reduced within the income, without either reducing the transportation of the mail below the just wants of the community, or by other mode increasing the expense of the department.

To continue the present amount of service, and extend it with the growth and spread of our population, particularly in the west, the present revenue, with its former charges, is evidently inadequate; and a reduction of that service greatly below its present standard would have to take place, unless congress make an appropriation from the public treasury, which I neither ask nor desire to see made.

Upon a view of all the circumstances, and with a perfect sense of the delicate responsibility assumed: I have felt myself imperiously called upon to exercise the power conferred upon me by the act of 1839, as master general, and have readjusted the commissions heretofore allowed to deputy postmasters. By this regulation, a copy of which is annexed, there will be added to the net annual income of the department about $100,000. I thought it better to do this than either to ask congress for an appropriation or to reduce the transportation of the mail below the just wants of the community.

When it is known that this reduction has been made to enable the department to send intelligence among the people, by continuing and extending mail facilities, and not in a spirit of parsimonious economy, the liberal and enlightened of all sections will, I am persuaded, approve what has been done; and I will not allow myself to believe that those whom it most immediately affects will view it in an illiberal spirit.

Should congress, however, not approve of this measure, they will have it in their power, before the next takes effect, to arrest its force, and will no doubt adopt the necessary measures to require the reduction of mail service, or to provide the means of paying the balance which will be due to contractors at the end of the year.

The report of the auditor of the post office department (marked B) will exhibit the progress which has been made in the adjustment and liquidation of the accounts of postmasters since the 4th of March last.

It is to be expected that among 14,000 deputy postmasters (appointed generally without a personal knowledge of the individuals or their securities) there will be found some who will prove faithless to their trusts, and whose securities are not good for the amount due the department. In view of this, I have instituted a rigid inquiry, not only into the fitness and business qualifications of the postmasters, but the solvency of their securities, from which the balances may be anticipated. This operation, performed in part by special agents of the department, under the letter of instructions annexed, (marked C), and the prompt settlement of the accounts of all postmasters, will more effectually guard the department from losses by defaulting postmasters.

The reduction of the postage upon letters is a subject which has engaged the public attention for years, and is one of great interest to the whole community.

It is contended by many, whose opinions are entitled to respectful consideration, that the reduction of postage would give an increase of revenue. Without undertaking to discuss this question at present, I am not prepared, from the present financial condition of the department, to recommend a reduction of the rates of postage now fixed by law, but invite a modification of them so far as to bring them into conformity more generally to the smaller coin of the U. States, and solicit revision of the laws regulating the postage on newspapers. I do not desire that the rates of postage on newspapers proper should be increased, though much might be saved to the department if the principle of the postage law were applied to newspapers, provided such regulation was not deemed to be public opinion. I must, however, earnestly invite your attention, and hope you will call that of congress, to the necessity of the enactment of a new law by which a just discrimination should be made in the rates of postage on newspapers proper and those mammoth periodicals which assume the shape and name of newspapers, but which are, in fact, the republication of books, reviews, and novels, sent through the post office, not always to subscribers, but in large masses to agents, to vend in the most distant cities, towns, and villages, which greatly increase the size and weight of the mails and the expense of transportation, without a corresponding remuneration to the department. The great number of these large publications which have been sent by the mail from Baltimore to Wheeling has mainly contributed to the frequent irregularities of the western mails for the last twelve months. I respectfully inquire whether it is just that the U. States mail shall be compelled to transport one of these papers, weighing nearly a pound for a cent and a half, from Boston or New York to Louisville, Ky., which has mainly contributed to the frequent irregularities of the western mails for the last twelve months. I respectfully inquire whether it is just that the U. States mail shall be compelled to transport one of these papers, weighing nearly a pound for a cent and a half, from Boston or New York to Louisville, Ky., which has mainly contributed to the frequent irregularities of the western mails for the last twelve months. I respectfully inquire whether it is just that the U. States mail shall be compelled to transport one of these papers, weighing nearly a pound for a cent and a half, from Boston or New York to Louisville, Ky., which has mainly contributed to the frequent irregularities of the western mails for the last twelve months.

I have already alluded to the establishment of what are called private express, for the carrying of letters, packages, and newspapers, upon the postroads of the United States, for hire and compensation, at one case tending greatly to the reduction of the revenue of the department. I must beg leave again to bring the subject more particularly to your notice, under the necessity of some further legislation, more effectual to protect the interest of the public, than the general government in its post office department.

If there is any grant of exclusive power to congress upon which all unite in opinion, it is the power to establish post offices and post roads; and it may fairly be assumed as an admitted principle, that the exercise of that power, has established a postroad, the right of a state, or the individuals of a state, to establish lines of transportation, for letters, packages, and newspapers, upon and over the same roads, for compensation, cannot be successfully maintained.

How far this assumed power has been exercised by individuals, and to what extent, I am not fully informed; but the information communicated to me, the department induced me to avail myself of the services of the first assistant postmaster general, while on a temporary visit of business to Philadelphia, to collect and report to me such information upon the subject, as would engage my notice would permit; and I have the honor now to submit to you the report.

Another report from the first assistant postmaster general, herewith submitted, will present you with a detailed statement of the amount of mail service for the year ending the 30th. June, 1841, and the rate of the postage in each state and territory, distinguishing between the charges for express and mail. By this report it will appear that the U. States mail is transported on rail roads and steamboats 3,946,450 miles, at the cost of $585,843; on horse and in sulkeys 12,088,862 miles at a cost of $781,807; in stages and coaches 18,961,213 miles, at the cost of $179,638, making a total aggregate of annual transportation of 34,996,525 miles, at the rate of cost of $3,159,375.

The act of 1838 declares that "each rail road within the limits of the United States which now is or hereafter may be completed shall be a post road;" and the act of 1839, provisions limiting the amount beyond which the postmaster general is prohibited from paying for the transportation of the mail on railways will be found.

Great embarrassments to the department have arisen in the making of contracts for the transportation of the mail with many of the rail road companies under the act now in force. These embarrassments arise mainly from two causes, the first, that the price which the department is enabled to pay, whether in reference to its means or the maximum fixed by the legislation of congress, has been deemed inadequate by many of the principal companies in the great cities, to whom it is a privilege to sell some of the companies to run the mail, as prescribed by the department; preferring to run such times as will best suit the travel upon the road; regarding, as it is natural for them to do, the carrying of the mail as secondary to the transportation of passengers. The latter view has been particularly felt in the great eastern cities, and in the city of Washington city to New York, the rail road companies from New York is necessarily thrown upon the Philadelphia and Baltimore rail road in the night, between Philadelphia and Baltimore; and the southern mail for New York is compelled to lie over the Philadelphia and Baltimore rail road in the day. This company can be induced to run the mail in the night. This they have declined doing, unless the department would pay them a compensation greater than is authorised by the laws of congress. Under a hope that some arrangement could be made—to the displeasure of congress, if no longer—I address to the president of the rail road companies, who are concerned in the transportation of the mail between the city of Washington and New York a letter, a copy of which, and the report of the first assistant postmaster general upon this subject, are herewith submitted.

An anxious desire to effect some permanent arrangement with the rail road companies for the transportation of the mail, upon a basis which shall be both just and uniform, considering the nature of the service performed by each, induced me to invite a meeting of the presidents of the different companies, in the city of Washington, on the 1st of January next; and I am gratified at the prompt manner in which all who have been heard from have consented to attend, and a hope is cherished that some arrangement, satisfactory to all parties and beneficial to the public, may yet be effected.

The improved mode of intercommunication by rail road and steam, operating under chartered rights granted by the states, and over which it is not pretended that the general government, much less the post office department, can exercise any control, imposes upon congress, in my opinion, new duties and obligations, which can only be cancelled by the adoption of some measure whereby the post office department may, upon adequate consideration, secure by compact the right to transport the mail in the cars of rail road companies, and at the same time give to the post office the power to control the direction and arrival of the mails.

There is now paid to the different rail road companies, annually, over $400,000 for the service, without power in the department to regulate the travel, arrival and departure of the mail; and constant and frequent difficulties, both in entering into and the execution of contracts, are presented.

It has occurred to me that the present was a most favorable period for the adoption of some measure by congress, whereby to secure to the United States the right to transport the mail upon these roads in all time to come, free of any annual charge upon the post office department; by the advancement of a sum of money to be agreed upon by the government and the companies, or such of them as may be willing to contract. Many of the rail road companies, and some of them constituting most important links in the great chain of intercommunication between Boston and Charleston, owing to the great derangement of the monetary condition of the country, and the depression of all state and company stocks, find themselves laboring under embarrassments and difficulties, which the aid of the general government, applied in the way proposed, would effectually remove, and at the same time secure to the United States the advantage and complete equivalent of transporting the mail upon these roads.

The credit of the United States to an amount not greater than the sum necessary to produce, at five per cent. interest, the amount paid by the post office department to these companies annually, would, I have no doubt, be sufficient to accomplish this desirable end. The prompt and favorable action of congress upon this subject at the present time would effectually secure the government against the danger of being called upon for occasional and large appropriations to meet the balances due by the department.

Do I ask the United States to do more for the post office department than justice would seem to demand, especially when it is remembered that the whole expense of the official correspondence of the government and the public, and private correspondence of those entitled by law to the franking privilege, is sustained and paid by a tax upon the correspondence, and the correspondence of the government is relieved from the heavy annual charge as now rated, (and it has neither the power to lessen it nor to prevent its increase), it may be hoped that the object so much demanded by considerations of public justice (that of reducing the tax upon the publicly and private correspondence of individuals) will be attained, and at the same time, the usefulness of the public mail greatly enlarged and extended to those portions of the union hitherto measurably denied the necessary mail facilities.

If the government was required to pay postage upon official correspondence, and the franking privilege was removed, or reduced to proper limits, the revenue of the department would be increased to an amount sufficient of itself to pay the interest upon the debt to be incurred by the proposed arrangement, and liquidate the principal in less than thirty years.

I respectfully submit to the president the propriety of communicating to congress the views which I entertain and have here expressed upon this subject.

Some embarrassments to the free transit of the United States mail coaches over that part of the Cumberland road which lies within the limits of the state of Virginia, and the proposed extension of the present year, incident to a right assumed by the authorities of that state to impose a tax upon the each transporting the mail.

In the act of congress proposing a cession of all right which the United States claimed over said road, upon certain conditions, to the states through which it passed, it was expressly provided that no toll upon the stages, coaches, &c. conveying the United States mail should be imposed. With this, among other reservations and exceptions, the states of Maryland, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Ohio, accepted the cession and assumed the control over so much of the road as is within their respective territories. It appears that, by a subsequent act of the Virginia legislature, so much of the act, by which she accepted the road, exempting the stage, coach, &c. conveying the United States mail from the payment of tolls, was repealed, and the right to impose tolls, and was imposed upon the same. Without detaining you with a further narrative upon this subject, I submit the letters and correspondence of the department in relation thereto, and the documents accompanying the same. Though the amount charged and exacted at the single gate in Virginia is inconsiderable, yet if she have the right to impose the toll, the other states have an equal right, and will, most unquestionably, assert it; and thus an additional annual burden of near $9,000 will be added to the transportation of the United States mail over that road, which is already the most expensive mail-coach service in the United States.

It is proper I should inform you that the prosecution instituted against the agent of Virginia, before I was called to the discharge of the duties of this department, for obstructing the passage of the United States mail on said road, by closing the toll-gate against the free passage of the coach conveying the mail, has, upon my suggestion, been suspended, for the present, under a hope that, upon a full representation of this subject, by the proper authority, to the state of Virginia, all cause of difficulty might be removed, without the necessity of a penal prosecution. I submit, for your information, the report of the chief clerk of the post-office department, in reference to the expenditure of the appropriation, made at the extra session of congress, to pay the debts due to contractors and others, for services rendered prior to the 31st of March, 1841.

There are other matters of detail, connected with the business of this department, which by law are required to be reported to congress; and it is therefore deemed inexpedient to bring them particularly to your notice in this communication.

I have the honor to be, with respectful consideration, your obedient servant,

C. A. WICKLIFFE.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, DECEMBER 4, 1841.
TO THE PRESIDENT, OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report:

The navy of the United States is composed of—Eleven ships of the line, of which one is rated for 130 guns, and ten for 74 guns.

Fifteen frigates of the first class of which one is rated for 44 guns, and 14 for 41 guns.

Two frigates of the second class of thirty-six guns each.

Eighteen sloops of war, of which eleven are rated for twenty guns, two for eighteen guns, and five for sixteen guns.

Three brig-sloops, and four schooners, rated for ten guns each.

Four steamers; besides
Three store-ships, three vessels used as receiving vessels, and five small schooners.

At the date of the last annual report from this department, the ships in commission were employed as follows:

In the Mediterranean, the Ohio, of 74 guns, Captain LaVallette; the Brandywine forty-four guns, Captain Bolton; and the Cyane, of twenty guns, Commander Percival, who was relieved on the account of ill health, and succeeded by Commander Latimer; the whole squadron under the command of Commodore Jones.

The Cyane was relieved by the sloop of war Preble, Commander Voorlees, and returned to the United States in May last, her cruise having been performed. The Ohio returned on the 17th of July last, and the Brandywine on the 8th of May last. The return of the Brandywine was owing to particular causes, not connected with the original purposes of her cruise; and, as her presence in the Mediterranean was important, she was ordered back, under the command of Captain Geisinger. In July last, the sloop of war Fairfeld, Commander Pattall, sailed for the Mediterranean, taking out commodore Charles Morgan, who now commands the squadron on that station. The squadron consists at present of the Brandywine, Fairfeld and Preble. The honor of the flag, in its intercourse with those of other nations, appears to have been properly sustained by this squadron; a due support and countenance have been afforded to our mercantile interest, and the amicable relations of our country with foreign nations have been preserved and preserved.

In the Pacific ocean the frigate Constitution, Captain Turner, the sloop of war St. Louis, Commander French Forrest; the sloop of war Yorktown, Commander Aulick; the sloop of war Dale, Commander Gaunt; and the schooner Shark, Lieutenant Bigelow; the whole under the command of com. Alexander Claxton. Commodore Claxton died at Talcahuana in March last, in the great loss of the service and the just regret of the country. Upon that event the chief command of the squadron devolved on captain Daniel Turner, who returned to the United States with the Constitution on the 31st of October last, the time of her cruise having expired. Commodore Thomas Ap C. Jones, having been appointed to the command of that station, will sail in the frigate United States in the course of the next fortnight. The sloop of war Cyane, Commander Stribling, sailed for the same station early in November. Upon the arrival of Commodore Jones, the squadron in the Pacific will consist of the frigate United States, the sloops of war St. Louis, Yorktown, Cyane and Dale, and the schooner Shark.

Orders were given to Commodore Claxton to employ one of his vessels in cruising in the Gulf of California and along the northwest coast of America, and to visit the Sandwich and Hawaiian Islands, in order to afford protection and assistance to our citizens engaged in the whale fisheries. In obedience to this order, the sloop of war St. Louis, commander French Forrest, was ordered to cruise in the Gulf and along the western coast of California. This duty was performed in a judicious and creditable manner by Commander Forrest. The atrocities committed on American and English residents at Monterey and its neighborhood, by the Mexican authorities, are well known. Under the unfounded pretence of a conspiracy among the foreigners to wrest the country from Mexico, and to set up a separate and independent government of their own, they were attacked by armed soldiers at night, wounded, beaten, imprisoned, sent in chains to a distant place, and their property destroyed, without even the forms of trial. In the midst of these outrages, Commander Forrest arrived upon the coast, and, by his prompt and spirited interposition, vindicated the rights of our citizens, and secured the rights of British subjects residing in Upper California. For these services Commander Forrest received, and appears to have well deserved, a formal expression of the thanks both of American and English residents.

In consequence of the civil disturbances in Upper Peru, it was deemed proper to dispatch the Shark, under the command of lieutenant A. Bigelow, to cruise upon that coast. The movement was judicious and well timed, and the delicate trust reposed in Lieutenant Bigelow was discharged in a manner highly satisfactory to this department. The property of American citizens, exposed to the rapacity and lawless violence of contending factions in the midst of civil war, was effectually protected, whilst all who witnessed the operations of the Shark were inspired with increased respect for the American flag. It is highly gratifying to observe, that Lieutenant Bigelow has been able to view the operations of the protection of our flag to the citizens and subjects of other countries as well as to those of our own.

In further execution of the orders of the department, the sloop of war Yorktown, Commander Aulick, was dispatched on a visit to the Sandwich and Hawaiian Islands, in order to view the operations of our citizens, and to afford them the assistance as might be necessary to our whale fishers and other citizens trading in that part of the Pacific. No intelligence has been received from her since she left Valparaiso.

The conduct of this squadron, as well under the command of Commodore Claxton as under that of Captain Turner, has been highly satisfactory to this department. No disorder nor failure in duty has yet been reported to me, calling for my censure or disapprobation. On the contrary, the strictest regard appears to have been paid to the honor of the flag, and to the duties which it owed to the country and its citizens. Captain Turner very properly availed himself of an opportunity to show respect to a friendly power, by receiving on board the Constitution, at Callao, and conveying to Rio, the Brazilian charge d'affaires. For this act of courtesy he received the thanks of the imperial government.

I would respectfully solicit your attention, in a particular manner, to the situation of American interests in the Pacific ocean. According to an estimate made by an intelligent gentleman lately returned from the Pacific, there are at this time not less than forty millions of dollars engaged in the whale fisheries alone, of which the greater part is American. I have great confidence in the accuracy of this statement; but, even if it be too large, there will remain, after all reasonable deductions, an interest of vast magnitude and importance. American merchants have formed establishments in different parts of the coast, from Chili to Columbia river, some of them very extensive and important, and all of them entitled to the attention of government. In Upper California there are already considerable settlements of Americans, and others are daily resorting to that fertile and delightful region. Such, however, is the unsettled condition of that whole country that they cannot be safe, either in their persons or property, except under the protection of our naval power. This protection cannot be afforded in proper degree and with suitable promptness by so small a squadron as we have usually kept in that sea. To cruise along so extensive a coast, calling at all necessary points, and at the same time to visit those parts of the Pacific in which the presence of our ships is necessary for the protection and assistance of our whale fisheries, requires twice the number of vessels now employed in that service. It is highly desirable, too, that the Gulf of California should be fully explored; and this duty alone will give employment to a long time to one or two vessels of the smallest class. For these reasons we have caused estimates to be prepared for a large increase of the Pacific squadron.

I also respectfully submit to your consideration the propriety of establishing, at some suitable point on the coast, a place of refuge, where our vessels may resort, in case of any emergency to this object may be found between the mouth of Columbia river and Guayaquil, which, it is presumed, may be procured, if they be not to be found on our own territory. Our public vessels cruising in that area are generally absent from the United States not less than six months, and in the absence they necessarily require a variety of supplies which they now be obtained without very great difficulty and expense. Any considerable repair is almost impossible, with all the means which can be furnished by all the nations of the coast. Such a post would also be of great service as a place of refuge and refreshment to our commercial marine, and would be of great moment to our commercial marine, and would be of great moment to our commercial marine, and would be of great moment to our commercial marine.

In addition to this, a naval depot at the Sandwich Islands would be of very great advantage. It is a central point of the trade carried on to the Pacific, and possesses many peculiar recommendations of climate and local conveniences and accommodations.

On the coast of Brazil, the frigate Potomac, of 44 guns, Capt. Storer; sloop of war Concord, Commodore de Boerum; Marion, Commander Bell; Decatur, Commander Ogden; and schooner Enterprise, Lieutenant Goldsborough; all under the command of commodore Charles G. Ridgely.

Commodore Ridgely, having desired to be relieved, in consequence of ill health, and having been informed that his successor would soon leave the United States, returned home in the Constitution, leaving the squadron under the command of Captain Storer. This was in nowise injurious to the service; and the reasons assigned by commodore Ridgely for his return before the arrival of his successor were altogether satisfactory to the department. On the 1st of November, the Delaware of 74 guns, captain C. S. McAuley, having on board commodore Charles Morris, left Hampton Roads for this station. On her arrival, the squadron will consist of the Delaware, Potomac, Concord, Marion, Enterprise, and Decatur, all under the command of Com. Morris.

Nothing of particular interest has occurred in the operations of this squadron. The friendly relations of our country with the government of the coast have been strictly maintained, and the rights of our citizens have been duly respected by the local authorities.

In the West Indies, the Macedonian, of thirty-six guns, commodore Jesse Wilkinson; the sloops of war Levant, Commander Fitzhugh; and Warren, Commander Jameson. This squadron was ordered to return to the United States, to avoid the hurricane season in the West Indies, and is still here. The sloop of war Vandalia, Commander Ramsay, will take the place of the Levant, and the whole squadron will be ordered back to its station as soon as the vessels can be supplied with crews.

In the East Indies, the frigate Constellation, of thirty-six guns, commodore Laurence Kearny, and the sloop of war Lexington, of 16 guns, Lieut. Comdr. Leach, all under the command of Commodore Kearny. The operations of this squadron are dated at sea, off the Cape of Good Hope, 31st July, 1841. At that time the officers and crews of both vessels were in good health, and they were making the best of their way to the place of their destination.

The exploring squadron, under the command of lieutenant Charles Wilkes, consists of the sloop of war Vincennes, commanded by that officer; the Peacock, Lieut. Hudson; the brig Porpoise, Lieut. Ringgold; and the schooner Flying Fish, as a tender to the squadron.

Intelligence down to the 6th of April, 1840, has been communicated in previous reports from this department. At that time the squadron was in New Zealand. In further prosecution of his cruise, Lieutenant Wilkes visited the Fecjee islands, and succeeded in establishing useful relations with the principal chiefs. His surveys of this group were prosecuted with great care and industry, and have served to ascertain the positions of a large number of dangerous reefs, and to indicate many secure and convenient harbors. This will be of great value to our citizens trading with that group, and particularly to the whalers. In many of the harbors, in the inner group, the conditions to which the whalers are subjected are so favorable, that whales abound, although very few are to be found in the neighboring sea.

The melancholy tragedy which has already been announced in the public journals was enacted at this point. Lieut. Joseph A. Underwood and midshipman William Henry, while engaged in surveying, were treacherously assailed by the natives, and, after a brave but ineffectual resistance, were slain. Their bodies were recovered and buried there. Their bodies were rescued and properly interred, and Lieutenant Wilkes indicted on the offending savages a severe chastisement, which will probably deter them from similar outrages in future. He was also fortunate enough to capture a noted chief, who instigated the massacre of a greater part of the crew of the brig "Herald" at the mouth of the Saginaw. This chief he proposes to bring to the United States, to be dealt with as the government shall direct.

At the last dates, 24th November, 1840, the squadron was at the Sandwich islands, undergoing repairs. It was the intention of Lieutenant Wilkes to visit the northwest coast of America, and to return to the U. States early in the summer of 1842.

A squadron of small schooners, under the command of lieutenant John T. McLaughlin, has for some time been co-operating with the army in Florida. This force has been increased, since the last annual report from this department, by the addition of three revenue cutters, placed under the direction of the department for that purpose, by the secretary of the treasury, and a new schooner built under the direction of the war department. The whole force now consists of seven schooners.

Important assistance has been rendered by this little squadron in the military operations in Florida. It has furnished the means of penetrating the interior of the country and attacking the enemy in his fastnesses. Lieut. McLaughlin has manifested great bravery, energy and zeal, and much credit is due to him, and to the force under his command, for the handsome manner in which they have acquitted themselves.

In obedience to the act of July, 1840, the brig Consort, under the command of Lieutenant Powell, has been diligently engaged in the survey of the coast, from the bay of Appalachicola to the mouth of the Mississippi. This survey was completed in June last, and Lieutenant Powell has since been engaged in the survey of the South shoals of Nantucket.

The brig Dolphin, Commander Bell, and schooner Grampus, Lieutenant Paine, returned, the former in May, and the latter in August last, from their second cruise on the coast of Africa. These vessels have been actively and efficiently engaged in the suppression of the slave trade, and in the protection of our commerce. It is gratifying to learn that the crews regret to say that their officers and crews have suffered severely from the diseases of the climate; and it is owing in a great degree to the constant vigilance and prudent precautions of the commanders, that their sufferings were not still greater. Notwithstanding the prevalence of the climate, it is impossible to dispense with the aid of the coast-guard station to the interesting duty of suppressing the slave trade, which could not be otherwise effected, the lawful commerce of our citizens with all parts of the coast is rapidly increasing, and already employs a very large capital. This trade is an object of so much importance to our country, that it is not surprising that rivalry by traders of different countries, that the presence of national vessels is absolutely necessary to protect them in their just rights, and to prevent those outrages, unfriendly to the harmony of nations, to which men are often driven by the thirst of gain. It is also worthy of consideration, that the presence of our vessels is a powerful stimulus to our colonies, by giving them consequence in the eyes of the neighboring native tribes. These views give great interest to this squadron, and render it desirable that it should be placed upon the most effective footing.—Many additional precautions, however, are necessary, in order to protect the crews from the fatal diseases of the climate, and thus to enable the squadron properly to discharge its duties. I have taken measures to obtain the requisite information upon this point, and hope to be able to avail myself of it when a new squadron shall be appointed to that service.

The operations of these vessels have been highly valuable in protecting the rights of our citizens engaged in trade, and in preventing the traffic in slaves. They have performed all that could have been reasonably expected of so small a force. An additional number of vessels, some of which should be of larger size, will undoubtedly be necessary for the security of our increasing trade in that quarter, and for the effectual suppression of the slave trade. This trade, I regret to say, is still carried on to a considerable extent, notwithstanding the vigilance of our cruisers, aided by the active co-operation of those of England.

Representations having been made to the department of an act of unlawful violence committed against American citizens on the coast of New Grenada, the Brig Dolphin, under the command of Lieutenant McKean, was dispatched to that quarter in September last, with such instructions as were deemed necessary to redress the wrong, and to guard against the commission of similar outrages in future. Intelligence was received on the 5th inst. that the Brig Dolphin had reached her place of destination. The time she had required to complete her mission, and the particular outrage complained of was not committed upon an American vessel but the presence of the Brig Dolphin was nevertheless considered by our consular agent highly advantageous to American interests, inasmuch as it then disturbed state of the country.

The steamships Missouri and Mississippi, built under the act of 3d March, 1839, the former at New York, and the latter at Philadelphia, are nearly ready for service, and will form a part of the home squadron.

Orders have been given for the construction of three steamers of medium size, under the act of 3d March, 1841, one at New York, one at Philadelphia, and one at Norfolk. In addition to these, captain R. F. Stockton is superintending the construction, at Philadelphia, of a steamer of 600 tons, to be propelled by Ericson's propeller; and Lieutenant W. W. Hunter is engaged in like manner at Norfolk with one of 300 tons, to be propelled by submerged water-wheels invented by himself. Very valuable results are anticipated from these experiments.

Orders have been given to build a first-class sloop and three small vessels of war, and to finish the frigates Cumberland, Savannah, Raritan and St. Lawrence.

The balance in the treasury to the credit of the navy hospital fund is $217,907 53. This fund is gradually increasing, from the assessment of 20 cents per month upon the pay of officers, seamen and marines, so that a continuing surplus may be expected. I recommend that authority be given to invest these surpluses, as they accrue, in some interest-bearing

So much of its annual increase as may not be needed for the particular purposes of the fund may be advantageously applied, in other forms, to the comfort of our seamen. The average annual increase of this fund, from the 1st January, 1836, has been $27,223 67; which, if it had been invested in 6 per cent. stock, would have added to the amount $57,482 04 on the 1st of January next.

Of the appropriation for the "suppression of the slave trade," there remains unexpended the sum of $4,365 14, which has been carried to the surplus fund. I recommend that it be reappropriated, and the further sum of $3,000 be added, in order to meet outstanding liabilities of this fund.

Under the head of "contingencies not enumerated" there remains, of the appropriations of the last three years, the sum of $9,246 76; of which $3,246 76 will be carried to the surplus fund on the 1st of January next, if not previously applied to the proper purposes of the fund.

For the condition of the "navy pension fund," I respectfully refer you to the annexed report of the commissioner of pensions.

The operation of the apprenticeship system continues to be highly encouraging. Complaints are occasionally made that the pledges of the government are not fully redeemed, but no sufficient evidence has yet reached the department of the existence of any serious abuse. Great interest is felt in the success of this experiment, and every effort is used to secure to the apprentices all the benefits and advantages promised by the terms of enlistment. The vigilance of the department will be constantly exerted to guard against all abuses, and to introduce into the system every practicable improvement. The number of apprentices now enlisted is about 1,000. This number is expected to result as might have been expected. An extension of the system is contemplated, so as to give to boys in the interior of the country an opportunity to join the service, without subjecting them to the expense of a journey to the rendezvous on the seaboard.

Great difficulty is experienced in the enlistment of seamen. To what cause this should be attributed I am unable to say; and, consequently, I am not prepared to suggest any remedy. It is, however, probably true, that the mere seaman is of too little consideration in the general estimate of the service. Laws and regulations securing to him the enjoyment of his just rights, liberal wages punctually paid, and a strict application, if not an exercise, of the benevolent principle, which provides for him or his family when he is disabled or killed in the service, would probably secure for our ships of war the preference in most cases over those of the merchant service.

Experiments in gunnery and projectiles, which have been conducted for several successive seasons under the direction of captain M. C. Perry, in the vicinity of New York, have been continued on board the United States steamer Fulton, captain John T. Newton, but under the general control of Captain Perry. In testing a gun in the usual mode, it unfortunately burst, killing several men and wounding others. The investigation of the cause of the accident by a court of inquiry, whose finding shows that, however distressing and deplorable the accident may have been, no just cause can be attached to the officer who conducted the experiment.

Measures have been adopted, and are now in process of execution, for supplying the navy with the requisite guns. Less progress has been made than was desirable, because of the great pains which have been taken to obtain the best guns which could be procured in the country. In a short time they will be furnished of the various descriptions used in the service, including the Paixhan guns.

Under the appropriation of the last session, for the purpose of "making experiments to test the value of improvements in ordnance, in the construction of steamers and other vessels of war, and in other matters connected with the naval service and the national defence," nothing has yet been actually paid. Some experiments, however, have already been authorised, and others are now under the consideration of the department, from which very beneficial results are confidently anticipated. It is not proper, however, to turn the public mind to the question, so many scientific and practical men throughout the country are now turning their attention to the subject that we may reasonably expect great advantages from a judicious use of this appropriation.

I have, under your directions, taken measures for the construction of a steamer on Lake Erie, in compliance with the act of 9th September, 1841.

I regret to say that the measures which have been adopted for the preservation of live oak and red cedar timber, under existing laws, have not been attended with the desired results. Whether this is owing to the inefficiency in the laws themselves, or to want of due vigilance and fidelity in the agents employed, I cannot say. It is true, however, that there is no evidence that the timber is daily taken in large quantities from the public lands, without authority and contrary to law. This is a serious mischief, and one which calls for prompt remedy. It is confidently believed that the agencies now authorised by law will never answer this purpose. The lawless bands who are engaged in these operations are too numerous, and their unsupported authority of the agents; and, as it is almost impossible to bring them to justice through the ordinary forms of trial, they are left to plunder unrestrained. The presence of a military force, charged with that especial duty, is believed to be absolutely necessary to preserve the most valuable timber land. A very small force would answer the purpose. A single steamboat, with her ordinary crew and a few marines, under the command of an active and judicious navy officer, would be able to pass rapidly from point to point, and extend full protection to every timber district which is accessible by water. The co-operation of the revenue cutters would be afforded if required. This would be at once the most effectual and the cheapest expedient. Agents might still be employed to watch the interior districts, and to give notice of all trespasses committed on them. Power should be given to arrest offenders, and to bring them before the nearest magistrate. If the penalties provided by the statutes prescribed by the act of March 3, 1879, and § 31 are supposed to be sufficiently severe, the only difficulty now is to detect offenders and bring them to justice. Additional legislation, also, is probably necessary, to define accurately the limits of the reserved districts, and to prevent all interference with private rights.—The Government has no responsibility in respect to those who claim the early and serious attention of Congress.

Every effort has been made, in compliance with the law, to obtain water rotted American hemp for the use of the navy, but hitherto without success.

One contract has been made, but the contractor has been unable to comply with its terms. We are, therefore, for the present, thrown upon our former resources for a supply of this article, but I shall continue to use all possible exertions to carry out the wise policy of congress upon this point.

That reform is necessary, in every part of our naval establishment, is on all hands admitted; and it is, therefore, for the present, thought proper to make no delay. The delay has been in the making of reforms injurious to the service, and is daily rendering reform more and more difficult, as it becomes more and more indispensable. Impressed with this truth, and anxious that no time should be lost in commencing this important work, I respectfully bring it to your notice at the earliest day I do not permit, however, to be present at this time more than the mere outlines of the many important subjects to which I desire to invite your attention. It is presumed that congress, if it should act upon the subject at all, will refer it to committees of their own body, before whom I hope to be prepared to lay all the information that may be required.

The first step ought to be the preparation of a full code of laws and rules for the government and regulation of the naval service. Without this, every other measure of reform will be unavailing. It is of the essence of free government that the rights, the duties, and the responsibilities of all men, in all conditions, should be ascertained and accurately defined; and it is of the essence of tyranny that men should be punished for imputed offences, or at the arbitrary discretion of their judges. This truth applies with peculiar force to those who are engaged in military service. The strict discipline which that service requires renders necessary a great variety of rules which would be useless in the ordinary conditions of society, which involve no moral or social crime, but which, nevertheless, it is often necessary to enforce with the rigour of a military government. To a degree unjust in itself, and violative of the spirit of our institutions, that these new and peculiar responsibilities should be in any respect uncertain. And yet it is in many cases extremely difficult to determine, according to existing rules, what is and what is not an offence in our naval service; and in great many cases, the uncertainty of the law is dependent upon the arbitrary will of courts martial in what mode and to what extent offences, real or imputed, shall be punished. A short review of our legislation on this subject will serve to present it in its proper light.

The act of congress approved 23d April, 1800, certain general rules and regulations were enacted, embracing the most prominent and important subjects relating to the service. These are still in force, but, although they are of a character to apply to the navy in whatever condition it may be placed, and were deemed altogether sufficient for it at the infant state, they are too few in number, and enter too little into details, to answer their purpose at the present day. Acting upon this idea, the board of navy commissioners, soon after its establishment in 1815, compiled "rules, regulations, and instructions for the naval service of the United States," with the consent of the secretary of the navy, in obedience to an act of congress passed 7th February, 1815, entitled an act to alter and amend the several acts for establishing a navy department, by adding thereto a board of commissioners." This compilation, commonly called the Blue Book, is still practically in force, and together with the act of congress, forms the only system of rules and regulations for the government of the navy.

By the act establishing the board of navy commissioners it is provided "that the said board of commissioners, by and with the consent of the secretary of the navy, be and they are authorized to prepare such rules and regulations as shall be necessary for securing a uniformity in the several classes of vessels and their equipments, and for repairing and refitting them, and for securing responsibility in the subordinate officers and agents; which regulations, when approved by the president, shall be binding upon all officers and agents, until altered and revoked by the same authority; and the said rules and regulations, thus prepared and approved, shall be laid before congress at their next session." Whether or not the Blue Book (which derives its authority from this law alone) was ever approved by the president, is a question which I dare not say I have no means of ascertaining. The probability is that it was not approved, as the book itself contains no evidence upon the subject. But, even if both these formalities were observed, it is altogether clear in my mind that the commissioners acted without authority, in prescribing many of the rules and regulations contained in that book.

The obvious intention of the act of congress is to make the navy commissioners the ministerial agents of the secretary of the navy, for certain purposes. He has no authority to employ any other agents for those purposes. Among other things, it is their duty, under the second section of the act, "by and with the consent of the secretary of the navy, to prepare such rules and regulations as shall be necessary," in the execution of the specific duties therein assigned to them, and for "securing responsibility in the subordinate officers and agents employed in those duties. There is nothing in the terms of the act, and nothing in its plain purpose and intention, to authorize the commissioners to prepare a general code of rules and regulations for the government of the navy. They were strictly confined to the purposes mentioned in the act, to wit, "securing a uniformity in the several classes of vessels and their equipments, and repairing and refitting them." For these purposes, and for other, they had authority to prepare, by and with the consent of the secretary of the navy, such rules and regulations as they might deem proper; and, as a necessary incident of this authority, to prepare additional rules for securing responsibility in their subordinate agents.

That this is the true meaning of the act of congress is so apparent that I deem it wholly unnecessary to enter into a more critical examination in order to prove it.

But the Blue Book is not confined to these objects. It contains a great variety of rules and regulations applying to the department of naval duty, and to every officer and man connected with the naval service. It is designed as a general code of rules and regulations for the government of the navy, and, as such, it is universally received, and daily acted on.

Under this code, thus questionable in its authority, and altogether insufficient in itself, the navy has been governed for twenty-nine years! There is, in truth, no law upon the subject—no obligatory rule whatever, except what is found in the act of 1800; and that is altogether imperfect and inadequate.

This subject was brought before congress in 1832. A law was passed in that year authorising the president to constitute a board of naval officers, to be composed of the navy commissioners and two post captains, who should be authorized to employ, by the assistance of the attorney general, carefully to revise the rules and regulations governing the naval service, with the view to adapt them to the present and future exigencies of the service; which rules and regulations, when approved by him and sanctioned by congress, should be binding on the force, in lieu of all others theretofore enacted." The board thus constituted convened in November of the same year. In November, 1833, they submitted the result of their labors to the secretary of the navy, and on the 23d of the following month the rules and regulations thus prepared were approved by the president of the United States, and submitted to congress. On the 7th February, 1834, the chairman of the naval committee of the house of representatives moved that 1,000 additional copies be printed, which was directed on the following day. On the 1st May, 1834, the president submitted to congress certain proposals for amending the present laws in relation to the naval service." Whether or not these were the same proposals which he had previously submitted, (viz: on the 23d December, 1833), I am not informed, nor is it of any importance in itself. The probability is, that some amendment of the present proposals was presented in May 1834. On the 8th of the same month, the chairman of the naval committee of the house of representatives reported a resolution for the printing of 1,000 additional copies of the ancient rules and regulations for the government of the navy. No further action was taken, and congress adjourned on the 30th of the following month.

From this statement it appears that this important subject has been before congress ever since the year 1832, and that nothing effectual has yet been done to accomplish the object of the act of that year. Soon after the appointment of Mr. Paulding as secretary of the navy, he presented to the president, with all proper zeal. Such, however, was the pressure of other duties upon the board, that it was impossible for them to attend to the revision of the naval code, as Mr. Paulding desired, until December, 1840. On the 19th of February, 1841, they submitted their report to the secretary of the navy, who approved thereof, but did not lay it before congress, as the act of 1832 directed. Neither was this done at the called session of May last. I have now the honor to lay this report before you, and to ask that it be submitted to congress.

It cannot be too generally admitted that these rules and regulations are altogether defective, and are altogether in many important respects; and, as the further action of congress in regard to them is necessary, I recommend that they be again submitted to revision. I would respectfully suggest that the preparation of rules and regulations for the government of all classes and grades in the navy ought not to be entrusted to any one person exclusively. A mixed commission, embracing the civil as well as the military departments of service, would, it is believed, be best qualified to adapt to every part of the service the proper laws and rules for the government and regulation of it. Such a commission might, with the aid of the rules now submitted, easily report to congress in time for its acting during the present session.

The evils resulting from the want of a proper naval code are of the most serious character, and will, if not remedied, ultimately ruin the naval service of our country. What can be expected of a community of men, living together under circumstances tending to constant excitement and collisions, with no fixed law to govern them, and where even rank and station are imperfectly defined? The necessary consequence of such a state of things must be, disputes, contentions, disorder, and confusion. Sometimes unauthorised power will be assumed, and at other times lawful authority will be disobeyed. It is impossible that a whole army, or a whole navy, should exist in that condition of official rank and authority. The same uncertainty prevails in regard to punishments. The unbounded latitude of discretion allowed to courts martial in this respect is of most evil consequence, and calls loudly for correction. It invites to the indulgence of the discipline, and thus invites to light offences to undue punishment, and suffering great offenders to escape with trivial penalties. And, even if no such improper bias could be supposed to exist, it is not to be expected that all courts will look upon all offences with the same eye. Men of lenient and indulgent feeling will punish lightly the same offences which those of a different character will punish with the most rigorous severity. Hence an inequality of punishment will prevail, odious in itself, calculated to excite discontent, to bring courts martial into disrepute, and to destroy the just influence of their sentences in the maintenance of the honor and discipline of the service. To prevent these evils, to remedy the disorders which now prevail, and to place the navy in a healthy and efficient condition, it is absolutely necessary to provide for it a code of laws and rules which shall accurately define the rank and station of every officer, and his duties and responsibilities, and ascertain crimes and their punishments. And I would respectfully urge upon the proper departments of the government the indispensable necessity of entering upon this important work without loss of time.

The subject of importance is the reorganization of the navy department. I have had but a short experience in this department; but a short experience is enough to display its defects, even to the most superficial observation. It is, in truth, not organized at all. The labor to be performed, under any circumstances, is great and onerous; but it is rendered doubly so by the want of a proper arrangement and distribution of duties. At present, a multitude of duties are imposed upon the head of the department, which any one of its clerks could discharge as well as himself, but which, from their pressing nature, he is not permitted to postpone. Hence, his whole time is occupied in trifling details, rendering it impossible for him to bestow the requisite attention upon more important subjects, involving the great interests of the service. These details are indeed so numerous and multifarious as to render it impossible for any man to attend to them fully, and to the powers of any one man. In addition to this, the present want of proper arrangement is extremely unfavorable to that direct individual responsibility which it is so necessary to impose on every public officer. The same cause occasions delays in his operations, and the department, by requiring necessary variety of tedious official forms, and consequently preventing that promptness of action which is indispensable to its due efficiency. And it is not the least among the evils of this state of things that the precise condition of the several branches of the service, and the distribution of labor without time and labor; thus adding to the cost of the department, while it diminishes its usefulness. These inconveniences and embarrassments, and many others which are daily felt, in the administration of the department, would in some degree be removed by a mere rearrangement of the duties, and the distribution of labor now employed in it; but additional labor is absolutely necessary, in order to enable it to discharge its functions in the manner required by the interest of the service. It would not be proper to enter into all the details of the subject in this report. It is already before congress, and will be received the early attention of that body. A resolution was adopted by the house of representatives on the 19th February, 1839, directing the secretary of the navy to "report to this house, at the commencement of the next congress, a plan for the reorganization of this branch of the public service, adopting as the basis of his plan the division of the duties now performed by the board of navy commissioners, and their assignees to sea and shore bureaux." In obedience to this resolution, Mr. Paulding, the then secretary of the navy, on the 10th of December, 1839, a long and elaborate report, "based on the principle presented in the resolution." To this report I respectfully refer. In most of its views, and in all of its more important conclusions, I fully concur. I do not, however, adopt his plan, or the principles, and some additional provisions, will probably be necessary, which the experience of the department will enable it to suggest, in arranging the details of the law. I earnestly invoke immediate attention to the subject, firmly believing that the administration of the department is so vitally connected with the safety of the country, and that it cannot be longer delayed without serious injury to the service.

There is reason to believe that it is how the settled policy of the government, to increase the navy as rapidly as the means at its disposal will admit, and, may there may be unnecessary that I should offer any suggestions upon that subject. I should not feel, however, that my duty was properly discharged, if I should fail to add whatever influence my own recommendation may possess, to the many considerations which suggest this as our true policy.

It is safe to say that the mercantile property of our citizens annually added on the ocean, and employed in foreign trade, at not less than one hundred and twenty millions of dollars; and to this is to be added the value of the vessels in which that property is conveyed, and the value of American interests resident on mercantile establishments abroad, and dependent on mercantile trade.

The coasting trade, not including such articles as are exported, cannot be accurately estimated, but it certainly amounts to many millions of dollars. Taking the aggregate of all property annually exposed to an enemy on the coast, and in the harbors, and in the rivers, it will probably be found that it does not fall short of one hundred and fifty millions of dollars. So large an interest is entitled to demand, and justly expects to receive, the most certain and ample protection. This is due alike to the citizen whose property is exposed, and to the government, whose revenues are so completely dependent on the duties which that property pays. But that protection can be found only on the ocean. Trade is never secure unless it can, at all times and in all places, appeal for support to the national flag; and it ought to feel that it is safe wherever that flag is displayed.

Our position, in relation to foreign commerce to any valuable extent provides, as a part of its established policy, an adequate military marine. Our own country is far behind all the considerable nations of the world in this respect. As compared with England and France, the two principal enemies of our nation, it is found that England, with much less than twice our foreign tonnage, has more than eight times as many vessels of war, exclusive of her steamships; France, with only one-third of our foreign tonnage, has more than five times as many vessels of war. The comparison might be still further extended, scarcely less to the disadvantage of our own country. It may well excite surprise that, with so large an interest at stake, and with a certainty that it will rapidly increase from year to year, so little preparation should have been made for its protection and security; and this surprise will not be diminished when we reflect that our interest, redressed and increased, is entirely dependent upon, our foreign commerce, and which must necessarily flourish or decay along with it. The farmer, the planter, the mechanic, the manufacturer, and even the day laborer, depends, in a greater or less degree, upon this for the success of his own peculiar line of industry; redress and increase of his interest are not made by the same influences. Commerce may be regarded as our principal interest, because, to a great extent, it includes within it every other interest.

Wars often arise from rivalry in trade, and from the conflicts of interests which belong to it. The presence of an adequate naval force, to protect our commerce, by prompt redress and to the injuries which are done to it, is one of the best means of preventing these disputes and collisions which are so apt to interrupt the peace and harmony of nations.

But these views, although sufficiently important in themselves to justify and require a very large increase of our naval force, are not the most important, nor are they the only ones, in the subject. Ranking in the first class of nations, we are under an absolute necessity to regulate our policy, in some degree, by that of other countries, so far as their policy may affect us. All the considerable maritime powers have, within the last thirty years, increased the size and number of their navies, and at this moment actively engaged in the same work. This fact alone would seem to render it absolutely necessary that we should make similar preparation on our part. In proportion as other countries multiply the means by which they annoy us, we ought, in common prudence, to add to our own defences and to our own means of resisting insult and injury. Any other course will only invite aggression upon our rights, which will continue to increase so long as we shall patiently bear them, and which most ultimately favor the aggressor. The more we are annoyed, when we are least prepared to make it successfully.

Free governments, which are necessarily more embarrassed in their councils, and slower in their action, than those which are not bound to observe the necessary foras of free government, have a peculiar interest in the subject of our inquiry. The nature of our institutions presents a very strong appeal upon this point. A war between the United States and any considerable maritime power would not be conducted at this day as it would have been twenty years ago. It would be a war of incursions, aiming at revolution. The first blow would be struck at the treasury. The nature of the nation, it is presumed, would expect to be successful over us for any length of time, in a fair contest of arms upon our own soil; and no rise nation would attempt it. A more promising enterprise would be sought, in arraying what are supposed to be the hostile elements of our social system against one another. An enemy so disposed, and free to land upon any part of our soil which might promise success to his enterprise, would be armed with a fourfold power of annoyance. Of the ultimate result of such incursions, we have no reason to be afraid; but, even in the best event, war upon our own soil would be a most expensive, the most embarrassing, and the more horrible in its effects, by compelling us at the same time to oppose an enemy in the field and to guard against attempts to subvert our social systems.

Heretofore we have found in the shallowness of many of our waters security, to a certain extent, against the hostile incursions of our enemies. So recently been made in artillery, are destined to change the whole system of maritime war. Steamboats of light draught, and which may be easily transported across the ocean in vessels of a larger class, may invade us at almost any point of our extended coast, may penetrate the interior through our most secure rivers, and may land and out of our most fortified harbors. The celerity with which these movements could be made, the facility with which such vessels could escape, and the promptness with which they could change the point of attack, would enable an enemy, with a comparatively inconsiderable force, to keep us in constant alarm, and to compel us to the horrors of war into the securest retreats of our people. The effect of these incursions would be terrible every where, but in the southern portion of our country they might, and probably would, be disastrous in the extreme.

It is obvious that a war thus conducted must be successful to a very great extent, in spite of all the defences on land which we could contrive. Nothing less than the conversion of half our country into a military garrison could protect us against it. Such is the exposed condition of our country, such is the character of our position, and such is the number of our people, that a population of twice our present number under the best military organization, would avail us but little. Whilst the combined powers of the world could not subdue us, even a secondary naval power could avoid our land defences, set our armies at defiance, and prosecute against us our interminable harassing and disastrous.

The single question, then, which we have to decide, in reference to this subject, is, where and by whom shall those battles be fought, which may hereafter become necessary in defence of our property, our institutions, our honor, and our lives? Shall we meet the enemy upon the ocean, with men trained and disciplined for that purpose, and on their own element, the shores, trusting to a scattered and harrassed people to expel him from their farms and their firesides? This question admits of but one answer. But it is worse than idle to suppose that all those high interests which I have alluded can be adequately protected by our present naval force, or by the thousands of exposed sea and lake coast, a foreign invader, more scattered than the most distant seas, and a domestic trade exposed alike upon the ocean and upon our interior waters, are, in effect, surrendered to the enemy, when they are entrusted to the protection of some twenty ships in commission.

If these views be not altogether unconvincing, the policy of increasing our navy, without further delay, is obvious. How far it shall be increased, the wisdom of congress will decide. Looking to it as the chief, if not the only adequate defence of our country against those wars of incursions from which so much evil is to be apprehended, I respectfully suggest that we cannot safely stop short of half the naval force of the strongest maritime power in the world. Our policy is peace, and we do not propose to ourselves a war of aggression, should we be compelled to employ it, as necessary as a measure of defence. It is not probable that any nation could detach from other service more than one-fourth of its whole naval force, to attack us upon our coast; so that, after deducting such part of our own force as we could not employ at all, and which part we should not be compelled to employ, there, we might reasonably hope to repel from our shores any maritime power, with only half its force in ships. With less than this, our fleets would serve only to swell the triumphs and feed the cupidity of our enemy. It is better to have none at all than to have less than enough. I am aware that this great increase of our navy would not be effected in any short time. I propose it only as the object at which our policy ought to aim, and towards the attainment of which your measures ought to be steadily directed. An annual appropriation, as liberal as the means of the treasury will allow, will in a few years accomplish all that is desirable.

Of what description of vessels our navy ought to be composed, is a question of great importance, and one which we are compelled to decide with reference to the practice of other countries. Doubtless a very large part of it ought to consist of steamships. Experience has shown that the vessels may be rendered perfectly safe at sea, and that they may be so constructed as to adapt them, in other respects, to purposes of war. Of their great usefulness the world has had a striking proof in the recent operations of the British squadron on the coast of Syria—troops were transported, and the British flag was planted over the coast, and were engaged in battle in Asia Minor on the sixteenth day after leaving England. This and other facilities afforded by this class of vessels were so great and effective that the admiral declared that "this success was owing to the efficiency of his steamers." They may well profit by the lesson thus taught. I might say that the vessels which would not be wise in us to engage very extensively in the construction of steamships of war of the largest class at this time. Imitating the example of England, our wisest policy would be to aid the private enterprise of our citizens in constructing packet ships, to transport our citizens and foreign troops, and to transport our troops and foreign troops. These should, of course, be constructed to fit them for war purposes, and should be held subject to the demand of the government, upon equitable conditions. There will, in all probability, be enough of such vessels to answer all the purposes for which steamships of the largest class would be required, and they would be furnished at a comparatively small cost to the government. Improvements are daily made, not only in steam machinery, but in the propelling power applied to steam vessels. Experiments are now in progress which promise important results in these respects, and it would probably be judicious not to expend large sums in the construction of steamships for distant cruises until these results shall be made known. But the same reasoning does not apply to steam vessels of a smaller class, destined for the defence of our own coast and harbors. These ought not, under any circumstances, to be delayed. They would be particularly useful on the lakes and in the Gulf of Mexico, and would be employed advantageously employed, under proper regulations, in the revenue service. They would be peculiarly adapted to the Gulf of Mexico, in consequence of the calms and currents which prevail there, and of their greater facility in making harbor in the violent tempests which are so common in that sea. This is, in truth, but the single harbor of Pensacola in which a ship of large draught can find shelter, although there are many which afford sufficient depth of water for steam vessels of the proper size. These vessels should be built of white oak, reserving the live oak for the bows of a different class.

Steamships have been built in Europe, of iron, of wood, and of mixed materials. The subject is understood to have been successful. I recommend that it be made here also, with at least one vessel of medium size, sufficiently large to afford a fair test without exposing too much to the hazard of failure. The great abundance of that material found in all parts of our country, and the facility with which it can be desired, and our workmen will soon acquire, if they do not now possess, the requisite skill in converting it into vessels. We may thus acquire a cheap and almost imperishable naval force, while, at the same time, we afford encouragement to some of the most useful and important manufactures of the country.

In my opinion, there is no necessity at present to increase the number of our line of battle ships. Some

In connection with this subject, I would ask you attention to the situation of the professors of mathematics now employed in the service. This useful class of men have no permanent connexion with the navy, and are not paid except when on actual duty. The consequence is, that they cannot rely on this employment for support, and are often reluctantly driven to other pursuits. It is to be presumed that the best qualified, and the most useful, of these professors in the navy, are equally qualified to be teachers on land; and, as this latter is the less precarious position, the best qualified will be the most apt to seek it. Hence the department cannot rely with any assurance on the services of these professors, except at all times when their services may be required. It is, I think, of great importance that some provision should be made upon this subject. I also recommend that a certain rank or position be given to the professors, which will relieve them from the necessity of messing and sleeping with their pupils. This close and constant association is well calculated to weaken the respect and influence which their relation to the young officers ought to inspire, and which is absolutely necessary to give due effect to their instructions. I doubt whether their services upon the present system are worth the money which they cost, although they would be highly valuable under proper regulations.

It will be perceived that the estimates for the ensuing year are much larger than they have heretofore been. It is confidently believed, however, that nothing has been asked for which is not necessary, and that nothing which is deemed necessary has been over estimated.

Having recommended a large increase in most of our squadrons, it followed, of course, that I should ask the requisite appropriations to support them. Presuming that government does not build ships without designing to use them, it would appear to be the obvious duty of this department to keep as many of them in constant service as can be profitably employed. This is, indeed, the true economy. Some of our finest ships have decayed to a serious extent, while yet upon the stocks, and still more have, after having been launched, required expensive repairs before they have been sent to sea. This is the necessary consequence of keeping them in our docks. Ships in actual service are generally in better repair. Some of our vessels decayed. A careful guard is kept over them, so that slight decays are immediately detected, and repaired without any considerable expense. It has frequently happened that our vessels have been found, after their return from long cruises, in better order for service than when they left the docks. On the other hand, when they are kept in port without crews, they decay rapidly, for want of the care and attention necessary to preserve them. It may well be doubted whether the aggregate of losses sustained and repairs rendered necessary, by non-use of our vessels, has fallen very far short of what it would have cost to keep them in commission.

But this is the least part of the evil. While our vessels are unemployed, our officers are idle. They thus lose the opportunity of acquiring a due knowledge of their profession, and naturally fall into those erroneous habits of mind which are so common. It would not be surprising if they should forget, in some degree, their respect for the flag which they are so rarely permitted to hoist, and lose in indolence and despondency, the lofty spirit and generous aspirations to which the navy owes its past renown. I am happy to assure you that its present prominence requires to serve this neglect. At no previous time has it been able to boast of so many able officers of the higher grades, or of so many young officers of fine spirit, good attainment, and fair promise. Nothing is required but to brush off the rust of idleness by giving them employment, and to restore to the navy the pre-eminence of a reasonable hope that a life devoted to the country, in the arduous service of the sea, may claim, at least, the reward of that country's notice and respect.

Other reasons for the present increased estimates will be found in the report of the navy commissioners, which I herewith present. Their statement is minute and specific, and at the same time so condensed that it conveys all needful information upon this point, in as few words as I could use for the same purpose. I content myself, therefore, with a simple reference to that report, remarking at the same time, that it meets my entire approval.

It will be perceived that a very small appropriation is asked for continuing the necessary work at the navy yard at Pensacola. The great importance of that yard is fully appreciated, and every effort will be used to complete it in the shortest time as possible. It is believed, however, that the appropriation now asked is as large as can be advantageously used during the next year. I shall not hesitate to ask an additional appropriation, should it hereafter appear to be necessary.

I invite your attention, in an especial manner, to the report of the navy commissioners, which I herewith present. Their statement is minute and specific, and at the same time so condensed that it conveys all needful information upon this point, in as few words as I could use for the same purpose. I content myself, therefore, with a simple reference to that report, remarking at the same time, that it meets my entire approval.

I respectfully suggest that an establishment of such magnitude and value should be bounded on all sides either by water or by a public street, so as to afford the greatest possible security against danger from fire. The present is a very favorable time for the purchase of the additional ground necessary for the attainment of this object. I recommend this subject to your consideration before any large additional expenditure shall be made for permanent improvements under the present arrangement.

A suit has been commenced, by an individual, for the recovery of eight or ten acres of land attached to the navy hospital at Norfolk. So much of that land as is unclaimed by individuals, has now growing upon it a grove of flourishing trees, which would, if properly protected, afford great comfort and refreshment to the invalids, while it would add much to the beauty of the grounds. At present, however, it is not enclosed, and consequently is subject to depredations which there are no means of preventing. These depredations will in a short time destroy the whole growth. A very small expenditure would protect it, and would be very beneficially applied to that object. I may here perceive that the commissioners ask for additional clerks. If these are not considered altogether necessary, I should strenuously urge the subject upon your attention but for the hope that the wants of the entire department in that respect will be provided for in the re-organization of it, which I have herein so earnestly recommended.

As to the purchase of stocks, which are so often together necessary, I should strenuously urge the subject upon your attention but for the hope that the wants of the entire department in that respect will be provided for in the re-organization of it, which I have herein so earnestly recommended.

As to the purchase of stocks, which are so often together necessary, I should strenuously urge the subject upon your attention but for the hope that the wants of the entire department in that respect will be provided for in the re-organization of it, which I have herein so earnestly recommended.

Permit me to express my entire approval of the suggestion of the commissioners in relation to a suitable depot for the charts and nautical instruments belonging to the navy. These have been procured at great labor and expense, and are indispensable in naval service. The small expenditure which will be necessary to preserve them in a condition always ready for use, is not worth a moment's consideration when compared with the great purposes which they are designed to answer. They are a necessary part of a naval establishment worthy of the present and growing greatness of our country.

In the administration of this department, it will ever be an object of great solicitude with me to practise a prudent economy in all things. But I have not sought to save the public money, by simply declining to do what would be of value to the public. Believing it to be an object of the first importance to place our navy upon the most efficient establishment, I have not expected to effect that object at any small cost. The saving which exposes the country, in a defenceless condition, to hostile attacks, will not be recommended by me. The spirit which would calculate the cost of measures rendered necessary for the support of the honor and glory of our country will never, it is hoped, display itself in this department. I have felt it to be my duty to place the alternative fairly and fully before the country. An efficient navy can be built and supported without very great expense; but this expense must be repaid, even in time of peace, by the services which such a navy can render. In war, it will be worth to us all the value which we place on the safety of our exposed seacoast, on the security of millions of our people, and on the renowned glory of our naval flag. It is enough that a necessity for expenditure is shown; the amount of it will be a secondary consideration with a people who truly love their country and properly value its institutions. All which is respectfully submitted.

A. P. UPSHUR.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

DECEMBER 15. Messrs. Calhoun and Preston appeared in their seats.

Mr. Wright presented memorials from citizens of Niagara county, N. York, praying congress, so far as they may consider it wise, and expedient, to intercede with the British government for the liberation of the American citizens now prisoners at Van Diemen's Land.

Mr. McKim presented the joint resolutions of the legislature of Alabama, relative to the establishment of a land office in that state for the disposition of the lands acquired under the Cherokee treaty. Also, joint resolutions from the same body, in which complaint is made of the great inconvenience resulting to the citizens of that State from the present rates of postage, and requesting that congress do and perform the same to the small ems issued from the post.

Mr. Merrick introduced a joint resolution providing for the transfer, to the company, of the stock held by the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. White introduced a bill making appropriate for the continuation of the Cumberland road through the states of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois.

Mr. Pierce introduced a bill to settle the claims of New Hampshire against the United States; and a bill to equalize the pay of the army of the United States.

Mr. Benton introduced a bill to authorize the legislature of Louisiana to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for school purposes in that state.

Mr. Lim introduced a bill creating a new land district in Missouri, and changing the boundaries of the southern and western land district in said state.

Mr. King introduced a bill authorizing the settlement and payment of certain claims of the state of Alabama against the United States; a bill for the relief of settlers on the public lands, who were deprived of certain benefits under the pre-emption law of June, 1834.

The bills above named were severally read a first and second time, and appropriately referred.

On motion of Mr. Bayard, it was Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the southern and western land district in said state, and of employing a part of the navy to that service.

The resolution introduced yesterday by Mr. Mangum, was taken up, and being amended at the suggestion of Mr. King by inserting, after the words "resolutions of the committee," the words "and communications from the legislatures of the respective states," was agreed to, and the committee ordered to consist of three members, to be appointed by the chair.

On motion of Mr. Barrow it was Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury inform the senate what amount of public lands has been surveyed and is for sale in Louisiana; and also, what quantity has been advertised by proclamation, and afterwards sold, and the proceeds thereof.

On motion of Mr. Linn, it was Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for improving the navigation of the Ohio, Mississippi and Missouri rivers, by the removal of snags, stumps of trees, and other obstructions in their beds, which annually destroy a great number of steamboats and other water craft, and a vast amount of produce and merchandise.

Various portions of the president's message were on motion referred to the committees on foreign relations, on naval affairs, on manufactures, on the District of Columbia and on the post office and post roads.

Woodbury submitted a resolution, which lie over, instructing the committee on naval affairs.

The senate then adjourned.

DECEMBER 16. A message was received from the house of representatives, announcing that they had passed a bill making appropriation, in part for the support of the civil department of the government for the year 1842.

The bill having been read, was on motion of Mr. Evans referred to the committee on finance.

The president laid before the senate the annual report of the secretary of the senate with regard to the contingent fund.

Mr. Barrow introduced a bill to increase the compensation of the judge of the United States district court for the state of Louisiana; and a bill to provide for the payment of the balance due to the state of Louisiana, for raising and equipping a regiment of volunteer militia, mustered into the service of the United States, in the month of April, 1841.

Mr. Linn introduced a bill to authorize the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the territory of Oregon, for extending certain portions of the laws of the United States over the same and for other purposes; and, on his motion, the bill was referred to the committee of five members to be appointed by the chair.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, introduced a bill to confirm to the state of Indiana the lands selected by her in lieu of the lands ceded by the reservations under the treaties of 1837 and 1839, with the Miami Indians.

Mr. Linn introduced a bill to authorize the sale of the Selma and Tennessee rail road company.

Which bills were severally read a first and second time, and appropriately referred.

Mr. Barrow presented a communication from pursers in the navy, asking that their accounts may be settled by the directors of the secretary of the navy.

Mr. Evans moved that the report of the committee of the president and directors to finance, be referred to the committee on finance. In making this motion, he did not wish to be understood as wishing to embrace that part of the message relating to a fiscal agent, because, if that was desired, it could be referred to a select committee.

On motion of Mr. Barrow, so much of the message as relates to the judiciary, was referred to the committee on the judiciary.

On motion of Mr. Preston, so much of the message relating to military affairs, was referred to the committee on military affairs.

Mr. Linn gave notice that he would, to-morrow, introduce a bill to repeal the act for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and grant pre-emption rights.

Mr. Preston submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to the senate, with as little delay as possible, the plan of a fiscal agent of the government in connection with the president's message communicated at the commencement of the present session of congress.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. Woodruff yesterday, was taken up and adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs, by law, a number of officers in rank, of men, and of soldiers in commission, suitable for a peace establishment of the navy, and of regulating this establishment like that for the army, so as not to be changed, except under express provisions made by congress.

During the day, petitions and memorials were presented, and on motion of Mr. Young, it was Resolved, That the committee on commerce be directed to make an expedition of making an appropriation for removing the obstructions in Rock river and the Des Moines rapids.

The senate then adjourned till Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, DEC. 13, continued. A message was received from the president of the United States transmitting a report from the secretary of state in answer to a resolution of the house of representatives of the 4th September last, requesting information touching the relations between the United States and the republic of Texas. Referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

Various letters from the secretaries of war and army and commissioners of public buildings with statements of various accounts, expenditures and contracts.

The speaker also appointed the following committee, additional to those enumerated on page 255.

Committee on expenditures in the state department—Messrs. John Van Buren, New York, Charles Hudson, Massachusetts, William M. Oliver, New York, John H. Brookway, Connecticut, William S. Hastings, Mass.

Committee on the expenditures of the treasury department—Messrs. A. Lawrence Foster, N. York, Samson Mason, Ohio, Samuel P. V. Y., Isaac D. Jones, Maryland, James Irwin, Penn.

Committee on expenditures in the navy department—Messrs. James J. McKay, New York, Thomas L. Tomlinson, New York, Peter Newhard, Penna., John H. Brookway, Conn., Archibald L. Lynn, New York.

Committee on expenditures in the post office department—Messrs. Joshua A. Lowell, Maine, Christopher Morgan, New York, William H. Washington, North Carolina, Linn Boyd, Kentucky, Henry S. Lane, Indiana.

Committee on expenditures on the public buildings—Messrs. Cave Johnson, Tennessee, Seth M. Gates, New York, Benjamin A. Bidlack, Pennsylvania, Samuel Stokely, Ohio, Jacob Houck, Jr., New York.

Numerous petitions were also presented, in relation to as many topics and appropriately disposed of. The house adjourned.

TUESDAY, DEC. 14. Messrs. McKen and Otter, representatives from the state of New York, appeared in the senate.

Petitions and memorials were called for in the order of the states and territories.

Mr. Lovell gave notice that he would, as soon as it should be in order to do so, ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the payment of the claim of the state of Maine for the services of her militia in defending the northeastern frontier of the U. States in the year 1833.

Mr. Cushing gave notice that he would ask leave hereafter to bring in a bill for the relief of claimants for French spoils prior to 1850.

Mr. Adams (among a vast number of petitions) presented a petition from sundry citizens of Hamilton county, Ohio, praying the repeal of the 21st rule; which said rule is in the following words:

"No petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or any state or territory, or the slave trade between the territories or states of the United States in which it now exists, shall be received by this house, or entertained in any way whatever."

Mr. Adams moved that the petition be referred to a select committee of nine members, with instructions to report a resolution repealing the said rule, but afterwards modified his motion so as to simply refer the petition to a select committee of nine members; and asked the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. Merriether moved to lay the motion to refer to the table, and the question being taken, (Mr. Merriether's) motion was rejected, yeas 57, nays 92.

And the question recurring on the motion of Mr. Adams to refer the petition to a select committee.

Mr. Rhet moved a call of the house; which was ordered; and the roll being called, 183 members answered to their names. The names of the absentees were then called, and 193 members appeared to be present.

Mr. Calhoun moved that all further proceedings on the call be dispensed with.

The yeas and nays on that motion were called, and, being taken, were: yeas 90, nays 90—a tie. And the speaker voting in the affirmative, the vote stood yeas 91, nays 90.

So further proceedings on the call were dispensed with.

And the question recurring on the motion of Mr. Adams—Mr. Merriether rose and avowing his intention to debate the motion of reference, made by Mr. Adams.

The speaker decided that the petition would lie over one day.

Mr. Adams also presented a petition praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or, as the alternative, for the removal of the seat of government.

The speaker having decided that, under the rule, the first part of the petition could not be received—

Mr. Adams moved the reference of the alternative portion of the petition to the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Barnard suggested a select committee, with no desire, he said, to be himself a member of it.

Mr. Merriether moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. Adams asked the yeas and nays; which were refused.

Mr. Adams asked for tellers; which were ordered.

The yeas and nays, being taken, stood: yeas 66, nays 47. [No quorum voting; but the motion to lay on the table was understood to be decided in the affirmative.]

Mr. Fillmore, on leave given, introduced a bill making appropriations for the present session of congress; and, after reading by its title, and referred to the committee of ways and means.]

Mr. Lewis, on leave, offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the use of this hall be granted to the agricultural convention on to-morrow evening, the 15th inst., at 6 o'clock.

And then, the house adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 15. The following members appeared in their seats.

From N. York—Mr. Henry Van Rensselaer. From Georgia—Mr. Roger L. Gamble. From S. Carolina—Mr. James Rogers. From Alabama—Mr. Reuben Chapman.

Mr. Randolph asked to be excused from service as a member of the committee on retrenchment, assigning as his reason for the motion the fact of his being a member of two other committees, which would impose upon him arduous and laborious duties. The motion being agreed to, Mr. R. was excused.

By general consent, Mr. Fillmore, from the committee of ways and means, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be authorized to employ a clerk for said committee.

The question on the adoption of the resolution was then taken and decided in the affirmative.

On leave, Mr. Fillmore, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill making appropriations for the fiscal year of the department for the year 1842; which was read twice, and referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Fillmore said that this bill contained only provision in part for the expenses of the session; and, as there were no funds on hand in either house, he hoped the house would indulge him by going into committee now and passing it. The suggestion was received without a murmur, being acceded to, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Pope, of Kentucky, in the chair.) The bill being read, and no amendment having been offered there to, the committee rose and reported the bill to the house; when by unanimous consent, it was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. Thompson gave notice that he would hereafter ask leave to introduce a bill entitled an act to repeal the first seven sections of the act entitled an act to distribute the proceeds of the public lands and to grant pre-emption rights.

Mr. Cross gave notice that, as soon as by the rules of the house the opportunity is offered, he will ask leave to introduce a bill to establish a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States; a bill to increase the jurisdiction of the United States district court of the state of Arkansas and for other purposes; and a bill to authorize the legislature of the state of Arkansas to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in that state.

Various petitions were presented, in the order of the states, in relation to private claims, in improving harbors, among others Oak Orchard creek in Orleans county, New York; theistre de Grace in Maryland; and Atchafalaya in Louisiana; also petitions in relation to slavery, Hayti, removal of seat of government, hospitals on western waters, commerce in relation to silk, testimony relative to the Luddo treaty and other topics of various import.

Mr. Cushing, from the select committee on the plan of finance recommended by the president's message, introduced the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be required to communicate to the house the plan of finance recommended by the president in the course of the present session of congress.

And the house adjourned.

THURSDAY, DEC. 16. On motion of Mr. Fillmore, a committee on enrolled bills on the part of the house was ordered to be appointed.

Mr. Thompson, of Indiana, gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the construction of the Cumberland road through the states of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois.

Petitions and memorials were then called for and submitted, among which were several resolutions offered by Mr. Levy, in relation to various improvements for Florida, and also to Florida lands, and relief of settlers, &c.

Mr. Fillmore offered the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That so much of the annual message of the president, with the accompanying documents, communicated to this house on the 7th instant, as relates to subjects of controversy and negotiation between this government and Great Britain, and also so much thereof as relates to our relations with other foreign nations, be referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

2. Resolved, That so much thereof as relates to the suppression of the African slave trade, and so much thereof as relates to the removal of causes involving our international obligations from the state to the federal judiciary, and also so much thereof as relates to the regulation and restraint of executive power in removals from office, be referred to the committee on the judiciary.

3. Resolved, That so much thereof as relates to the civil service, and the appointment of representatives to the house, be referred to a select committee.

4. Resolved, That so much thereof as relates to the finances of the government be referred to the committee of ways and means.

5. Resolved, That so much thereof as relates to the tariff be referred to the committee on manufactures.

6. Resolved, That so much thereof as relates to the currency, exchanges and a fiscal agent, be referred to a select committee.

7. Resolved, That so much thereof as relates to the army, fortifications, and the Florida war be referred to the committee on military affairs.

8. Resolved, That so much thereof as relates to the navy and maritime defenses of the country be referred to the committee on naval affairs.

9. Resolved, That so much thereof as relates to the post office establishment be referred to the committee on the post office and post roads.

10. Resolved, That so much thereof as relates to the Smithsonian be referred to a select committee.

11. Resolved, That so much thereof as relates to the District of Columbia be referred to the committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hitt desired to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee of ways and means (Mr. Fillmore) as to the jurisdiction which that gentleman prescribed to the committee of ways and means and to the select committee on the subject of finance.—By the resolution raising the select committee the plan of finance recommended by the president was alone submitted. The inquiry he wished to make was, whether the select committee raised on this subject was confined to the plan submitted by the president alone?

Mr. Fillmore said he supposed that if there should be any conflict between the two committees they would necessarily have to refer the matter to the house for its decision.

His own question was then submitted, only referred to the committee of ways and means that part of the message which related to the condition of the finances, the receipts and expenditures.

Mr. H. C. Johnson suggested to Mr. Fillmore an amendment in the resolutions, providing that all such parts of the documents accompanying the message, as referred to the establishment of a national foundry, be referred to the select committee already raised on that subject. Mr. Fillmore said he had no objection.

Mr. Briggs hoped that the resolutions would be taken up regularly in their order.

Mr. J. A. Thorton called for the reading of the resolution which proposed to refer to the committee on manufactures so much of the message as related to the tariff, which having been read, Mr. Thorton said he supposed a tariff was to be laid for the purpose of revenue, and not for the purpose of protection; and he believed that this question had always come up in the first place on the disposition of this part of the message. Those who were willing to go for a tariff for protection, to lay "duties for the express purpose of protecting manufactures, and not for the purpose of revenue, had generally been in favor, so far as he understood, of referring that part of the message to the committee on manufactures; while those who supposed that a tariff was only to be laid for the purpose of revenue, had voted for a reference to the committee on ways and means.

He moved, therefore, to amend the resolution, by striking out the committee on manufactures, and inserting the committee on ways and means.

Mr. Everett submitted to the speaker, as a question of order, that the resolutions must be taken up in their order, and the question put upon them; the speaker said that the question would be taken on all the resolutions unless a division were called for.

Mr. Rhett called for a division on each resolution, which was ordered.

The question was then taken on the first resolution, which was adopted.

And the question was taken on the second resolution, which was adopted.

And the question being on the adoption of the fourth resolution, to wit:

4. Resolved, That so much thereof as relates to the finances of the government, be referred to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Cushing moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "so much as relates to the finances," and insert, "so much as relates to the state on the treasury and the ways and means."

After much discussion, upon ending the respective limits of the jurisdiction of the committees on ways and means, and the special committee on finance, and also upon the definite limits of the special committee and whether they were to be restricted rigidly to the plan of the president and his secretary, whereupon Mr. Everett suggested to Mr. Fillmore to insert in the resolutions, "and not for the plan of finance recommended by the president."

Mr. Fillmore said he would accept the modification. The question then being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Cushing, it was taken and decided in the negative, without a division.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on the original resolution, as modified by Mr. Fillmore at the suggestion of Mr. Everett the resolution was adopted.

The fifth resolution was then read, and is as follows: 5. Resolved, That so much thereof as relates to the tariff be referred to the committee on manufactures.

Mr. Thorton moved to strike out the word "manufactures" and insert "protection." He said the chairman of the committee of ways and means intended to reserve to that committee only so much of the message as related to the receipts and expenditures of government. This also belonged to the committee of ways and means; but if so much of the tariff was to be referred to the committee on manufactures, it would be taking from the committee of ways and means their appropriate business, and countenancing the principle of protection to its fullest extent.

Mr. Mallory called the yeas and nays on the motion, which were ordered.

Mr. Tillingham called for the portion of the message which the gentleman from New York (Mr. Fillmore) intended to refer to the committee on manufactures belonged to them; and this would appear to the house from an examination of that part of the message.—He should prefer to have the resolution modified so as to read as follows:

"That so much thereof as relates to manufactures, and to a discrimination of duties with reference to considerations of domestic policy connected with our manufactures," he referred to the committee on manufactures."

The business of the committee of ways and means did not embrace the "discrimination" which was pointed to by the president in his message, and which they had got to dispose of by reference to some committee. The subjects to be referred to the committee of ways and means were expressed by the rule describing their duty.

[Mr. T. then read the rule defining the duty of the committee of ways and means, of which the following is the material extract: "To take into consideration all such reports of the treasury department, and all such propositions relative to revenue, as may be referred to them by the house; to inquire into the state of the public debt or the revenue, and of the expenditure, and report from time to time their opinion thereon; to examine into the state of the several public departments; and particularly into the laws making appropriations of money, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and also to report from time to time such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments and the accountability of their officers."]

It appeared from this rule that this subject did not belong to the committee of ways and means; and there was no committee in which this subject could properly be referred but the committee on manufactures. The committee on manufactures was appointed for the purpose of ascertaining, when it was decided that revenue was wanting, how it might be most conveniently, least injuriously, and most promptly raised, to that committee, and not to this country. He hoped the subject would not be withdrawn from the committee, to which it was proposed to be referred in the original resolution.

Mr. Wise was very glad that the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. Thorton) had made this motion; if he had not, he (Mr. W.) should have said it himself. He has been the first to question the question of reference—between the tariff and anti-tariff parties. Those heretofore in the history of the tariff question who had gone for protection per se, had gone for the reference to the committee on manufactures, and those who had gone for a tariff for revenue to support the treasury, had voted a reference to the committee on ways and means.

The gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. Tillingham) had said there was a portion of this message which recommended protection to manufactures—a tariff of duties for protection—he said that the gentleman had alleged that the president had recommended protection. There was nothing in the message which suggested any such thing. He then quoted various passages from the message, showing, as he contended, that protection was not intended, but that reference was had to fiscal objects—to treasury objects alone—to revenue. The message recommended that the treasury should be protected from discriminating for the object of revenue; and within the line of revenue, gentlemen might ascribe to themselves the right of protection if they pleased.—Not one inch beyond a tariff of revenue did it go.—The question was, whether the principle should go beyond revenue, or a mere tariff. The gentleman proposed to make the incident govern the principle, and carry this whole subject to the committee on manufactures, to raise a tariff for the protection of manufactures.

Mr. Foster advocated the reference to the committee on manufactures.

Mr. Rhett should merely make a few observations. The speaker said that the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Foster), being a new member, had been indulged in a debate not in order, and suggested that the debate be confined to the strict question of reference?

Mr. Rhett said he did not understand the message as recommending protection. He would take the view to protection, but distinctly for revenue. He must confess the message did also intimate that discrimination might so be made as to protect manufactures. When a duty was made for the purpose of revenue, could it have protection? The only way in which a tariff of revenue could be benefited must be by having his manufactures consumed, instead of the foreign manufactures which would come in. That was the only way in which he could be benefited; and, in this point of view, how was it possible to combine a duty for revenue and protection?

He said that the interest commenced the other way. If the two objects were incompatible, and inconsistent with each other, as he contended, what did they propose by the imposition of duties? Unless duties were laid for the protection of the manufacturer, and for the destruction of commerce—unless that was the design of the house, duties must be intended for revenue; and why should the question of laying duties for revenue be referred to the committee on manufactures? The time had now come when this question must be settled; nine years it had been agitated on this floor. While they were about legislating on the first step, he urged them to be careful not to leave the subject to the committee on manufactures. If the house intended a duty for revenue, or incidentally for protection, the subject should go to the committee of ways and means. If the principal benefit was for protection, the subject should go to the committee on manufactures.

Mr. Fillmore said the first objection that had been made to the reference of this part of the message to the committee on manufactures was, that this committee had no specific duties assigned to it in the rule. He had some doubts whether it was in the history of that committee, for the purpose of seeing, he found it had no specific duties assigned to it by the rule, what duties had been assigned to it by the use of this house. He found that this committee was raised in 1819, and that, as often as the general question of manufactures had been brought up, it had been invariably referred to that committee. (He then went into an historical account of the existence of the committee, in connexion with the various bills since its origin, showing that the question of tariff had uniformly been referred to this committee.) He had no doubt that the committee on manufactures was unconstitutional. It was strange that a committee which was unconstitutional had been existence, and charged with important duties, for years, and nobody had before discovered its unconstitutionality. Was it of the least importance that what committee a bill came? If the house saw fit to be subject to the committee of ways and means, he, for one, was willing to devote all the time possible to this subject. He was willing the house should do as they saw fit. [A modification of the solution had been presented to him, which he was about accepting, when, at the request of Mr. Briggs, he was obliged to do so, leaving the resolution in its original form.]

Mr. Briggs said that the appropriate duty of committee of ways and means was prescribed; there were no duties particularly laid down for the committee on manufactures; but every body knew it was selected for the purpose of ascertaining, as far as possible, the greatest amount of information on the great subject of manufactures, and the tariff of duties for protection. There was no such proportion in the message, and consequently none but this house. The president of the United States told them that, in imposing duties for revenue, government has a right to discriminate so as to protect the manufactures of the country. If a discrimination were to be made, they wanted to know by what branch of industry most needed it, so as to discriminate wisely and judiciously. And whence would they get this information? From the committee of ways and means, who are supposed to have no particular knowledge on this subject, or from the committee on manufactures, who are supposed to have no answer to this very subject? This question need no answering; the formation of the committee answered it at once.

The gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Foster) asked why the object of former bills had not been approved by the committee on manufactures? He (Mr. B.) would say, if that had been the object they had a high and noble example for it. The conduct passed by the American congress was of this purpose—and passed by those who knew its duty, and did not hesitate to do it.

Mr. Medier referred to the remarks that had been made by his colleague (Mr. Foster) as to the unconstitutionality of the committee on manufactures. This had been spoken lightly of, but he would thank gentlemen to put their finger on the clew of the constitution which authorized the appointment of this committee. He would ask the gentleman from Georgia, whether he would not say that he was in committing this whole question to the chair of a committee who had supervision of one thing alone? He (Mr. M.) advocated its reference to the committee on ways and means who had supervision of the whole subject, and understood it properly. He agreed with the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Smith) that the committee on revenue be benefited.

Mr. Smith, of Virginia, went into an historical examination of the existence of several committees showing that, before the committee on manufactures its duties had been performed by the committee on commerce, together with the present duties of commerce. When the spirit of protection began to manifest itself, the committee on manufactures was made; and now the question was, whether the committee on manufactures, for the purpose of protection, should be recognised as in the power of congress. If the power of protection were unconstitutional, then the committee on manufactures would be.

The question then was, whether this house were to look to a tariff only for revenue, or for protection? If for revenue, what was there for the committee on manufactures? Its powers could be embraced, as formerly, under the committees of commerce and ways and means, and the committee was altered. He would suggest, however, the propriety of laying on the table this resolution, in the remaining parts of the message might be referred, and he would then offer a resolution, on which the question might be raised. The question now settled by this congress whether, under the constitution, they were to protect domestic industry, or whether they were to look to the tariff as a means of revenue. He moved for the resolution on the table, with a view to offer a resolution abolishing the committee on manufactures, and giving hereafter to the committee on commerce the power over commerce and manufactures.

Mr. Wise said he hoped his colleague would withdraw the motion, for it would lead to no practical good.

The speaker said it would require a vote of two-thirds to bring the resolution before the house, if objection were made to it.

Mr. Smith then withdrew the motion.

Mr. Proffit thought it was very anomalous, except as a principle, to have a committee on manufactures, and a committee on manufactures or ways and means, for their composition was but little different. From principle, it ought to go to the committee on ways and means. At the last session of congress, the question of the tariff, by a unanimous vote of that (the whig) party, was referred to the committee of ways and means; and now it was said to be improper to refer it to the committee of ways and means. In looking on the composition of the committee on manufactures, he was compelled, in self-defense, to vote against its reference to them. There was not a solitary member on it from the west of the Ohio river. The committee of ways and means there would be one or two to protect the interests of the west in this matter. His views coincided with those of the gentleman from Virginia on this matter. He did not believe it was intended by the president to communicate a tariff for protection, but that he would find on the table of a tariff for revenue, and that alone. The reference ought to be made to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. F. W. Ivin (in reply to the declaration of Mr. Proffit) said there was a member of the committee of ways and means from northwest of the Ohio. He did not intend to debate this question, although, when proper, it could be shown that every president of the United States, in some form or other, had advocated the doctrine of protecting domestic industry. The message of the present president said, that while we ought to confine the duties imposed by the government to the purpose of revenue, and whilst it is advisable to use moderate counsels on this subject the manufacturing interests might seek within this provision protection. The early presidents and congresses went further than the mere doctrine of protection; they went for encouragement as well as protection of domestic manufactures.

[Mr. I then cited from the history of their legislation some instances in support of this ground, particularly referring to the second bill passed by congress, which contained this principle, and was passed by 41 yeas, to 8 nays, among the yeas being the name of James Mansons. He also briefly noticed the history of the committee on manufactures.

But now had a party sprung up, and been recognised not only in South Carolina, but had spread its ramifications into other sections of the union, that not only condemned the protective system, direct and incidental, but went on to a discrimination of duties within a tariff of revenue, for the protection of domestic manufactures. They went further, and desired by discriminating against them, to break down the industry of this country; and they had now within that party a member from Georgia, a whig no sorer from whom he was much surprised to hear such sentiments as he had to-day uttered, which were in violation of the pledges given by the great Harrison party; made by their chief, who openly and above board declared himself in favor of the compromise act; but within that, for all the protection that could be afforded, for the protection of the southern whig to fulfil that pledge. The domestic industry of this country must and would be protected.

He called on the democratic party of Pennsylvania to say whether they were prepared to avow this doctrine—for the first time published in the Globe—discriminating against manufacturing industry. To what committee, he asked, should this part of the message go? Let it be admitted that they might incidentally discriminate, for the purpose of affording all the protection they could within the compromise act, and where was the subject to go if not to the committee on manufactures?

The speaker gave the floor to—

Mr. Jones, of Virginia, who yielded to a motion that the house adjourn.

And then the house adjourned.

FRIDAY, DEC. 17. On motion of Mr. Ward, it was resolved that when this house adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The unfinished business of yesterday was the resolution offered by Mr. Fillmore:

Resolved, That so much thereof, [i. e. of the president's message], as is referred to the tariff be referred to the committee on manufactures.

Which resolution Mr. Atherton had moved to amend by striking out the words, "committee on manufactures," and inserting the words "committee of ways and means."

And the pending question was on the amendment.

Mr. Jones, of Virginia, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the house at some length in favor of the amendment, and Mr. J. then examined into the duties of the committee of ways and means, as prescribed by the rules—contending that the bare enumeration of duties was not at all a sufficient glance, that the whole subject of revenue and of finance was intended to be committed to their charge.

If this were a proposition to lay a tariff for protection, he was not prepared to say that its direction to the committee on manufactures would not be the proper one. But if any gentleman of this house ask the imposition of duties for the purpose of protecting domestic manufactures? The idea was disclaimed on all hands. Was such the recommendation of the president of the United States? He, (Mr. J.) had only to appeal to the history of the past political life of the president to find the most ample refutation of such a position. Was that a fair construction to be placed upon the communication of the president?

By examination, they would be able to see the inducements which operated on the mind of the president to bring this subject before the house. The president was giving information to congress. (It was his duty to do,) in relation to the condition of the treasury. He was going on to show the resources of the government for the year, and to show its liabilities for the same period. In this connexion it was that the subject of the tariff had been introduced by the president; and Mr. J. would call the attention of congress to the particular branch of the subject.

Mr. J. commented upon the expenditures unfavorably to the administration, &c. read from the message the statement of receipts and expenditures, for the purpose of repelling the inference that the object of the president in his communication was the protection of manufactures. The president, he said, never throughout these points of the message, lost sight of the word revenue, thus clearly showing the object to be to impose duties for the purpose of revenue alone.

Mr. J. did not very clearly understand what was intended by the president in that part of the message in which he said: "So also the government may be enabled to determine the expediency of such considerations of domestic policy connected with our manufactures." If the president meant to assert the opinion that congress possessed the constitutional power to lay discriminating duties with a view to protect domestic manufactures, then he differed with the president, and the result of the debate would be his sound and inconvertible, that at the precise point where complete protection commenced, revenue ceased. The very object for which protecting duties were imposed, was to exclude from the country the commodities on which the duties were laid, and on which revenue depended; while duties laid for revenue alone. The effect of the one was to promote commerce, to raise revenue to replenish the treasury. The effect of the other was certainly to cripple, if not to destroy, both the commerce and revenue of the country.

But if, on the other hand, the president meant to advance the opinion that incidental protection to domestic manufactures might result from the laying of duties, laid really for the purpose of revenue, then the question was presented in wholly a different point of view, and in one certainly less objectionable. In no view that he, (Mr. J.) had been able to take of this subject, had he been able to perceive any sufficient reason why it should be taken from the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Hunt, remarked that, from the commencement of this debate, he had deprecated it, because it seemed to him that the gentlemen were unnecessarily anticipating a subject which must, sooner or later, come up for the action of the house at the present session.

He was a member of the committee on manufactures, and were he to consult merely his own ease, he would be desirous that this subject should be referred to the committee of ways and means. But, from the course which this debate had taken, and but unadvisedly, the gentlemen were desirous of drawing out on this floor an expression of opinion as to the fact whether there was any constitutional power or right in this house or this government to protect the labor—yes, the free and the slave labor—of this country, as contradistinguished against the paper labor of Europe. If there was any motive or object in the debate which had sprung up, it was to elicit an expression of opinion on this point.

He had had no idea of entering into the argument, and he should not have done so but that some observations had been made by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Davis,) which he could not suffer to pass without a remark. He had respected the tariff, year after year, made the declaration here, that so far as regarded himself—and he spoke the sentiments of a constituency partly agricultural, partly commercial, and partly manufacturing, and one of the most wealthy and opulent in his state—there was no disposition to drive the tariff out of the tariff, to any extent that any patriotic gentleman from the south would not assent to, to an extent offensive to enlightened and patriotic gentlemen from the south acting under the compromise act. His principal object in rising had been to ask gentlemen on all sides of the house, tariff or anti-tariff, whether coming from the north or the south of Mason and Dixon's line, to put aside from their contemplations the charm of protection on the one hand, and revenue on the other, and to come up like sensible and patriotic men, like the means, to the question of the protection of American industry, from the tariff of the north or the south of Mason and Dixon's line, against the legislation, the orders in council, and the restrictive regulations of foreign countries. That was what he asked. He asked gentlemen to do this with a spirit of compromise of patriotism—as American citizens, without reference to geographical divisions.

As to what might be the specific meaning of the president of the United States in that portion of his message which related to this subject, he should at the time he was speaking have been more respectful and decorum due to his station, and as an independent legislator here, he would never consent to look to the white house, nor to reports of Mr. Hume, nor to any other quarter, for lights to influence him on the question of protecting American industry from foreign restrictions and regulations.—He would never consent to take the president's recommendation as a rule of action by which his own conduct or vote was to be governed. If things were to come to that, better would it be to abolish this as well as the other house of congress. Mr. H. addressed briefly to the complexion of the two committees, and then concluded his remarks. The final action of the house, the result would be the same whether the report came from the one committee or the other.

The manufacturers, like all other classes of men, were selfish—to more so than merchants, or planters, or agriculturists, or mechanics, or sailors, or any other class of men. But they were essentially selfish. Their interest required them to be so. As such, and looking to them merely as manufacturers, he owed this class of men nothing, either as a legislator or as an American citizen. But when gentlemen looked at that class of men as connected with the agriculture, and commercial interests, and with government in all its departments, could they as politicians or as patriots, looking to the United States and to the protection of the commerce, the agriculture, and the labor of our own country, say that this great class of men were to be neglected? And not only so, but that discriminating duties or in other words discriminating legislation against them, was to be adopted by an American congress?

Mr. H. expressed the hope that this portion of the message might go to the committee on manufactures, that having heretofore been the usual course of reference.

Mr. Randolph, being one of the committee on manufactures, and representing a people largely interested in the subject, rejoiced that the debate had sprung up thus early in the session. It would arouse the country to the importance of the subject, and awake from their fatal slumbers the numerous class of citizens who were sleeping, and who, if they had been slumbering on the very brink of destruction, as if all were safe or all was lost.

Mr. R. was also happy that this debate had not assumed a political cast. The south, of all parties, had come out against the manufacturers; and he thought it ought to show to the north, the middle, and the west, that they should bury party distinctions and unite upon an opposite course. He called on the iron-handed democracy of Pennsylvania, as well as their political associates in other portions of the union, to go with him in sustaining the interests of their own country. He called on the north, the middle, and the west, that they should bury party distinctions and unite upon an opposite course. This was one. It rode and should ride triumphantly above all such distinctions. And if the question now before us is to be a test, as alleged by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) of the north and the south, he would say that the north and the south had no occasion for making it a test: the subject had always been referred to the committee on manufactures, and there it should go. But if it be a test—of what is it? We are ready to meet it, and the test question is between a horizontal ad valorem tariff and one of discrimination. Between these two systems was the test, and on this question he understood the president as going with the north. He says: "So also the government may be justified in so discriminating, by reference to other considerations of domestic policy connected with the tariff, as to give a preference to duties which are laid with distinct reference to the wants of the treasury, no well founded objections can exist against them." He adds: "It might be esteemed desirable" not to affect the land bill. Thus he does not even limit the discrimination to 20 per cent.

Mr. R. said he was aware that a certain newspaper, claiming to be the organ of the president, had put a different construction on the message; he supposed, however, that the country must look to the message itself, rather than to the organ, for the precise meaning. Besides there were some persons, as rumor said, who had been deputed to say that the president, in the message means not what Mr. R. and others contended it did. Were any so authorised? No answer. Then there are none. The language of the president must be taken as broad as it stands, and his acts conform accordingly. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Rieth) had said that the tariff was not a revenue duty. That was inconsistent, and the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Jones) had this morning dwelt on the same point. Mr. R. thought, with deference to those gentlemen, a greater fallacy was never uttered. It arose from not distinguishing between a duty that was prohibitory and one that was not. The duty of three cents a pound on cotton was prohibitory. It was not on wine, and on iron, wool, &c. it was a revenue duty, whilst the duty on iron, wool, &c. &c. not being so high as to be prohibitory, operated both for revenue and for protection. The increase of the duty increases the revenue, though, by decreasing the importation and enhancing the price, it at the same time creates or increases the protection. The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Merritt) had alluded to what he explored the idea of a protective tariff. Explained. When the bill was introduced by Mr. R. the first petition on record, and the second statute passed under the constitution, were for protection; and from the period that act was passed to the present, through all the phases of party, every congress had, in some shape or other, recognised the doctrine of protection. Other gentlemen had bated the idea that it was a committee on manufactures. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Smith) had offered a resolution to expunge it. Mr. R. regretted that he had withdrawn the resolution,

The country would like much to have seen the vote on it; they would like to have known who were for and who were against. But the friends of the tariff, by thrusting from congress the large class of citizens interested in manufactures. Another gentleman had said that the tariff would be introduced into the house. If so, it had been here for more than twenty years, and has carried many a goodly burden. He believed almost every tariff bill had been presented under that rule. But (Mr. R. said) he did not intend to go further into the debate. This was the time to discuss the principles of a tariff. He would confine himself to the question of merely assigning his reasons why this portion of the manifesto should be referred to the committee on manufactures. In the first place, the rule and the committee were created for the express purpose; this was the committee to whom the subject had usually been referred. It was not a committee which had had such a multiplicity of business before them that they could not possibly give this subject the attention which it required. And, lastly, this was the appropriate committee, because the only question was, how you shall discriminate; and as any discrimination would be in favor of or injury to manufactures, of course the committee on that subject should have cognizance of it.

Mr. J. R. Caldwell said he would show, first, that the committee on manufactures had a valid existence. It had been contended here that it had not, or ought not to have. This argument could not exist were it not that a particular duty was not assigned to it. If a judicial eye should pass over the parts of the message that the president had sent, it would see that the intention of the president was to increase the duties on the protection of increased duties, of an augmentation of duties, with the protection of domestic manufactures. It was not to be overlooked that the legal adviser of the president on this point was a citizen of Pennsylvania, a state where the doctrine was perfectly settled, that the president had a right of reconciliation may exist. Let the president's own law be the law. It is axiomatic. There could be no doubt of the intention of the president. He apprehended the president was entirely right in his idea of the possibility of a reconciliation between these two things, that gentlemen had deemed inconsistent.

Whenever a change was made in the revenue policy of the country, there was not an instantaneous, magical change from one state of things to another; but there was a transition state. So with manufactures: when, ever, with moderation and judgment, the duty on an article was increased, the interest of the manufacturer was benefited. The manufacturer, by increasing the duty, was bringing into use the resources of the country. How would it be with foreign articles? He then referred to various articles, which, a few years since, it was thought, must be imported; our manufacture of which had now arrived to such a degree of perfection that the American articles are preferred.

over the English. There was, therefore, whenever an increase of duties took place, a great abundance thrown on the American market by the foreign capitalist, which at once pays the amount of increased revenue, cheapens the article in our market, and enables the manufacturer of our own country—the home manufacturer—to see in the rainbow of hope a promise of the future excellence and advantage of his articles that foreign manufactures cannot surpass. The two things, therefore, were perfectly reconcilable.

They had then told, in the course of the present debate, that there was nothing found in the constitution of the United States relating to manufactures. Press the argument home, and the constitution would then not only not be a source of authority, but would extend no power, but to the committee of ways and means the principal part of their duties also. Two or three gentlemen had referred to the earliest tariff; it was important to press the facts connected therewith on the house, inasmuch as it had not only been the first tariff, but the only one that was framed by the same individuals that had just framed the constitution of the United States, and was found in the statute in immediate juxtaposition with the law which went before it, requiring of the officers of the revenue, and the states circumstances, that they should take oaths to support the constitution; and immediately came the preamble to the tariff of duties referred to, which were levied for the support of the government; to pay the debts of the government; thirdly for the encouragement and protection of manufactures under the existing circumstances. The speaker then considered of the present day, and entitled to the respect of posterity.

Mr. Stanhild, had he not known this house at well as he did, he should have been surprised at the range of debate taken on the mere question of reference. But he understood the object. They had seen the enemies of the whig party—and he welcomed them to their seats of honor. He had seen a gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. Wharton), who with a zeal—a hasty zeal—for which he as a southern man did not thank him, was endeavoring to protect the south; and really the discussion had been quite amusing. He had been amused to see a gentleman, apparently a gentleman, taken sides in this matter. There was the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. Frein), who yesterday made one of the most ingenious, non-committal speeches, for a protective man, he had ever heard. He had said the message recommended a protective tariff, and did not recommend it; while another southern gentleman disclaimed the message, and encouraged domestic manufactures. It was not for him to take sides in this dispute between the two parties; he would let them discuss it among themselves. He thought it a little unkind for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to note with such emphasis that a southern whig, from Georgia, had been among the first in attacking a protective tariff. He thought that his own countrymen were taking the lead in opposing the whigs in opposing a protective tariff.

The gentleman from Georgia had said that the committee on manufactures had no duties by the rules of this house. [Mr. S. here referred to the journal of the house, showing that in 1795 a committee appointed for that purpose had reported to the house the necessity of the committee on commerce, and among others, and that this committee was expressly charged with the duty of reporting on manufactures; and that in 1796 the committee on manufactures was separated, and the committee on manufactures appointed.) It was no new thing. The framers of the constitution in 1795 established the committee on manufactures. And who now proposed to knock it away? A southern whig? No; one Mr. Smith, who never claimed that title, and did not want it, from a district of Virginia, near this place. Let that fact go to the people of Pittsburgh. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had called on the southern whigs to come up and stand by their standard. The Mr. Smith did not do so, and they were in Pittsburgh, the southern whigs in his district, and some of their own, and he should like to call the gentleman from Pennsylvania to come and stand by his side in rejecting abolition petitions, the next time they came up. Let him come and help us.

But the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Jones), the ex-cancellor of the exchequer of this house, had made one of those mild, gentle speeches here; who, with all his ability, one of the most plausible insinuating gentlemen, sometimes put a deceptive statement—he would not say intentionally—before the public. He said that the gentleman from Virginia—he the locofocoism, he (Mr. S.) took pleasure in calling him a friend, and he was as much so, he was willing to admit, as a locofoco could be. He (Mr. Jones) commences an attack on this administration, and taunts us by saying that we had promised to reduce the public debt to one million dollars. Behold how soon a plait tale shall put him to the blush. The gentleman had said that the expenses of government this year for the first three quarters amounted to $24,734,546. Why could not the gentleman state that from the 1st of January to the 31st of March, 1847, the public debt had increased $20,757,156, to which added the $24,734,546, left a balance of $45,491,702 for the last quarter of this year, it amounted to $7,937,904. In the first place, he asked the gentleman from Virginia to compare this with the thirty-nine millions expended during Van Buren's administration. How did this thirty-nine millions compare with the thirty-nine millions expended during the administration of the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams)? Did he come into power with his friends professing retrenchment and reform, and stay in power twelve years? Did it come in with the friends of the locofocoism, and stay in power twelve years, controlling this house and the nation with an insatiable thirst for money? Did he not know that it was to taunt us—not having been in power one short year—and with misunderstanding enough and trouble among ourselves, so that we hardly know where we are—to taunt us with increasing the expenditure of the government, and the appropriations which he (Mr. J.) and his party have made in this twenty-seven millions come up? Who appropriated the money? Did these appropriations come from us at the extra session of congress—from any increase of the money? No; that was done under Van Buren. It is the venerable friend, formerly at the head of the committee on appropriations, who has made them some account of this. These appropriations outstanding on the 4th of March last were more than thirty-one millions of dollars, and were the work of the last congress and the last administration, when to taunt us these appropriations showing so large an increase.

During the last session (continued Mr. S.) of last congress, when the reign of Van Buren ceased, Mr. Woodbury makes his estimates, and tells us we must not exceed them; and yet, before the session is out, the chairman of the committee of ways and means admits that they were exceeded by nearly two millions of dollars. Was there in those estimates of Mr. Woodbury's any estimate for the Florida war?

[Mr. S. then read from document No. 70, 26th congress 2d session, a letter from the secretary of war to Mr. J. W. Jones, chairman of the committee of ways and means, in which, speaking of the arrearages due to the Florida troops, he says: "This pay is now due;" and with this letter of December 17, 1840, a statement received from the paymaster general's office, November 13, 1840, of dues to the Florida troops, amounting to $250,690 10.]

Mr. Woodbury, in submitting his annual estimates, kept out of view not only the money wanted, but debts due; among others, this debt of $250,000, and thus the whig party must be saddled with charges which the Van Buren administration made! Was it fair, or generous for the gentleman from Virginia to say that the country in its distress, to take away the twelve million of dollars public debt, we should be able to reduce the expenditures some ten or twelve million dollars. These appropriations, therefore, were to pay the debt created by the last administration, and not by the whig congress, or since the whig party had been in power. He (Mr. S.) requested the gentleman from Virginia, therefore, to postpone his censure until there was a fair trial, not let the whig party wouid do; he trusted they would let the country know the truth. They could not, let them be scouted out of power and sink as they trusted they (the late administration) had, in public indignation.

Mr. Stale obtained the floor, and moved that the house adjourn, and the house adjourned to Monday, at 12 o'clock.

CONGRESS.

In the senate on Tuesday, the bill to postpone the operation of the bankrupt law, having its second reading, Mr. Berrien moved that it be referred to the committee on the judiciary, on which some debating ensued, in which Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Calhoun, Mangum, Clay, Buchanan, Henderson, Huntington, and Tallmadge partook. The question being taken was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bates, Berrien, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Morehead, Porter, Simmons, Southard, Tallmadge, Williams, Woodbridge—15

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Babby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, King, Linn, M. Roberts, Mangum, Monroe, Pierce, Poinsett, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Sturgess, Tappan, Walker, Woodbury, Wright, Young—25.

So the motion for reference was negative.

AMENDMENTS PROPOSED TO THE CONSTITUTION.

On Wednesday Mr. Clay introduced three resolutions, which having had a first and second reading, were on his motion made the special order for Wednesday the 12th January. They propose to amend the Constitution, the first, by prohibiting a senator or representative from being appointed to any civil office under the U. S. government during the term or fraction of the term for which he was elected; the second, by rendering the veto in-operative in case a majority of both houses shall again pass a bill after reconsideration of its objections; and the third, by electing vice vice, by a joint vote of the senate and house, the secretary of treasury and the treasurer of the United States, who are also to be removable only by the concurrent vote of the two houses.

THE EXCHEQUER BILL. On the same day Mr. Preston, called the attention of the senate to the report of the secretary of the treasury, giving the plan for the establishment of currency. He was of opinion that something must be done, but there were certain portions of the plan which staggered him a good deal. He concluded by moving that the report of the secretary on the subject of an exchequer board be taken up for consideration. Mr. Tallmadge moved that it be referred to a select committee of nine and being indisposed accompanied his motion with but few remarks. Mr. Buchanan arose and expressed his opposition to the plan of the secretary and could regard it only as a great government bank. Mr. Calhoun briefly expressed some of the reasons that would induce him to oppose the motion to commit, and concurred in the objections of Mr. Buchanan. Mr. Rives replied to the arguments of both; he did not consider it a government bank, appealed to them not to make up their minds in opposition until the bill had been modified in committee, and regretted that they had resolved on opposition, before they knew the shape the proposed measure would assume. Mr. Mangum having then obtained the floor, yielded to a motion for adjournment, and on Thursday delivered his speech in opposition.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

AMERICAN MINISTERS. His excellency, Edward Everett, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States, arrived in London on Thursday evening, November 18th, and had an interview with the earl of Aberdeen at the foreign office by appointment.

Mr. Everett left London for Paris on the 25th, for the purpose of rejoining his family on their way to London.

Col. Todd, our minister to Russia, arrived at St. Petersburg on the 10th of November.

The Illustrator, seventy-four, having on board sir Charles Bagot, the governor general of Canada, sailed on Tuesday the 16th, put into Falmouth on the 20th and sailed again on the 24th of November.

STEAM NAVIGATION TO INDIA. At the first annual meeting of the proprietors of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam navigation company, which was held at London, it was stated, as not altogether improbable, that in a short period a more frequent communication than a monthly one might be established, in which case the grant of £100,000 made to this company by the East India company would probably merge into a contract for the mail service. The opening of a transit by Mehemet Ali for merchandise to and from India, &c. through Egypt, was announced, and the thanks to the pasha was carried with acclamation.

The ceremonial of the baptism of the young prince, will, it is rumored, not take place until the month of February next.

Sir Francis Chantrey, the most celebrated English sculptor, died of an apoplectic fit on the 25th of November. This great artist was considered, during his life time, second only to Thorwaldsen in the Danes. The French chamber of deputies was convoked by royal ordinance for the 27th of December.

The steam frigate Kamschatka, which was built at New York for the Russian government, arrived at Cronstadt on the night of the 10th November, in perfect order. It is said that the emperor and empress had intended to make an experimental trip in the Kamschatka, in order to compare her powers with those of the Bojotta, considered the finest war steam vessel in the Russian navy, but on the 12th the Neva was closed by ice, and the navigation for the season being ended, the Kamschatka was hauled into dock, and those of the crew who wished to return home were enabled to get out of port.

The earl of Elgin, well known for his depredations in Greece upon the remains of ancient architecture, formerly British ambassador at Constantinople, and one of the representative peers of Scotland, died in the early part of November.

The American minister at the Hague is exerting himself to arrange the case of the American captain (Hatch) who was the cause of the death of a sailor at Rotterdam.

On the 31st of October, the three hundredth anniversary of the festival of the reformation was celebrated at Wittenburg. In the evening a number of the most respectable persons in the town formed themselves into a procession, and walked to the statue of the great reformer, Martin Luther, where they sang a hymn.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

The hon. Daniel Jenifer, minister plenipotentiary to Vienna, Thomas H. Morris, sec. secretary of legation, and Mr. James C. Jenifer, attaché, took passage in the packet ship Westminister, which sailed from New York for London on Monday, 20th December.

CONSULS. The president of the United States has officially (Dec. 22), recognised Stevenson Forbes as consul for Netherlands for the state of Alabama and the territory of Florida, to reside at Mobile; and (also Dec. 25th), J. G. Lyz as consul of Switzerland for Pennsylvania, New York and Delaware, to reside at Philadelphia.

Charles James Hunt is officially recognised by the president as vice consul for Sweden and Norway to reside at Boston for the states of Massachusetts and N. Hampshire.

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF THE UNITED STATES. A meeting of the friends of agriculture from the different sections of the United States was held, pursuant to public notice, in the hall of the house of representatives, on the 15th of December, 1841.

After organizing with the appointment of the hon. James M. Garnett, of Virginia, as president, they adopted a constitution, resolved to petition congress to set apart the Smithsonian bequest to carry out the objects of the society, and to appoint a committee, who selected the following officers, to serve until the first general meeting, and exhibition on the 4th May next.

President.—JAMES M. GARNETT.
Corresponding secretary.—John S. Skinner.
Recording secretary.—John F. Callan.

Treasurer.—Edward Dyer.
Board of council.—Levi Woodbury, Elisha Whitelsey, Alexander Hunter, John A. Smith, W. J. Stone.

Vice presidents.—Maine, George Evans; N. Hampshire, Isaac Hill; Massachusetts, B. F. French; Connecticut, Eli Ives; R. Island, Gov. Fenner; Vermont, William Jarvis; New York, C. H. Bennett; N. Jersey, C. S. Greene; Pennsylvania, Mr. M. Klein; Delaware, J. W. Thompson; Maryland, Thos. Emory; Virginia, Edmund Ruffin; N. Carolina, Edmund Deberry; S. Carolina, Wade Hampton; Georgia, W. Lumpkin; Alabama, Dixon H. Lewis; Louisiana, Alexander Mouton; Arkansas, Archibald Velt; Tennessee, F. H. Gordon; Mississippi, M. W. Phillips; Kentucky, Clifton Allen; Missouri, Lewis F. Linn; Illinois, A. W. Snyder; Indiana, Solon Robinson; Michigan, Isaac E. Crary; Ohio, John Hastings; District of Columbia, H. L. Ellisworth; Florida, R. W. Williams; Iowa, Timothy Davis; Wisconsin, Henry Dodge.

The vice presidents of Virginia, Maryland, District of Columbia, Pennsylvania and Delaware are ex-officio members of the board of council.

THE NATIONAL INSTITUTE for the promotion of science, formed about a year and half ago, held a meeting at Washington on the 13th December. Their proceedings were interesting and cheering. Colonel P. Force presided and previous to adjournment, it was determined to request the hon. J. Q. Adams to deliver for them the next anniversary discourse.

THE NAVY.

THE HOME SQUADRON will probably leave port in a few weeks, but its sailing has been so long delayed, as we understand, partly in consequence of the scarcity of seamen, but more from the heavy character of the work required to be done on the steamers, two of which are attached to the force to be employed on this service. The squadron will consist of The Independence, razee, capt. Gallagher. The Columbia, frigate, capt. Farley. The Missouri, steamer, capt. Newton.

The Mississippi, do. capt. Salter.

The Vandellia, sloop of war, commander Ramsay.

The Falmouth, do. com. McIntosh.

The Grampus, schooner, lieutenant com. Van Bunt.

The Dolphin, do. lieutenant com. McKean.

These vessels are fitting at different navy yards, and will probably rendezvous at some given point, when arrangements will be made for their future operations.

[Nat. Int.

The steam frigate Mississippi (lately launched at the Philadelphia building yard) arrived in the harbor of Newcastle, from Philadelphia, on Christmas eve.

The U. S. ship Macdonian, Com. Wilkison, bound to the West Indies, sailed from Hampton Roads yesterday. She was passed off Willoughby's Point light boat last evening, by the steamboat Pocahontas.

At a marine general court martial, held at the marine barracks, commencing on the 23d November, 1841, first lieutenant George F. Lindsay was tried upon charges furnished by lieutenant A. G. Gordon, of the U. S. navy, and found not guilty. The finding was approved by the proper authority on the 10th December.

EXPLORED EXPEDITION. The Perceke, captain Hudson, was expected to arrive at Fort George about July 1; the Vincennes, captain Wilkes, expected to arrive at the same place July 15; and the Porpoise August 1.

All these vessels were at the northward in pursuance of the objects of the expedition; they had previously been at Fort George, at the mouth of Columbia river, where every attention was paid them by the governor and officers of the Hudson Bay company.

From Fort George it was believed the squadron would sail for Singapore, and from thence home. The above information is from an officer belonging to the squadron, who remained at Fort George while the vessels were north, waiting for their return. The latest information direct from the squadron left all well.

U. S. brig Consort put into Holmes's Hole on the 31st, on her way from Norfolk to Portland. She is commanded by Lieut. Lewis.

STATES OF THE UNION.

RHODE ISLAND.

The 27th, 28th and 29th of December were the days for voting on the question of the adoption of the constitution lately in part proposed.

MARYLAND.

The legislature convened on the 28th ult. In the senate, Richard Thomas was chosen president and J. H. Nicholson chief clerk. In the house, J. C. LeGrand was chosen speaker and J. N. Watkins chief clerk. The two former are whigs. The annual message of the governor was transmitted on Wednesday the 29th.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The legislature adjourned sine die on the 17th instant. Among the 27 acts passed during its session, were the following:

An act to prevent the citizens of New York from carrying slaves or persons held to service out of this state, and to prevent the escape of persons charged with the commission of crime.

An act to prevent the emancipation of slaves and for other purposes.

An act to incorporate villages, societies and companies, and to renew and amend certain charters heretofore granted, and to establish the principles on which charters of incorporations will hereafter be granted, whereby all corporations hereafter created, shall be subject to impeachment, trial and correction, before the power which creates them, the representatives of the people.

An act to make the unlawful whipping and beating of a slave an indictable offence.

An act to reduce all acts and clauses of acts in relation to the militia law of this state, with sundry amendments, and an act to modify the prison bounds law.

Resolutions were adopted hostile to the land distribution bill of congress, previous to adjournment.

GEORGIA.

LEGISLATURE. The general assembly of the state of Georgia, adjourned sine die on the 9th instant, having been in session little less than six weeks—being the shortest as well as most laborious session that has been held in many years. They passed nearly 200 laws. Of these the governor vetoed six, one of which was to direct the central bank to pay the interest on the public debt, and another to reduce the taxes of the state 20 per cent. They left the banks pretty much where they found them—considering, perhaps, that they could manage their own affairs. The bill for correcting the banks, with its various amendments, was lost on a re-vote. The central bank has some of its restrictions removed, and is authorised to put out $200,000 in small bills.

The bill to aid the Monroe rail road company was lost. The Darien bank, we understand, is to be wound up, and its assets turned over to the central bank.

ALABAMA.

The legislature have adopted resolutions against the land distribution bill. They have also repealed unconditionally the law which provides for the election of representatives to congress on the general ticket system.

LOUISIANA.

The legislature convened on Monday Dec. 12. W. C. C. Claiborne was elected speaker of the house of representatives. Gov. Roussin's message was transmitted the next day.

ARKANSAS.

STATE BONDS. The state loaned her bonds to a large amount, to erect and equip her Real Estate bank. Of these bonds $50,000 were endorsed over to the North American Banking and Trust company, of New York, to raise funds upon. The North American Trust company pledged them to Messrs. Halford & Co. London brokers. Thus they stand: the North American Trust has gone out the Real Estate bank and the state of Arkansas is to pay either principal or interest, alleging in bar, the frauds of their agent, the North American Trust company.

OHIO.

DECISION OF SUPREME COURT.

Augustus L. Perrell and others, } Franklin supreme vs. } court in Chancery.

The Columbus Insurance Co., } ry.

1st. On the 4th day of March, 1840 a loan was made by debts to claimants, of the sum of $3,200. Ten per cent. was reserved, and the balance of the $3,200 paid to claimants.

Claimants executed a promissory note under seal, payable in New York on the 1st of May, 1840, for $3,200. Also a power of attorney dated 6th March, 1840, authorizing the confession of a judgment for the amount of the note, and interest, and costs.

2d. On the 16th of July, 1840, claimants paid to debts on account of the note, $1,225 42.

3rd. On the 12th September 1840, debts caused a judgment to be confessed against claimants for the sum of $3,224 64; being $24.64 more than the amount of the note after having received $1,225 42 on the 16th of July, 1840.

4th. An execution was issued upon the judgment, and claimants paid the whole amount of the note for $3,200, with interest at six per cent. and all costs, calculating the payment on the 16th of July, 1840, and filed their bill of injunction against the residue. Claimants paid the excess of 4 per cent. reserved at the time of the loan, as it was their case.

5th. Defendants claimed the right to charge 10 per cent. interest on the note, after it became due till the payment or till the judgment, and also 8 per cent. exchange, and these were the two items in controversy.

The defendants' charter authorises them to loan money generally, without fixing any rate of interest, and they claimed, that they had the right to charge as much interest as they pleased.

Claimants claimed, that by their charter defendants could only claim 6 per cent. interest and that no rate being authorised they were bound by the general law of the land.

The court granted and decreed a perpetual injunction, deciding both points in favor of claimants and against the company. [Daily Freeman.]

INDIANA.

The legislature have passed a joint resolution, and which, having been approved by the governor, is now a law, postponing the sale of personal property on execution now levied and advertised, or which may be levied hereafter, and before the first day of February next, until some day to be fixed by the proper officer, and after the first day of February next.

The lower house has passed, by vote of seventy to twenty-seven, an act requiring that real estate under execution should sell for two thirds of its appraisement. It will probably pass the senate.

The senate passed the greater part of the 15th inst. in discussing the joint resolution fixing upon the 15th of January next as the time for the resumption of specie payments by the banks. The resolution was referred to the committee on the state bank, and this committee was finally instructed to report it back so modified as to require the state bank to commence redeeming her five dollar notes, and all notes under that sum, with gold and silver, on demand at the proper branch, on or before the first day of April next; the ten dollar notes and under, on or before the first day of May next, and all others on or before the first day of August next, with provision.

Resolutions have been introduced into both houses "repudiating so much of the state debt of Indiana as has been incurred by the sale of state bonds for which no consideration has been received, in consequence of the failure or fraudulent conduct of the purchasers thereof; but, at the same time, acknowledging, in all time to come, the valid obligation of all her liabilities outstanding, for which she has received the proper consideration agreed upon. One of the resolutions provides for the ascertainment, by the fund commissioner, of the numbers, dates, amounts, and other descriptions of the bonds referred to, and for their publication in certain cities of the union and of Europe, as repudiated bonds."

There is a bill before them authorising the redemption of the fifty dollar treasury notes now in circulation, by a new issue of five dollar treasury notes, payable two years after date of the last issue. Some of the legislature were busily at work upon the project, which is now assuming a tri-form character. It is proposed—

1st. To issue 45 treasury notes, in amount sufficient to pay the debt of the state to the state bank.

2d. To issue $500,000 of treasury notes annually, for four years, for the purpose of completing the northern canal to the feeder-dam in Noble county, the rail road to Indianapolis, the White-water canal to the national road, and the improvement of the Wabash rapids.

3d. To issue 55 treasury notes for the purpose of redeeming the 500 treasury notes now in circulation.

We have lost sight of the movements in reference to the first class of these issues. The resolution, to instruct one of the committees to report a bill providing for an issue of the second class, was laid upon the table, in the senate, on the 15th inst. by a vote of 10 to 11. The bill authorising the issue of the third class was ordered to be engrossed in the house on the 16th, 82 to 14.

The Veray Western Statesman of the 23d inst. says that the report of Noah Noble, esq. present fund commissioner, to the legislature of that state, is, perhaps "one of the most startling official documents ever presented to the people of this or any other state. The extent of the frauds against the state, and the boldness with which they were perpetrated by the late fund commissioner—to say nothing of the immense sums actually lost through his criminally stupid management—are without a parallel in the financial history of any state."

SUSPENDED DEBT. A public meeting has been held in Washington county, and another in Shelby county, at each of which resolutions were passed expressing disapprobation of the action of the legislature, should refuse to pay all state bonds for which the state had not received a bona fide consideration.

ILLINOIS.

CONVENTIONS. The Van Buren convention at Springfield nominated A. W. Snyder as their candidate for governor, and John Hall as their candidate for lieutenant governor. Forty-three counties were not represented in convention.

The whigs have decided not to hold a convention to nominate state officers, as, on a comparison of views, it is found that they are all for gen. Joseph Duncan for governor. There is some disagreement yet with regard to lieutenant governor, but it is believed that all will be harmonized without a convention.

AMOUNT OF BONDS. The editor of the Alton Telegraph, writing from Springfield, says, that on inquiring at the auditor's office, he was informed that no official record whatever had been kept of the amount of bonds issued, the purposes for which issued, nor of their numbers, and that the only means of obtaining the information desired, was by examining the reports which, from time to time, have been made to the legislature.

FLORIDA.

Waleahou has come in at Pilatka with 37 Indians, and the Choctaws, John Ballou, John Colwell, Garlan, they have all promised to come in under their chief Octacoochee. Eighteen Mickaskees have remained, and they say will not come in at all, but will fight it out. They have killed two of the delegates from Arkansas, in the vicinity of Canassassay.

Two Indians who were sent to the Fort Moseley, the 10th of November, were found dead on the road leading towards the Esten-hatchee river, by a detachment of the 3d infantry, which arrived at Fort Fanning the 27th. From the appearance of the bodies, they must have been murdered on the day after they departed from the fort.

Efforts were made to excite him to revenge the murder of his two men; but without effect. He would do nothing till he could consult his people at Tampa.

The expedition of Lieut. G. W. Patten to the head waters of the St. John's, after an absence of ten days, returned to Fort Moseley on the 8th inst. The country south of Lake Harney was inundated, and it was next to impossible to ascertain the true channel. The consequence was that the canoes were frequently entangled amid intricacies from which it was difficult to liberate them. Lieutenant examined several places, on two of which he discovered fields containing sweet potatoes, Lima beans, peppers, &c., which the Indians had planted during the summer. The Indians, however, had left the islands, probably to join the forces of Sam Jones or Halleck Tuslengeeng.

Lieut. Col. Riley had arrived at Fort Pierce, and was daily expected by the land route to Fort Mellon.

THE PUBLIC FINANCES.

LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Transmitting a report upon the state of the finances.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 20, 1841.

SIR: In obedience to the directions of the act of congress of the 10th of May, 1830, entitled "an act supplementary to the act entitled 'an act to establish the treasury department,'" the secretary of the treasury respectfully submits the following report:

Of the public revenue and expenditure.
The balance in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1841, (exclusive of the amount deposited with the states, trust funds, and indemnities, and the amount due from banks which failed in 1837), was, as stated in the report of the secretary of the treasury submitted to congress of the 31 day of June last $957,345 03. The receipts into the treasury during the first three quarters of the present year amount to $23,467,072 52

Viz:
From customs $10,847,557 44
From lands 1,104,063 06
From miscellaneous and incidental sources 90,691 69
From banks of Bank of U. States 662,043 47
From banks which failed in 1837 51,137 30
From treasury notes per act 31st March, 1830 1,524,703 80
From treasury notes per act of 15th Feb. 1811 5,936,932 90
From loan, per act of 21st of July, 1841 3,229,946 86
The receipts for the fourth quarter, it is estimated, will amount to $6,943,095 25

Viz:
From customs 4,000,000 00
From lands 350,000 00
From miscellaneous and incidental sources 30,000 00
From banks of Bank of U. States 10,215 23
From treasury notes 350,000 00
From loan—
Received $2,202,750 02
Estimate for balance qr. 100,000 00

Making the total estimated receipts for the year $30,410,167 77

And, with the balance in the treasury on the 1st of January last, an aggregate of $1,397,512 80

The expenditures for the three first quarters of the present year have amounted to $24,734,346 97

Viz:
Civil list, foreign intercourse and miscellaneous $4,615,363 81
Military service 106,341,104 43
Naval service 4,229,986 94
Treasury notes redeemed, including interest 5,027,811 13
Public debt 27,080 64
The expenditures for the 4th quarter are estimated, on data furnished by the respective departments, at 7,290,723 73

Viz:
Civil, miscellaneous, and foreign intercourse $1,581,205 44
Military service 3,169,773 54
Naval service 1,966,560 50
Interest on loan 70,000 00
Principal and interest on treasury notes 503,193 95
Making $23,023,070 70

And leaving a deficit to be provided for on the 1st of January, 1842 $627,557 90

It being essential that no deficit, arising from the failure in effecting more than the portion of the loan authorised by congress at its last session, should be provided for by means that might be at once available, it is recommended that an immediate issue of treasury notes be authorised, to meet the emergency.

II. Of the estimates of the public revenue and expenditures for the year 1842.

The receipts for the year 1842 are estimated as follows:

From customs $19,000,000 09
(Arising from duties accruing in 1841, and payable in 1842 $3,400,000
From duties accruing and payable in 1842 $15,600 00).

Treasury notes 50,000 00
Miscellaneous sources 150,000 00

19,200,000 00

From which deduct the estimated deficiency on the first of January, 1842 627,557 90

Leaving this amount applicable to the service of the year 1842 18,572,442 10

The expenditures for the year 1842, including $7,000,000 for the redemption of treasury notes, are estimated at 32,791,010 78

Leaving to be provided for this amount 14,218,568 68

The receipts from the customs for the year 1842 depending for their amount upon the action of congress at its present session, in the adjustment of the tariff, it is not practicable to form estimates of the revenue which may be derived from the last source with great precision. These now submitted have in view the present rates of duty, and their final reduction to 20 per cent. ad valorem after the 30th of June next. The scale of duties thus established, has been necessarily assumed as the basis of calculation for the remainder of the year 1842, estimated with reference to the anticipated importations of that year, compared with the average importations of former years.

In the estimated receipts, the amount which will come into the treasury from the sales of the public lands in 1842 has been excluded, as the act of congress of the 4th of September last directs its distribution among the several states and territories.

With regard to receipts from the loan already authorised by law, it is to be remarked that, owing to the short period which is to elapse before it becomes redeemable, together with the unsettled state of the money market, it would not be safe to expect that any considerable portion will be obtained, for the service of the year 1842, before the expiration of the time limited for effecting it.

The law authorising the issue of treasury notes also expiring early in 1842, not more than $50,000, it is supposed, can be made available from that source.

In estimating the expenditures of the year 1842, it is assumed that no other appropriations will be made than those now submitted in the estimates from the several departments; and that the balance of those appropriations unexpended at the end of the year 1842, will be equal to that at the close of the present year.

It is proper further to remark that estimates of expenditures can only be made for such as may be required under existing laws, and arise in the ordinary operations of the government. The power of appropriation, as well as the power of raising revenue, being at all times in the hands of congress, this department cannot afford estimates upon its own sense of what the public interest may be thought to require, especially at a time when the condition of the country may be supposed to call for more than ordinary means of defence and security.

The amount required for surveys of the public lands, and the compensation of the officers employed in that branch of the public service, being payable out of the proceeds of the sales of those lands, is not included in this estimate of expenditure.

To meet the deficiency in the year 1842, amounting to $14,218,570 68, it is respectfully recommended congress to authorise—

1. An extension of the term within which the residue not yet taken of the loan already authorised shall be redeemable, amounting to, say $6,500,000.
2. The re-issue of the treasury notes heretofore authorised by law, amounting to $5,000,000.
3. The balance still required, of $2,718,570 68, together with an additional sum of $2,000,000, (a surplus deemed necessary in the treasury to meet emergencies of the public service), to be supplied from imports upon such foreign articles imported as may be selected, with due regard to a rigid restriction in amount to the actual wants of the government, and a proper economy in its administration.

III. Reduction of the tariff.
The last reduction of duties on imports provided for by the act of the 21 March, 1833, will take effect immediately after the 30th June next. From that day no duty will exist on any imported article exceeding twenty per cent. ad valorem; and certain other legal provisions of the same act, of great importance, are to come into operation at the same time.

One of them is the enactment which, after that period, requires all duties to be paid in ready money; thus putting an end to the system of credits which has prevailed from the first establishment of this government; a system which, however necessary or convenient in the infancy of our commerce, when the increased capacity of the country was inconsiderable, and a strong desire was felt to lower and encourage foreign trade by all practicable means, may at the present day well yield to the important objects to be secured by cash payments.

Another, deemed at the same time an essential provision of the act, is that which declares that, after June, 1842, all duties on imported articles shall be assessed upon the value of such articles at the port where the same shall be entered, under such regulations as shall be prescribed by law. Hitherto, throughout the whole history of the government, the cost or value in the foreign market has been assumed as the basis for the calculation of ad valorem duties, and to this cost or value certain additions have been made, supposed to be equivalent to the charges of importation. But undervaluations abroad, frauds, real or supposed, in invoices, and the unjust advantages which were believed to exist in the hands of foreign manufacturers, had become, in fact, themselves the importers into the country of a large proportion of the manufactured goods from Europe, led congress to look to a home valuation for security as well to the American importing merchant as to the revenue, and to the producers of similar articles in the United States.

The legal effect of the act of 1833 would seem to be, to abolish the practice, after June 30th, of assessing duties upon invoices or foreign valuation; and, therefore, if congress shall not at this session prescribe regulations for assessing duties upon a valuation to be made at the port of entry, or pass some law modifying the act of 1833, it may well be questioned whether any ad valorem duties can be collected after the 30th of June. The language of the law seems explicit. It is that, "from and after the day last aforesaid" (June 30th, 1842), "the duties required to be paid by law on goods, wares and merchandise, shall be assessed upon the value thereof at the port of entry; and that, from and after that date, such regulations as shall be prescribed by law." And it is further declared, that so much of any other act as is inconsistent with that act shall be and is repealed.

The assessment of duties, after the day limited, on the basis of the foreign cost or value, is inconsistent with the act, and the law authorising it must therefore, as it would seem, be considered as repealed.

The act of 1833, as must be obvious to all contemplates no other than ad valorem duties after June, 1842; for although, in a given case, a specific duty may not amount to 20 per cent. on the cost of the article, yet that fact cannot be ascertained without referring to price or value—things constantly fluctuating—and much uncertainty, and perhaps confusion, would arise, as changes in the market price of articles might carry the duty beyond the limit at one period, though within it at another.

Indeed, there can be little room for doubt that it was in reference to that point, and to the possibility of the act, that no duties on imports should exist after the 30th of June, 1842, but ad valorem duties. It must be admitted that this was a very important change in the whole system of imports into the United States, since it has heretofore been regarded as the dictate of high protection, and the teaching of long experience, that, for the prevention of frauds and the security of the revenue, duties ought, as far as practicable, to be made not ad valorem, but specific.

Of the essential or peremptory provisions of the act, there are two, which, it is not to be disguised, were intended to startle towards the new regulation of equivalents or mutual considerations. These are the reductions of all duties to twenty per cent. ad valorem, and the assessment of those duties upon a home valuation. It is impossible to read the act itself, and still more impossible to advert to the history of the tariff, without arriving at the most perfect conviction that the home valuation was resorted to for the purpose of guarding the revenue against fraud, and protecting American manufactures against undervaluations. There could be no other possible object in this provision. It is a part of the act, therefore, connected with another part, and inserted for the purpose of qualifying essentially the operation of that other part.

But it is highly proper to look at the circumstances which led to the passage of the act of 1833, and to regard the motives in which it appears to have had its origin. It was the result of a spirit of compromise and conciliation, at a time when considerable agitation existed and much diversity of opinion prevailed. If events shall appear to make it necessary to reconsider or readjust the provisions of that law, all proceedings towards it must be conducted in the same spirit. The undersigned is most deeply impressed with the force of these convictions, while offering suggestions to congress on the subject. He is constrained to admit that it has appeared to him that the interest of the country required some modification of that law, and that some such modification would first remove the great, if not insurmountable difficulties of establishing a home valuation at our various ports, without incurring the risk of producing such diversity in the estimates of value as should not only lead to great practical inconvenience, but interfere also, in effect, with the constitutional provision that duties and imports shall be equal in all the states. If such should be the opinion of congress, then it is clear that some equivalent is to be provided for the home valuation, or else the whole basis upon which the act was expected to rest, as a measure of compromise and adjustment, is taken away or displaced. There is, then, to that extent, to be the totality or compromise of interests evidently intended to be produced by placing home valuation as an equivalent against a reduction of ad valorem duties. It remains for the wisdom of congress to determine whether such equivalent can be found.

In the second place, if congress should be of opinion either that home valuation is practicable, or that some equivalent and proper substitute may be found for it, the undersigned will not disguise his opinion that it cannot be regarded as wise, by any portion of the country, as a permanent system of policy, to augment the duties on imports, or to subject the duties on imports to such augmentation, by raising duties on all articles, including those of absolute necessity, to the full extent of twenty per cent, and preserving that limit, at the same time, as a fixed barrier against higher duties on any article whatever, even those of mere luxury. Such a plan of revenue, if it be regarded as a settled one, appears to the undersigned to be unnatural and unequal, and such as is not likely to promote the best interests of the country.

The probable effect of the future operation of the act of 1833 upon the manufactures and mechanical trades of the country, particularly if the home valuation be established, and no provision for such home valuation found, gives rise to inquiry too important to be overlooked.

It is fully acknowledged that all duties should be laid with primary reference to revenue; and it is admitted, without hesitation or reserve, that no more money should be raised, under any pretence whatever, than such as is necessary for the economical administration of the government. But within these limits, and as incidental to the raising of such revenue as may be absolutely necessary, it is believed that discrimination may be made, and duties imposed in such manner as that, while no part of the country will suffer loss or inconvenience, a most beneficial degree of protection will be extended to the labor and industry of large masses of the people, while the whole country will be rendered more prosperous in peace, and infinitely stronger and better prepared for foreign war should come upon us. The principle of discrimination has obtained from the period of the first tariff, and it is believed that it will continue to be found to be indispensable to the interests of the revenue itself; and if, in fixing a system of duties, it consists with the best interests and true policy of the country so to apportion them among the various species of imports as to favor our own manufactures at the same time that the revenue itself is benefited, it may be found to be indispensable to the interests of the revenue itself; and if, in fixing a system of duties, it consists with the best interests and true policy of the country so to apportion them among the various species of imports as to favor our own manufactures at the same time that the revenue itself is benefited, it may be found to be indispensable to the interests of the revenue itself; and if, in fixing a system of duties, it consists with the best interests and true policy of the country so to apportion them among the various species of imports as to favor our own manufactures at the same time that the revenue itself is benefited, it may be found to be indispensable to the interests of the revenue itself.

The undersigned feels no difficulty in admitting that a duty of twenty per cent, ad valorem, assessed upon the value of imported articles in our own ports, would in many instances be a rate sufficiently high and so judiciously adjusted, as to afford reasonable and judicious encouragement to home producers of the same articles. As to those, therefore, the act of 1833 will be accomplished, if its provision for home valuation be carried out by congress. But he still supposes that there are several descriptions of imported manufactures and products, the duties upon which are higher than twenty per cent, upon the home value, and thus yield a greater revenue to the government, while, in regard to some of them, it will be found that, without such increased duty, the labor of large classes, engaged in producing similar articles, will be greatly depressed, if not entirely suppressed.

It is unquestionably true, and well worthy of remark, that the act of 1833 was avowedly conservative in its objects and character; and, while it was designed to remove what was esteemed a grievance by one part of the country, it was not intended that the interests of any other should be sacrificed by it. It was a measure of reasonable severity, was intended for all. Its true spirit, therefore, will be best carried out by acting, under any new state of circumstances, with reference to the same great objects, and doing justice alike to all. The great principle of that act was moderation and conciliation, and this should never be lost sight of. But the measures proper and necessary to carry out that principle, and to meet the altered circumstances of the country call for such change, without any departure from the principle itself.

Nothing is more established by our experience, and the experience of other nations, than that the augmentation of these cases, and the modes of their operation, the cost of the article to the consumer, in many cases it appears not to increase that cost at all. Very often the price to the consumer is kept down, notwithstanding an increase of duties, partly by the greater supply of the home production, and partly by the competition of the foreign market. It is believed, indeed, that there have been cases in which the joint operation of the two causes has occasioned prices to fall lower than they were before the increase of duties was laid.

This result in the operation of trade and business might readily be traced to its causes; but a full exposition of those causes, and the modes of their operation, would too much swell this report. Suffice it to say that, when an additional duty is laid on an article in a country in which that article is extensively consumed, the burden always falls in part, and sometimes, as experience has shown, altogether, upon the foreign producer. The foreign producer must sell; and, in the place of sale, he finds an article produced on the spot which comes into advancing competition with his own by reason of paying no duties, he still must sell, and for the sake of being able to do it, he must be content to bear the burden of the duties himself. The duty borne by the foreign producer is the charge for transportation.

It is something which is not borne by the domestic producer in the market of competition. Analogous instances occur in domestic trade. The wheat grower of Indiana, who incurs heavy expenses in conveying his flour to an Atlantic port, expects no higher price for it when it arrives there than is paid for flour of the same quality and weight in the immediate neighborhood. The cost of transportation, therefore, does not operate so much to raise the price at the place of sale as to diminish it at the place of production. Now, the great law which regulates prices, by demand and supply, is sternly observed in cases of foreign importation, as in this instance of domestic trade. The cost of transportation, therefore, does not operate so much to raise the price at the place of sale as to diminish it at the place of production.

The great proportion of the agricultural population of the United States is obliged to rely mainly upon the home market for a sale of its products, although a large part of those products (wheat, for instance) is such as often enters extensively into the consumption of the world. The quantity of flour and grain exported from this country is also small. Indian corn, exported from this country, is also small, inconsiderable, in comparison with the quantity consumed in the large cities and manufacturing towns, which have either entirely grown up or added largely to their population under the influence of laws of congress, passed since the end of the last war, upon the subject of the consumption of flour and grain in the manufacturing districts, especially in the north and east, decline, to that extent there is an absolute loss to the wheat and corn grower, since the quantity consumed by them will find a market nowhere else. To say nothing, in this connection, of the incalculable importance of a home market to the producers of articles of domestic manufacture, and limiting his remarks to the grain growers alone, the undersigned cannot but persuade himself that all will see and acknowledge the great value to that class of producers of the northern and eastern markets—the only considerable market, indeed, which is permanently open to them upon the face of the earth.

So long as the policy of other countries shall continue to be such as to encourage agriculture from their ports, and thus deny to us the markets of their fair reciprocity in trade, it would appear to be equally the dictate of policy and of justice to our people to secure to them, as far as may be reasonably and properly done, a market of consumption for their produce in their own country.

The undersigned is of opinion that the condition of the treasury and of the country demands an augmentation of the revenue. It cannot but be the true policy of government to extinguish the amount of debt now existing as soon as practicable, and to avoid increasing it. The creation of debt, by loans and other means, for the purpose to supply deficiencies of regular income, cannot but be a source of future embarrassment, as injudicious and objectionable. The general credit of the government, always good, has been greatly raised, both at home and abroad, by the fact that it has fully paid off and discharged the debt created by the revolution and by a subsequent war with England, and that it has the honor of the present preservation of this high credit is of the utmost importance. It must be the necessary reliance of the government, if, in the vicissitudes of human affairs, sudden war should come upon us, requiring large and immediate expenditures. Exact punctuality in the payment of interest, while the debt shall continue, and its payment so soon as the time of payment arrives, as well as the known ability and honor of the government, are the means of inspiring that general confidence which shall at all times enable it to use its credit to the greatest advantage.

The estimated expenditures of the government for the coming year will exceed its probable income by $14,213,576. Should congress authorize a reissue of treasury notes to the amount of $5,000,000, and the balance of the loan be disposed of, there will remain a deficit of $2,718,570, for which provision must be made by law. It is not supposed that congress will deem it advisable to restrict the income of the government to the precise amount of its expenditures. There ought to be a surplus of at least two millions, to meet unforeseen emergencies in the public service; and should even the proceeds of the sales of the public lands be withdrawn from the states, a reference to the receipts from that source in the last and present year would show that a surplus of that revenue, to meet the wants of the government, must still remain.

The state of the national affairs, the disposition of the government, in which, it is believed, the people fully participate, to put the country into a respectable state of defence, and especially to support and strengthen the military marine, all appear to suggest the propriety of such increase of duties on articles carefully selected as, while the amount shall not bear hard on individuals, by limiting their customary enjoyments, nor oppress nor derange the general business of the country, shall yet supply the treasury, not extravagantly, but speedily, but yet reasonably, and justly for all the great purposes of national defence. Economy, that great public virtue, which is so essentially proper to be practised by republican governments, would be but half exercised if, while on the one hand it avoids all unnecessary expenditure, it does not on the other make a reasonable and judicious provision for the necessities of the government. All which is respectfully submitted, secretary of the treasury.

W. FORWARD,

Hon. J. White, speaker house of representatives.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

DECEMBER 20. The president announced that the select committee on printing consisted of Messrs. Angell, Merrick and McKim.

Mr. Calhoun was respectfully asked to be excused from serving upon the committee, but subsequently withdrew his request.

Mr. Wright presented a memorial from a large number of merchants of the state of N. York, praying for certain amendments to the bankrupt law, passed at Charleston in 1837, which was referred to the committee on the judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Calhoun presented the memorial of the chamber of commerce of the city of Charleston, adverse to the general bankrupt law; also, a memorial of the chamber of commerce of Charleston, relative to steam vessels of war; also, a memorial asking for a post route from Charleston to Memphis.

Mr. Buchanan presented a memorial from merchants of Philadelphia, asking for several important alterations in the bankrupt law; and requesting a repeal of the act if the amendments shall not be made. He said that he was extremely happy to find that this innumerable class of individuals, who are so often referred to by the name of bankrupts, were so numerous that it would be well to have a bankrupt law applicable to banking institutions.

Mr. Buchanan presented the memorial of the chamber of commerce of Philadelphia, asking for the establishment of a light on the break-water in the Delaware.

Mr. Barrow presented the resolutions of the legislature of Louisiana, with regard to increasing the salary of the judge of the United States district court of that state; also, in relation to the military defence of New Orleans, and the propriety of the general government sending a steam ship into the Gulf of Mexico, for the purpose of protecting the commerce of the Mississippi.

Mr. King presented a memorial from the citizens of Alabama, designating the Falls of Tallapoosa as the most eligible site for the proposed armory on the western and southwestern waters.

Mr. Sturgeon presented the petition of Jonathan Wright and others, of Spring Garden, Philadelphia, praying that the constitution of the United States may be so altered as to entitle all men to liberty and happiness.

On the motion of Mr. King the petition was laid on the table.

Mr. Woodbury presented the preamble and resolutions of a meeting held at Halifax Court-house, Va., expressing disapprobation of the late extra session of congress, and a strong doubt whether the measures then passed furnished the relief which was intended; and asking for the re-enactment of the sub-treasury law and a repeal of the distribution act.

Mr. Monten said that, at the extra session, the memorial of Monsieur Gonon, relative to the system of telegraphing, was referred to the committee on military affairs. As the subject was one of vast importance to the country, he would suggest that the committee again take up the subject; and he expressed a hope that it would be found worthy their earliest attention.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, submitted a resolution, which was adopted, instructing the committee on finance to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to defray the expenses arising out of the treaty between the United States and the Miami Indians.

Mr. Wright introduced a bill to amend and continue in force an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington. He said that he presented the bill to a select committee of gentlemen who constituted a committee on the subject of the rights of the citizens, and he was directed by these gentlemen to ask that the bill be referred to the committee on the District of Columbia, and that it be printed.

Mr. Evans, from the committee on finance, reported, without amendment, the house bill making an appropriation for defraying, in part, the expenses of the government for the year 1842, and asked the senate to consider it at this time.

Mr. King inquired whether he understood the senator as saying that he had reported the bill without amendment to the Senate, he objected to its consideration because he could see no propriety in paying themselves while others were suffering. He observed that they all knew it would be much sorer to amend this bill and pass it through, than to get a second bill passed. He knew that the task of preparing amendments to this bill would be laborious, but he felt himself bound to undertake it. He, however, believed that no good could result, unless by an amendment to this bill.

Mr. Woodbury said that attempts to have appropriations made in accordance with the views of the senator from Alabama, had often been made, but always failed. He apprehended that the views of both the senators could be accomplished, and that congress could now make appropriation for what was actually due; and before more became due, they could make another appropriation.

Mr. Tipton hoped that the bill would be postponed so as to enable the senator from Alabama to prepare his amendment; and, with that view, he would move that the bill be laid on the table.

The question was then taken, but the motion was disagreed to; and the bill was read a third time, and passed.

The following bills were reported back to the senate from the committees to which they had been severally referred:

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, from the committee on public lands, reported a bill to establish an additional land district in the state of Alabama; a bill for the relief of the Selma and Tennessee rail road company; and a bill to authorise the state of Louisiana to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for school purposes.

Mr. Huntington, from the committee on commerce reported a bill allowing drawbacks on goods exported in original packages from the United States to Chihuahua and Santa Fe.

Mr. Pierce, from the committee on pensions, reported a bill to provide for certain Cherokee Indian pensioners.

On motion of Mr. Huntington, the senate then went into an executive session and, after some time spent therein, the doors were opened, and the senate adjourned.

DECEMBER 21. Mr. Morehead, of Kentucky, appeared in his seat.

Sundry petitions respecting slavery were presented, and on motions to receive them ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Linn, in pursuance of notice, introduced a bill to repeal the act to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the states, and to grant pre-emption rights, and to appropriate the revenue from that source for the defence of the country. He was not certain that it should be referred to the committee on public lands, as that committee were adverse to the project; he would prefer its being sent to the committee on military affairs.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, said that at the last session the subject had been referred to the committee of which he was chairman; he had reported the bill, and it had become a law. Should the bill be referred to the committee on the public lands, he would do his duty, but his mind must undergo a radical change, which he did not anticipate, or he should recommend that the bill be reported back to the senate for reconsideration. The committee on the public lands had not yet taken effect, and he felt unwilling to see its operation before he acted on the question of repeal. He spoke for himself, and not for the other members of the committee on the public lands.

Mr. Lian then moved its reference to the committee on military affairs.

Mr. Calhoun said the law of parliament went so far as to say that no committee should have charge of a subject who were opposed to the measure to be considered. It had been deemed even as in violation of the law to appoint one member upon a committee who was known to be opposed to the whole measure. Mr. C. therefore suggested that the bill should be referred to a special committee of five or seven; he should prefer seven. There was, he said, no more reason for referring the bill to the committee on military affairs than to the committee on finance. He would make the motion himself, but that he preferred that the senator from Missouri (Mr. Linn) should be placed at the head of the committee.

Mr. Linn said that he had much to do in looking after the interests of his own constituents; but if the senator thought proper to refer it to a select committee he should not object. By taking from the treasury the means which the distribution bill placed there, we afforded but little means of relief to the states themselves.

Mr. L. hoped the senate would take the subject up and reconsider it. He wanted a cool, deliberate investigation of this subject, and other great and leading subjects connected with it. The nation demanded this at our hands. Mr. L. said further, in regard to war, that he thought there was great and serious danger of its coming upon us, and he begged that the country would prepare herself to meet the danger when it might.

Mr. Phelan said that from the tone of the public press every where, there was a demand that the country should be placed in a condition of defence. He had heard it stated by gentlemen of great experience in the land and naval service of the country that the country was not now in as good a condition as it was at the commencement of the late war. He hoped the bill would go to a select committee.

Mr. Allen hoped that the senate would not act upon this matter before acting upon a matter of prior consideration—the apportionment of representatives among the people. Many of the state legislatures were now in session, and unless congress acted on it speedily it would be necessary for them to convene an extra session of the state legislatures for the purpose of acting upon the apportionment of congress. He hoped congress would act upon this subject now, and the distribution question afterwards.

Mr. Calhoun hoped again that it would be referred to a select committee. The military committee represented one branch of the defenses of the country, the naval committee another branch, and the bill before the senate embraced objects beyond the province of either of these committees. It involved questions of finance, calculation, &c. He would suggest that the committee be composed of one member of the committee of military affairs, one from the committee on naval affairs, one from the committee of finance and the majority favorable to the proposition.

Mr. C. also said that he felt a deep solicitude upon this subject. The state he represented had made a unanimous movement upon this subject. They had pronounced the bill unconstitutional, and had refused by a large vote in the popular branch of the legislature to receive the quota apportioned to South Carolina. The senate, by as large a vote, would second the action of the popular branch of the legislature. For these reasons he felt a deep solicitude in the question.

Mr. Preston said he was utterly averse to the reference of this subject to the committee on military affairs. It was not germane to that committee. He could see no reason why the senate should not act upon the bill without any delay. In regard to the amendment proposed by the senator from Tennessee (Mr. Pickens), he was ready to second any efforts which could be carried into effect. We should remember, however, in our wish to gain physically more strength than we have, that we do not destroy that vigor necessary to sustain the internal strength of the country. Our treasury presented a most extraordinary condition, and the deficit of the coming year would be fourteen millions, and that we should want more than we could get from commerce, from the public domain, and from all the sources of revenue in our reach. With all this, we should be compelled to borrow. In regard to the principle of distribution, he regarded it as unwise. Unconstitutional he did not regard it. He thought the senate should retract its step as soon as it could.

Mr. Buchanan advocated a reference to a select committee, but regarded it as a little matter to what committee it was referred; for, where it would be referred, unless senators materially changed their minds, it would be referred to the same committee. Mr. Buchanan said that he too had been sickened at the condition of the treasury as shown in the report of the secretary of the treasury. We found ourselves fourteen millions in arrears our wants; and year after year we were increasing our debt. We were to give the states the miserable pittance which they would receive under the distribution bill. Mr. B. said he agreed with a senator from South Carolina in another thing also; and that was, that the finances of the country should be put in a state of order, so that there could be no vigorous prosecution of a war with any power. The finances of the country should be in a healthy state, if we would have the country in a good condition in the way of preparation for war. Economy was necessary; and, he thought, it would be necessary to raise a loan of $100,000,000, or $120,000,000 to bring the rail road companies to terms. The report of the secretary of the navy had proposed also to increase our navy to half the size of the British navy, when, as was well known, the expense in the navy was the least of the expense in the army. He told what it was in Great Britain.

Mr. Linn withdrew his motion to refer to the committee on military affairs, and moved its reference to a select committee.

King expressed himself gratified at hearing that the committee had been formed by the senator from South Carolina (Mr. Preston) in regard to the distribution bill. He took pleasure in saying that the little state from which he came would not accept this bounty from the general government. They believed it belonged to the people of the state, and that the federal treasury should save us from a high tariff, and therefore should not be received. He hoped the senators would carry out the views of the people, and repudiate the bill which they had repudiated. He had no doubt that the senators who voted for this bill, would, for it would be a great benefit to the people of the state.

In reference to the question of the defence of the country, he would not consent to vote for stated appropriations because the finances were embarrassed. In the present aspect of affairs when the nation was threatened, he was for taking liberal appropriations when the danger came, more might be lost in a single night than the expenditure of years.

Mr. Mongon denied that it was parliamentary to refer a question like this to a committee the majority of whom were favorable to the proposition. The question presented was the making one of repeal. There was no question for any references; or, if it was required, it was to be made in public lands. In regard to what had been said by the senator from Alabama, he denied that the public mind had been expressed adversely to this object. He stood here for one, in fact, as it were, upon this subject. Mr. Mongon also denied that the senator from Alabama had said anything which had been irrelevantly alluded to by many senators. He believed there was no danger of war, and it was only the visionary ideas of glory which prompted men to talk of this subject as they did. Men who desired glory, and who were not satisfied with the attention to the great matter of war, were exciting the public mind by these inflammatory

Mr. Bayard advocated a reference to the select committee, and the formation of such a committee would give those who called themselves democrats the majority. He should vote against repeal, and he wanted no better argument to sustain his own side than the question than just such an argument as would

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to make a report to the senate, showing what would have been the operation of the land distribution bill if it had been in operation during the year 1841, and how much would have been the distributive shares of each state and territory and the District of Columbia, and how much would have been the estimated product of the land sales for the year. Also, the distributive share of each individual, provided the said revenue should have been divided up by the head to the entire population of the union according to the census of 1840. It is further Resolved, That the distributive shares of the states, territories, and District of Columbia, and individuals, provided all the proper costs and charges upon the lands, consisting of Indian annuities payable during the year, and the current purchases of land, and the interest on the public debt, and the charges named in the distribution act, were first deducted before the distribution should be made.

On motion of Mr. Preston 3,000 extra copies of the report of the plan of the fiscal agent were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the senate adjourned to meet on Monday next.

DECEMBER 27. The hon. Arthur P. Bagby, senator elect from the state of Alabama, in the place of Clement C. Clay, resigned, was qualified and took his seat.

Mr. Wright presented a petition, signed by a large number of the merchants of New York, praying that a law may be passed to suspend the operation of the bankrupt law, passed at the last session, for two years from the 1st of February next. He remarked that the petition was sent to him by mercantile firms of that city, and that the reason why they made this request was, principally, on the ground that if the law should be put into operation on the 1st of February, (so great a depression and tightness of money would be the result at this time), that property would be thrown into market to such an extent as must inevitably cause a great sacrifice of assets. He also stated that the memorial was signed by the presidents of five several banks.

Mr. Young introduced a bill to amend the act distributing the proceeds of the public lands among the states and to grant pre-emption rights; and a bill granting to the state of Illinois an additional quantity of land for the completion of the Illinois and Michigan canal, which was read a first and second time, and appropriately referred.

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the necessity and propriety of providing by law for the appointment of a district judge of the state of Mississippi, and to assign the present incumbent the northern district of said state, and to increase the salary to be received by the judge of each district.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform the senate, if in his opinion it may be done without detriment to the public interests, whether any proposition has been made to or received from the British government since the 4th March, 1849, relative to a mutual right of search; and, if so, to lay before the senate all the correspondence, together with any instructions that may have been given since that time by this government to our minister at England relating to this subject.

The chair laid before the senate a communication from the treasury department, containing the annual statement of the commissioner of the land office.

On motion of Mr. Smith, it was referred to the committee on the public lands.

Mr. Benton said that he held that congress had no right to pass any such act as it had passed. It was nothing but a law for the general abolition of debts at the will of the debtor. It was one of the acts of the extra session, and carried through this chamber upon the high-pressure principle. Not an i was allowed to be dotted, not a t to be crossed, without the consent of the friends of the measure. It was a bad measure in itself, passed in a bad way, and carried out badly measure along with it. It would receive its destruction from the judiciary or the voice of the people. The act was not a bankrupt system within the meaning of the constitution. The design of a bankrupt system is to enable creditors to save something out of a debtor's estate, while the constitution of the United States does not require a bankrupt system in the world which does not require the consent of the creditors, either in the whole or a great majority, to sign a certificate consenting to the final discharge of the debtor. The bill of congress reversed every proposition belonging to a proper bankrupt bill. By the mere operation of law, and the decision of the court, the debtor obtained his discharge. It was not, therefore, such a measure as the constitution required, and it was a violation of the constitution of the United States. It helped the creditor to say—under

When the matter came to the final certificate, the bill was particularly objectionable, and unlike all bankrupt bills in other countries.

Under the bill itself, the federal courts were to perpetually stand open to the debtor. Like the gates of hell, they were to be open forever. The banks could be benefited as far as the bankrupt bill extended benefits, and were subjected to none of the exactions of the bill.

When the framers of our constitution authorised the passage of a bankrupt bill, they had in view the bankrupt system of all countries, and particularly of Great Britain. They did not mean that such a bill should be passed, in all the leading features of the measures, and this he could prove from the Madison Papers and the contemporaneous history of the times. That meant that the bankrupt system should be the

They meant that the bankrupt system should be the model. The bill was a mere thing, and no more a bankrupt system, within the meaning of the constitution, than it was a bill of agriculture. It was, in its tion, than it was a bill of agriculture. It was, in its best aspect, a property law, but such a property law as no state in this union ever had, or ever would adopt. Property laws had been regarded as im-

In conclusion, Mr. Benton said if congress would pass a bill for including corporations, he would go for it; if not, he would not support it; and he should prefer to see the present bill repealed.

Having concluded his remarks, Mr. Benton was about to introduce his bill, and the chair to propound the question for a first reading, when Mr. Henderson briefly replied to the senator from Missouri and his original proposition. He said that the bill was the originator in introducing the recent elections, it was introduced several years ago by a friend of the senator, (Mr. Yorell,) and, although the bill underwent many modifications, whatever honor was attached to the measure was belated. He said that he was not a native of Missouri did not feel himself willing to abide the decision of the country, and for this reason he was prepared to introduce a real bankrupt bill; and while he insisted that this act did not correspond with the law of the country, he was prepared to respond with the law of the country would be satisfied with one which applied to banks alone. Now, the law which was passed at the last session included bankers, as well as the English law, and in the same language. It applied to persons and to corporations, and he was prepared to persevere between them, and the senator would search in vain to find in the English bankrupt law a clause applicable to corporations. The senator had placed himself in a position here to advocate the rights of creditors in Europe, and on other occasions, to show how little these creditors were entitled to.

Mr. Henderson asked, on which point? He understood the senator as arguing that the bankrupt law would operate oppressively and unjustly on creditors abroad; and he thought that the senator occupied different ground when he denounced English creditors in this country.

Mr. Benton again denied the assertion, and called for specifications.

Mr. Henderson would make no particular specification; but he would remark that, on different occasions, the senator had denounced their system of legislation. He apprehended that the senator would soon be found on the side of the banking corporations who were now asking congress to repeal this law. Many of the banks would oppose this law, for it would soon expose the rotten condition of their affairs, and their small assets without a real foundation for their their small assets and the country's economic issues. He was therefore expected to see many of the leading corporations of the country opposing the law, and asking for its repeal. They had already seen such an application this morning in the petition presented by the senator from New York, (Mr. Wright), and that too under no other guise or specification than that it was a proper subject of legislation under the provisions of the law. The effects which must go into insolvency, would, no doubt, be great, and he felt confident that a dishonest man had no more to gain under this law, than an honest man had notwithstanding the senator from Missouri had maintained a position to the contrary. He was not now prepared to answer the laborer's question, but when the senator, whose bill came up, he would, and the other gentleman should feel disposed to do so, go into a response with regard to the constitutionality of this law.

Mr. Benton understood the senator from Mississippi as saying that he was, on former occasions, opposed to paying Europe creditors. This was not so. It was true that he objected to the proceeds of the public lands being applied to that object; but, on other accounts, they were fairly entitled to a settlement of their debts.

Mr. Wright said that, because he had presided over the morning and stated that it was signed by the presidents of five of the banks of the city of New York, an inference had been drawn that those banks were unsound, and were unwilling that their unsoundness should be exhibited. Now he was not to be placed in any position beyond his own choice in defending the banking institutions of the country. If there were such things as sound banks, what was to become of the business community if they were to be labelled as unsound and rotten? He would not say that no effort would be made to remove the prejudice of the petitioners, whose position he fully understood; but let them look at the subject as business men, and with a becoming sense of justice.

Mr. Henderson remarked that he did not attempt to specify any particular banks as being insolvent; he had meant to say that it was more likely that insolvent bankers would oppose the bill rather than banks with their creditors.

Mr. Calhoun agreed in almost every word uttered by the senator from Missouri; for he held the bankrupt act to be flagrantly unconstitutional, and the most unconstitutional law ever passed in favor of fraud and oppression. But he rose to say that hoped the senator who asked leave to introduce this bill, would push the matter. If that should be done, it was his intention, when the bill came up, to move to repeal the law, instead of proposing to amend it. A few days ago, he presented the memorial of the chamber of commerce of the city of Charleston, adverse to this law; and, in obedience to that, and his own convictions, he would pursue the course which he had first suggested.

The bill was then read a first and second time, and referred to the committee on the judiciary.

The president pro tem. (Mr. King) laid before the senate the following communication, viz:

1. From the state department, stating that the returns of the sixth census, or enumeration of the people of the United States, had been printed.

2. From the war department, in pursuance of a joint resolution of the two houses of congress, containing a list of all such persons as have made application for pensions, or for an increase of pension, and a statement of the names of those who ought to be placed upon the pension roll.

3. The annual report of the commissioner of the general land office.

4. From the secretary of the treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the senate, a statement exhibiting the value of imports and exports during the year ending the 30th of September, 1841, as follows, viz:

Value of merchandise free of duty,	$64,785,449
Value of do. paying duty,	59,381,934
		$124,167,333
EXPORTS—
Foreign merchandise, viz:
Value of merchandise free of duty,	$10,793,451
Value of do. paying duty,	4,303,175
		15,101,626
Value of domestic produce,	106,039,665
		$121,161,311

Note. The value of imports and exports for the 3d quarter, ending 30th September, is partly on estimate.

Mr. Woodbury remarked that, from the statement, it would be perceived that the imports exceeded the exports more than three millions, contrary to the impressions which had gone abroad upon the subject.

The report was ordered to be printed, and then the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, DEC. 20. Mr. Miller moved to suspend the rules with a view to pass over the resolution now before the house, which related to that portion of the message relating to the tariff. His object was to take up the resolution for the reference of the subject of the apportionment of representatives under the sixth census.

After various objections and explanations from Messrs. Sellers, Briggs, and Miller, and the speaker it was stated by the clerk that the resolution for the reference of the apportionment was passed last Thursday, and had been sent to the select committee appointed on that subject.

The house then resumed the consideration of the resolution to refer to the committee on manufactures that portion of the message which relates to the tariff.

Mr. Slade, who was entitled to the floor on this subject at the last adjournment, said that he would not have said a word on this subject, if the speaker had not placed him on the committee on manufactures, and as he did not mean to resign the position that he represented a constituency deeply interested in this question, and who, of course, looked to him to defend their interest whenever it was brought under consideration. He felt also compelled to say something, from the fact that the legislature of the state which he in part represented had passed resolutions on this subject, which furnished an excellent summary of the arguments which should be urged in favor of the protective system; and, as he desired to make these resolutions a part of his speech, as well as the reasons which he wished to address to the house, he would ask that they might be read. The resolutions which were read (p. 182), were here read by the clerk, and Mr. S. proceeded. It would seem that he was thus requested, by an authority he was bound to respect, to use his best endeavors to obtain the passage of laws for the purpose of protecting domestic manufactures. This he should endeavor to do, not only voting, but, on all proper occasions, so far as he was able, by giving the reasons which influenced his votes.

Under ordinary circumstances, a mere question of reference would not naturally and properly involve the whole merits of the question. But the question of reference was so presented now, as very properly, from the nature of the case, to involve the consideration of its merits. He was not surprised, therefore, at the rage which the debate had taken. If the question arose now, for the first time, what direction should be given to the subject of manufactures—whether the house should raise a committee on manufactures or raise a committee of ways and means, to consider the subject, that would be another question. He was not surprised, therefore, if they had a committee on manufactures, and they had it, committee of ways and means, not only established by the rules of the present session, but which had their foundation in the long-settled policy of the country. And yet an attempt was now made to divert this subject from its long-accustomed, natural, and appropriate channel, and to give it a new one. This could not be done under existing circumstances, without sending abroad an impression over the country that the protective policy was, in point of fact, altogether abandoned. It would in fact amount to the abolition, if he might so speak, of the committee on manufactures. There were very good reasons why the friends of the protective system should take their stand upon this question of reference.

This consideration was strengthened by a reference to the appropriate duties of the two committees. The latter had a committee of ways and means, and it had a committee on manufactures. They found, from the very face of the rule, that the committee of ways and means had necessarily and properly nothing to do with the subject of manufactures—that the range of their inquiries did not necessarily touch this subject. And yet gentlemen desired to foist upon the committee of ways and means a set of duties never contemplated by the house.

But there was another still stronger circumstance in favor of this view. There was another rule of the house which provided for a committee on manufactures, so that we had not only the negative testimony arising from no such specifications of duty in the rule establishing the committee of ways and means, but we had positive testimony in the establishment of the committee on manufactures, the very name of which sufficiently indicated the range of its duties.

Mr. S. engaged on this view of the case, contending that under the rule, or under the view of the subject given in the message of the president, (from which he quoted), the committee of ways and means could not take into consideration the subject of manufactures, unless specially instructed so to do. Where were these special instructions? Let the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. Atherton), if he were disposed to abolish the committee on manufactures, (and it amounted to that), bring forward a resolution instructing the committee of ways and means to consider not only what he (Mr. S.) had read from the president's message, but also the subject of discussion, not only for the purpose of mere revenue, but for the purpose of protection. Would the gentleman do that? or did he suppose that the committee of ways and means would consider the subject for a moment, if that was not done? Mr. S. considered the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire, if it should prevail, as tantamount to a declaration that the president's message, that he would have no examination at all into this question. He appealed to gentlemen on all sides, from the east and the west, the north and the south, of all parties, to say whether the house was prepared to come to a vote which should speak such a language as that. He did not know but what gentlemen from New Hampshire might be prepared to do so. He would refer the subject to the committee of ways and means would be ineffectual to say that there should be no examination into it; and what then was to become of all the petitions which had been sent here in relation to it? Did gentlemen suppose that at the present discussion the question of tariff and protection of manufactures was going to remain silent? It could not be.

But it was in the highest degree unparliamentary to refer this subject to the committee of ways and means. The parliamentary rule—that was to say, the spirit of the parliamentary rule—was that a subject should be referred to such a committee as would be best calculated to protect the rights of the people. It was not done, the child, (to use the language of parliamentary commentators), was put into the hands of a nurse that would strangle it. The object was, that the case should be exhibited by the committee in such a way as to present to the legislative body a full view of the desires of the petitioners. And if that had been understood, the consequence would have been, that the committee of ways and means were to take cognizance of this subject, it would have been differently constituted—and he would now say that if the committee on manufactures was, (in effect), to be abolished, the committee of ways and means ought to be reorganized. The committee on manufactures, as it has been reorganized, with a view to this particular subject, it was composed of six members in favor, (Mr. S. was understood to say) of the protective system, and three opposed to it. This was all it should be.

After dwelling on the position that the reference to the committee of ways and means would amount, in effect, to an abolition of the committee on manufactures, Mr. S. went into an elaborate historical review of the origin of the protective system—tracing its subsequent progress from the origin of the government, as sanctioned by the recommendations of every successive president, from Washington to Jackson. For this purpose, and in illustration of his views, and to show that the protective system had been recommended and followed up as the permanent and enduring policy of the country, he quoted largely from executive communications, laying especial stress on those proceeding from Jefferson and Madison.

Mr. S. concluded by an urgent appeal to the house to send to the appropriate committee on manufactures this great subject of protection to American manufactures—a subject which, he said, had now arrived at a most critical and eventful period in its history. If ever there was a time when it needed examination and investigation, that was the present time.

Mr. S. spoke about two hours and a half, during which he read largely from various documents illustrative of his positions.

Mr. Sellers took the floor.

An adjournment being called for, Mr. Sellers gave way.

Before the question of adjournment was put, Mr. Stanley by request—moved that his colleague, Mr. Sheppard, be excused from serving on the committee of expenditures on account of ill health. Granted.

The speaker communicated the annual report of the secretary of the treasury. Referred to the committee of ways and means, ordered to be printed, and 10,000 copies ordered.

Then, at a quarter before three, the house adjourned.

TUESDAY, DEC. 21. Mr. Warren, of Georgia, attended in his place.

The house resumed the consideration of the resolution to refer to the committee on manufactures that portion of the president's message as relates to the tariff to the committee on manufactures.

Which resolution Mr. Atherton had heretofore moved to amend by striking out the words "committee on manufactures," and inserting the words "committee of ways and means."

Mr. Sellers, of Md. expressed his surprise that on a simple question of reference between two standing committees of the house the entire policy of a protective tariff should have been drawn into discussion, and an effort made to control the votes of members by their general views for or against such a policy. For himself, he should be governed in his vote not by the general question of the constitutionality or expediency of a tariff for protection, but simply by the nature of the functions assigned, respectively, to the two committees in question. The committee on manufactures had originally been raised for the consideration of the question of protective duties, and the whole subject of the tariff had always been referred to this committee, and never to the committee of ways and means. He was disposed to depart from the established practice of the house. Mr. S. said that although a tariff debate did not legitimately belong to this simple question on reference, yet as gentlemen had succeeded in eliciting, to some extent, an expression of opinion in different quarters of the house, he was disposed to consider what were the sentiments in relation to it. Some gentlemen had taken the ground that even an incidental protection of domestic industry was unconstitutional, yet our most enlightened statesmen had held and ably defended the opposite sentiment. And it was absurd to submit to the government such a power, so utterly needless and inefficient, as it was to be able to extend protection to the industry of its own citizens. He declined going into the constitutional argument, but insisted that, on a mere view of expediency, no period could ever be so favorable as the present to regulate and place on a permanent basis the protective policy of the country. It was a subject to be dealt with less of collision and difficulty than in any past period. Our treasury was empty; the government was compelled from unavoidable necessity to devise a system of taxation to supply the deficiency in the revenue, and it might with comparative ease be now arranged to do while the purpose of revenue was secured; incidental protection might at the same time be extended to such interests as needed it. Mr.

S. contended that this was the idea intended by the president in that clause of his message which related to the subject of duties on imports; and so believing, he rendered the president his thanks for the recommendation. By a short but conclusive and convincing argument, the executive had shown that this could be effected.

Here Mr. S. went into some severe comments on the adverse doctrines of free trade and a "horizontal" tariff. So far as he could understand the gentleman from South Carolina and others who advocated such doctrines, they maintained that in laying duties for revenue on goods imported, it was equally to be laid even to incidental protection: more absurd position he never had heard advanced. Carry out the principle, and impose one uniform rate of taxation without any discrimination, and a tax that would utterly prostrate and destroy some sources of revenue would leave others scarce at all affected; and this, in effect, gentlemen's boasted principle would, in practice, create that every bugbear they so much dreaded, a protective tariff.

Mr. S. next directed his attack against what is called "the forty-bale theory"—a theory which first made its appearance in the house in the shape of an illustration by Mr. R. of the duties levied on the exports of South Carolina, viz: that the producers of exports were the payers of the whole duty on imports. This dogma contained the substance of the whole theory. Mr. S. utterly denied that it was true in fact, and facts, being utterly against it, were sufficient to upset the whole superstructure. When it was asked how could we prove the theory false by a reductio ad absurdum. If the position of this forty-bale doctrine were true, then it must follow that South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and a few more of our southern states, paid one-half of all the duties levied in the United States, because they raised one-half of the exports of the country. It would follow, too, that these were the only states that consumed foreign luxuries. But was the fact so? Was it not true that the non-slaveholding states consumed more of them than the slaveholding states? Was it customary to give these luxuries to the slaves? He believed not. But could carry the proof still further. If the doctrine were true, then the 7th congressional district of the state of Maryland could consume the whole of the foreign luxuries imported into the state; but to his certain knowledge this was not so: for he believed the city of Baltimore alone consumed more of them than the whole state besides, and he was not responsible than the city of South Carolina put together. A more ridiculous theory never was broached by the mind of any man than this far-famed forty-bale scheme. Mr. S. spoke with warmth against the notion that the ingenuity, skill and patient labor of our own countrymen were not to be protected against the injurious competition of foreign manufactures, when an American heart should continue to beat in his bosom he never could yield himself to so revolting a doctrine. He trusted to see the products of that skill and industry multiplied a thousand fold, and furnishing materials for a commerce which should whiten with its sails every wind and spread itself to the remotest limits of the world. To witness such a result our true policy was to cast a shield over the industry of our own people. "This the government could do: this it was bound to do."

Mr. S. here adverted to the absurdity of the policy which would throw open our ports to the manufactures of all the world, while, at the same time, our own products were sold and sold at a disadvantage in every market from admission abroad. And on this topic, he adverted to the duties levied on American tobacco, which he characterized as openly insulting to the government and people of this country. With many expressions of disgust and indignation, Mr. S. went into some details to show the state of the revenue as fixed by the revenue laws of different countries in Europe, commencing as he proceeded on the enormity of exacting such a tribute from the agriculturists of the United States to fill the exhausted treasuries of the aristocratic governments of the old world. He showed that the taxes on the produce amounted to seven tenths of the imports of the European governments amounted to upwards of thirty millions. It was a condition to which the American people could not longer submit without dishonor. And here he took occasion to do justice to a late administration which had used every effort, by negotiation and otherwise, to effect the redress of this great national injury, but in vain. In support of this position, he referred to and quoted communications from Mr. Stevenson, our late envoy to Great Britain: from which it appeared that, in reply to his remonstrances and representations, the British minister could not but admit the injustice and hardship of the tax, the inequality of the case, but pleaded in reply the delicate and hazardous nature of the task, especially in the present position of that country, of attempting a reduction of its foreign duties. The intention of that government seemed to be that of the dying miser to his son: "My son, get money; honestly, if you can; but, my son, get money."

Mr. S. again adverted to the doctrine of the advocates of free trade. They saw and were compelled to see that justice and injury had been done to us by other governments, yet they could not give up their darling maxims: the theory must be carried out at all hazards and at every expense. He hoped the house would be governed by no such wild theories, but would take the proper means to put an end to a system of wrongs which was degrading and disgraceful to our country.

Mr. S. here adverted to the desire professed by Mr. Stale, in his speech of Monday, to have protection extended alike to all the industry of the country, whether free labor or slave labor. He trusted the gentleman and his friends would not "keep the promise to the ear and break it to the hope." He trusted when the law came to be framed that they would not turn about, and, having their own interests protected, give the go-by to every other section of the union. If they acted like true men, he would go with them to the last, but he should reserve the right to what he or others would like. He never would consent to protect one interest of the country, and leave another, which far more needed protection, wholly unprotected. Gentlemen need not expect this. He never would do it. Must Rhode Island have her cotton goods protected, and Vermont her sheep, and Pennsylvania her iron, and every state in the union be attended to, and the tobacco of Maryland be passed by? He trusted not. If that was the policy of gentlemen, it could not be known too soon.

Mr. Linn, of N. Y. said that ultra partisans on each side must yield something, and consent to take some middle ground; if not, the common sense of the people would before long do it for them. He would not consent to what he or others would like. He never would consent to protect one interest of the country, and leave another, which far more needed protection, wholly unprotected. the interests of agriculture? Not because either commerce or a revenue stand in peculiar need of protection, but because there is a deficit in the treasury? He would appeal to every man of candor—why raise this question of a protective tariff because there was a deficit in the treasury? If the object was to supply revenue to meet the deficit, why not apply to the committee of ways and means, whose express duty it was to do very things of this kind?

But it was insisted that although the direct object was revenue for the treasury, yet taxes for revenue might be made discriminating so as to give an incidental protection to manufactures. A most absurd position. To want to secure that protection, in this view, to an object remote and incidental merely. Suppose the advocates of the tobacco interest should urge and insist on countervailing duties on silks and wines, on German linens and British broadcloths, and should therefore insist that the subject should go to the committee on agriculture. The subject should go to the committee on agriculture. The representatives of the cotton growing interest should insist that the duty on imports in exchange for American cotton was equal to an export duty on their staple, (a doctrine Mr. R. did not endorse, and on which he now expressed no opinion: he did not like to see a man from that country so easily understand them however as saying that all the imports were consumed by the producers, but that the exports were decreased in value to the amount of the tax on corresponding imports), and should insist on its going to the committee on commerce. Either of these demands would be just as plausible as that which involved in sending it to the committee on manufactures. Now, gentlemen might disagree on subordinate points, but the main object, viz. Revenue, should be ever kept in view. They might as well refer a clause touching the increase of the army to the committee on the territories, because the committee on the territories could not but be made to remember that their argument cut both ways: it was a two-edged sword, and they should be careful how they handled it.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. Linn) had disclaimed all hostility to the south, and had expressed his opposition to drawing lines between north and south. Mr. R. entirely agreed with him, but unfortunately the gentleman's premises and his conclusions were wide apart. The only tenable ground in this matter of duties was to have all the various interests of the country to rely on their interests, and if they protected those interests, they would find themselves struck at on some other interests. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Sellers) had looked at the national honor; but if he looked a little closer into his heart perhaps he would find there self-interest overruling all other considerations. The gentleman from New York (Mr. Linn) had looked at the high duties on silks and wines, on cloths and linens; now possibly he might find that his northern friends who went so strong for protecting home industry would not relish very high duties on these things, because they did not compete so much with domestic manufactures. They would possibly prefer to have the money duty protected for themselves. Thus it was, the moment we legislated for one we came against another. Let gentlemen rather refer the matter to a committee which went for neither, but was supposed to be unbiased.

The tariff was to be raised to supply revenue; this was the ground taken by all. Now the first question was, how much is needed for this purpose? And how should the committee be instructed? From the report of the secretary of the treasury, it was known that the committee had that report been referred to the committee on manufactures? No; but to the committee of ways and means. The requisite information was now before that committee, and the subject should go to that committee.

But the house had been told that this subject should go to the committee on manufactures because the committee of ways and means had so much business before it.

[Here some explanations passed between Mr. R. and Mr. Fillmore, chairman of the committee, who declined having ever returned to take charge of the subject.]

No doubt the gentleman's objection, from the mass of business, had arisen from his great uneasiness; but would the house relieve the gentleman and the country from the more weighty subject, that they might have time to attend to what was of less moment?

As to the argument from precedents, it had little weight. Admitting that the subject of the tariff had always heretofore gone to the committee on manufactures, was it now under a new political dispensation. All previous tariff laws from 1789, when this committee was first raised, down to 1823, had been referred for protection. True, this idea was kept out of sight in the titles of the bills, and the existence of a national debt furnished a ready excuse for passing them; but the debt was under speedy liquidation, and all those laws were clearly for protection of manufactures. Under such circumstances, it was right to send the tariff to the committee on manufactures; but since then a compromise act had passed, and it looked to the ultimate abandonment of the whole principle of protection; and it proposed a compromise of the whole subject, the subject should be referred for an economical administration of the government. The great question now was this: shall we adhere to the principles of the compromise act, or shall we return to the doctrine of protection?

Mr. R. was opposed to discriminating duties for protection. He did not envy the manufacturing interest, nor would he deny that they should have protection which they must unavoidably derive from a uniform duty. They, and they alone, would be protected by that duty. If 20 per cent. was not enough for the purposes of revenue, he would go for 50 per cent. and manufactures would get the whole benefit. At least, it was conceded that their other interests would derive any protection; but that manufactures must wait palpable.

What the views of the president actually were on the matter, he knew not and cared not. That he expected to be for discriminating duties every one might have seen. He had said that he was not a slave, but whether he really was so, he must leave to the president's friends. The advocates of protection were welcome to his aid. But what had the house to do with his personal views in the matter? How often must this opinion of the president be hugged into that man's mouth? How often the subjectivity of some gentlemen carry them? Must the views of the executive be consulted on every trifling matter, even to the question of referring a paper to a committee? It will become the representatives of a free people and a great party, whose motto had been resistance to executive dictation. Here he quoted the message, that he was; but he denied that therefore this subject must go to the committee on manufactures. Unless this was resisted, that house would at length become a mere "bed of justice" to register executive edicts.

One word to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, from the Pittsburgh district. That gentleman had done his best to convert this matter of reference into a party question. He had called on the whig party—a party in which the gentleman had, it seemed, had all confidence—to protect domestic industry. He had called on the whig party to support the tariff alone in Pennsylvania were for protection; whether there was not a great democratic party who advocated it in Jackson's day, and afterwards ran a man for president who had voted for the high protective tariff of 1828? And whether he had been

Had the whig party ever pledged itself, as a party, in favor of protection? No. But there was one pledge which it had openly made in every state, and county, and city, and hamlet of the land—a pledge to give the country a fiscal agent, and to reform the currency. He called on the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Irwin) to come up to his pledge—to reform the currency—and that without regard to executive dictation. Was the gentleman ready to redeem that pledge? When he had done that, it would be in somewhat better taste to call on the whigs to protect domestic industry. But the gentleman had not done that. The question would or could become a party question, and so he would find it.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. Linn) had spoken very respectfully of the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. Morton), who had moved this resolution. Though that gentleman was not of Mr. R.'s party, he thanked him heartily for the moral man's subsequent course, and said that that could no more be made a party question than could abolition.

In conclusion, Mr. R. disclaimed to "speak for the south"—he had heard that dose till he had been often disgusted—but he would say that he believed there was no party in the matter. The free-soil men of the United States who while they did not themselves ask for protection of any kind, did not intend to submit to unequal and onerous exaction.

Mr. Butler, of S. Carolina, considered it of very little importance to which committee the reference of this portion of the message should be made. So far as the composition of the two committees was concerned, there was little difference in them; but, on the ground of principle, all questions relating to revenue should properly be referred to the committee of ways and means.

The gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Sellers), had a very summary method of disposing of all parties in the way of his conclusion. He had made allusions to the state of South Carolina. He had said that state was occupied by a few heretical theories, but he had not examined them; he had declared, in simple denunciation only, that the opinions entertained in South Carolina were ridiculous and absurd. He had not only not examined the character and principles of South Carolina, but he had misrepresented them. There was no party in South Carolina that was hostile to manufactures, or disposed to destroy or demolish them. The whig party in that state was as friendly to manufactures as any portion of this country; but not so friendly to them as to be willing to have their interests taxed for the benefit of manufactures—as to be willing to see manufactures forced into existence by destroying all other interests. They were willing to destroy all other interests, but they would not see their interests destroyed. They would not see their interests more at risk; but they were unwilling to see it done at the expense of their interests. Gentlemen had taken occasion to allude to the course of South Carolina on this subject in such a manner as clearly proved that they did not understand her principles. That the examination of the course that had been taken by South Carolina, they attacked her principles, let it be done with fair argument and reasoning, and not with denunciation.

The gentleman from Vermont (Mr. Stale) did not understand the principles of South Carolina, or appreciate her patriotism or devotion to the interest of the whole country. He had said that he had taken for his text certainly a very isolated fact, that the message of every president of the United States since the organization of government had favored protection; and on that had brought up an argument that manufactures were to be protected. He (Mr. B.) had listened with great attention to hear either gentleman say what he meant by protection; and he had not heard it alluded to yet. Did they mean to carry the duties beyond twenty per cent.—or lay the whole burden on a few articles, and leave others free? If they did, he protested against it. So far as they were concerned in South Carolina, they would not discriminate against manufactures. They were not of manufactures; they were disposed to have the manufacturing, agricultural, and commercial interests stand on their own footing; they were unwilling to be taxed to support any class of manufactures.

Allusion had been made to one subject he had hoped to have been better left alone for consideration. One gentleman had said that in an article in which slave and free labor might be concerned, he would make a discrimination in favor of free labor? He (Mr. B.) would not regard this otherwise than robbery. The highway robber never uttered a wordier phrase than plunder and robbery than this, from gentlemen knowing that the south were guaranteed by the constitution of the United States in the full possession of this property, and that this property should be secure to them; that they were to be allowed the same privileges under the constitution, and that was the ground on which this constitution was founded. South Carolina (they the north) had with respect to their free labor, and now the unblushing clerimony was exercised by the gentleman, to come on this floor, and say that he would disregard all these obligations, and destroy their property, sooner than his favorite interests should be protected.

Mr. Linn requested the floor for an explanation; which being granted, he said that the gentleman from South Carolina had been either very inattentive, or had entirely forgotten what he (Mr. L.) had said. He did not in the first instance, or finally, make the distinction between slave and free labor. He had expressed his opinion that the tariff was unnecessarily made before them on this and kindred questions; and had then said if this issue must be made—if in the adjustment of the tariff the question was, which system shall you support, the free or slave system? he felt bound, in conscience, to go in favor of the free system. And he trusted, as an American citizen, he might be permitted to avow these principles on this floor.

Mr. Butler continued. He had not misunderstood the gentleman. The gentleman had put the condition that if this question were raised, he should take the side which he said he was bound to take in philosophy; it was against this sentiment that he (Mr. B.) had protested. He said that the gentleman had been dishonest, good faith, and all regard to constitutional obligations would never sanction. No man who had watched the course of things in this government and the circumstances in which the constitution was shattered by the states, could deny the fact that slave labor came into the government exactly on the very footing with other labor.

The gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. Randolph), and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Irwin), had called on the whigs of the south to rally under their standard, and support protection. He (Mr. B.) as one of the whig party, never appeared with such a standard; he recognized none such, he had come forward to correct the abuses of this government, which they, (the whigs), believed had crept into every crevice and department of this government; but he had never expected to be hailed by gentlemen from the north, in this bold and barefaced effrontery, to come forward and assist them in laying taxes on the south for the benefit of the north. All the gentlemen had said they were for protecting domestic labor, meaning to exclude slave labor. They would say, as a gentleman had remarked yesterday, that South Carolina might be considered in this country as a foreign nation, but not when the question of free trade and slave labor was considered. All the duties laid by this government on foreign articles were to that extent a benefit and assistance to domestic manufactures, whether the duty was ten, fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five per cent. The moment they carried a duty to such an extent as to prohibit the introduction of foreign articles, it was exclusively a duty for protection and not for revenue, and the very object of government would be directed to the protection of manufactures. As understood, the question now submitted was, whether, in this adjustment of the tariff, they would confer it to the purpose of the protection necessary for the most economical administration of government.

Thus far he was as willing to go as any body; he was in favor of such a tariff; but the moment they transcended it, they carried duties so high as not only to destroy revenue, but exclude foreign articles, and he could not sanction.

Allusion had been made to the protection the south receives on her cotton, but he had heard no gentleman pretend to intimate that this was not merely a nominal duty. Whence might the south expect to meet competition for her cotton? It had been said, from the East Indies; but this was not now the case, and it was not now the case would be. The duty on cotton was merely a nominal duty. The gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. Shale), had gone into distant fortitude, and prognosticated what would be the state of the case hereafter. He had differed with some in one particular; he had not definitely fixed the duty on cotton, and he would have said, but had said "the time was not far distant" when the duty would appear in this hall with appeals for the protection of manufactures. He, (Mr. B.) could not say whether the gentleman was correct, but he now saw no indications of the kind whatever.

One question that had arisen in this discussion was, (the president's) in his annual communication, had favored protection or only recommended a tariff for revenue. This was perfectly immaterial. So far as he, (Mr. B.) was concerned, he professed to be governed by no opinion the president might declare here or elsewhere. If the former history of his (the president's) had been against protection, Mr. B. should regret that since his elevation to the presidency he should have changed his opinion, and fallen into the councils of other people, so that they might not have the benefit of his aid in opposition to protection.

He Butler having concluded, on motion of Mr. Sellers, the house adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 22. Mr. Cushing rose and gave notice that he would hereafter ask to bring in a bill regulating commercial intercourse with the port of Cayenne, in the colony of French Guiana, and to recruit certain duties.

The house resumed the consideration of that branch of the resolution of Mr. Fillmore, providing for the carrying of the message to the president, in which Mr. Althoff had heretofore moved to amend.

Mr. Marshall observed that it did not seem to him to involve any difficulty, or justify to authorize the extent of debate to which it had given rise: it was a simple question of references, which, in itself, involved no difficulty in relation to the question of the duties, either on one side or the other, of the much debated question of the tariff. It was a mere question of parliamentary propriety, as between two of the standing committees of the house, to which of them a certain portion of an executive communication should be sent. To Mr. M. it appeared that an error had been committed in the communication referred to must at once settle the matter. [Here he quoted from the message the passages referring to an increase of duties.] In these passages he understood the president as intending to intimate it as his opinion that, although duties could not be levied on the amount of revenue actually needed by the government, yet in the imposition of them congress might legitimately have an especial eye to the protection of the domestic industry of the country, and might so frame its legislation that the taxes needed by the treasury might incidentally meet the end. If that was the opinion of the president, and congress was called upon by him to lay revenue duties with a view to guard the domestic industry of the people, without transcending the amount needed by the exigencies of the treasury, could there be any question that the committee on manufactures was the appropriate committee to which to send the portion of the message containing such recommendation.

There could be nothing so fatal to the peace and to the union of these states as the agitation of questions in which the interests of slave labor should be set in opposition to those of free labor—in which a line was drawn between different sections of the union, as if their interests were hostile to each other. And the idea was attempted to be established that a government of this country could not exert the power conferred upon it by the constitution to establish a uniform system for the regulation of commerce without arraying one-half the country against the other, and benefiting the one at the expense of the other. Mr. M.'s views of the general subject were completely different. The fact that slavery prevailed in a portion of the land, and not in another portion, far from in connexion with the diversity of products and of pursuits among different portions of the country, had always struck him as one of the strongest possible elements of our national union. What furnished a more solid foundation for the interests of commerce than that diversity? Or what has been a stronger basis for peace and amity among different nations of the world?

In theory the doctrine of free trade was, he confessed, very imposing. And if theory and philosophy had the remodeling of all the states and governments of the world; if a political economist were set up to be the arbiter of the destinies of the earth, if all national rivalries, and national antipathies and enmities and prejudices could be softened down by the mere force of reason, then indeed it might do to adopt the maxim that industry and capital must be let alone—that capital would find out such investments as were most profitable, and industry would conduct the exchange of its powers with the most productive, and legislation might look on with folded hands and admire the free working of the system.—Yes, it would be a beautiful spectacle; we should have a perfect Utopia of a world. True, one nation would still be richer than another, from mere natural advantages, of climate, of soil, of position, &c. But, alas! political economists were unable thus to arrange things. No mere theorist was set up as umpire to settle all questions among the nations. Nations, ever since their existence, had been contending, struggling for pre-eminence, and they were not likely to be contented with the position they would mediate upon us the fair and beautiful doctrines of free trade, and to hear them one would suppose that no other policy had ever been thought of in Britain. But, when we looked at the actual policy of England, did we find free trade? Did England exchange with Great Britain for the benefit of her exports and their own investment? How had that empire attained to her present vast height of prosperity and power? By giving every practicable protection and encouragement to the industry of her people; by attracting and domesticating to her utmost ability the manufactures of the whole world. No sooner did a new branch of manufacture rise up in any part of Europe, than England tempted those who practised it, by protective duties, by bounties, by personal rewards, by every seductive means within her reach, to settle in England. And no sooner was the exotic planted on her shores than it was sure to receive the fostering patronage of the government, until it had attained its roots firmly into the soil, and attained a firm luxuriant growth; and by this policy, steadily pursued, she had risen to her present national strength and greatness.

But we were exhorted to throw open our ports to all the world; we were to welcome the products of every foreign nation, to receive all they chose to send, while at the same time they excluded, with watchful unsleeping jealousy, every one of our products whenever they had any similar ones of their own to foster. This was a pretty system of free trade!—America has a staple, for example, in cotton manufactures; but Britain has a staple in British manufactures; but Britain has rhetorically seized her ports against it, and we are still to go and buy of her, and call it "free trade." The theory of these political philosophers might come nearer the truth had all nations, in the race of commercial rivalry, started at once, and we were contented with that of foreigners engaged in the same occupations. Under such circumstances, would gentlemen preach to us the theories of free trade? It was vain to say that capital and industry would ever flow into the channels of manufacturing production of themselves, unaided by the protection of legislation without government, and even in their incipient stages, manufactures never could start. Our soil might be fully opened and cultivated, and a large redundant population might grow up upon our soil, yet these extra hands never could become manufacturers unless under the safeguard of legal protection. And the moment that government should commence any branch of domestic manufacture, the foreign capitalist, whose capital was invested in that manufacture, and who had heretofore supplied our own market, would put forth his whole strength to crush the infant rival, and crushed it might be unless the arm of government intervened to shield it.

Mr. M. wanted to see the day when under the protecting arms of the government, extended over every branch of our own domestic industry, (and here he knew the danger of running his head against the "compromise act"), all that could be produced here would be produced here, and the home market would be that of all markets. When we bartered with foreigners, a portion of the profit, perhaps the larger portion, went into the pocket of the foreigner. But if we traded with our own people, the profit was American, all around. If the profit went to the English, and the profit went to England, but when we traded with the south traded with his brother in New England, America got the whole—double the amount was made and saved to the nation.

AY, but how would all this interfere with the compromise act? And what was the compromise act? It was a law passed in 1833, fixing a uniform duty of twenty per cent. on all imports, after a certain day, but very generously leaving it in the power of congress to fix the rate higher or lower, if the necessities of the government should require or permit, according to the excess or the depletion of the treasury. Why so much sensibility had been exhibited in connection with this act, Mr. M. was unable to understand. For his own part, even if the law had contained no such saving clause, no such reserve of power to the government to vary the rate of duty, he should deny its authority in toto as a rule to bind the legislation of congress. He denied the power of any congress to bind the future congresses by any constitutional sanction and sacredness for all future time. As a temporary expedient—as a means of soothing and allaying political and sectional exasperation, it might be all very well; it might even have been wise for the time then present. South Carolina had formerly been a very peaceable and amiable state, most of open hostility; and the executive of that day—than whom, in popularity and in power, there never had lived a greater upon earth—had put his hand upon his sword, and threatened to turn its edge upon the south. Great men, on either side, were identified with the controversy, and its progress had embroiled the whole country in a state of high and alarming exasperation. It was feared by good and wise men that the peace of the union might be endangered; and under such an ominous juncture of circumstances this compromise bill became a law. As a measure of policy, as a preventive of evil, it was wise, considering the times. But, to meet us at this day, in 1842, and tell us that a law passed in 1833 has power to bind this government to all eternity, as a compact—as an organic, fundamental law—was to advance a proposition to which Mr. M. never would yield his assent. He would never assent to a law which he felt so to bind the congresses of the United States. According to the fluctuations of circumstances, of policy—yes, even of public opinion alone—that law was repealable; the power of congress to repeal it was indisputable.

Mr. M. did not say that he was in favor of laying duties beyond the amount required for revenue, for the mere purpose of protection. The propriety of that was a debatable question; and much might be said, and had been said, on both sides. The power to regulate commerce had been absolutely and unconditionally confided to the general government, and when we were asked to regulate commerce, we must refer to the universal sentiments of the notions of the earth. And why grant a power to "regulate"? The history of the world would prove that the most arduous struggles had in all ages taken place in reference to it, and that the sword had often been drawn to settle the controversy. The members of the constitution were well acquainted with the history of the past; and when preparing a frame of organic law for this young, this nascent nation—the long vista of future grandeur, power and wealth, the fruit of successful industry, rose before them with a new era, and they were anxious to provide this provision as a means of arming the government with power to resist the attacks of foreign rivalry; and the government must have been powerless without it. But for this, and Great Britain would at this day be the regulator of the commerce of this nation. Nothing could have sorted to simple denunciation. The gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Sellers), had said it was ridiculous, and some other member that it was absurd; yet none of them had met the proposition and endeavored to show, either by facts or reasoning, that it was untenable. He, (Mr. R.) believed it to be strictly true. There were those who contended that government had the power in the use of laying duties for protection on the ground of providing "for the general welfare;" and others who claimed this as an incident to the power of protecting commerce; but the ground that had been taken in justification of protective duties, by all who had preceded him, except two gentlemen, was that the power of laying duties for protection was incidentally included in laying duties for revenue. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. Linn), and New Jersey, (Mr. Randolph), had said his, (Mr. R.'s) proposition was absurd, and proceeded from the error of not properly discriminating between protection and prohibition. This he held that while you cannot lay a duty for revenue that produces prohibition, you may lay a duty which produces protection. [He here read extracts from the reported speeches.] It was admitted by them, if the duty was pushed up to prohibition, it would destroy revenue. Suppose, then, the duty was raised to one-third, or one-fourth, he asked, was not this revenue destroyed in that ratio? Therefore, taking the gentlemen's proposition that prohibition did necessarily destroy revenue, and therefore a duty proposing it was incompatible with revenue, their reasoning against protection was as good as proved to be entirely false. Why did not practical gentlemen go into details and facts to test the truth of their principle?—He would take the proposition of the gentleman, (Mr. Linn), and go through the process of protection and prohibition.

The gentleman had supposed that, if a tax was laid on iron of $100,000, the foreign manufacturer could stand it. But he contended that prohibition would in this manner make the price of the commodity so high that he could not bring it here and sell it, and the domestic producer would be enabled to undersell him. Prohibition did not at once go into effect; it was only gradually that entire prohibition accomplished. He could not see how the principle of restraining the article of iron, on which, if a duty of 50 per cent. were laid, the manufacturers of this country would not be able at once to produce the domestic article in sufficient quantities; at first, they might not produce more than one-quarter of the supply, and would increase gradually until they could meet the demand. If the sale of foreign iron would cease, and revenue entirely cease; and he asked gentlemen if, when entire prohibition produced destruction, the destruction was not in proportion to the degree of prohibition? Gentlemen need not call the part protection, and the whole prohibition; it was prohibition from its intensity up to its consummation; the moment they began protection, they placed a lever by which the foreign article must be worked out of our markets. What was prohibition? To keep out the foreign article; it was, if they kept out one-fourth or one-half of it, it was prohibition. Protection was prohibition, and prohibition was protection. Let gentlemen meet the proposition boldly and fairly, but not come here with the humbuggery that a tariff for revenue is inconsistent with a tariff for protection; if they want for a tariff for protection under the commercial power, or the "general welfare" let them question the ground. The gentleman from Kentucky should be argued, not with mere words, not against facts, but on the broad principles of the constitution. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) this morning had claimed from the commercial power—the power to regulate commerce, which was our department of industry, power over every department. It was not his (Mr. R.'s) argument that it was unnecessary for us to become dependent on any foreign nation? He (Mr. R.) would like to hear by what sort of sophistry it could be shown that we were subject to foreign nations, and they not to us; but that was his argument, and he would not use it; he would supply his self-sufficiency in other words, would make it a new specimen of the Chinese empire. According to the theory of certain gentlemen, as soon as we shall get into that predicament, the other nations of the world would turn on us and eat us to pieces, for drawing to ourselves an independent power. The gentleman from Kentucky knew that, under the very clause of "regulating commerce," the power had been assumed to interfere with our slaves, and hinder us from carrying them from one port to another? This was a striking commentary on the looseness of his construction of this power. The power was given by the states to congress to "regulate commerce," to secure communication between different parts of this country, and not to strike down the commerce of the country.

This was not a local question, but was as wide as the constitution, as sacred as the union. If the constitution did not on either of these broad grounds justify the protecting of manufactures, then its use presented was, shall the protective policy or the constitution prevail? If the protective policy were persevered in, the constitution would come to an end. If the constitution were persevered in, it would have a view to any particular interest; the power was to lay duties for general purposes, and not for special reasons alone.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) had referred to the compromise act. This act had no constitutional sanctions; they could repeal it when they pleased. The question now was shall you renew the protective policy in 1842, or adhere to principles laid down in this compromise, which are productive of the best interests of the country? Who are the parties to this controversy? He would turn to the people of the country, and see how many of its inhabitants compose the manufacturing interest. Formerly, it had been said that banks were the people; now the same thing was repeated, and the protective policy was said to be the people. The total population of the United States was something over 17,000,000; and these were divided into manufacturers and trade were seven hundred and ninety-one thousand, and he was informed that in this number were included all mechanics and day laborers of every kind, and almost half the peasantry of New England. These should be deducted, and then they would be left 1,000,000, and these engaged in manufactures. The agriculturist was taxed for every thing he wears for the benefit of the manufacturers, this small proportion of the people of the U. States. What right had government to tax one man for the benefit of another? It was contrary to every principle of justice that they should be called on to support a legislature to legislate for the people, and to be opposed to despotisms, no longer to legislate for the few, but to carry out the great principles of equal legislation for the benefit of the many.

They were told by gentlemen who held these doctrines that they were legislating for the south. If they were told that they intended to make us pay for some thirty years higher prices than we otherwise would, but they intended to make prices cheaper in the end; and for this purpose the present generation was to be bound down under the weight of oppressive taxation. When had the world witnessed such an anomaly as this? The very object of gentlemen named in the articles dear the manufacturing interest could not live without taxation; they lived on the oppression of the country; and still gentlemen said they were legislating for the labor of the country, and that those who opposed them were forcing against the interest of the country. They were sprung into existence and the convulsions of war and the distress and suffering of the country. The gentleman from Kentucky had represented this government as hostile to the manufacturing interest, and said that manufacturers sprung up without the help of government. There was no subject of protection, if it had legislated for any section of the union, had legislated for New England alone. He (Mr. R.) was willing that these interests should receive all the benefits resulting from a fair construction of the constitution; he was no enemy to them; but when they were called on to sustain a tariff, at war with every principle of right, it was asking too much.

Where originated the doctrine of the unconstitutionality of a protective tariff? In the south! Not the time when New England was affected by it in the same manner as the south, and still then opposed the doctrine. There were those in New England, as Mr. Story, of Daniel Webster, and others, in favor of the unconstitutionality of protection. The very men who formerly maintained the unconstitutionality of a protective tariff now urged it on us. He did not think, as had been intimated, that this government was in favor of duties for revenue; on the contrary, he had said at the last session that he did not think the duty on silks should be 20 per cent; but in laying duties for revenue all the departments of industry should be equally benefited; and as large manufacturing establishments had sprung up, and the country was still less willing to make a discrimination against manufacturers.

The gentleman from Kentucky had called on them to say when an interest had flourished, except by the intervention of the strong arm of the government? He (Mr. R.) referred to Switzerland, and said that the manufacturing interest had flourished without the protection of government. Protection, so far from making commodities cheaper, as had been contended, made them dearer. It was a law of commerce and competition, that when the arm of the government was fetched to the support of any interest, prices never came down, and would be as cheap as otherwise. He had as much confidence in the growing greatness of our country as any one. Great Britain had not grown great from a protective policy, but from her free institutions. It was the liberty of Great Britain, as far as it existed, which had given her her greatness—which had quickened her industry. Our progress to wealth and prosperity had been impeded by the millions and millions of dollars paid to manufacturers. Were we to continue this course of tribute? It was nothing else.

This thing called protection was nothing less than plunder; the taking property from one man and giving it to another; nothing less than making one section of the country tributary to another. Gentlemen could not deceive the people as to the practical result of this whole policy; it was to tax the many for the benefit of the few. He had said and still indulged the hope that this congress would adjust the question in such a way that all portions of the country could stand together. It was not his desire that the different portions should stand in opposition. If the voice of one who was no enemy to the union would not be disregarded, he would say, if the course now threatened to be pursued was persisted in, they would face an issue between the different portions of the country and destroy our union.

He had seen it suggested in an abolition paper that, on the question of the tariff, a distinction was to be drawn between the free and the slave states; the gentleman rose on this floor, and, on a question of taxation, held that the free labor is to be protected against the slave labor, they put the torch to the constitution.

The doctrine of equal rights was the doctrine of free trade; the doctrine of free trade was the doctrine of Christianity; and the doctrines of Christianity those of peace. Under the influence of these our destiny was a glorious one: "the sword would be beat into the ploughshare." We should "know war no more," and all portions of the union would progress in harmony; but if the opposite principles were broadcast, and persisted in, war must come, and with it oceans of blood. But should we not hope that our destiny was higher and holier should we not take warning from the fate of other nations, and, adopting the principle of equal rights, move on united? It was said that South Carolina was the principle of the tariff, but all that the great doctrine which lay at the foundation of American liberty and the constitution, he would hang to his heart; he would not give them for the sceptre of Cæsar. Our destiny, he repeated, was to be great and glorious one, because it was "to do as others would that they should do to us," and our destiny would be onward with liberty and prosperity; but let the interests of one portion of the country be regarded as opposed to those of another, and American liberty and glory would set, and set forever.

Mr. Rhett having concluded, Mr. Johnson obtained the floor; but yielded to Mr. Weller, who, as the house do not adjourn, he adjourned.

THURSDAY, DEC. 23. Mr. Thaagen, of Mississippi, introduced his colleague, Hon. Mr. Griffin, representative elect from that state, who was qualified and took his seat.

On leave given, Mr. Fillmore, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill for the extension of the duty on foreign iron to $100,000, and for an addition of five million dollars thereto.

The bill having been read twice by its title, was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Cushing, it was resolved that when the house adjourns, it adjourns to meet on Monday next.

The unfinished business of yesterday was the amendment offered by Mr. Rhett, to the amendment offered by Mr. Johnson, to the resolution offered by Mr. Fillmore.

Mr. Fillmore remarked, that although the present state of the treasury and of the public expenditures was in a considerable measure connected with the question now before the house—which question was, whether the subject of the tariff, as referred to in the President's message, should be committed to the committee on manufactures, or to the committee on ways and means—he would not have gone into the subject if he had not already been introduced by other gentlemen in the course of the debate.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Jones) had adverted to a portion of the message of the President, and expected that the President would have provided thirty-two millions of dollars, and had remarked that here was seen the difference which frequently prevailed between profession and practice.

Mr. A. then adverted to the debt which he said, it was charged had been "bequeathed" to this administration by the last. Gentlemen would recollect the various amounts at which that debt has been estimated by gentlemen of the whig party on this floor. And all would recollect that in the report of the late secretary of the treasury, a peculiarly striking illustration was taken to swell the amount of debt; that was, including expenditures that were to be incurred, and a balance that was to be raised for the purpose of being kept in the treasury. He (Mr. A.) could conceive of no other method of ascertaining the debt existing at the closing in of the present administration except by the treasury notes actually outstanding. The treasury notes outstanding on the 3d March last, if he recollected were a little upwards of five millions of dollars. Had that debt been paid by the present administration? Mr. A. here proceeded to contend, by reference to figures, that the present administration, instead of having paid off this sum, had increased it to millions. The only debt which was left to him had increased that debt to this sum of seven millions of treasury notes and about five and a half millions of loan making a total of twelve and a half million of dollars.

Something also had been said in the course of the evening in relation to the expenditure of the sum of thirty-nine millions yearly during Mr. Van Buren's administration. Now, there were documents which could be referred to, and which would show the amount of expenditures proper of that administration for each and every year. This was not a mere computation, but a statement derived from actual facts, as they were known to exist—for on this point the past at least was secure. It could be demonstrated by figures what these expenditures were. Mr. A. then proceeded to draw a parallel between the expenditures of Mr. Van Buren's administration and those of the present administration, drawing strong deductions in favor of the economy of the former, and eulogizing the plaus of reduction which, Mr. A. said were in successful operation, and contrasting them with the plans and propositions of the present "reforming administration."

It had been said that the expenditures which had been incurred were attributable, in part, to the votes of the Van Buren party. Was that the fact? Did the Van Buren party cause the vast expenditures of money attendant on the especial session—a session which that party regarded as having been so unnecessarily called? Mr. A. here said, "No," and, "that the whigs had held power was extended, and, though but time was sometimes measured by the lapse of events as well as of years, or months, or days. And the time had been long enough to hold an extra session; and, lessons of misrule had been hurried upon the brief period of time which, ordinarily speaking, years could beget. It was, however, brought forth. Mr. A. then alluded to the results of late elections, remarking that these results must have taught the most obtuse that victory had returned to its accustomed standard, and that the glorious democratic banner, temporarily stricken down, now floated over the land in triumph upon every breeze. But to come more immediately to the subject before the house. The sole question was, as he conceived, should the object of a tariff be to raise revenue or to afford protection? That, he considered, was the only question involved in the issue before the house, and he was permitted to say that those who suggested that the doctrine of free trade were designed for the exclusive benefit of the south did injustice to those expansive, enlarged, and liberal doctrines.

For his own part, he considered that these doctrines were well calculated to open the eyes of the portions of the union; he conceived them calculated, he would not say to protect—but because that word had been so much misused—to give free scope to industry, and to encourage every class of society. They were calculated to prevent special legislation for special interests, and to prevent the enactment of laws that he regarded as their great enemy.

Reference had been made to the state which in her part represented—made, too, in a somewhat unkind manner—by a gentleman from New York and a gentleman from Vermont. This reference he thought recalled for. The legislature of the state of New York, at various occasions, passed resolutions expressive of their opposition to the question of constitutionality and inexpediency of a protective tariff—resolutions couched in strong language. Those resolutions emanated from representatives who expressed the opinion of a large majority of the people, and that state, the seat of the great city of New York, though sterile in soil, had nevertheless a large mass of territory containing probably as much grain, corn, comfort, intelligence, competency, and education as universally diffused as any other section of country, of similar extent, in the United States. But he recalled that they understood their own interests, and did not need to be reminded of the conduct of Vermont from New York or Vermont. The gentleman from Vermont (Mr. Stark) had said the people of New Hampshire had been long in a bad school. Well, they had not been educated in the anti-masonic school, nor in the national republic American system school, nor did (Mr. A.) conceive that an enlarged patriotism consisted in applying the torch of the incendiary to the glorious temple of our union.

Whether he represented the interests of his constituents or not was a matter between him and them; but he believed that he had done his duty for his people, by an election held since his own, that he misrepresented his constituents, he would scorn to hold his seat. Whether that was the case with the gentleman from New York (Mr. Linn) he (Mr. A.) could not know.

He concluded by the declaration, that if the objection against this portion of the message, made in his judgment, to go to that committee which had jurisdiction of the subject, and not to any committee which was bound to look to any particular interest or any particular class.

Mr. Reynolds said for a few moments he would drop his drop into the bucket of free trade. The subject was of no importance to the country, in all its consequences. His constituents in southern Illinois believed in the principles of equality. All the taxation in the state of Illinois, under their constitution, was laid according to the distribution of property. He was prepared to say that his constituents would be willing to pay direct taxes; but this was the proper mode, and before ten years had passed we should see this government supported by direct taxation, because it was on the principle of equality. The president's message was right in one thing in discrimination, and wrong in the other. It was wrong in having certain branches of industry protected, but it was right when it went to discriminate according to the principles he had laid down—according to the property of the individuals consuming these articles. That was right, to saddle the tax on the individuals who had the most money. That was discriminating duty, and that was what ought to be discriminated. If he could demonstrate that to protect manufactures was to prostrate all equality, then he would call on them to come over and vote for equal principles. Was it right to tax ninety-nine out of one hundred individuals for the benefit of the one? No, because, you could saddle yourself without it. When you tax one man a privilege, you are obliged to make it from that man. He wanted not to depress manufactures, but to place them on the same ground with other branches of industry.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall), yesterday spoke of the glory of England. He brought up the fly, and said, "England is the most powerful nation on earth, but it is becoming so by protection? Were there then thousands of poor individuals starving for want of bread? Was that an example for us? This reminded him of the fable of the fly and bees. The fly came upon the honey, and said, "I will take this honey." The fly was poor, cold, and hungry. The bee said, "I will fly to this fly, Go hence; your profession has brought you to this condition, and we do not want to learn your business. Could not this be applied to England? One great means of England's power arose probably from doing what it had been doing—running roughshod over the poor. China is simply left, so she refused to eat opium. England was also doing so. His maxim was, "an honorable peace, or a decided war." In his state there were but two manufactures. Was it right to tax all the other people of the state for their benefit? When the working people pay the tax, and the law says that they are taxed for the benefit of the manufacturers, they would give it up, and go against the system of protection.

Mr. Arnold said he had been advised by some of his friends to speak upon this question. They had said that perhaps a speech would have some beneficial effect on him. They were afraid, by his silence at this session, that he had accumulated rather too much sin, and that he might be tempted to do so. He might get relief. He had had no idea of doing so, until he heard the ranting, raving speech of the little gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. Whitcomb), but the very facetious—he must say the ridiculous speech of the gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. Reynolds), had almost put him out of the notion of speaking; but, as the gentleman hailed originally from the same section of country from which he came, he would endeavor to answer one or two of his positions.—They had heard an extraordinary speech from the gentleman from New Hampshire. He had come up here, and he had been ranting, raving a parallel between the expenditures of this administration and those of the late administration of Mr. Van Buren. It was a most extraordinary position. Whose administration was this? Was it a whig administration? He, (Mr. Arnold), denied emphatically that it was. It had not the least tincture of whig doctrines about it. [Laughter.] No; it was the gentleman's own administration; it had merely changed hands. It was true, the people thought it was a whig administration, and they had heard Van Buren from power with scorn, contempt and indignation—more so, perhaps, than any man was ever hurled from the presidential chair; and there the matter ended. He had thought they had effected a revolution; the great mass of the people through the country had thought so. But the whigs had not been so successful in their plans, and, taking the lamented Harrison from us, had thrown this government instantaneously, at the moment of that venerable patriot's decease, into the hands of modern democracy again; and when a whig congress had been paralyzed in every effort by the executive, who had been elected by modern democracy, every hand modern democracy rises here and runs a parallel between the expenditures of Van Buren's administration and the administration of John Tyler, who was a worse loco foco than Van Buren! It was most extraordinary. Could a man listen to it with patience? No; sick as he was, he could not. [Laughter.] They, (the whigs), were not accountable, and did not intend to be, to this administration. The gentleman talked about a revolution. Yes; there had been a revolution, and one that this country would long feel, which began at the day of the demise of William Henry Harrison, whom they had elected. Were they accountable to this administration? Where was Harrison's cabinet? Only one of them was left, and he was in so questionable a shape that he had a mind to speak to him. And was that a revolution? What was there in any of the great measures of the late session that, as the gentleman told them had been condemned? He knew, from the indications there were in the public prints, that they who were the whig party proper on this floor were to be paralyzed at the white house. He knew that when they came here they were to be hardly tolerated in this house; that there would be an attempt to ride over them roughshod; and they had this day witnessed the beginning of that attempt from the great, lofty and gigantic state of New Hampshire.

As the gentleman from New Hampshire had taken such hasty offence at what the gentleman from Vermont had said, he (Mr. Arnold) could do him the favor to give him his opinion of New Hampshire—of the natural, moral and political state of New Hampshire. He should give his opinion on all these heads. He was not a native of New Hampshire, but he was left here were hardly to be tolerated this session, and they had seen the beginning of it this morning. They had seen it held out in the official paper here—he called it the official; to be sure there was a little split apparently on the subject of the "fiscally;" but on all other things he looked on the Globe as the more official organ of the whig party. The Herald, and that had been twitting them, and telling them how modest the great whig party were who had passed the "sag rule;" that they felt the rebuke the people had given them. He would teach the Globe, if this life was spared, before this session closed, how much he despised them, and how much he had of his opinion since the called session. The modern democracy was perfectly intoxicated at its apparent success at the recent elections at the east, the west, north and south; and were coming here and giving notice that they would repeal this bill and that.—Beautiful indeed! A revolution! [Laughter.] What people were the authors of this revolution? They were the "one hour rule!" Did the people want to hear six or eight hour speeches here at the called session, when the nation was bowed down and mourning under misery and wretchedness? Was the "one hour rule" the cause of the great revolution which they called a revolution? Was it the cause of the American people, so far as he had been with them, the intelligent part of the people, said that the "one hour rule" was a great and a glorious rule; and they hoped to see it inserted among the rules of this house as a permanent rule, because they say one hour is long enough for a man of sense to speak, and a great deal too long for a fool. It is his opinion that if that rule were put in effect, they might come to a vote on it, which they had borrowed from the democrats, that had caused this revolution? That was not original with the whigs.—The only original measure was the "one hour rule." The taking a bill out of committee originated with the modern democracy, and if that were put in effect, a revolution in this country, it was a most extraordinary state of things. What was it that had produced the revolution? Was it the distribution bill? That had not yet gone into effect. Was it the bankrupt law? that law of humanity in favor of the poor, over modern democracy, and so many reconcile tears, and which, I am sure you will, and every thing from him, for the relief of an unfortunate and honest poor man—for he must be honest before he can take the benefit of this law, which was a law of humanity, of kindness and gentleness? Could it be that the people had been revolutionized on account of this law? It was not so. Modern democracy may cease to laugh on this subject. The revolution of which they speak is all imagination. It had been created by the apathy of the whigs—by the smoke from the artillery at the other end of the avenue.—The iron guns, which the whigs had mounted and charged, had been turned upon them.

He intended to have stopped this debate until the question could have come up fairly on the remodification of the tariff, but on the question of reference the whole matter had been opened, and they had gone on into the merits of Van Buren's administration and Tyler's administration; and the modern democracy were railing at Tyler's administration! That was the greatest blunder that he had heard; that the whigs were to be held accountable for this administration! Harrison was going to turn out the whigs and restore Van Buren's administration, while he allowed the clever fellows to remain in office. He (Mr. A.) was against proscription. He had said here and everywhere that he was opposed to it.—His district would tell what his feelings were. But the American people expected that the dishonest and incompetent part of the office-holders were to be turned out. And what was the unquestioned fact? Tyler had not only kept in office some who were considered most dishonest, but worse than that, the very dishonest knave that the sound patriot Harrison, who never removed an officer without cause, had put out of office, John Tyler, this modern locofoco, had kept in office, and he had been a modern locofocoism getting up, and telling us, "Justify your administration!"

He had thought that this system of burning treasury buildings would be stopped, but how would it be if Tyler kept in office these very rogues. Tyler had not only kept in office the wicked men, but he had kept General Harrison, who was never known to do any man injustice on the face of the earth, had turned out, Tyler had reinstated. And now the gentleman from New Hampshire says "your administration is so extravagant!" Should he (Mr. Arnold) sit by and hear these things said, and not contradict them and let the country know the truth? He would not do it. The country should know the length, breadth and height of Tyler's wickedness. He had nothing to ask of him. We had asked to have a modern locofoco, who just before the close of Mr. Van Buren's administration whopped about and became a Van Buren man, removed from office, and a man much more competent, whom every high member from the state recommended, to be appointed in his stead, but John Tyler and his secretary of state, between them, had kept in office the former incumbent against the unanimous recommendation of every high member from Tennessee.

If these locofoco principles were to be carried out, Van Buren might as well have done it as any one; and he should infinitely have preferred this to its being done by Tyler. When a gentleman "pitches and cooes," to use a homely phrase, as the gentleman from New Hampshire has done to-day, he ought to remember that all his efforts fall on the devoted head of Van Buren. Now, he acknowledged if there was a revolution—if, on account of the one-hour rule, or the mode of taking bills out of the committee, the American people had performed this great revolution against the whig party, and put the modern democracy in that place, and the whig party in the place of self-government. It was inconsistent with common sense. Why had not "petitiot Allen," with twenty-five thousand votes against him in Ohio, resigned his seat? Did the senators from Ohio regard the voice of the American people? No. Did the modern democracy regard the people? No. How was it at all decided? So it was in Ohio. How was it in Connecticut? Majority after majority had gone against the Connecticut senator. Did he resign? He called on men to act up to their professions.—Had Mr. Smith, of Connecticut resigned? No. How was it with Williams, of Maine? He held on to the whig party test "like yonder possum." (He wished this homely simile to be excused, for it was just suited to the subject.) How was it with Mouton from Louisiana?

The speaker said it was not in order to speak of senators by their names.

Mr. Arnold said he did not know that those he had spoken of were in the senate; they might be in the country—that they would have done it at least in the case of Tennessee? (He here referred to the inconsistencies of the "modern democracy" in that state.) That was his great objection to modern democracy; they went for the party, and not for the country. They never had, and never would present the glorious, the heroic spectacle of Harrison's cabinet. He looked at them as a bright, a glorious, a sunny light to this nation, they were round ready and willing, for the sake of their country, to lay down their offices—rich offices, too—at a salary of $6,000 per year. When did modern democracy ever give up an office? When she was choked off, and not otherwise. [Laughter.] [He here further referred to the course of modern democracy in Tennessee.]

He did not intend to discuss the question of the tariff at present. He merely wanted to convert the demagogical cant of the gentleman from New Hampshire. What was New Hampshire, that she should furnish a lever in politics, that must get up here and dictate to what committee this reference should be made? What was New Hampshire? A most barren and sterile piece of earth. He never could think of New Hampshire without thinking of black chilly rocks, of the screeching owl and prowling wolf.—Was she advancing in population? He believed not. She was the only state in the union that had taken a retrograde movement; or, at least, she advanced in population less than any other state, and was in favor of free trade! He would like to know what New Hampshire had to trade out. [Laughter.] On politics; that was all; it had been her trade for years.—He was told there was one manufacturing town in the state, and that was in the gentleman's district—he did not know but the very residence of the gentleman—that gave a large majority against him.—He would like to know if this was so.

Mr. Aberton said there was a great number of manufacturing towns in his state; they were interspersed almost throughout the whole state. The state was as much interested in manufacturing as any portion of the country. In some of the manufacturing towns there were majorities for him, and in some, against him. He said that there had been for a few years past a majority against him, not of five or six hundred, as had been intimated, but of from less than one hundred to two hundred, and perhaps a little upward. And for four or five years in succession, there had also been large majorities in his favor.

Mr. Arnold inquired whether that was recently? Mr. Aberton replied that it was within eight or ten years, and since the manufacturing establishments had sprung up there.

Mr. Arnold thought the gentleman's explanation rendered his position still more awkward. He had said his state was dotted all over with manufactories, and yet had gone for free trade! It had always appeared to him most extraordinary to hear American citizens denouncing home industry, and wanting to bring our country to dependence on France and England.

He concluded by remarking that he had been very sick, [laughter,] and had gone on longer than he had expected to have been able. But when the question came up, he would show the Globe, and modern democracy throughout the country, if his life was worth anything, that he had changed his opinion, and that the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. J. C. Johnson) had felt it his duty, in the organization of the house, to have moved the adoption of the rules of a (self-styled) democratic congress. He (Mr. A.) had voted against him; he would have the "one hour rule" voted up again; and if gentlemen with their own rule had taken bills out of committee of the whole, he would see how they would now go. Let them come forward with their bills to repeal the bankrupt law and the distribution bill, before it went into effect, and then let the people how these measures would ruin the country.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the gentleman from Maryland, stating that the sixth census, or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, has been completed, and accompanied by a printed copy of the said census; as also a particular census of all pensioners of the United States, with their names, ages, and residences. The statistics and other matters of information which the gentleman from the census the secretary states are yet in progress.

Ordered, That the said letter, census and accompanying papers do lie on the table; and that the same number of copies of the papers in manuscript be printed, as have been directed by law to be printed of the census.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the house adjourned.

MONDAY, DEC. 27. Mr. Jeremiah Brown appeared in his seat.

The following committee was announced by the speaker:

Committee on the part of the house to arrange the placing of the statue in the Capitol.—Messrs. Green, of New Hampshire; P. Knapp, of Maryland; Paulding, of Ohio; C. J. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania; and Mallory, of Virginia. [Messrs. Preston, of South Carolina, King, of Alabama, and Cheate, of Massachusetts, are the committee on the part of the senate.]

The debate on the reference of the tariff was then continued by Mr. Weller, who expressed himself in favor of referring the subject to the committee on ways and means and addressed the house for nearly an hour.

Mr. C. H. Williams, of Tennessee, followed and spoke for about half an hour taking the ground, that a high protective tariff was now entertained by nobody on the floor of congress. He denounced the president and called for greater economy and retrenchment.

Mr. Henson, of Massachusetts, then addressed the house in a long and argumentative speech, supporting its reference to the committee on manufactures and at 3 o'clock, gave way to a motion for adjournment, and the house adjourned.

TUESDAY, DEC. 28. The house having met, Mr. Hudson, resumed, and concluded his remarks.

Mr. Payne, of Alabama, then took the floor, and maintained that the government had not the power to discriminate for the purpose of protection.

Mr. Backs, of New Hampshire, followed and defended his state against the remarks of Mr. Arnold, and was succeeded by Mr. Eastman, of N. H. who also advocated the reference to the committee of ways and means and was continuing, when on motion, the house adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 29. Mr. Giddings, from the committee of claims, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of claims be authorized to continue in employment their clerk, at the compensation hereof to him.

Mr. Cave Johnson moved to amend the resolution by inserting the words "during the session of congress." And the question on the amendment was then taken, and the amendment was affirmative; yeas 90, nays 61, and the amendment was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. Morron, from the committee on the public lands, reported a bill further to extend the time for issuing military land warrants to the officers and soldiers of the revolutionary army; which bill was read the first and second time, and committed to a committee of the whole house to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. J. Q. Adams, it was ordered that the messages of the president referred at the last session to the committee on foreign relations, and not reported on by them, be referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

Mr. Cushing, from the committee on foreign affairs, made a report upon the petition for indemnity for spoiliations prior to 1800, accompanied by a bill to provide for the satisfaction of claims due to certain American citizens for spoiliations committed on their country prior to the 31st day of July, 1801, which bill was read the first and second time, and committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

On motion of Mr. Pope, the postmaster general was requested to furnish the house with a statement of the amount paid for the use of rail roads and other public means in transporting the public mails to the different parts and places in the United States directed by law.

Mr. Fillmore, proposed to go into committee of the whole on the state of the union, the secretary of the treasury having that morning communicated the fact of there being an immediate deficit in the treasury to the amount of $260,000.

Objections having been made, Mr. Sturdy desired to know when a report might be expected from the select committee on the currency.

Mr. Cushing, in answer, said the gentleman a definition of the committee would facilitate the action of the committee by the reference of the president's message, which has not yet been done. [Laughter.]

The house then resumed the consideration of the amendment offered by Mr. Reil, to the amendment offered by Mr. Adams to Mr. Fillmore's motion to refer the tariff to the committee on manufactures.

Mr. Eastman, resumed and concluded his remarks.

Mr. Meriwether, of Georgia, then took the floor, and denounced the system of speaking about every thing but the question. He defended the whigs, and at 4 o'clock, gave way for a motion to adjourn, previous to which,

Mr. Lowell asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill providing for the settlement of the claims of the state of Maine for the services of her militia.

The bill, having been read twice by its title, was referred to the committee on military affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Cushing made the following motions:

That the message of the president of the United States of the 9th of March, 1840, concerning tonnage duties on Spanish vessels, be referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

That the message of the president of the United States of the 31st of December, 1839, concerning French vessels from Guinea to the United States, be referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

And they were accordingly; and the house adjourned.

CHRONICLE.

ADRIEN IN RUINS. A fire broke out on Monday night, in Adrien, which destroyed a large portion of that enterprising village. It commenced in Crutenden's grocery, in which a keg of powder exploded. There were thirty sufferers, and the loss is estimated at $40,000. [Detroit Daily Ad.]

ANTHRACITE COAL TRADE. The immense value of the anthracite coal trade of Pennsylvania may be seen in the fact that the amount mined and sent to market this year will exceed 1,000,000 tons, worth in the market $5,000,000. In 1829 the quantity was estimated at 400,000 tons, and then only 355 tons. It has been steadily increasing during the last 20 years, until it has at length reached 1,000,000 tons.

The following is the amount shipped from the several mining districts:

Schuykill	557,157 tons
Monaca Chalk	119,127 do.
Lackawanna	100,000 do.
Wyoming, about	47,000 do.
Pinegrove	25,000 do.
Shanokin	21,463 do.
Lyken's Valley	1,000 do.

We have at length reached a million of tons. This amount would have been greatly increased had it not been for several accidents. Next year 1,200,000 may be mined and sent to market. [Harrisburg Chron.]

BANK STOCK IN SOME OF THE WESTERN COUNTIES OF MARYLAND continues to maintain its value, notwithstanding the depression in other quarters. For instance, Hagerstown bank stock is selling at $26 1/2 per share for $25 paid in; the Farmers' and Mechanics' bank of Frederick county sells readily at from 10 to 20 per cent. above par; and Westminster bank stock sells at $18 per share for $25 paid in.

BANK PROFITS AND BANK SUSPENSIONS. Within the brief space of the 11th November, 1841, the state of North Carolina has received from the Bank of the State $181,299; from the Bank of Cape Fear $32,661. Individuals have received from the Bank of the State, on 30,000 shares $85,250, from the Bank of Cape Fear, on 10,000 shares, $17,250, making the sum now of $102,500. They have divided as profits, among stockholders, and all the time in a state of suspension. [North Carolina.]

BOSTON AND ALBANY RAIL ROAD. The chain of rail road between Boston and Albany, N. Y. is at length entirely completed, and on Dec. 30, two locomotives ran from New York to Albany. The undertaking promises to yield immense advantages to both states.

BRIG CREOLE.—Dates of the 7th December, from Nassau, state that Capt. Ensor has recovered so far, as to leave for New Orleans. Two of the mutineers had died in jail from their wounds. The following is the list of the names of the slaves and the amount of the insurance:

Thos. McCargo, in the Orleans Insurance Co.	$20,000
do do Merchants' do	10,000
Laupkin & Lockett do Farmers' do	20,000
do do Merchants' do	10,000
Johnson & Apperson do Ocean do	10,000
John Hazen, do do	6,250
Charles Hatcher, do do	3,300

The following are transcripts from the policies of insurance issued from each office, sums and numbers omitted.

From the Ocean's Policy.—"On slaves valued as per list attached to application 8—against all risks, and chiefly against that of foreign incursions; warranted free from elopement, insurance and natural death." From the Farmers' Policy.—"On slaves valued as per application 6. The insurers are not liable for suicide, natural death, desertion or injury; but to take the risk of interference by foreign governments or their agents."

Merchants' Policy.—"The company not liable for suicide, desertion or natural death; but liable for risk of embezzlement, desertion or seizure by foreign powers. The policyholders have refused to pay in cash. Three or four of the most distinguished and gentlemanly of New Orleans have offered to undertake the conduct of suits against the in, for 5 per cent. if the money shall be recovered, or nothing if unsuccessful."

The schlr. Francis Goethorn, which had arrived at Kingston, Jamaica, from Nassau, brought 52 colored emigrants, including probably some of the slaves who were taken from it by the Creole.

The passengers and crew have published a protest giving a minute detail of the circumstances dated from New Orleans Dec. 7.

CHRISTMAS DAY, in the afternoon, in the city of Philadelphia, Chestnut street was crowded with a dense mass of numerous beings. The entire population of the outer districts seemed gathered there, eager to catch a glimpse at the ship windows, and enjoying the excitement of the moving panorama. It is estimated that there were 40,000 persons on Chestnut street most of the afternoon.

DEMOLISH SWAMP CANAL. An abstract has been published in the Northern Herald of the canal which has been passed through the Demer Swamp canal. For the year ending on the 30th September, 1841, amounting to $1,237,755, six per cent. of which is supposed to be the value of the productions of Virginia, and the residue belonging to North Carolina. The value of the merchandise passing in the same period is stated at $626,115, divided between the two states in the same proportion as the produce.

DIVIDENDS. The Petersburg rail road company have declared a dividend of 3 per cent. for the first six months. The Farmers' bank and the Marine and Fire Insurance bank, both of Savannah, have recently declared a dividend of 1 per cent. for the last 6 months.

FLORIDA. Colonel Riley returned to Plattska on the 21st, from his expedition to the head waters of the St. John's river, discovered the Indians, and has just returned to his visit to the Everglades, and has found any traces of Indians. [Savannah Republican.]

GREAT FIRE AT WATERTOWN. We learn from the Jeffersonian extra, that the large woollen factory, owned and occupied by the Black River woollen company, in Watertown, was destroyed by fire on the morning of the 23d inst. Loss estimated at $3,000 to $26,000; insured only for $11,000 of one of the Boston offices.

THE BOSTON LEAGUE. We have already published the organization of a society established in this city under the above appellation, and now acting in concert with branches in several states.

An auxiliary branch of this truly national association is about to be formed for the state of New York. A convention met at the hall of the American Institute, in the principal purpose of adopting a constitution and by-laws, and we sincerely hope that a full attendance may be given to this home concern by all our citizens, whether naturalized or native born, who are interested in the rights of our native and naturalized citizens.

It is time that quibbling jobbers among ourselves, least one part or section of the country should get ahead of the others. A unity of American feeling and true Americanism, from our parliaments, is that is wanted. This is the spirit of the true protection, of laborers, mechanics and manufacturers, ask for, and a home league, reaching throughout the country, moving with the sentiment, united interest, all interests in favor of our home union, and independence, is one which surely all Americans should prize.

[N. Y. American.]

A JUDGE CONVICTED. The trial of Samuel McHenry, late chief justice of Harrison county, Texas, took place on the 10th inst. in the district court for the parish of Natchitoches. Judge Campbell presiding. The charge against the prisoner was that he with several others named in the indictment, (two or three of whom were in the year ago, and are now in the penitentiary), had feloniously seized from the parish of Natchitoches, into Texas, negro slaves, two horses, and a bride and saddle, the property of Mr. Anthony, of that parish. The jury, after ten minutes deliberation, brought in a verdict against the prisoner, and the others named in the indictment, for the crime of kidnapping. The verdict for the young negro. The effect upon her reputation cannot but prove injurious.

JUDICIAL DECISION. At the sitting of the Philadelphia court of general sessions on Dec. 23, the judges delivered their opinions on the motion to quash the presentment of the grand jury against the policy of the United States bank and others. They were unanimous in the opinion that the presentment should be quashed. Each of the three judges delivered a separate opinion.

LANDING OF THE FLIGHTERS. The 22d inst. anniversary was celebrated by the Pilgrim society of Plymouth on December 23. The New England society at N. York city also celebrated the day, being its 37th annual meeting.

MARRIAGE LICENSES. A petition has been presented to the legislature of Tennessee, praying that the marriage fee may be reduced. The petition represents the state of Tennessee as an unnatural, and quotes Vattel's Laws of Nations to prove that the marriage in a civil society can occupy a permanent place in society. The facts that the people are disappointed in not getting a national bank, that money is hard, that there is a heavy tax on the poor, and that the poor are suffering, (the "thief") is obliged to gather chestnuts to pay for his marriage license, are urged as reasons why the marriage fee should be reduced. The petitioners also pray that premium should be granted to those who are industrious in study, and also to the author of the best book "on moral character" tending to create a general taste for reading. [Tennessean.]

MISADVENTURES. The rev. James Carr Richmond, a clergyman of the Episcopal denomination, is about to sail on a visit to the interior of Africa, to revive the Christian worship in the city of Constantine.

The New Haven and New London papers contain particulars of the death of the rev. Henry C. Mitchell, and his going out to the interior of Africa. Mr. Mitchell was a native of Groton, Connecticut, and was ordained last fall as a missionary among the Nestorians of Eastern Asia, soon after he married Miss Richards, of New Haven, and embarked with her for Africa. His place he arrived some time in the spring. In August the youthful pair started from Beyrout for the interior, and after travelling through that desert country for nearly a year, Mr. Mitchell, who was a devoted and zealous man, fatigues and privations of the journey, after a week's only one day, and was buried in the sands by the Kurds, without shroud or coffin. Mrs. Mitchell was seized by a kind of typhoid fever, and, after surviving the loss but a few days. It is a most melancholy case, and the fate of both the sufferer will be mourned by every one who knew them. Mr. Mitchell was a young man, of uncommon worth and fine talents, and has left a mother and sisters, whose bereavement may be imagined, but can never be described. The wife was very young, and is represented as every way fitted to be a lady in womanhood, and of the most devoted affection to her husband, and the cause in which they had engaged.

THE MISSOURI PENITENTIARY was destroyed by fire on the night of November 26. The loss is estimated at $10,000. The Jeffersonian says—"When it was discovered that it proceeded from the fourth story centre building of the penitentiary, many horrible phantasies seized upon the minds of the people, and the cause in lingering torments. At a distance the dying tortured groans of upwards of one hundred poor wretches, injured in their dungeon cells, were in imagination distinguished from the cries of the poor and the suffering. As the flames continued to ascend to the skies, and spread their red glare in still more horrible forms, and it was ascertained that every convict had been released from his cell and turned into the prison, another panic ensued. It was the fear of a general massacre, at that dead hour of the night when the beasts of the forest had gone to their lair and all nature was resting in the peaceful slumber of the night. The fire, steadily made on the quarter master general for a supply of arms, and our citizens turned out to the rescue with alacrity. The cells, together with the warden's house, were saved."

AGES OF NEWSPAPERS. It appears from a compilation of Mr. P. L. Simmonds, of Rochester, that the oldest existing London papers are the English Chronicle, or Whitehall Evening Post, which was started in 1774; the Morning Chronicle, 1761; and the Morning Chronicle, 1769. The oldest American papers are the Bostonian, published at Stan-ford, 1635; the Ipswich Journal, 1737; Bath Journal, 1742; Birmingham Gazette, 1741; Chester Courant, 1733; Darby Mercury, 1742. The oldest newspaper in the United States is the Pennsylvania Letter, which was commenced in 1747. In Scotland, the Edinburgh Evening Courant, is the oldest paper, having been published in 1705. [Cork Reporter.]

POPULATION OF IRELAND. According to the census of the population of Ireland, taken in August last, the whole number of the population was 8,274,715; of whom 7,965,336 were of the Roman Catholic faith, and 1,216,379 of different Protestant sects. In the year 1715, the population of Ireland numbered 3,010,219, sons of whom 1,070,000 were of the Roman Catholic faith, and 1,940,219 Protestants; so that in the period of 120 years the population of that country has increased nearly five fold.

PRESIDENT. Many of the papers in the interior of Pennsylvania are out for James Buchanan for the next Presidency.

THE ROCHESTER AQUEDUCT. The New York Sun says that "this is probably as splendid a work of the kind, extent and execution considered, as any in the union. It is a long wall, 100 feet high, and 100 feet long, and from rear to front, 441 feet. It is 125 feet high at the bottom of the piers to the top of the coping, and rests on a rock foundation in the bed of the Genesee river. It is six piers and two abutments, each 75 feet long, 10 feet wide, and five feet high to the coping, and 10 feet wide. It has seven circular arches resting on the piers and abutments, each 52 feet span, 10 feet rise, 63 feet long. It is 10 feet thick at the crown, and 3 feet thick at the spring line. The span of the arches, and filling up the inside space between them, are each 62 feet long, 8 feet 3 inches high."

TENNESSEE. The state of Tennessee has subscribed to the various internal improvement companies within her limits for $100,000, and has issued her bonds on this subscription to the amount of $100,000. The state has been granted to twenty-eight companies, of which sixteen have commenced the construction of roads. Six companies have completed their roads, and those of nine others are nearly completed. The state is making great undertakings by the other companies is very uncertain.

Legislature. On the 7th December, after a session of five days, spent in vain efforts to carry into execution the joint resolution of the two houses for calling the U. S. States senators, the convention adjourned sine die. The senators have been introduced into the house, having in view the division of the state and the formation of a new one.

TEXAS. At last some severe censures were expressed in congress against president Lamar for filling up Texas with Indians, and for the capture of Santa Fe. Accounts from Mexico confirm the capture of its advance guard of 100 men by the Mexicans.

TOLLS ON THE CANALS. The following comparative statement of tolls received on the New York canals, since the year 1820, when the Erie canal was first opened to toll, will be read with interest.

Year.	Tolls received, Yrs.	Total, 1820-41.
1820	55,537 $4 18 31	1,228,801
1821	14,388 $7 18 29	1,228,483
1822	40,400 $7 16 26	1,463,715
1823	122,928 $8 18 29	1,643,715

ADDRESS OF GEN. JAMES TALLMADGE before the American Institute.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS.

CHRONICLE.

CONGRESS.

In the house of representatives, the series of resolutions offered by Mr. Fillmore was finally disposed of on Monday last. The subject of discrimination was referred to the committee on manufactures. In the senate, the exchequer scheme continues to be the unfinished business of debate. On Thursday, Mr. Woodbury advocated its reference to a select committee, after which, a motion for adjournment over to Monday next, prevailed.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

CUBA.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Express at Havana, December 15, says: On the 9th instant the Havana published an order for the suppression of eleven of the nineteen monasteries existing in the island, and sequestration for the benefit of the state of the entire church property, excepting that of the nunneries, amounting to seven millions. For the support of the monks he has assigned them a small pension, and also a fixed sum to be paid annually by the state to different churches for the maintenance of religious worship. The begging orders are prohibited asking alms in the street, as they would thereby have an advantage over the other orders whose property has been sequestrated. Those monks who secularize are to have a pension one-fourth greater than those who retain their habit. All the sacred vessels are to be distributed among the poor churches. Of these nineteen convents, seven are in the city, containing one hundred and thirty-four monks and novices. But three convents are left, and, as their rents are taken away, most of the monks and all the novices will secularize. Another measure in agitation by our present intendant is a reduction of the tariff. He has appointed a commission to take the subject into consideration, and has invited, through the press, the merchants and all who are interested in the subject to address him their views. It is rumored that he has already decided on the abolition of duties on exports. These alterations, however, will not probably go into operation before the middle and perhaps end of next year.

MEXICO.

VESSELS OF WAR. The N. Y. American of Jan. 3 says, that two fine schooners, which, for some days, have been laying off Jersey city, apparently intended for revenue cutters, and destined for Mexico, were detained yesterday by order of the government on the ground of being designed for vessels of war, and fitted armed, manned and equipped contrary to the statute, in such cases made and provided.

The revenue cutter was directed to anchor between them, and forbid their departure. The vessels are commanded, the one by capt. Howard, who took out one of the steamships of war built here last year for Mexico, the other by capt. Martin.

It is in the case of these steamships and the Russian frigate Kamshatka, these schooners had not been armed and manned, they would not have been in jeopardy of the law; but each of these vessels has a heavy Paishan gun amidships, and its complement of cannonade, together with a crew of fifty men.

The vessels were built by Bell & Brown, and cost $65,000. We presume the case will be immediately carried to the district court of the U. States.

TEXAS.

Letters from the far west confirm the rumors of the capture of the army sent for the invasion of the province of Santa Fe. The prisoners have been sent towards the seat of the Mexican government and their fate is yet unknown. The American consul at Santa Fe has left his post and arrived in Missouri.

W. FORWARD, secr. of the treasury.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

The Bangor Whig states that Maj. Graham, who has been charged with the arduous service of surveying the northeastern boundary line, having closed the survey for the winter, passed through that city on the 28th ult. on his way to Augusta, and thence to Washington.

He has had during the last summer about one hundred men in his employ. The trees upon the line have been removed, on the tops of the hills to a space of about one hundred feet, and lessening in width down the valleys, and the whole line cleared and bushed. The survey has been continued a few miles above the Grand Falls, very near which the line is found to run. The old line has been found very crooked, and the new running, with the straight line, takes in several houses in the country below Grand Falls, and in some instances portions of the cleared fields of the farmers there. Some of them would, at times, get exasperated at these proceedings, but most of them were rather calm. About sixty miles of the line, through an unbroken forest, still remains to be surveyed.

THE ARMY.

Major general Gaines has been authorized to remain in Washington, having public duties and private interests requiring his attention for two months from the 23d December, 1841. During the temporary absence of Gen. Gaines, the command of the western division is devolved on brig. Gen. Atkinson, the officer next in rank therein. His head quarters are at Jefferson Barracks.

In addition to the above, there are seven small schooners on the coast of Florida, under the command of Lieut. J. T. McLaughlin, co-operating with the army in its efforts to restore peace to that disturbed frontier.

The EXPLODING EXPEDITION, under the command of Lieut. Wilkes, consisting of the sloops Vincennes and Peacock, and the brig Porpoise, is still employed in that service, but is expected to return to the United States in the course of the ensuing summer.

[Nat. Intel.]

The U. S. frigate United States, Captain Armstrong, being the broad pendant of Commodore Jones, dropped down to Hampton Roads, on December 31st, and if the wind continue favorable, would proceed to sea on the morrow. She is destined for the Pacific, but will touch at Rio de Janeiro, and carries out the hon. Jon. S. Pendleton charge d'affaires to the republic of Chili.

The U. S. brig Dolphin arrived at New York on Dec. 31, from Cartagena.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT, by and with the advice and consent of the senate.

Richard S. Finckney, to be a commander in the navy, from the 8th Sept. 1841, to take rank next after commander D. G. Farragut.

[Navy department, 4th January, 1842.]

The board of naval surgeons recently convened at Philadelphia, for the examination of assistant surgeons for promotion, and of candidates for appointment as assistant surgeons, has adjourned sine die.

Assistant surgeon A. J. Wedderburn was passed for promotion.

The following is a list of the candidates reported for appointment as assistant surgeons in the order in which they stand:

1. Morris B. Beck, of Virginia.
2. J. Francis Luckernan, of Massachusetts.
3. Oscar B. Baxter, of New Carolina.
4. Lewis J. Williams, of Maryland, and
5. Marius Duvall, of Maryland.

STATES OF THE UNION.

RHODE ISLAND.

The New Age, of Providence, gives the following as the returns of the late election. "For the people's or the suffrage party's constitution, as it is called, freeholders 4,019, non-freeholders 7,905; and the vote was not yet all in." There are in Rhode Island less than eight thousand Freehold voters, under the present state of things; and by this result a majority will be found in favor of repudiating the charter and adopting the constitution.

tain her specie payments she has the advantage over New York of exporting two products of the soil which, as long as Europe pays in coin, represent yearly from thirty to forty millions in specie.

There is no doubt of the soundness of our banks in the aggregate. A statement of their situation lately published and which was laid before the meeting of their presidents, shows that upon comparing the amount of their cash liabilities, with the assets applicable to their payments, the situation of the banks is more favorable than it was in December, 1838, when they resumed specie payments. Their objection to resumption now, is founded upon the inability of some of them to provide the available means to meet the payment of such of their cash liabilities as may be immediately demanded of them, whilst their circulation is now only sustained by the confidence inspired by its being received at the other banks. I have already at two former sessions suggested to you the necessity of adopting measures for liquidating these weaker banks. It is now admitted on all hands that the difficulty of supporting their credit is the only obstacle in the way of the others resuming their regular course of operations. It was to relieve these institutions in their distress, and to give them time to improve their situation that the board of presidents has thought proper to advise a prolongment of the resumption one year. But whatever means they may eventually have of meeting their engagements, it is evident that their active capital is insufficient for the legitimate banking purposes. A comparative statement of their situation at the suspension of specie payments, and in the present state of their affairs, will give you an idea of what they have to hope from the prolongation of their suspension.

Two years of suspension have diminished their available means $300,000 and increased their immediate liabilities more than $780,000. Thus it is clearly seen that the evils the country is laboring under, far from being remedied by the suspension, are yearly aggravated by its continuance. Five banks now confess their inability to sustain themselves without assistance. In a year more the number will probably be doubled, for the aid demanded would considerably reduce the means of the stronger banks without restoring the others to a much healthier condition.

These institutions, which are now unable to resume will be still less able to do so hereafter. The depreciation in the value of our products and of real estate, resulting from the disorder in our currency, reacts on the port folios of the banks by diminishing the pecuniary abilities of those who are indebted to them. Already they have ceased to rely upon the confidence upon the punctual payment of their paper, they have discounted, and the amount of protested paper already considerable, cannot fail to increase in a frightful manner by a longer continuance of the suspension. Having lost the advantages of their banking privileges by the suspension, those corporations find themselves derelict of the public confidence, whilst the public are left without the facilities they had a right to expect. In January 1837 the capital of the banks which had laid before the legislature a statement of their situation amounted to $33,300,000 and their discounts and loans to $43,400,000, more than $10,000,000 beyond their capital paid in. In November last the capital paid in was $33,300,000, the accumulated profits, not divided, amounted to $39,900,000—and the discounts and loans to 45,409,000, id est $1,500,000 below the capital.

Some of the banks have expressed their desire to resume immediately and two now pay their circulation in specie; no doubt the legislature will see the necessity of sustaining the resumption, and will be enabled, by forcing all to perform the duties prescribed to them by their charters or to enter into liquidation, you will be adopting the only effectual means to rid the country of institutions destitute of banking means and who thereby paralyse the action of the others whilst they keep their paper in circulation. I can give you no other way to put an end to the reprehensible and illegal solidarity which is attempted to be established between banks that cannot fulfil their engagements and banks for which the state has pledged its credit and its faith. Resumption must press heavily upon the community for a while, but this pressure cannot be avoided. We cannot permit the value of our property to be always represented by a paper money furnished by banks which do not pay their debts. A resumption must take place sooner or later and it cannot take place without a momentary shock. While we delay this crisis, we weaken our power of resistance, and we increase its intensity by the additional number of institutions that must succumb.

[CRIMINAL LAWS.]

The numerous frauds committed against different banks in this city, shew the insufficiency of our penal laws against this species of crime. The act of February 10th, 1821, reaches the officers and servants of the banks who shall have unlawfully converted to their use its funds, or those who have added to convert this offence; but the law does not extend to those who obtain money by drawing checks on banks where they have no funds; they cannot be punished unless they are accomplices of the officers or clerks of the institution, and of this it is almost impossible to obtain sufficient proof. Crimes of this kind are during your absence, but the law does not extend to those to the amount of some hundred thousands of dollars; and for protection for the future they look to your legislation.

The penalty for the crime of bigamy is far too lenient, a fine of not more than five hundred dollars, and imprisonment not longer than two years, is a punishment no ways commensurate with the gravity of this offence.

The law against duelling has become a dead letter. The slight regard paid to it by juries, even when the testimony is undeniable, shews that its execution is impossible to be enforced. The law which defines its proper manner and penalties. Laws which cannot be executed should be repealed or modified. If the punishment of death were replaced by imprisonment, if the survivor and seconds were rendered jointly and severally liable for the debts of him who falls, if the guilty were besides liable for large damages to be recovered before a civil tribunal by the heirs of the deceased, the end the legislature had in view would probably be better accomplished.

[STATE LANDS.]

At the commencement of your last session I thought it my duty to lay before you some observations on the public lands to be reserved for the use of the State of colleges and primary schools. I beg you to allow me to bring them again to your consideration. A law for the sale of the school lands will probably be passed at this session of congress; if early instructions be sent to our delegation, you will be able to dispose of these lands with the consent of congress, in such a manner as to create a permanent fund for public education.

The act for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, passed at the extra session of congress, requires that you should fix the manner in which the five hundred thousand acres granted to this state within its limits, for internal improvement, should be selected.

[PUBLIC SCHOOLS.]

The gross negligence displayed by the greater part of the administrators of public schools relative to the transmission of the returns which the law requires them to make to the secretary of state, renders it impossible for you to learn the number of indigent children who receive the benefits of education, through the liberal appropriations yearly made for this object. In 1839 only eleven parents made their returns at the time fixed by law—in 1840 the number was reduced to nine. At the end of this month is the time fixed for their return, yet to this day only two have been received. The absence of all information on this important subject should convince you of how much abuse a system is susceptible, where large sums are disbursed without the legislature being able to judge of the extent of the benefits which the mass of the people derive from it.

The sums appropriated every year for the support of the public schools, prove that the legislature has the necessity of alluding to the people that degree of education necessary to fit them for our form of government, but it should not be forgotten that these appropriations are useless, unless employed so as to afford the important end for which they were designed. The present percentage is paid to our preceptors, and out of the principal cause of the want of success attendant on our system of primary instruction is, in my opinion, to be attributed to the great repugnance felt by many families to send their children at the public expense to school where there are other pupils whose parents pay for their education. I have seen only 1 tract of land for the purpose in 1832 and 1833, to which you will permit me to refer, I have explained upon what plan the primary schools of New York were established, and advised the abandonment of the plan which we have followed so long without beneficial results to substitute common schools "where the sons of the poor and of the rich man are alike admitted without any other distinction than that which depends upon themselves, establish by their application and their talents." It appears to me now that I can do no better than to repeat the same recommendation. The law passed at your last session to create schools of this kind in New Orleans, induces me to hope that you will feel the advantage of establishing them throughout the state.

[PENITENTIARY.]

A fire which happened in the penitentiary at Baton Rouge, on the 4th of last month, has occasioned a loss which it will require near ten thousand dollars to repair. An attentive examination of this establishment has convinced me that the only means of enabling it to pay the debt which the convicts, the 30,000 dollars annually costs the state, will be to employ all the prisoners in the manufacture of coarse cotton and woollen goods, which has been put in operation there within the last two years. The additional appropriation which would be required for the purchase of machinery and for the erection of the buildings would, I am confident, be repaid to the treasury within three years, by the profits of this branch of industry.

A very considerable number of old convicts are annually sent back to the penitentiary. It seems but just that those who break the force of the laws is repeated should be sentenced to a greater punishment than is incurred by a first offence.

[SLAVE TRADE.]

Twenty-four slaves convicted in Virginia of heinous crimes, but whose punishment had been commuted by being carried out of the limits of the U. S. are now in the hands of the agents of the slave trade. By the law of the 29th January, 1817, they should be sold, and the price divided between the state and the informer. As there was no informer in this case, the slaves belonged entirely to the state; and the attorney general has by my advice, postponed the sale until after the next session of the legislature. It is to be doubted whether this will induce the legislature to ordain that convict slaves whose importation is prohibited under the penalty of fine and confiscation, should after their importation be sold in the state, and thus cause the very evil from which it was the object of the law to protect fellow citizens. The opportunity now presented of making the first application of this law, allows you to correct its evil effects, by enacting that these, as well as all such others as may hereafter be imported and seized under similar circumstances, should be employed for life, under strict guard, upon the public works of the state. The men of color condemned to hard labor, the mixing of whom with the white convicts in the penitentiary seems to me, as I have already observed to you, in opposition to our institutions, could also during the term of their sentence be advantageously transferred to our public works.

[COLONIAL ARCHIVES.]

Having learned that there existed in the archives of the French government a great many manuscripts relative to the colonial history of Louisiana, I have obtained through the obliging exertions of General Cass, our minister near the court of France, the permission to have them examined and copied. One of our fellow citizens who was at Paris at that time, undertook the task, and has prepared a catalogue of the manuscripts, with a short synopsis of the contents of each. This work which has required much time and labor, will soon be laid before you. The first in date of these documents is the process verbal of taking possession, by Lassalle, in 1682, of the country to which he gave the name of Louisiana, the last is the account of the trial of the Louisianians, executed in 1760, by order of O'Reilly. Some of these papers cast a new light upon many pages of our annals, which the then government of France and Spain did not think politic to make public. It will appear, for instance, that the object of the conspiracy which O'Reilly accused it his duty to extinguish in the blood of its chiefs, was not as then proclaimed, to restore the colony to the dominion of France, but to establish a republican government under the protection of England. So that Lafreiniere and Villere were the first martyrs of American liberty, and poured out their blood in an attempt to establish a republic in Louisiana, eight years before the Declaration of Independence of 1776. As no correct history of Louisiana can be written without the aid of the information contained in those manuscripts, you will doubtless appropriate with pleasure the small sum necessary to have them copied.

A. B. ROMAN.

New Orleans, December 13th, 1831.

OHIO.

THE GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE, after the usual preliminary acknowledgements of the beneficence of divine providence, proceeds to the subject of the common schools of the state and submits to the legislature the propriety of devolving the duties of their general superintendence upon one whose exclusive business it shall be to discharge them, as was formerly the law, instead of leaving them as at present to be performed by the secretary of state. It then proceeds to the

[PUBLIC WORKS AND STATE DEBTS.]

The public works in which the interest and true glory of the state are deeply involved, have been prosecuted with as much rapidity as could have been anticipated, from a view of their condition at the time of the last session, and it is gratifying to find them pledged to the completion of the Wabash and Erie canal, within a given time, and the work being one of great importance to a neighboring state with whom a compact existed on that subject, the legislature very properly authorized the commissioners of the canal fund, to loan money for that object without restriction as to the interest on such loans. At the time of the passage of the law of the last session authorizing loans, the debts then due to contractors on all the public works were estimated at about $581,000. This debt, with a very small abatement in amount, had all accrued prior to the meeting of the legislature, and had already been $1,500,000, in the last year. The commissioners of the canal fund being limited to loans at 6 per cent, and such being then impossible to be obtained, the debt was suffered to accrue, and had to be provided for out of the resources of the present fiscal year. To discharge this debt, the legislature has authorized the treasury to borrow money without restriction as to the rate of interest on the loan. The balance of the loans authorized by law were expressly limited to the payment of interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum.

The whole amount of loans of all classes authorized the past year, was $2,100,000. The amount loaned to the canal fund, was $1,500,000. These loans, owing to the peculiar condition of the money markets both at home and abroad, have been chiefly of a temporary character; but in no instance have they been obtained at a rate of interest exceeding six per cent, although the act of the last session had expressly authorized the loan of over one million at a higher rate.

It will be perceived, for the reasons already assigned, that the debt due on the public works, for labor done during 1840, amounting on accurate ascertainment to about $600,000, and the amount necessary to complete the Wabash and Erie canal, on which the legislature had authorized the loan of about $2,523,417, have been paid during the present year, making together over $3,100,000, were of a peculiar character, and such, as in good faith, the state was bound to see promptly obtained and disbursed. The great declension in the price of state stocks, the most unquestionable character, for the first time, since we were first presented to the canal fund commissioners difficulties of the most formidable character. Permanent loans of large sums, at any reasonable rate of interest, could not be had, either in Europe or the Atlantic cities of the U. S.

Actuated by a laudable zeal to preserve unshaken the good faith of the state, the treasury so prudently maintained through every vicissitude, the credit of the commissioners, as the best that could be obtained, negotiated a loan of about $1,000,000 early in the last spring, from two of the banks of Ohio. By the terms of this loan, the notes of the banks making it were received at par, and the interest is to be paid at the state treasury, semi-annually, in hard money of the state, at the rate of six per cent. per year.

The interest on the public debt during the year has been punctually paid; and the various public works of the state have been provided with funds to carry them forward as rapidly as could be desired. The management and improvement has been completed, and is now being navigated by the canal boats, from Cincinnati to Zanesville to the Ohio at Marietta. The amount due for labor on this, is estimated at $200,000.

The Hocking canal is finished to a point within ten miles of its termination, and about twenty-five thousand dollars are supposed to be due for labor already done on the line. The cost of its entire completion is estimated at $500,000.

The debt due to contractors on the Wabash and Erie canal, for labor during the present year is estimated at about $50,000. Assuming the estimates sent to the legislature by the board of public works, during the last session, as a safe guide, it may be considered as probable, that this debt can be completed by a further expenditure of about $200,000.

The amount now due for labor on the Miami extension is estimated at $100,000 and according to the estimates furnished in the report of the board of public works, at the last session of the legislature, an additional sum of about $900,000 will be required to complete that work to its termination.

One hundred and ninety miles, including a navigable feeder, there remain eighty-eight miles, to complete the navigation from Cincinnati to the Ohio, to the Maumee bay. When this work shall be finished, there will be seven hundred and ninety-three miles of canal owned entirely by the state, and more than a hundred miles of canal, owned by individuals, constructed by companies in which the state has an interest, there will be nine hundred and fourteen miles of navigable canal, within the limits of Ohio. These enduring evidences of enterprise and wealth, traverse the state in such directions, as to draw to them the productions of the richest agriculture, the necessary articles of domestic and foreign markets to the door of the farmer and mechanic, for the products of their labor.

The amount paid into the treasury from these canals during the present year, is $484,758 18. When the route through the valleys of the Miami and Maumee shall present an unbroken communication from the mouth of the Maumee to the mouth of the Maumee and Hocking canals, now quite finished, shall be in full operation, it is obvious, that at the present rate of tolls, the receipts into the treasury will enable the legislature greatly to diminish the taxes. The amount (as I have shown) necessary to the completion of all contemplated works, now unfinished, will be comparatively little to that now existing, and that sum is necessary to enable us to use those works on which large expenditures have been made; expenditures which must be quite unproductive until the works to which they were applied shall be completed. In the existing state of the money market, the derangements of the currency, consequent embarrassment of trade, it is not probable that loans to any extent can be made during the present year by sales of stock, on fair terms, either in the Atlantic or European markets. Should any favorable change be effected by the action of congress upon the currency, during the present session of that body, its influence would be greatly felt in an increased facility given to every department of business, and to increase a sale of stock on terms more advantageous to the interest of the state, might be expected. In the present condition of the national concerns, any measures in that quarter, tending towards relief from the weight of a long oppressive and malignant energy upon the currency, are scarcely to be hoped for, and certainly not at all relied upon as a basis of legislation. Should the sound banks of this state whose charters will expire in 1843 be rechartered, or their capital be transferred to any new scheme of banking which the legislature may enact at this session, there is good reason to believe that loans might be obtained from that source, the interest on which would be payable in our own state; and thus we might be enabled, from our own capital, to carry on to final completion our own public works. Other means there are, undoubtedly, by which the sums necessary for carrying forward our public works might be raised, and which would not the legislature may devise, but the foregoing has occurred to the most safe and practicable, upon the supposition that some general scheme of banking shall be adopted at this time.

[LAND DISTRIBUTION BILL.]

In contemplating the future operations of the state in the management of her public debt, we should not forget the late act of congress making distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the states. The amount to be received by Ohio under this bill, must of course depend upon the quantity of public lands which shall be annually sold. The best estimate of the present year, probably give at least $300,000 to Ohio annually, for the next four or five years, and when the large amount of new lands held by individuals shall have been sold, the dividends to the states, may be expected to increase, with the increasing sales of the public domain. Under the act of congress, the first distribution is to be made on the first day of June.

I regret to observe a desire manifested in various ways to effect a repeal of this most salutary law; one that has so often been passed by both branches of congress, and after having been arrested by executive power, was fortunate at length, in gaining the approval of the president, the magistrate of the union. Should this law remain, and the legislature complete its public works during the next year, it cannot be doubted that the dividend coming to Ohio, and the proceeds of the canals, would in 1843 fully pay the interest of the entire public debt of the state. This would enable the next legislature to reduce the taxes now pressed heavily upon the people. All taxation for canal purposes would be unnecessary. When the public works of the state shall have been fully and fairly operating for a few years, and the receipt of tolls should be such as to enable us, without increasing the taxes, to withdraw from the payment of interest on the public debt, our dividend arising from the sale of the public lands, in part or in whole, then it would become not less the policy than the duty of the state, to devote the whole of that fund to the extinguishment of the principal of the public debt. Thus posterity, for whom it has been sometimes imagined our internal improvements were foregone, should be enabled to pay the interest of the public debt, the inheritors of an estate free from encumbrance, yielding an ample revenue for all public purposes; with nearly a thousand miles of navigable canals, traversing it in all directions, bearing to their destined markets all the products of their labor, and bringing to them in return the necessaries of life, and the luxuries which they wish, the luxuries of the civilized world.

[PENITENTIARY, HOSPITALS, &c.]

The operations of the penitentiary for the last year have been conducted in a manner creditable to the warden and to the state. Improvements in machinery and workshops during the past year, account for the fact that the nett proceeds of the institution are less for this, than the preceding year. After, however, defraying all expenses, the balance paid into the treasury the present year is $23,700. In the year 1839 the number of convicts sent from all parts of the state to the penitentiary was 172; in 1840, 137, in 1841, 121, showing, notwithstanding our population has been constantly and rapidly increasing since 1839, a decrease of crime in three years of about thirty per cent.

The institutions for the deaf and dumb, for the blind, and the lunatic asylum, have all, during the past year, given additional proofs of the wise philanthropy which dictated their establishment. I most earnestly recommend to the consideration of the legislature the propriety of erecting additional buildings connected with the lunatic asylum.

[GEOLOGICAL SURVEY, &c.]

By a former act of the legislature, a geological survey of the institutions of the state, and the result was the collection of a variety of soils and minerals from various districts in the state which for some years had remained without being classified, stored in a room for that purpose. At the last session a small appropriation was made, to be applied, under my direction, to pay the expenses of labeling and arranging these specimens for preservation here, and for distribution to the literary institutions of the state. Soon after the adjournment of the last legislature, for the purpose of executing the law, I procured the services of Dr. Mather, who has nearly completed the arrangement. The specimens designed for the use of the institutions of the state, are now ready for distribution. The arrangement of the whole will be completed by the first day of January next. The specimens intended to remain permanently at the capital are cased and labeled, and together with the apparatus belonging to the state, are now in a room prepared for that purpose, on the public grounds at the capital. In the necessity of the subject, I cannot forbear to press upon your attention the propriety of continuing on a limited and economical scale the geological survey of the state, especially in reference to the agricultural interest involved in the subject. The most productive lands in the state are well known to be declining in fertility, and the resources of such soils must either be learned by the farmer by experience, which we know in some countries has failed, or it must be made known by that science which teaches the nature and quality of soils, and which is itself but the embodied and successful experience of the laborer. It is the duty of mankind to be primarily to the subject. If by the labors of a geologist, so appointed, one bushel of wheat more than is now produced should be raised on each acre of ground in the state, occupied in the growth of that grain, it would pay the salary of such an officer, twice told, for many years to come.

[BANK CHARTERS, SUSPENSION, TARIFF.]

In connection with the subject before me to address to the legislature at its last session, I was urged upon that body the imperious necessity for action on the subject of the bank charters which will expire in January, 1843. That session, however, passed, and no definite action was had on this, the most difficult, and the most important of the subjects upon which the legislature is called upon to act. The final settlement of the question can be delayed no longer. This great duty is devolved upon the present general assembly, with a daily increasing necessity for its prompt and permanent adjustment.

The long continued suspension of specie payments by the banks of some of the middle states, by those also of the southern, western and southwestwestern states, has brought about a general suspension of specie payments in all the states of exchange, usury to a most enormous extent, embarrassment in every branch of business, with a great increase of risk attending all commercial operations. This state of things, if not speedily remedied, will take our currency, which should be a fixed measure of the price of property, itself a mere vendible commodity, more variable in value than most other common articles of traffic. It may be well questioned whether this most unhappy state of our affairs will not take place in some of the most important changes in our existing commercial relations with foreign countries. This is a question over which the state legislation has no control; the national legislature alone is competent to decide. It is filled with laborers whose daily toil brings them only a subsistence, pour into our markets every variety of manufacture, by the laws of their respective countries, the products of the soil, and the only equivalents they will receive from us in return.

Except mud and duties so onerous, as to amount to prohibition, the bread stuffs, and other productions of much the largest portion of the people of the United States, can find no markets in the ports of France or England. It is obvious that our exports, so important to us, are at all times exposed to great fluctuations; and it is equally evident, that we must in such case be liquidated by an exportation of the precious metals. This drain, which no human ingenuity can always foresee, must have the effect to disturb prices, even were our money purely metallic; should it be of the mixed kind, composed of coin, and paper convertible into coin, the latter would, whenever the former was scarce, be of sufficient value to suspend the specie payments would seem inevitable. As the laws now are, the revenues to the government of the union, must be raised by duties on foreign goods. It is within the power of congress, by a proper discrimination, in levying duties necessary for the ordinary expense of government, so to discriminate as to restrict foreign importations to narrow limits, or to open new markets to our traffic—on cotton planters, on terms of perfect reciprocity—Whether congress will exert this power, when it shall be proper, as it soon must be to reconsider the subject, is a question which cannot now be considered as settled with that certainty which is necessary to form a safe basis of state legislation. The existing state of things, and the prospect of future national legisla- tion, should be the basis of any policy, which the legislature to adopt, touching the subject of our currency. However divided the people of this state may be in their opinions, as to the form in which this question shall be settled, there cannot be a doubt but they are all united in the desire that it should be finally adjusted by the present legislature. The expiration of the term of office of four out of six members of this body, in January, 1843, demands this, not merely as a measure of sound policy, but one of absolute necessity.

The interest and business of the people demand that the capital of those banks whose charters expire in 1843, if at all consistent with other leading considerations, should be retained in that business, in some form, to be prescribed at this time. A large portion of this capital is held by owners in England. Should the capital be withdrawn from the country, the portion of it owned abroad be taken home, and no means of similar investment provided, results must follow, more disastrous to the state, than any, even in the worst times, which it has hitherto encountered. I refer the legislature to the opinions and reflections contained in the communication on this subject, and to the suggestions of the Legislature, embracing this subject, which may be to the satisfaction of the Legislature, and the suggestions which it might be desirous to submit at this time.

Stringent measures, calculated to compel a resumption by the banks of our own state, whilst those of several of the Atlantic, and all of the western and southwestern states, remain in a state of suspension; although they might accomplish much good, would undoubtedly be attended with serious results, too obvious to need comment, and with the subject of enumeration. The legal questions arising out of laws, operating upon charters previously granted, lend also to embarrass this species of legislation. How far the legislature can go, in enforcing regulations upon private corporations, where provision has not been made in the original charter, is a question of no infrequent control is a question which touches the fundamental doctrines of the social compact, and is obviously one, which, in the end, can only be decided by the judicial courts of the country. Any law which the legislature might deem it proper to adopt, with a view to accelerate, the resumption of specie payments by the banks, should most carefully avoid any infraction of charters heretofore granted, as in that event, it would not be enforced by the courts of the state.

Wisely and happily for us, the constitution has given to the representatives of the people, ample dominion over the laws of the land, bounded only by the restrictions contained in the constitution. The executive power is with us, as completely disjoined from the legislative, as that of the judicial. Our experience for the last few years, has accumulated various and many evils of a different system. Our gratitude should be unbounded to those, who, in forming our constitution, limited executive power to proper executive duties.

I unite with the whole people of the state in the fervent prayer, that the great lawgiver of the universe may so conduct your deliberations, that they may confer permanent blessings upon the state, and justly entitle yourselves to the applause and gratitude of our common country.

LEGISLATURE. In the house of representatives of the state, on the 21st instant, the following preamble and resolutions were moved by the speaker, (Mr Spalding:)

*Whereas an opinion has become somewhat prevalent that the independent states of this union will at some future period, REPUDIATE the payment of the debts by them respectively contracted with the capitalists, both in Europe and America: and whereas such an opinion is at variance with every principle of patriotism, morality and even of common honesty: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the general assembly of the state of Ohio That a just sense of right, independent of the high claims of her citizens to a character distinguished for honor and integrity, should effectually preclude our great state from entertaining the crude notion of absolving herself from the claims of her creditors by the mere exertion of sovereign power.

"Resolved, As the sense of this general assembly That the citizens of Ohio respect the sanctity of their engagements, whether of a public or private nature and will at all times be found willing to pay the principal and interest of all debts by their state government fairly and lawfully contracted."

These resolutions were agreed to, in the house of representatives by sixty-four yeas to six nays.

INDIANA.

The governor's message at the opening of the present session of the legislature after reviewing the prosperity and blessings of the past year proceeds to the subject of the

STATE DEBT AND PUBLIC WORKS.

You have met under peculiarly trying circumstances. Since the adjournment of the last legislature we have reached a crisis in our affairs, dreaded indeed by many, but which it was hoped might be avoided. Indiana, until this present year, had succeeded in paying the interest on her public debt, and at the last session ample provision was supposed to have been made for its payment this year, but the circumstances have been such that the agents of the loan have declared it impossible to procure the necessary funds, and we are compelled to admit that an unwelcome truth, that the credit of the state has not been sustained.

It now devolves upon the legislature to devise and adopt measures the best adapted to the exigencies of our situation. To do this, it becomes necessary to look over the whole ground—to examine our exact situation with the strictest scrutiny, and make the most correct estimate we possibly can of the liabilities, and means, and resources of the state. In order that the whole subject may be fully presented and understood, I shall in the first place consider somewhat in detail the commencement and progress of those measures, the unfortunate issue of which has involved the state in her present difficulties.

In the year 1827, the state of Indiana obtained from the general government a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Wabash and Erie canal with a view to connect the Wabash river with Lake Erie. A portion of this grant was surrendered to the state of Ohio on the condition that she would construct the canal from the boundary of Indiana to the Lake. This canal has been completed, ready for navigation, from Lafayette on the Wabash, to the eastern line of the state. This work is not generally regarded as forming a part of the general system of internal improvements, in the prosecution of which the state subsequently engaged in the year 1836. It is now understood that Ohio will complete her portion of the line in 1842; by which an uninterrupted communication will be opened between the Wabash and Lake Erie.

In the month of January, 1836, the legislature passed an act to provide for a general system of internal improvements, embracing a number of expensive works. The extent and present condition of these works, including the Wabash and Erie canal, with the total disbursement thereon, up to the present time, with the expenditure under every head, may be briefly summed up as follows:

1. The Wabash and Erie canal from the state line to Tippecanoe, 129½ miles in length, completed and navigable for the whole distance, at a total expenditure, including payments for every purpose, of $2,041,012. This sum includes the cost of the steamboat lock at the Delphi dam, now nearly finished.

2. The extension of the Wabash and Erie canal from the mouth of Tippecanoe to Terre Haute 104½ miles—total probable cost, $1,500,000—amount expended, $308,855. The navigation opened so far down as Lafayette, and a portion of the work performed in the vicinity of Covington.

3. The Crosscut canal from Terre Haute to central canal, 40 miles in length; estimated cost $718,672; amount expended, $420,679. No part of the work is navigable.

4. The White Water canal, from Lawrenceburg to the mouth of Nettle creek, 76½ miles; total estimated cost, $1,675,738; amount expended, $1,099,867. Thirty-one miles of this work navigable, extending from the Ohio river to Brookville.

5. The Central canal, from the Wabash and Erie canal to Indianapolis, including the feeder dam to Muncietown; total distance, 134½ miles; total estimated cost, $2,299,853; amount expended, $568,046. Eight miles completed, other portions nearly done.

6. Central canal, from Indianapolis to Evansville, on the Ohio river; length 194 miles; total estimated cost, $3,532,394; amount expended, $831,302; 19 miles of which at the southern end, connecting with the Ohio river, is finished, and 16 miles, extending south from Indianapolis, nearly finished.

7. Erie and Michigan canal, 182½ miles; estimated cost, $2,624,823; amount expended, $156,324. No part of this work is finished.

8. The Madison and Indianapolis rail road, 85 miles long; total estimated cost, $2,046,600; amount expended, $1,493,013. Road finished and in operation for about 28½ miles. Grading very nearly finished on 27½ miles in addition, extending to Edinburg.

9. Indianapolis and Lafayette turnpike road; 73 miles in length; total estimated cost; $593,737 amount expended, $72,182. The bridging and most of the grading done on 27 miles from Crawfordsville

10. New Albany and Vincennes turnpike road 105 miles long; estimated cost, $1,127,295; amount expended, $654,411. Forty-one miles graded and McAdamized, extending from New Albany to Paoli and 27 miles in addition partly graded.

11. Jeffersonville and Crawfordsville road, 164 miles long; total estimated cost without metallizing $952,000; with metallizing added, the cost would be $1,651,800; amount expended, $372,733; forty-five miles partly graded and bridged, extending from Jeffersonville to Salem, and from Greencastle north

12. Improvement of the Wabash rapids, undertaken jointly by this state and Illinois, one-half of the estimated cost of which is $102,500; amount expended by Indiana, 9,539.

There has also been paid for the general contingent expenses of the board of internal improvements for the purchase of instruments, &c, chargeable alike to all the public works, the sum of $35,564 41.

By summing up the foregoing statement it will be seen that the whole length is 1,289 miles, 281 miles of which have been completed; aggregate estimated cost of all the works, $19,914,424; amount expended for all purposes, up to this date, $8,164,528 21.

The above estimates of the cost of the entire line are based on the cost of the work already, from which it appears it would require to complete the whole of the above works, $11,750,000. At the present reduced prices it might take less, were it not for the loss and dilapidation on the unfinished portions of the works.*

*The sum requisite to complete any particular work may be seen by subtracting the amount expended from the estimated cost. Appended to the message is a tabular statement, A, prepared from the most authentic vouchers and sources of information, from which the above was extracted, exhibiting the work done and the expenditures in detail.

part of the items, but upon referring to the most accurate sources of information it is believed the following statement will be found substantially correct.

1. For the Wabash and Erie canal	$1,725,000
2. For the establishment of the state bank	1,390,000
3. For the enlargement of the capital of said bank	1,000,000
4. Advanced to the bank in anticipation of the 4th instalment of the surplus revenue	294,000
5. For bonds advanced to the Lawrenceburgh and Indianapolis rail road company	221,000
6. For bonds sold for the internal improvement system of 1836	7,050,000
7. Due the state bank for advances on the public works, including interest	693,146
8. Amount of treasury notes outstanding	1,300,000
9. For last July instalment of interest	259,000
10. Hypothecated bonds sold	404,000
11. Bonds now hypothecated	665,000
12. Interest on outstanding treasury notes	85,090

Total $15,088,146

There has been advanced on the bonds now hypothecated $145,000 nearly. Should this sum be refunded by the sale of state bonds, that item will be reduced to the amount of bonds sold to redeem those hypothecated. When the revenue of the year 1841 shall pass into the treasury the amount of treasury notes will be reduced perhaps to $50,000.

That part of our liabilities usually called the suspended debt, upon which nothing has been received, in which may be included the Cohen property, consists of the following:

1. Due from the Morris Canal and Banking company for bonds sold to increase the stock of the state bank nearly	$1,000,000
2. From the same for bonds sold for internal improvement purposes	1,146,000
3. From other companies	294,000
4. Cost of Cohen property	341,000

Total amount of the suspended debt $3,381,000

By a joint resolution, in relation to money due in eastern cities and states for state bonds disposed of, approved February 24, 1840, it was made the duty of the fund commissioners to require a collateral security to double the amount of the bonds sold to the Morris Canal and Banking company, to raise money to increase the capital stock of the state bank, or require the payment of said bonds or the return thereof. By this transfer to the canal fund commissioners, the management of this debt was taken from the officers of the bank, and it has since been the cause blended with the debts contracted on account of the general internal improvement system.

No correct opinion can be formed of the probable amount which will be realized from the suspended debt, nor of the value of the collateral securities taken at different times for its payment; the securities are as various as can be well imagined, and many of them are doubtless scarcely worth the paper employed in conveying them to the state. A part of the debt may be recovered, but how much, or when, are questions it is impossible to answer. One thing, however, is pretty certain, that very little of it can be collected in time to be used for any immediate purpose.

The public debt of the state may be arranged under three different classes.

1. That part upon which the interest can be paid without resort to taxation. This includes the following loans, viz:

1st. Original loan to create bank stock	$1,390,000
2d. Advanced to the bank in anticipation of the 4th instalment of the surplus revenue	294,000
3d. Advanced to the Lawrenceburgh and Indianapolis rail road company	221,000

Total $1,905,000

Second. The treasury notes remaining in circulation. The whole amount issued up to the 1st of November 1840, was $1,450,000 00. The amount which has not been returned to the treasury is estimated at $1,300,000. These bear interest from their date until redeemed, at the rate of six per cent. per annum.

Third. This part of the public debt consists of all our liabilities of every description, exclusive of the treasury notes upon which the interest is demandable, and for the payment of which no adequate means are at present provided.

These may be stated as follows:

1. Bonds sold for the Wabash and Erie canal	$1,727,000
2. Bonds disposed of for internal improvement purposes	7,050,000
3. Principal due the state bank for advances on the public works	641,500

4. Hypothecated bonds sold and unsold	$1,669,000
5. For bonds sold to the Morris Canal and Banking company, to increase the capital stock of the state bank	1,000,000

Total $11,487,500

This sum bears five per cent. interest, except $100,000 of the Wabash and Erie canal loan, and the amount advanced on the public works by the bank, which bear six per cent.; and about $30,000 of seven per cent. bonds recently disposed of in payment of interest. The annual interest on the above sum may be set down at $482,440. If we add to this the amount to be paid for exchanges, commission, expenses, &c. the least amount necessary to discharge the interest on the above sum of the public debt will vary but little from $615,000 annually.

To pay this amount of interest, the state possesses the following means, which may be relied on with certainty:

1st. The interest on the proceeds of sales of the Wabash and Erie Canal	$24,000
2d. Interest from surplus revenue	32,000
Total	$56,000

Which being deducted from the preceding sum of $615,000, leaves the annual interest due under the third head of the sum of $559,000.

The proceeds from tolls, water rents, &c. on the public works, will be absorbed in expenses and repairs for some time. And all other extraordinary sources of revenue brought into the estimates usually made, are too uncertain to be relied upon at present. But I think it may be calculated safely, that in six years, should the complete per portion of the work as soon as expected, the tolls and rents derived from the Wabash and Erie canal, when added to the annual interest received from the sale of canal lands, will be sufficient to pay the interest on the loan for its construction.

It is to be inferred from the foregoing statements that we have a twofold debt pressing heavily upon us, from which immediate relief cannot be expected, namely, the sum actually expended on the system of internal improvements adopted in 1836, comprising works which are not in a situation to yield any profit, and also the suspended debt upon which the accruing interest is to be paid, although the state has not received any part of the principal.

It is due to ourselves, in this state of our affairs, to examine into some of the prominent causes which have produced the present embarrassments. The first of these is doubtless to be found in the number of large and expensive works embraced in the system of internal improvements, and their simultaneous prosecution. Also, the unexpected increase in the prices of provision, labor and materials, was such that a sum much greater than the original estimates was required for the construction of the public works. Two great errors were committed in the progress of the system. The first was paying the interest of the money borrowed, that the government should have been content with the compound interest; and the people, not feeling the pressure of taxes to discharge the interest, naturally became inattentive to the policy which was pursued. Had the legislature commenced by levying taxes to defray the interest as it accrued, its amount would have been a small index to the sums expended on the works. This itself would have done much to check extravagant expenditures. The second error was selling bonds on credit. This finally led to the most disastrous consequences, and it constitutes a prominent cause of the failure of the state to progress with the general system of improvements, that those companies to whom bonds had been sold on time did not comply with their contracts. During the summer of 1839 several very important works were rapidly progressing to completion. Loans had been negotiated with the Morris Canal and Banking company, and other companies of less note, amounting to nearly two millions of dollars, and generally, the state was to be paid to the state in monthly instalments, so as to enable the canal commissioners to meet their engagements with contractors on the public works. Every thing seemed to be moving forward as prosperously as could be desired until the month of August, 1839, when these companies became unable to fulfil their contracts. As a matter of course, operations on the public works ceased immediately, except on the Madison and Indianapolis rail road, for which a special loan had been made with a company in Madison. In a very short time the situation of the country became such, that money to progress with the works could not be obtained from any quarter.

But the enumeration of the causes which produced our present embarrassments does not stop here, particularly as relates to the non-payment of interest.—The legislature at the last session made provision for the payment of interest and the redemption of treasury notes, by authorising the sale of bonds, to bear not exceeding seven per cent. interest, and by directing the levy of a tax of forty cents on each hundred dollars of the grand assessment. As it is well known, the fund commissioners have disposed of bonds on the terms required by the legislature. Now, it is to be realized in the collection of taxes soon enough to meet the July instalment of interest. But this is not all. The act of 1840, authorising the issue of treasury notes, made them receivable for taxes, and it will be found, when the revenue of the present year shall be brought into the treasury, that the notes, for all of it will be returned in treasury notes, which by law are required to be destroyed as they are received by the treasurer of the state. And the amount of these notes still in circulation must prevent us, for several years, from deriving any available means from the collection of taxes, with which to liquidate any part of the interest on the state debt. The condition of the suspended debt is such that, although portions of it may be collected, yet we cannot procure it to pay interest as it falls due.

Such is actually our condition: and candor and justice to our creditors, and to our editors require us to acknowledge that we have neither trader our control nor in prospect, for some time to come, the means to discharge the interest on the whole of our public debt.

It is true, we might, by the sale of bonds greatly below their nominal value, manage to meet our liabilities for the present, but, owing to the great depreciation of our bonds, the debt of the state would soon be augmented to a sum so large that it would be impossible, under the most favorable circumstances, to sustain its accumulated weight. Such a line of policy must in the end lead to a failure more disastrous and oppressive to our necessities, than to pause at the present period of our difficulties. Heavy sacrifices to pay interest will add to the existing burdens of the state, without the most remote promise of ultimate relief, although this may not be true in respect of measures to secure the completion of some of the best works. The sum which it would be necessary to raise in order to pay the interest at the current selling price of our bonds, if properly and prudently applied annually, would do more to relieve the state and calm the fears of judicious creditors, than large and continued sacrifices to meet the interest while permitting the works to decay.

Nevertheless, it becomes us to leave no efforts untied to recover our former position. Indiana possesses an enterprising and a rapidly increasing population. The natural resources of the state, as they shall be developed by the industry of her citizens, will add continually to her wealth, and this very addition will result in a constant relative diminution of the burden of the public debt. The state alone, that we cannot preserve the faith of the state unpaired. Still we should not despair of recovering from our difficulties while any means remain within our power with which we can work. Although whatever means, available at present, are insufficient to pay all the interest on our internal improvement debt, yet we can do much to lighten our burdens, if sources as can be reached, properly and prudently applied, place the state in a situation to pay her debts, and finally redeem her smitten credit?

Unless infamy is to be sought in the suicidal measure of repudiating the public debt, and we furthermore add the destructive policy of abandoning all the public works comprised in the act of 1836, thus proving that the public debt is a necessary evil, as has been expended, the state could do better than collect all her scattered means which can be made available, and with a determined effort endeavor to place some of the most valuable works in a condition to become profitable.

So far as it can be done consistently with the public good and the sacred faith of the state, and without granting privileges which may prove detrimental to the future interests of the citizens, the state would do well to secure the assistance of companies who may be willing to contribute towards the construction of the public works. That companies can be found to embark to any great extent in an enterprise of this character I do not believe. Nevertheless, on some of the lines it is currently understood that associations of individuals can be induced to step forward and invest funds in the shape of stock to an amount which will afford efficient assistance in the completion of the works.

There is nothing pleasant in arriving at these conclusions, nor in expressing them; but while so much is said in a spirit of reproof, on the subject of Indiana protracting her credit under such a

I have endeavored thus to lay before you the condition and wants of the state, as fully as the means within my power would enable me, with such suggestions as seemed important for your consideration. I am confident that you will be able to determine for our affairs, upon which we can look with pleasure. It is difficult to foresee the result of the present state of things, and equally difficult to determine, what particular remedy should be applied. The involvement of the state in the war, while it has increased the number of the soldiers, it has also increased the number of responsibility resting upon the state. There has been a time in the history of our state when a spirit of forbearance, firmness of purpose, and an entire abandonment of all selfish designs were more important than the state was entrusted with the management of her concerns.

The new governor of Wisconsin has sent his opening message to the legislature of that territory. We copy the following from it.

It is well ascertained that the sheep which are fed upon the high prairies increase in size and improve in health, and that their fleeces are more weighty than of those sheep which are confined to the pastures of the eastern and middle states. The extensive and rich prairies of the Wisconsin Ridge and its branches, and upon which there is now no prospect of settlements being formed, we may expect, if the proper encouragement is given, will be occupied in a few years with flocks of sheep capable of supplying all of the manufactories of woollen goods in the U. States with wool.

The protection of the business of mining and smelting of lead ore which has been heretofore afforded by the United States by the duty on lead, has enabled the miners of Wisconsin to supply chiefly the consumption of the United States, and to furnish a considerable quantity for shipment to China and other countries. The largest shipments of our domestic lead it appears have been made from Boston; and it is hoped that the intelligent and enterprising merchants of that city, who have thus obtained new markets for an article of which Wisconsin has this year produced over twenty millions of pounds, will receive from this branch of our trade the reward to which they are so justly entitled.

The fur trade of this country is presented with foreign countries under the greatest disadvantages; and its interests appear to have been overlooked or disregarded by the government of the United States. The furs of this country are not only the most valuable of all furs imported into the United States are admitted free of duty. The goods also, which are required for the trade, are manufactured in England and France, and pay a duty on their entry in the United States. The British trader supports his own along our northern border, and the American trader, who manufactures in the same shops in England as those in the possession of our traders, and he pays no duty. The American traders have more than a million of dollars invested in this trade; it is a valuable trade to this country of sufficient magnitude to entitle it to consideration.

In the prosecution of the inland trade of Wisconsin the improvement of the navigation of the rivers by which it is traversed becomes an object of primary importance and I earnestly recommend the adoption of measures at this session to render navigable the Menomah (or Fox) and Wisconsin rivers, as this is the only route of communication by water between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi, within this territory.

The improvement of the Rock and Peckatonik rivers, can be undertaken, when Illinois shall have rendered the former navigable from the present bounda-

I understand that it is expected that an appropriation will be obtained from congress at its present or next session, to improve the navigation of the Platte and Grant rivers, and the river of the Four Lakes—and possibly some of the streams which I have named—and I hope the effort may be successful.

ADDRESS OF GEN. JAMES TALLMADGE,
BEFORE THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE, AT NEW YORK, ON 26th OCT. 1841.

FELLOW CITIZENS: We rejoice to meet you on this 14th anniversary of the American Institute. It has been our lot very often to meet you on these occasions; and always, on our part, with increasing satisfaction. It is with exulting pride we find we have your marked approbation of our whole course.

The American Institute was incorporated many years since, for the purpose of advancing the AGRICULTURE, COMMERCE, AND MANUFACTURES of our country. IT WOULD itself like the champion of each, but in particular and especially of commerce. It is the interest of the country to do justice to her commerce. Secure to that an open trade and unrestricted enterprise, it will in return not only build up a commercial marine, and establish our naval strength, but will provide a market for agriculture and manufactures, which will be sufficient, and all they ask for their protection and indemnity.

We have a country unsurpassed in its advantages by any other portion of the globe; and blessed with a government, soil, and climate, unequaled by that of any other. Look at the mighty progress we are making in internal improvements. Already this country, which led the way in canals, has 3,700 miles of canal navigation, pouring in its abundance 20,000,000 bushels of wheat annually. Thus we have about 30,000 miles of these useful public works, equal in value to about $160,000,000, expended for the benefit and happiness of the whole people. No country on earth, ancient or modern, can produce any thing so many and so great physical achievements at all comparable to this. How different, and how much better is this, than those monarchical and despotic governments which waste their revenues, and can boast only of their numerous troops, pyramids, and obelisks, and their standing monuments of the oppression and subjugation of the people from whom such abundance has been wrung.

We have had, during the progress of the present fair, addresses delivered on various subjects of public interest, and especially on agriculture and the culture of silk. You have, on our part, seen the wisdom and the beauty of the system of agriculture, and the learning of the land: by a Baldwin, a Burgess, an Everett, a Davis, a Kennedy, a Southard, a Webster, and many others: in fact, orators have preceded us on these subjects, and facts and circumstances have been adduced by them to show the wisdom and propriety of the encouragement and protection to the great interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures. They have so brought their eloquence and reason to bear that I venture to say, there is not a book extant combining at one centre, and containing so much information on these subjects, as the Encyclopædia Americana, a work of full and

My purpose on the present occasion, is to call your attention especially to commence and its attendant consequences. It is perhaps sufficient for the purposes of the country, and in gradual advancement; but it is not what it ought to be. The extent of our country, its benign and varied climate, with its exuberant and virgin soil, has fitted it for every production and every pursuit. The genius and irre-

Internal commerce is not what of right it ought to be. Our increasing population, and the superabundant productions of our land, push it forward to a state of partial prosperity. But it bears no just proportion to the advance of internal improvements, and what the attendant circumstances of the country invited it to become. Providence has showered down blessings upon us. We have been spared from the great scourges of mankind; neither war, pestilence, or famine. Yet our country is desponding and suffering under embarrassments.

Agriculture is abundant, but has no market! Manufactures withering, and at a stand. Labor depressed. This strong arm of supply and defence is not employed and protected as it should be. The revenue is diminishing, the treasury exhausted. The currency deranged; and credit destroyed. Foreign commerce is growing on us at an alarming extent.

Is it not time that we should arouse the attention of the government to these facts, and warn it of our condition?

The causes leading to such disastrous results, are worthy mature consideration. We cut the following article from a city paper, we believe from the Journal of Commerce of September.

"The revenue law will go into operation on the 1st proximo. It may produce changes in the state of our trade, of which the extent cannot yet be foreseen. At present, our trade with the continent of Europe, and with France particularly, is in a condition of stagnation, which has been brought about alone have brought about. It is almost altogether in the hands of foreigners. Of the packets-ships recently arrived from France, with very valuable cargoes, four-fifths of these, certainly, and perhaps ninth-tenths, were for foreign account, or consigned for foreign account. The French merchant, and the enterprise of the American merchant, it is quite impossible that any equal competition should have shut him out so completely from the French trade, and therefore it is, we say, that unwise legislation must be at the bottom of it.

"The new duties on silks and other merchandise, the produce of France, now free, very large assortments have arrived and are arriving. So that the calculation of revenue from this source will, for the first portion of the current fiscal year, be disappointed, the country being stocked Yes, fellow-citizens, "unwise legislation" has crippled the energies and the resources of the country. "Our trade is in condition which unwise legislation alone have brought about. Nine-tenths of the importations from France are on foreign account. The same may be said as to importations from England, Germany, and France. We have lost our free trade. We have opened our ports to the productions of foreign countries. We receive foreigners with open arms, and extend to them all our civil rights and privileges, but are not willing to become their inferiors in this land of our birth. This monopoly by them of our foreign trade, and of importations, makes them our masters. We tolerate their legislation, we tolerate and tolerate by our own "unwise legislation." It is high time our government placed us on a footing of equality with other nations. Foreign goods are imported on foreign account, accompanied by a foreign agent, or consigned to one previously stationed here, to hold possession of the goods to sell them at the highest price, and to return the goods to the return packet. Our regular merchants pay taxes and rents, and may look from the stores to witness what they severely feel, the facilities afforded to this process of foreign trade. The American importing houses have been superseded, and but few of them remain. This change in the course of the importing trade, and the increase by foreign goods, has been the consequence of our bad currency and loss of credit. The diminution of our imports at the present time, compared with our exports, comes not from any salutary measures, adopted by our government, but arises from our former great indebtedness, and the present doubtful safety for further liabilities. The most vicious nullifier, comes from the illustration of the effect of our late public measures, than these facts present.

If our government did not before know, it was informed by despatches from the American minister, General Cass, Oct. 28, 1839—

"That in 1836, France imported into the United States, value, 238 millions of francs. She received as imports from the United States, value, 110 millions of francs." The balance paid in specie.

Again:

"All the exportations from France to the United States, are manufactured articles: none of them giving

It is one of the commercial regulations of England, that American produce, arriving at a port of her colony, is automatically as colonial produce, and may be re-shipped in British vessels to the mother country, or to any other colony, or foreign port; while a like voyage is prohibited to an American vessel. It is thus that a large portion of the produce of the state bordering on the lakes, on the large rivers, and on the British settlements, is automatically nationalized; and is sent, to the consumption of St. Lawrence, to foreign markets, in British vessels, thus encouraging ship-building, and the shipping interest of England, and furnishing an effectual nursery for British seamen. It explains why five-sixths of the commerce of Maine, and two-thirds of that of Georgia, and now nearly one-third of the commerce of the United States, is carried on, and increasing, in British vessels. It tells us how country, and ship-building, and mechanics are unemployed, while the amount of New York ship-building is lessening yearly; why many of those she has, are unemployed, and her general prosperity is unequal to the advantages of her situation and enterprise. Add to these circumstances the countervailing and prohibitory duties of England against the agriculture and the commerce of this nation, all Disregarding the deeply acquired prejudices of the Government, and the present depressed and disastrous condition of the country, and the country cannot be misunderstood. The balances of trade against us the last six years, are nearly three hundred millions of dollars, for articles which could have been manufactured in this country; to say nothing of the two hundred millions of state stocks sold in Europe in the same time. How mysterious it is that our finances and currency are endangered, and business is ruined, and our countrymen are winking at the system of the Government, while they shrink with dread from looking at the real causes.

The injurious effects of these measures on New York alone, are worthy of consideration. In 1835, the freight which came to tide water, on the New York canals, was 753,191 tons, and required over 1,400 vessels, of 500 tons each, to transport it to this city and to a foreign market. It gave life and activity to our towns and cities, by a continued employment of an increasing demand for labor, materials and mechanic skill; and formed an important item in our domestic and foreign commerce. The tolls, business, and freight on our canals have been greatly lessened by this diverted trade. The diminution exceeds in amount the growth and increasing production of the west.

The statistics of ship building, for 1840:

	Vessels.	Tons.
"Maine, there were built,	181	38,936
Massachusetts,	113	17,811
New Jersey	103
Maryland,	111
New York,	72	13,786

Thus showing the comparative condition of your commercial emporium. It has been diminished in amount for the last several years. How could it be otherwise, under the commercial regulations of other governments, and almost the abandonment of our own? In common with the nation, it has claims for relief and protection in its just rights and pursuits.

Spain deems it correct and wise to follow illastric precedents. She too naturalizes the produce of other countries, in order to command its carrying trade in her own vessels. Our cotton is prohibited going to Spain in American vessels; while, if sent to her colony of Cuba, it is there naturalized, and then shipped in Spanish vessels to the mother country, or a foreign market. A considerable commerce of this kind is now carried on from Havana; to the loss of New Orleans and to American vessels. Our government yields to all this. It ought to support our trade and commerce, or withdraw like the Chinese, and be ready in our turn, to be intruded because we will not cat ovium.

The cotton of Texas and the Red River would come to New Orleans, as its port of business, depositing for shipment for market; but a duty amounting to prohibition against foreign cotton, as a protection of this staple of the southern states (and which opposes its extension to the staples of other states), compels it to turn aside into the Gulf of Mexico. New Orleans suffers the loss of its business, and American vessels are deprived of its carrying trade.

Much is said about free trade. England sends books on political economy for us to use, but not to be regarded by herself. Our government has gone on giving free trade, without any return, till an empty treasury has compelled it to resume duties for the sake of revenue.

In 1834, by the official statement to parliament, the quantity of leaf tobacco imported from the United States was 37,804,871 lbs., the duty on which, at 3s. sterling per lb. would amount to $27,219,507. According to Mr. McCulloch, the discriminating duty between tobacco raised in the British colonies, or the United States, is 3*d.* sterling, or 6 cents per lb.; being equal to the price of Virginia and Kentucky tobacco in London market, (in bond), according to the same author, in 1834.

The duty levied on pot and pearl ashes imported into Great Britain from the United States, is 6s. sterling, or $1 44 per cwt.; while from British colonies ashes are admitted free of duty. The effect of this has been to drive the trade in ashes from the northern states to Montreal and Quebec, whence they are carried to England in British vessels. Thus in 1834 the imports of ashes from the British colonies, (Canada, &c.) were 84,937 cwt. and only one cwt. from the U. States.

In 1838, England raised, by duties levied on cotton from the United States, $2,434,949, while she prohibits, or burthens with heavy duties, every article of our agricultural produce. Foreigners, and agents for foreign business, may well huzzo!! for such a FREE TRADE. It is according to the English book. Will any person with American feelings join in such clamor?

It is not true that the American Institute, is an advocate for a high tariff. It maintains equality and a perfect reciprocity in trade. It proposes to offer to other governments, free trade, equality and reciprocity. Our business is to offer to England and to France to come to some agreement, for a just and equal trade; to take our tobacco and rice on equal terms; to make American productions free, and reciprocal; and if this is refused, to adopt countervailing regulations, as a defence against their unjust measures; and to put on their broad-bottoms, silks, and manufactures, the like duties they put on tobacco and the agriculture of our country. Their aggressions, to be our rule of resistance.

It is the object and wish of America, to walk in the paths of peace. Give a clear deck, or an open field, and she will ask no favors of the world. But with our keen sagacity, and what with politics and president making, our country is not going in advance, as she ought, with all her natural advantages. With keen and vigorous governments abroad, careful of their interests; and with party rulers here at home intent only on their places and party discipline, it is no matter for wonder that currency is deranged, commerce depressed, and, in short, all the concerns of the country embarrassed.

These things explain why, among other things, our commercial marine is languishing. Strife may come and find our marine deranged and our hard-seamen driven to other pursuits, and one-half of the trade of our country in possession of foreigners. We may decline, and we may lose the trumpet, and we may lose the laurel, and we may lose the right to "stand our steady march upon the mountain wave," and they may not be within our call; and all this too while it is the declared policy of our country to encourage navigation; and especially long voyages as NEED-ERY FOR SEAMEN. For this object a bounty is paid on the fisheries; and drawbacks allowed on the export of fish. The amount of the bounty does not appear in the table, but is believed to be nearly equal to one million of dollars.

In the face of such facts, the last revenue bill surrendered the China trade to British shipping! Tea from China, was before, and has been a long time duty free, in American vessels; and ten per cent. duty if in foreign vessels. In the last revenue bill this little discriminating duty of 10 per cent. is repealed, and it enacts, that tea shall be duty free, "from China," or "ANY OTHER PLACE." This must be in favor of British shipping, and in compliance to a duty on all other goods, and in compliance to a duty on all goods operating as a prohibition against rice, flour, and the productions of our agriculture, unless diverted to these channels, giving the carrying trade to British vessels. The old stale teas of British stores, are now to be sent to this country in British vessels, and

While we gave to France a free trade in her silks, wines, and luxuries, as a reward for the embarrassments inflicted by her, on our commerce and agriculture, we have yet continued the duty of 10 per cent. on silks from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, which operates as a tax on us, and as a bounty on the silks of France and England.

With the protecting duty long since allowed of New Orleans sugar, a bounty was given, in the nature of a drawback on the importation, refining, and exportation of foreign sugars. When the duty was diminished, the bounty remained unregarded. The omission did not offend nullification, as it only greatly increased the exports of Cuba, created a few minor domestic restraints in this city and in Boston; and presented the rare circumstance of a bounty paid in this country for supplying Russia with West India sugar. The last congress, in mercy to the emp treasury, repealed this bounty, so far, as to be only equal to the duty paid. Such a state of things could not have been the intention of any congress or any administration; but engaged and engrossed as they are, in president-making, and in squabbles of party politics, it is only their heedless legislation. They have not had time to insist on equality and reciprocity in trade, and take the proper retaliatory measures against the injurious commercial regulations of other governments. In olden times the messages of our presidents dwelt on the support and condition of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures. In latter years, these subjects are deemed too unessential to gain admittance into such public documents.

We do not speak of any of these things as partisans. The American Institute belongs to no party. It censures all parties alike. Party spirit and the discipline of party, is the bane of our land, and the curse of our country. The Institute calls for support to our agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, and to procure such legislation as will put us on an equality with other nations in all our commercial pursuits.

There is no defect in our institutions, or in the character of our people, which occasions the present depression of our concerns, foreign and domestic. We stand elevated in the eyes of the world for capacity to produce. If Russia wishes to build a vessel, she sends to New York for one as a model. We are needed an imperial steam frigate, New York is employed to build it. Spain also sends to New York for steam vessels of war. Is a cotton factory or a steam sugar mill wanted, America furnishes it. Does Prussia need a flouring mill, she sends to Baltimore for machinery. When Egypt wishes to enlarge her empire, she sends her citizens to Rochester to learn the art of grinding wheat; Austria sends to Philadelphia for locomotives. The grand sultan sent here for our Eockford to instruct them in ship-building, and for our Porter, to improve capacity and valor for their defence. When Egypt wakes up, she sends to England for a fleet of iron ships, and her subjects and her bullock-mills are not the most perfect in the world for digging canals, she too sends for tools and steam-engines. When Texas wants machinery, she sends to Lowell and Patterson and England—even England herself sends to Philadelphia for locomotives, for she cannot find equal quality at home. In our own country, there is no mean citizen and enterprise are not unattended and honored.

Were the coachload to use this free trade, or reciprocity which we ask, American productions would meet the eye of the traveller in every country and clime. Even now an American peace-maker would be a laughing-stock, a rare sight, a curiosity, a staple, in saying a peace-maker, I do not mean a Quaker; their chaste and beautiful principles ill accord with this degenerate age. I refer to Cochrane's repeating gun, which must soon come to general use. While the war was going on, we were not afraid to assert boldly our claims to reciprocity and free trade. This is not the only instance in which members of the institute have been called abroad to superintend the building of iron vessels, the offspring of their own minds, and these will long stand as monuments of American skill.

Having, perhaps, hereafter no better opportunity to express the deep obligations which the American Institute feels under to the U. S. naval officers of this station, I will improve it by saying that we should be most happy to reciprocate, and have looked about us for the means of so doing.

We can only offer you, gentlemen, in return, our sincere thanks, and the beautiful nautical instruments which are now before you, manufactured by members of this institute, which, by their near approach to perfection, will give you greater confidence in crossing the mighty waters; and should these fail which we offer with one hand, we hold in our other a Francis life boat to succor and to save in the last extremity.

The president then announced the delivery of the premiums, commented upon various specimens and individual manufactures; and the affairs of the exhibition closed with music from the naval band.

THE memorable "armed neutrality" of the north, under the auspices of the empress CATHERINE, formed for the defence of "FREE TRADE," was overthrown in the wreck of the French revolution.

"Russia was prosperous in 1816, '17, '18 and '19 but, fascinated with the theories of Adam Smith and J. B. Say, she adopted a new tariff in 1818, of the delusive plan of letting trade regulate itself.* I this tariff she abrogated her prohibitions, and lowered her duties. The country was immediately deluged with foreign goods, and in due course, drained ^aThe tariff did not go into operation till 1820.

its specie, as these imports in past years, to pay for the surplus of those products, which far exceeded its exports. The most disastrous consequences took place. Circulation was stopped. Distress and wretchedness overspread the land. The manufacturers, as was the case in this country, first fell victims to this mistaken policy. Agriculture next felt the shock; and finally, bankruptcy swept a large portion of those commercial houses whose cupiditas had paved the way for the misery of their country."

The following statement of the sufferings of the country is taken from a circular of the emperor of Russia, signed by count NESSERODE:—(published in 1834.)

"To produce happy effects, the principles of commercial freedom must be generally adopted. The state which adopts, whilst others reject them, must condemn its own industry and commerce to pay a ruinous tribute to those of other nations.

"From a circulation exempted from restraint, and the facility afforded by reciprocal exchanges, almost all the governments at first resorted to seek the means of repairing the evil which Europe had been doomed to suffer; but experience, and more correct calculations, because they were made from certain data, and upon the results already known, of the peace that had just taken place, forced them soon to adhere to the prohibitory system."

"England preserved hers. Austria remained faithful to the rule she had laid down, to guard herself against the rivalry of foreign industry. France, with the same views, adopted the most rigorous measures of protection. And Prussia published her own tariff in October last, which proves that she found it impossible to follow the example of the rest of Europe."

"In proportion as the prohibitory system is extended and rendered perfect in other countries, that state which pursues the contrary system makes from day to day sacrifices more extensive and more considerable."

"The consequences of the prohibition to the manufacturers of other countries—and to our manufacturers perish in the struggle, which they are as yet unable to maintain."

"It is with the most lively feelings of regret we acknowledge it is our own proper experience which enables us to trace this picture. The evils which its details have realized in Russia and Poland since the conclusion of the year 7-19 of the present century, AGRICULTURE WITHOUT A MARKET, INDUSTRY WITHOUT PROTECTION, LAGUISH AND DECLINE, SPECIE IS EXPORTED, AND THE MOST SOLID COMMERCIAL HOTSPES ARE SHAKEN. The public prosperity and the local wealth are injured, and various circumstances, if new regulations did not promptly change the actual state of affairs."

"Events have proved that our AGRICULTURE and our COMMERCE, as well as our MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY, are not only paralyzed, BUT BROUGHT TO THE BRINK OF RUIN."

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

On motion of Mr. Walker, of Mississippi, appeared in his seat.

The president of the senate presented a memorial from the anti-slavery society of Pennsylvania, asking that congress would take measures for the removal of the seat of the general government to some non-slaveholding state. Motion to receive ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Clay gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce to-morrow a joint resolution (or joint resolutions) for amending the constitution in regard to the veto power and in regard to the appointment of members of congress to office.

On motion of Mr. Linn, all the petitions and memorials relating to the occupancy, &c. of the Oregon territory, presented since 1835, were removed from the files and referred to the select committee.

Mr. King, presented a bill regulating commercial intercourse with the port of Cayenne, in the colony of French Guiana, and in regard to certain duties, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. Linn, asking what would have been the operation of the land distribution bill if it had been in operation in 1840, was taken up and adopted.

Mr. McRee introduced a bill to establish a mint at Chicago, in the state of Illinois.

Mr. Bates gave notice he should move for leave to bring in a bill to refund the ascertained balance due to Massachusetts for disbursements during the last war with Great Britain.

The bill to establish an additional land office in the state of Alabama was taken up, on motion of Mr. Smith. It was read, after being discussed, was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill to postpone the operation of the bankrupt law having its second reading—

Mr. Benton asked that it be referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Benton asked the chairman of the committee the reason of such motion, not regarding it proper so to refer the bill.

Mr. Berrien said that several memorials having been referred to the judiciary committee upon the same subject, he regarded the motion as a proper one to make in reference to a bill of the same character.

Mr. Calhoun said he believed that there had been a great reaction upon this question, and instead of there being a majority in favor of it, there was probably an overwhelming majority against it. The bill had been rejected, it could not be re-introduced, and those who wish a modification or a repeal should have an opportunity afforded them.

Mr. Linn and Mr. King were surprised to hear the motion to commit after the action of the senate the other day on the distribution bill. Mr. King said that the motion was repeated, it could not be amended.

No man would rise in his place and say that it ought not to be essentially changed, even if it was not repeated. He hoped the majority would be at least consistent in their action upon this question, and not allow the bill to go to the committee. They had an opportunity afforded to them to show what value they placed upon this principle.

Mr. Mangum said, that he believed it did require great amendment. In its present form, he regarded it as impracticable and incapable of being carried into execution. He had understood that many material alterations still required before the bill could be of any use at all. Mr. A. did not intend the reference to a committee as necessary to this action.

Mr. Calhoun concurred entirely with what had been said by the senator from North Carolina; nor would he now move his amendment to repeal, to the bill, as proposed, a postponement of the operation of the law, if allowed to be left upon the table to be acted upon without a reference.

Mr. Clay said he was not in the senate when the bill in relation to the public lands was before it, but, in reference to the bill now before the senate, it was, in his opinion, referred to the committee. It had been introduced with a view of material amendment for the purpose of adding a new and important feature to those already incorporated in the bill which had passed congress. In regard to this question, he was most willing to be guided by public opinion.

Mr. Henderson said, that he had no extra session, he did so upon the broad ground that was demanded by the commercial sections of the country. In his own state there was no great feeling in regard to the measure. He had seen no evidence of change in regard to public opinion upon this measure. If convinced, however, that the majority of the American people were adverse to the bill, he was willing to be guided by their action, and see it repealed. But he saw no evidence of such opposition, and doubted if the opinion that there was this change was founded on any good evidence.

Mr. Buchanan said that twenty years since he had studied this question practically, and then became convinced of the bad effects of the measure. If there were 500,000 or 1,000,000 bankrupts in the U. S. state, it would be impossible, with the present judicial force, to carry out the bill. This was the great barrier in the way of the execution of the law of 1800.

Mr. Henderson said, if the power to pass a bankrupt law had been taken from the states and given to congress, he should never have urged the consideration of the subject by congress. He did not agree with the senator from North Carolina that the present bill was incapable of execution. He knew it would be of slow execution, but it would do some good. It was not intended as to be more perfect and more quickly executed. He agreed with no senator who said the bill could not be enforced; nor did he agree with the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun), who said that the sound part of the community were not in favor of the measure, and that he had a reason for his opinion. He was not sure. He had always known that the money-power of the land was opposed to this bill; but, for one, he would never raise his arm to aid the strong against the weak. Nor did he agree with senators who said this bill had not been discussed. It was well known the measure was matured at a session preceding the last.

Mr. Houston said he had but little interest in the question. The questions in regard to this bill and the bill the other day were different. That was a bill to change the whole of the appropriation. This was a bill proposing no such change, but an amendment to the bankrupt bill.

Mr. Calhoun, having been absent the other day when the land bill was under consideration, had no samples of consistency to trouble him; the identical were argued over and over again, and its difficulties were to be pointed out by experience and not by consequence in advance. He was opposed to any repeal or postponement, and thought that public opinion had not changed unless in gratification of its passions.

The defects if any will hereafter be pointed out in its execution.

Mr. Buchanan said, sixty days would prove it true if the bill could not be enforced. It would, for this reason, so long as it was unpopular, and then obnoxious. The courts in New York would not be enabled to get through their business.

Mr. Henderson said that the senator from Pennsylvania after pronouncing the difficulties of its execution, did not point out also the manner in which they could be obviated.

Mr. Benton said that in thirty days the law would be enforced unless postponed. He had moved the postponement as the simplest form, because he had foreseen, if he had proposed a repeal, which he preferred, that it would bring on a contest which might go beyond the first of February. He had given his bill the middle form he could get, and he found the bill to commit persisted in. He must, therefore, regard this motion as decisive of the fate of his bill. He would, therefore, move for the yeas and nays.

The question was then taken and decided as follows: yeas 15, nays 21. Names, see page 273.)—So the motion was negatived.

The senate then adjourned.

DECEMBER 23. Mr. Preston from the committee on military affairs reported a bill to settle the claims of Georgia for the services of her militia called out to suppress Indian hostilities, &c. without amendment.

Mr. Clay, agreeably with notice given yesterday, introduced three joint resolutions, the first restricting the veto power; the second, transferring, in certain cases, the power of appointment, from the president to the legislature; and the third, that no member of congress should have any civil appointment during the official term for which he was elected. Each of the three resolutions had in view the same object—the reduction of executive power within proper limits. To this great object he had understood the whig party were pledged prior to the election of 1840. He was not, however, at the time, so not, he felt that he was individually pledged to this object, and now proposed to redeem it.

The resolutions were then introduced, and had their first and second readings, as follows:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States in congress assembled, (two-thirds of both houses concurring), That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several states as an amendment to the constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said legislatures, shall be valid as part of the constitution:

No senator or representative shall, during the term or fraction of a term for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States.

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States in congress assembled, (two-thirds of both houses concurring), That when a bill which shall have passed the senate and house of representatives of the United States shall be returned by the president, with his objections to its appropriation and signature, it, upon its reconsideration, it shall again pass the senate and house of representatives, by a majority of two-thirds of each house, notwithstanding the president's objections, it shall become a law; and the requirement by the existing constitution of two-thirds of each house again to pass the bill, when ratified by three-fourths of the said legislatures, shall be valid as part of the constitution:

If any bill shall be presented to the president within a period less than ten days (Sundays included) fit to the termination of the session of congress during which it shall have passed, and which he shall refuse to sign at the close of the session, he shall be bound to return it within three first days of the succeeding session. If he should not so return it, the bill shall become a law; and if he returns it with his objections, he shall be bound to sign it, and the true intent required, the two houses of congress shall proceed to consider it, in the manner as it is returned, during the session at which it was passed, and, if upon its reconsideration, it shall again pass each house by a majority of two-thirds of each house, it shall become a law, notwithstanding the president's objections, it shall become a law.

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States in congress assembled, (two-thirds of both houses concurring), That the secretary, or other head, by whatever denomination it may be called, of the treasury of the United States, and the treasurer of the United States, shall, be, respectively, appointed by a joint vote of the senate and house of representatives, by ballot or viva voce, as the two houses may severally resolve. When appointed, either of them may be removed by a concurrent resolution of the two houses, separately agreed to. No member of them shall be removable by the president of the United States. Congress may provide by law for the case of a vacancy occurring in either of these offices between the periods of the annual appointments.

Mr. C. said he hardly thought it necessary to refer them to any committee; he would simply move to make them the special order for Wednesday, the 12th of January next; which was agreed to.

And, on motion of Mr. Mangum, they were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Preston asked the attention of the senate to the report of the secretary of the treasury giving in detail the plan for the establishment of currency throughout the U. States.

Mr. Tallmadge moved that the report be referred to a select committee of nine senators to be appointed by the chair.

Mr. Buchanan delivered an address in opposition to the scheme.

Mr. Calhoun, also addressed the senate in opposition. He did not rise to oppose the motion to commit, but to express briefly the reasons of his opposition to the plan proposed by the administration.

Mr. Rice, replied to Mr. B. and Mr. C. and regretted that they should have expressed their hostility before it had been modified in committee.

Mr. Mangum obtained the floor, but yielded to a motion for adjournment, and the senate adjourned.

DECEMBER 30. The president of the senate laid before the senate a message from the president, containing a communication from the department of state, in answer to a resolution of the 27th inst. asking "if any proposition had been made to or received from the British government since the 4th of March, 1840, in relation to a mutual right of search," stating that no proposition had been made by either government since that day.

Mr. Allen presented a resolution from the general assembly of the state of Ohio, desiring of congress early action on the subject of apportioning the number to form the representation of the U. States under the census of 1840.

The resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. Linn presented the preamble and resolutions of the legislature of Missouri, instructing their senators to oppose any law for the repeal of the naturalization laws, and to resist all means designed to cause delay or difficulty in the attainment of naturalization.

Mr. Buchanan presented a memorial of citizens of Warren county, Pennsylvania, asking that the treaty with the Seneca Indians may be annulled.

Mr. Graham submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to inform the senate what is the present number of cadets in the military academy at West Point from each state and territory of the union, and from the District of Columbia; what regulation, if any, exists in the war department respecting the appointments of cadets, so as to apportion places among the several states and territories; the number of appointments has at any time exceeded 250, and if so, at what time or times; and whether, when a vacancy has occurred in the corps of cadets from any cause, a successor has been unfurnally appointed in the same congressional district from which his predecessor had been selected.

Mr. Barrow submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the navy be directed to communicate to the senate a list of the names of the midshipmen appointed from the 1st day of January, 1837, to the 20th December, 1841, and a statement showing the places of nativity of all such midshipmen, and their places of residence at the time of their appointment.

On motion of Mr. Barrow.

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the necessity of an appropriation being made by congress at its present session for the purposes of constructing a new custom house in the city of New Orleans.

The bill for the relief of the Selma and Tennessee rail road company after having been advocated and explained by Messrs. Smith, of Indiana, followed by Mr. King, was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill to authorize the legislature of Louisiana to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in that state was ordered to be engrossed.

The senate then proceeded to the unfinished business of yesterday, being the motion of Mr. Tallmadge to refer a message from the president to a select committee of nine, to be appointed by the chair, when—

Mr. Mangum, of North Carolina arose and addressed the senate in opposition to the project of the secretary of treasury for an exchequer board. After addressing the senate for some time, and then resigning his seat.

Mr. Benton arose and moved to lay the subject upon the table for a moment, in order to move that when the senate adjourns, it adjourn to meet again on Monday next.

The resolution was informally passed over, and the motion put upon the question of adjournment to Monday, which was carried in the affirmative.

Mr. King moved an executive session, which was ordered.

Mr. Huntington then gave notice of his intention to speak upon the question of reference before the vote was taken.

The senate then went into executive session, and soon after adjourned.

JANUARY 1. Various memorials were presented by Messrs. Wright, Benton, Buchanan and Calhoun, praying the relief, modification or postponement of the bankrupt law.

Mr. Buchanan presented a petition from certain citizens of Warren county, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the confirmation of the treaty with the Seneca Indians.

Mr. Woodbridge presented a petition from citizens of Michigan, asking the intervention of government in behalf of the Americans held in duress in Van Dieman's land.

Mr. Barrow introduced a resolution, which was adopted, directing the committee on naval affairs to inquire into the expediency of regulating by law the appointment of midshipmen, so as to give to each state in proportion to its representation in congress.

The resolution submitted on December 30 by Mr. Graham, in relation to the appointment of cadets, was taken up and adopted.

Mr. Bates, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to refund the ascertained damage to Massachusetts for advances made by her during the late war with Great Britain.

The following bills were read the third time, and passed.

A bill for the relief of the Selma and Tennessee rail road company.

The bill to authorize the legislature of Louisiana to sell her lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in that state.

The senate then proceeded to consider in committee of the whole, the bill allowing drawback on merchandise exported in the original package to Chihuahua and Santa Fe, in Mexico.

This bill having been advocated and explained by Mr. Huntington, followed by Messrs. King, Linn and others, was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill to provide for the allowance of invalid pensions to certain Cherokee warriors, under the provisions of the article of the treaty of 1835 was considered in committee of the whole, and having been advocated by Mr. Pierce, was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. Benton said that he would avail himself of the first day in business to call up his bill for the postponement of the bankrupt law.

The question of referring the bill and report of the secretary of the treasury coming up for consideration as the unfinished business.

Mr. Huntington, addressed the senate in opposition, and analyzing the bill and accompanying report in order to demonstrate that it was to be one of government power, government property, government influence, controlling the government, and controlled by the government; and would be destructive of the public liberty. After concluding, Mr. Bates rose to controvert the discussion, but the time being, general wish to adjourn, Mr. B. yielded the floor for that purpose. And the senate adjourned.

JANUARY 4. Mr. Wright presented a petition from citizens of Buffalo, asking the interference of the government in behalf of the American citizens, prisoners at Australia.

Mr. Young, on leave, introduced a bill further to amend an act, entitled 'an act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of 1840 equines, and to grant pre-emption rights.'

The following bills, ordered to be engrossed, were severally read a third time and passed:

The bill to provide for the allowance of invalid pensions to certain Cherokee warriors, under the provisions of the 14th article of the treaty of 1835.

The bill to allow drawback on goods exported in original packages to Chihuahua and Santa Fe, in Mexico.

On motion of Mr. Linn,

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury send to the senate a statement of the quantity of public lands in Missouri, reserved from sales in cases where the lines of private survey of claims derived from France and Spain interfere with public surveys; and whether, in his opinion, such fractional parts of the national domain are liable to the operation of any pre-emption laws, and what injury would result to public or private rights by extending the benefits of such a law to the settlers on such fractional parts.

Mr. Linn also submitted the following:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to give the notice to the British government which is required by the 18th regulation of the treaty of 1840, to put an end to the treaty for the joint occupation of Oregon, west of the Rocky Mountains, and which territory is now possessed and used by the British Hudson Bay company, to the ruin of the American Indian and fur traders in the country, and conflicting with the inland commerce with the interior provinces of Mexico.

On motion of Mr. Preston,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire whether any further legislation be required to determine more accurately the rights and duties of the vice president and president of the senate, in case of death, resignation or removal; and the mode of succession in case of death, resignation or removal of any of those officers; and to report by bill or otherwise.

The senate then proceeded to the unfinished business of yesterday, being the motion of Mr. Tallmadge to refer the plan of a fiscal agent to a select committee of nine, to be appointed by the chair, when, Mr. Bates arose and addressed a speech in opposition to the scheme, and he hoped that it would not be referred to a select committee. He hoped the adulterous progeny of northern federalism and Virginia abstraction might be strangled in its very birth.

Mr. Morehead rose to continue the discussion, but an executive session was moved and carried, and the debate closed soon after two o'clock, and the senate adjourned.

JANUARY 5. The president of the senate laid before the body a communication from the general post office, showing the expenses of the contingent fund for the year 1841.

The following memorials and petitions were presented and appropriately referred to the committee by Mr. Bates: From A. W. Townsend, in favor of a protective tariff.

Also, from citizens of Warren county, Pennsylvania, stating that gross frauds had been practised upon the Tuscarora and Seneca Indians, and asking that no appropriation may be made to carry the treaty into effect.

Reports from committees were presented by Mr. Linn from the committee on private land claims, without amendment, the bill to continue in force the act for the final adjust of private land claims in Missouri, approved July 13, 1832, and the act supplemental thereto, approved 28 March, 1839.

By Mr. Morehead, from the committee on military affairs, the bill to settle the claims of the state of Maine for the services of her militia.

Also, from the same committee, asking to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Monsieur Gonon, in relation to a system of telegraphs.

Mr. Morehead said he would prefer that the report lie on the table for the present; which was acceded to by Mr. Preston.

The motion of reference of the report of the secretary of the treasury coming up as the unfinished business of the senate, was taken up, and Mr. Bates delivered a speech in opposition to the scheme. Having concluded, Mr. Simmons, of R. Island arose and addressed the senate. He suggested the propriety of framing some kind of an agent by iterations and modifications of the plan as proposed.

Mr. Woodbury (Mr. Simmons having concluded) rose and expressed a desire to say something upon the subject; but, as the hour was late, an adjournment was moved and carried. And the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, DEC. 30. The house resumed the unfinished business of yesterday, being the reference of the tariff, and

Mr. Morehead advocated its reference to the committee on ways and means.

Mr. Winthrop followed in favor of the committee on manufactures, after which

The house adjourned.

MONDAY, JAN. 3. Mr. Cooper, of Pennsylvania, introduced to the house the hon. Mr. Russell, member elect from the state of Pennsylvania, (vice Judge Black, deceased), who was qualified and took his seat.

Mr. Stuart, of Illinois, gave notice of a motion for leave to introduce a bill to establish a port of entry at Chicago.

The house resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of Thursday, being the amendment offered by Mr. Rhet to the amendment proposed by Mr. Jetherton to Mr. Fillmore's resolution to refer parts of the president's message as refers to the tariff, to the committee on manufactures.

Mr. Wm. C. Johnson, of Maryland, expressed at large the reasons that should induce him to vote for the reference of the subject to the committee on ways and means, and having concluded,

The speaker gave the floor (there being many competitors) to

Mr. John C. Clark, who said that he did not rise to make any remarks, but God forbid (continued he) that upon this question, and at this time, I should indulge in any comments upon the great questions connected with this discussion.

the decision of the question just voted would dispose of this also.

Mr. Gamble moved that they be all laid on the table. Mr. Adams asked the yeas and nays on the laying the first of the series on the table, which were ordered. And the roll having been called through—

Mr. Sturdy (pending the announcement of the vote) rose and desired to be informed by the speaker at what time of the proceedings it would be in order to move that gentlemen who had not voted should be called upon to do so.

His object in making the inquiry was, that there were certain supporters of Martin Van Buren who had been desirous of making political capital out of this motion, who had not voted.

The speaker said the gentleman was not in order. Mr. Sturdy said there were gentlemen on this floor—one from New York especially—who had not voted. He (Mr. S.) had made the inquiry in order that these gentlemen might be compelled to vote.

The speaker. The gentleman has a right to demand that any gentleman who was within the bar shall vote.

Mr. Sturdy. A representative from the city of N. York did not vote on this question, and I think he should be compelled.

(Cries—Name him.)

The speaker (addressing Mr. Sturdy). Will the gentleman give the name?

Mr. Sturdy. Yes; Mr. Roosevelt.

Mr. Roosevelt (addressing Mr. Sturdy) was understood by the reporter to say, "If you want my sentiments on that question, you shall have them."

Mr. Sturdy. No I want your vote; for you have sometimes voted both ways.

The speaker called to order, and read the 40th rule, (new edition) which is as follows:

"Every member who shall be in the house when the question is put shall give his vote, unless the house, by a special vote, excuse him."

Mr. Sturdy said he would not press the matter. He only wished to call attention to the fact.

Mr. Roosevelt. I am happy to find that my vote is of so much importance to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. Sturdy said the gentleman's vote was of no importance to him (Mr. S.) that he knew of, nor to any body else.

The speaker then announced the vote, ayes 103, noes 87. So the petition was laid on the table.

The petition of S. S. Sheldon and 361, others, of New York Mills, presented heretofore by Mr. Floyd, of New York, continued in its turn.

Mr. Adams (after some conversation with the speaker) asked for a vote on all the petitions seriatim, though, he said, he would not call the yeas and nays.

Mr. Sturdy asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. Roosevelt appealed to the gentleman who made the motion to lay on the table to withdraw it for a moment, to enable him to say a word in explanation.

Mr. Gamble declined.

The question was then taken, and decided as follows: yeas 107, nays 83. (Mr. Roosevelt voting in the affirmative.) So the petition was laid on the table.

Several other petitions of the same series, were laid on the table without a division; when

Mr. Arnold rose to make a motion which, he said, might perhaps give offence to some of his friends. It was a privileged motion. He moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday on the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. Adams), in order to refer so much of the president's message as related to the tariff to the committee of ways and means.

As he did not wish to detain gentlemen, and as this was a little matter between himself and two of the representatives from N. Hampshire, (Messrs. Burke and Adams), he was the usual dinner hour had nearly arrived, and gentlemen might wish their dinners, he would merely tax the gentlemen referred to and the speaker to stay and hear what he had to say. It was due to himself that he should make this motion.

Mr. Giddings inquired of the speaker if this motion was now in order?

The speaker. It is a privileged question, and rides over all others except the question of adjournment.

After some conversation between Messrs. Wise, Arnold and the speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Arnold said, as it was the pleasure of the house he would go on now; and he should not feel slighted if gentlemen did not remain to hear him. He had been assured, he did not regard that, but his state had been assailed, and his constituents; and this was the worst of all, his democratic constituents were assailed by a democratic member on this floor.

Mr. Arnold perceived there was in a strain of anxiety, and Mr. Adams called on gentleman from Tennessee to order.

The speaker said that, strictly, the debate was not in order, nor had been much of that allowed on the same question. The debate had opened out by degrees, and the chair did not consider himself after the debate had gone on so far, at liberty to arrest it now. The question of order had been raised some days since by the gentleman on his left, (Mr. G. Davis), and the chair had not at that time felt himself at liberty to arrest the debate, so wide a range had been already allowed by the house. As long as the remarks were not personal, the chair could not arrest the debate.

Mr. Wm. O. Butler appealed from the decision of the chair, and called the yeas and nays on the appeal. Excited debating ensued.

Mr. Wm. O. Bur said as the appeal would lead to a debate, he would withdraw it.

Mr. Borne renewed the appeal.

The excitement and confusion continuing, Mr. Burton, of Virginia, obtained the floor, and remarking that he had been forty years in public life, and had never seen the motion he now intended, and which he thought should be carried out of self-respect, moved that the house adjourn.

Which motion prevailing, the house adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 5. The journal of yesterday having been read, Mr. Adams moved to amend it as follows:

"Strike out the instructions from the journal of yesterday, on his motion of December 14, as Mr. A. says he withdrew the instructions and only moved to refer, the speaker having stated, on that day, the instructions were not in order, except by general consent; and Mr. Carr Johnson having objected thereto. Mr. Meredith moved to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. Adams called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and, being taken, were: Yeas 99, nays 78. So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. Briggs called for the orders of the day.

The speaker stated the business before the house to be the question on the appeal taken yesterday by the gentleman from New York (Mr. Borne) from the decision of the speaker; [by which decision the question of order raised by Mr. Borne against the remarks of Mr. Arnold was overruled, and Mr. A. permitted to proceed.]

The appeal was briefly debated by Mr. Gealey, who appealed to the justice of the house to allow his colleague (Mr. Arnold) an opportunity of replying to the remarks that had been made by the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Messrs. Eastman and Burke), who speech after speech, although the speaker had allowed by the house, an opportunity of reply, which would, from the necessity of the case, also be out of order, should be given to his colleague.

Mr. Hopkins was about submitting a remark, when he yielded the floor, and Mr. Fillmore, from the committee of ways and means, reported the following bill:

A BILL to authorize an issue of treasury notes.

Be it enacted, Sec. That the president of the United States is hereby authorized to cause treasury notes, in lieu of those heretofore or hereafter redeemed, to be issued for such sum or sums as the exigencies of the government may require, but not exceeding the sum of five millions of dollars of this emission outstanding at any one time, and to be issued under the limitations of other provisions contained in the act entitled "an act to authorize the issuing of treasury notes," approved the twelfth of October, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, and as modified by an act entitled "an act additional to the act to authorize the issuing of treasury notes," approved the thirty-first of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty, except that the authority hereby given to issue treasury notes shall expire at the end of one year: from the passage of this act, if not sooner terminated under the proviso to this section; provided, that the authority hereby given to issue treasury notes shall cease and determine as soon as the loan authorized by the act of July twenty-first, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, or which may be authorized by any other act, shall be negotiated and rendered available.

Mr. Stuart, of Illinois, moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. W. Carr Johnson said he would vote against laying the bill on the table, although he would be compelled to vote against the bill itself.

And the question on the motion of Mr. Stuart was taken and decided in the negative, yeas 33, nays 163.

So the motion to lay the bill on the table was rejected.

And on motion of Mr. Fillmore, the bill was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Jackson gave notice that when this bill came up, and Mr. Adams called on gentleman from Tennessee to order.

Mr. Arnold said he believed his case now came up before the house. [A laugh.]

Mr. Borne demanded the yeas and nays on the question of appeal; which were ordered by the house.

The speaker then stated the question. He had understood the gentleman from N. York (Mr. Borne) to call the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Arnold) to order for irrelevant remarks. The speaker had overruled the point of order, deciding that although the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee were, strictly speaking, out of order, yet they were not, after the debate had been allowed such a latitude by the house. From this decision the gentleman from New York had taken an appeal to the house; and the question was now on that appeal.

The clerk then commenced calling the roll on the question of the decision of the speaker stand as the judgment of the house?"

Mr. Adams' name having been called, Mr. A. said he understood the question to be, whether the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Arnold) should be permitted to make a speech here in direct defiance of the rules of the house; and that the speaker had decided that he should proceed in direct defiance of the rules, because the speaker had already permitted others to speak in the same manner. He could not vote to sustain the speaker in that position; because in doing it he must vote in annihilation of the rules themselves. He held the speaker responsible for the rule itself said he should be for arresting any member the moment he gets out of order; and the speaker could not justify a subsequent decision for violating the rules of this house, because it had been done before. It was intimately connected with the existence of the house, and therefore he could not vote to sustain the speaker's decision.

The speaker remarked that he had decided yesterday in the hurry of the moment that this appeal was debatable; but from further reference to the rules he was satisfied that it was not, appeals on questions of relevancy and personality not being debatable. And he would add that as the gentleman (Mr. Adams) insisted on the rigid application of the rules, he would call the gentleman to order.

Mr. Adams. This is a new decision, is it? It stops me. I say, "no," then, to the support of the speaker's decision.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative, as follows: yeas 67, nays 83.

Thus the appeal from the decision of the speaker was sustained.

Mr. Arnold said he supposed he might now be allowed to proceed in order.

The speaker said that the gentleman from Tenn. (Mr. Arnold), having been called to order only for irrelevant remarks, would now be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. Arnold said he would endeavor to proceed in order.

The speaker said, to avoid further difficulty, he would state to the gentleman that this was a mere question of order, and now, after the decision of the house, the debate must be confined strictly to the limits of the rule.

Mr. Arnold said he had been afraid of that.—[Laughter.] He was of the opinion that the motion might be made to the house that he should be permitted to reply to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. Gilmer wished to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. Arnold said he understood the proposition the gentleman wished to make, and could not agree to it. If it would not be in order to exhibit his statistics to the house and the country, and run a parallel between the misery, poverty and wretchedness of New England, and the prosperity, buoyancy and hope of Tennessee, this opportunity of speaking could avail him nothing. If he could not do this, he must die as gracefully as he could. He could not expect to die as gracefully as Caesar did at the foot of Pompey's statue; but he was situated a little like Caesar, in this respect, and he might say to the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams),—"Et tu Brute!" (General laughter.)

Under the circumstances of this case, he should unquestionably be justified before the world, and by his constituents, in writing out his speech and publishing his statistics; he would be following the example of the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts in this respect, and he might say to the gentleman of the hon. gentleman from N. Hampshire, (Mr. Burke), whose speech was a written one. Therefore, as they seemed to apply the rules to him, he would withdraw the motion for reconsideration; and he supposed they would adjourn, go home, and take dinner.

Mr. Hopkins then moved that the house adjourn, and the house adjourned.

THE TRADE OF THE LAKES.

GENERAL TALLMAGE'S ADDRESS. We were much surprised by some of the statements in relation to this trade in the speech of Gen. James Tallmage before the American Institute, New York, inserted in a recent number of the Register, but without leisure at the moment to examine them. An article in the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser of the 29th ult. contests the accuracy of those statements. It says: "In alluding to the effects of the British system of high duties, upon American products when carried in American bottoms, as throwing a large proportion of that commerce into the hands of British owners, to be transported in British bottoms, Gen. Tallmage makes the following statement, professing to be derived from the documents sent to congress 2d March, 1841, showing the tonnage and vessels which entered the United States in 1840:

"The commerce and navigation on the Western Lakes, exhibit a case yet more extraordinary:
Lakes, like a case yet more extraordinary:

Lake Ontario.	Vessels.	Tonnage.
American,	599	63,517
British,	1,011	215,050
Lake Erie.
Detroit—American,	7	593
" British,	155	12,000

Buffalo, Cleveland and other places, seem to be omitted; and the tables are too imperfect to state the commerce of the Upper Lakes."

The figures here given for number of vessels, must, of course, be intended for cruisers.

Now what does this statement mean? Is it pretended, in the face and eyes of facts, that the commerce of Lake Erie is almost entirely in the hands of the British, and carried on in the British vessels? The reverse of this is known to be the case by every man of common intelligence, who has ever heard of the commercial transactions on our western waters! To show the glaring error of Gen. Tallmage's statement, with regard to the business of Detroit, we give the amount of tonnage registered at Detroit for the year 1850—All American vessels—derived from an official source. There were 22 steamboats, 36 schooners, 8 sloops, 1 brig, and 1 ship, with an aggregate tonnage of 7,472 tons. Multiplying the entrances of these craft by their tonnage, would show the actual American tonnage entering: the port of Detroit during 1850. The returns of 1841 would show an increase over this result. So much for the "77" entrances of American vessels, with the grand total of "5937" tons produced by their aggregated business! The number of British vessels on this lake, besides their armed steamers, we have no positive means of knowing—it cannot, however, much exceed half a dozen. On Lake Ontario the number is—We incline to think—somewhat larger than the number of American vessels.

The tonnage registered at Buffalo is now, in round numbers, 15,000 tons—at Cleveland nearly 10,000 more—making some 33,000 tons of American tonnage on this lake, registered at only the three principal ports. We shall ere long be in possession of official returns from the different ports of the lake, which will furnish when published a full exhibit of the different craft now employed upon its waters.

Again; Gov. Tallmage says—"The tolls on the Welland Canal suddenly rose from $12,000 to $50,000 averaging (Halifax) and the tolls and freight of the New York Canals fell a corresponding amount, after the treaty with England, which sacrificed us to the West India trade."

We should like to know at what time the tolls of the Welland Canal were swelled to any such amount. The business done through that channel has been a trifle greater this season than for any previous season, and the tolls received, up to the 31st October, was but $18,583, Halifax.

The great inaccuracy of General Tallmage's statistics, show that in his desire to make out his case, he is not quite so particular about his facts as is desirable to a right understanding of the whole ground.—We certainly have not—and need not have—any anxiety to bolster up the business of our lake, and magnify its importance; but we desire that it be not so grossly misrepresented or misunderstood before so eminent and influential a society as the American Institute, as to be incorporated in its published proceedings, and circulated throughout the world as a true record.

MARYLAND.

ANNUAL MESSAGE OF THE EXECUTIVE.

TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

Gentlemen of the senate, and of the house of delegates,

The nature and extent of our pecuniary embarrassments are so well understood, that it is only necessary, at the present time, to notice the new aspect which they have assumed since the last session of the legislature. The law, then passed, for assessing and taxing the whole property of the state, was intended to provide a permanent revenue, of sufficient amount to pay the interest of the public debt punctually as it became due. But as it was known that some time must elapse, before the proceeds of the tax could be collected and paid into the treasury, the commission-ers of loans were authorized to borrow five hundred thousand dollars, for the purpose of supplying the deficiency in the revenue for the present year. Loans were obtained, principally from the banks, to the amount of about four hundred thousand dollars, which enabled him to discharge the interest of "the public debt on the first of Jan. and the first of Feb. to be; it was found impossible to borrow a sufficient sum for the next quarterly payment, and I regret to say that the state is without the means of paying the interest which will become due on the first of January. It will be understood however, both at home and abroad, that the legislature, in laying a permanent tax for paying the interest of the public debt, are authorizing a loan for supplying the temporary deficiency of the revenue, did all that was then in their power to comply with the obligations of the state. The assessment returns have not been received from all the counties, and the amount of taxable property in the state is not yet ascertained. It will probably fall short of the general estimate, and in that case a higher rate of taxation, than is provided for by the bill of last session, will be required to meet the increasing demands on the treasury.

The public debt is now fifteen millions two hundred and thirteen thousand dollars, of which, about ten millions may be considered as bearing on the state. The subscription of three millions to the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, was paid in state bonds, and will not yet be needed, and are not yet chargeable with interest. The previous subscriptions to that work, amounting to one million of dollars, have yielded a revenue more than sufficient to pay the interest on that portion of the public debt. The Baltimore and Susquehanna rail road company, having been compelled to apply its net revenue to the payment of old debts, has been unable, as yet, to contribute any thing towards the relief of the treasury. But its profits are gradually increasing, and its debts are nearly extinguished. In September last, it paid seven thousand dollars to the treasurer, and there is very little doubt that the future profits of the work will supply the means of paying a considerable portion of interest on that part of the debt which was contracted for its use. On the loan of one million of dollars to the Tide Water canal company, no part of the interest has been received since the first of last January. The loans and subscriptions to the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, amounting to more than seven millions of dollars, have been the principal cause of the heavy embarrassments in which the state is now involved; and until that work is completed to Cumberland, the interest on the whole investment will continue to be a charge on the treasury. While it is therefore of the utmost importance to finish the canal, it is evident that we have not the means of providing funds for that purpose. It would be unavailing to attempt to borrow money at present, on the credit of the state, or to force out a new issue of bonds, when those which have already been offered for sale are rejected in every market.

[BANKS.]

The banks of this state have persisted so long in refusing to redeem their notes, that there is no reason to expect that they will return of their own accord to the path marked out to them by their charters. It is now a question for the legislature to determine, how much longer they are to be permitted to disregard the laws of the state and the rights of the community.

The opinion may still be entertained, that the state banks can never be properly regulated without the aid of a national bank; and that as their present condition is attributable to the want of such an institution, no remedy can be provided by state legislation. A reference to the banking system of England will show how far a great, general, national institution, connected with the government, has had the effect of limiting the number, or regulating the issues of local or private banks.

Country banks began to spring up every part of England immediately after the war of the revolution, and continued to increase till the year 1793, when a redundant currency and a general spirit of speculation and over trading produced a violent reaction, and consequently "an extent of misery and bankruptcy which until then had never been known in that country." Three hundred and fifty banks had been in full operation; and of this number, one hundred stopped payment, and upwards of fifty were entirely destroyed.

In 1797, another crisis occurred. In the latter part of the previous year, heavy demands were made on the country banks; and some of these failing, all confidence was at an end, and the Bank of England was reduced to so great an extremity as to be compelled to suspend specie payments; which were not resumed till the year 1800.

In 1816 and the two previous years, two hundred and forty country banks stopped payment, of which number, eighty-nine entirely failed. One pound notes were then in circulation, and to use the words of the writer, from whom these statements are taken—"the failures that then occurred, affected the industrious classes, swallowing up in an instant the fruits of a long life of laborious exertion.

In 1823 confidence had revived; and the banks began, as usual, to enlarge their issues; and in the two following years, the amount of their paper in circulation was increased nearly fifty per cent. Speculation, overtrading and extravagance immediately ensued, and in 1825, the banks were again in another scene of distress and bankruptcy.

Nothing is more common than to ascribe public embarrassments to some other cause than the real one, and consequently to provide remedies which frequently aggravate the evil. Prior to the explosion in 1825, a bank partnership could not consist of more than six persons, and it was supposed that the mischiefs of the banking system were caused in a great measure by that regulation. Accordingly, joint stock companies were established, without any limitation as to the number of partners.

Three of these companies commenced operations in the year 1836; in 1836, the number had increased to fifty-six; in 1836 forty-five companies were formed; and many of these having numerous branches, it was computed that two hundred joint stock banks were established in that year. They immediately commenced the work of adding to a paper currency, already redundant, and continued to do so until the first of December, 1836; when the credit system having been strained to its utmost limits, suddenly gave way, and a change from artificial prosperity to real distress such as invariably attends the excessive use of paper money, immediately took place in every part of England.

The sketch of the English banking system shows that the Bank of England has, for a century past, whether in time of peace or war, or during the continuance of specie payments or a general suspension, has been unable to control joint stock or private banks, or to regulate their issues, or even to protect itself from the effect of their mismanagement. It is therefore difficult to conceive, how the banking system of the United States, pushed as it generally is to the very verge of bankruptcy, can be regulated by a national bank or a fiscal corporation. There can be very little doubt, however, that the banks of every state may be regulated by the authority from which they derive their charters.

Whether the banks of this state ever intend to redeem their notes is altogether uncertain; though there has been occasionally a rumor that they were ready to resume, whenever a similar movement was made by the banks of Pennsylvania, Virginia and the west. But to make resumption in Maryland dependent on the resumption elsewhere, is to postpone it to an indefinite period, and to leave the banks without any permitted to act as they pleased, till those of other states chose to comply with their obligations, the consequence might be, that instead of encouraging each other to resume they would enter into a general combination to prevent it.

It has been frequently remarked, that the people owe the banks, and the banks owe the people; and that if the first will pay the latter will do the same. Individuals, and not the people are indebted to the banks, and are often accommodated and indulged at the expense of the whole community. The great mass of the people, especially in the country, do not apply for bank loans, and it is only the few who they did; but they all have an interest in the value of the paper which is daily passing through their hands.

The reason, generally assigned by the banks for not resuming is, that it cannot be done without serious injury to the community. Individuals might give the same reason for not paying their debts, that is, that they could not, and the money which they have loaned out, without putting their debtors to inconvenience. This excuse might be urged at all times, and if sufficient, would justify a perpetual suspension. It has also been urged, as a reason for not resuming, that the exchanges are too much in favor of the eastern cities. Bank notes are at a discount of three or four per cent. in New York, because they are not paid in specie. This is not the rate of exchange between the two cities, but a difference of value between the paper of their respective banks. And it is hardly necessary to add, that the depreciation in the paper of our banks, having been caused by their refusal to redeem, ought not to be urged as a reason for their continued suspension.

It is supposed that the banks of this state find it more difficult to redeem their paper, because they are not permitted, like those of New York, to issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars; and thus the failure to comply with that promise is suggested as the reason for their refusing to resume. They would gain by the destruction of the small notes, in proportion to the loss of the public; and this is the only advantage they could derive from their issue. If an inferior currency had not already banished specie from circulation, the banks might succeed in drawing it from the pockets of the people by means of their one dollar bills. But if they kept it in their vaults, they would gain nothing by the operation; and if they parted with it, their liabilities would be increased in proportion to the amount of their new issues. The risk of suspension would be increased in a much greater proportion because the small notes would pass into the hands of a greater number of citizens, and the amount of suffering from the new issues, and for that reason, are more likely to make a run upon the banks.

Admitting, however, that the privilege of issuing small bills might be convenient to the banks, the proper inquiry is, whether it would be of any advantage to the community. The people are already disappointed any material benefit from a resumption of specie payments, while corporations and individuals are permitted to issue and circulate every description of small notes. To restore the currency of the state to its proper condition it is necessary to compel the banks to resume specie payments, and to allow no other means to prevent them from issuing, receiving, or paying out, any notes of a less denomination than five dollars; to prohibit other corporations, as well as individuals, from issuing paper of any kind for circulation; and to get rid of the rail road orders, which the people are daily receiving in exchange for their specie.

These orders are fast reaching the point of depression, at which they will cease to be a currency; and it has been proposed to raise their value, by throwing upon the banks the responsibility of redeeming them. It is well to consider, whether the banks have a right to adopt the issues of the rail road orders, and what would be the effect of such an arrangement on the general currency of the state. They were authorized, by an act of last session, to receive and pay out these orders, which they could not previously do without violating the laws. But they were not authorized to adopt them as their own currency, or to become answerable for their redemption, or to make specie payments which might be sustained by their depreciation. If they have a right to use their funds in this manner for the purpose of raising the value of the rail road orders, they have equal authority to enter into an arrangement with the city of Philadelphia for redeeming the notes of the United States bank.

But the banks could not assume the payment of the rail road orders, if they had a right to do it, without injuring their own credit, and increasing the difficulty of resuming specie payments. They are now unable or unwilling to redeem their own paper, reduced as it is in amount; and if they were to assume the payment of a million and a half of dollars, in addition to the present amount, it would be the payment of a debt, which they were in a state of insolvency, and their own notes, instead of being at a discount of three or four per cent. would probably sink to the level of the rail road currency. It is contended, that the proposed arrangement, if carried into effect, would furnish the banks with the means of resuming specie payments, and that the payment of the rail road orders, which might be required for change, and the rest would be returned to the banks. Whether they were kept in circulation or not, the liabilities of the banks would be increased in proportion to the amount assumed, while their additional means of meeting them would consist of unavailable stock. If the adoption of the rail road orders would enable the banks to resume, it would at the same time prevent the people from deriving any benefit from specie payments. They would be real currency, and the principle of specie circulation would be a nominal and deceptive one, that will enable the banks to evade their obligations.

The rail road orders were issued and received without the slightest expectation that the banks would ever be required to redeem them. The rail road companies entered into contracts, in July, 1840, for the extension of their work from Harper's Ferry to Cumberland. They had previously consented to receive city stock to the amount of three millions of dollars, which sum the city of Baltimore had subscribed for the construction of that part of the road. But as the stock could not be sold without a great loss, the companies were obliged to take it at the basis of a currency; which, it was said, would afford important advantages to the public, as well as the most undoubted security to the holders. This scheme has enabled the rail road company to dispose of city stock, to the amount of one million five hundred thousand dollars, at its par value; and to transfer to the holders of their certificates, the risk and loss which they were not willing to encounter themselves of selling it in the market.

The city of Baltimore and the rail road company have had all the benefit of the stock orders; the first, in saving the interest on an equal amount of stock; and the second, in making the interest on the same work. On the other hand, the banks were embarrassed by the measures that relieved the rail road company. In 1839, they advanced five hundred thousand dollars on account of the city subscription, because they were informed, that, without a loan to that amount, the commencement of the road, beyond Harper's Ferry, would be postponed; they have since had a large portion of their own paper displaced and their profits diminished, by the circulation of the rail road orders; and now they are expected to repair the loss, which the depreciation of those orders has occasioned to the public.

The banks are in no condition to perform any act of supererogation. They ought to be compelled, promptly and unconditionally, to redeem their own paper, meet their own liabilities, and comply with all the conditions of their charters; but it would seem to be unreasonable and unjust to make them answerable for the acts of other corporations, or for the redemption of any other paper than their own.

A further modification of the tariff, with a view to the protection of particular interests, has been made the subject of legislative resolutions in several of the states; and has been recently pressed upon public attention with so much earnestness, that I have been induced to submit a few observations, respecting the probable effect of such a policy upon the interests of the agricultural states.

The advocates of this policy complain of the heavy burdens, imposed by other nations on our flour, grain and tobacco; and insist, as a proper measure of retaliation, that high duties should be laid upon the foreign articles as come in competition with our domestic manufactures. It is thus proposed to compensate the agricultural states, for the restrictions imposed on the sale and consumption of their produce, by subjecting them to new burdens at home for the benefit of other sections of the union. It can hardly be expected that increased duties at home will cause a reduction of duties in other countries, and it is well to consider the value of our present markets, before we incur the risk of making them worse. Great Britain, in pursuance of her own policy, which has been introduced into the country as the true American system, restricts the importation of breadstuffs with a view of protecting her agricultural interests. Her restrictions on our exports are not greater than ours have frequently been upon her manufactures; and we have no reason to complain, as long as she admits our products on the same conditions that are imposed on those of other countries. In times of scarcity she admits our flour and grain, on the payment of increased duties; and it must be recollected that her corn laws do not extend to her colonial possessions, which furnish extensive markets, not only for our agricultural produce but also for our manufactures. In the year, ending the last of September, 1840, the domestic exports from the United States amounted to sixty-four millions of dollars. In that amount the following agricultural productions are included:

1,717,019 bushels of wheat, valued at	$1,620,631
1,817,239 barrels of flour	6,939,637
286,611 bushels of corn	88,807
1,019,121 barrels of mixed meal	41,800
49,293 bushels of rye flour	156,913
Rye, oats, peas, and beans	76,604
74,876 barrels of ship bread	292,167
15,466 kegs do.
33,122 hogheads of tobacco	3,776,770
495,366 pieces of cotton	141,983,922
24,029 tierces of rice	418,577
	42,402,499

$55,937,232

The remainder of the sixty-four millions is made up of the productions of the forest and sea, and of various articles of domestic manufactures, such as hats, saddlery, coaches and other carriages, boots and shoes and household furniture. The manufactures of iron, and of iron and steel, amounted to nearly one hundred thousand dollars; and hence it may be seen how materially this branch of domestic industry depends on the admission of foreign iron at a low rate.

While our domestic exports to Great Britain and her dominions exceeded sixty-four millions, our imports fell short of forty millions. The domestic exports to the rest of the world amounted to less than fifty millions, and our imports to sixty-eight millions; and of the amount imported, six millions were exported to the British dominions. Our exports and imports, of course, vary from year to year, but the statement now given will show, that our trade with England is of the utmost importance to the whole union, and especially to the agricultural states. It will show too, that we give encouragement to foreign industry, by purchasing British manufactures. Great Britain gives encouragement to that immense amount of American industry, which is employed in the production and transportation of the cotton, tobacco, flour, grain, and other articles which she receives in return.

It may be supposed that Great Britain will receive an equal amount of American produce, whether we increase the duties on her manufactures, or leave them at the present rate. To accomplish the purposes of the American system, it will be necessary to regulate the tariff in such a manner as to exclude, or materially diminish the importation of foreign manufactures, and give our own the benefit of the home market. Great Britain would then perceive that her export trade to this country was of very little value, and might be induced to give a preference to other nations, and exclude our broad-stuffs from her market.

She could not procure an immediate supply of tobacco from other countries; but, by means of discriminating duties, she might encourage the cultivation of it in every climate adapted to its growth. Admitting, however, that a protective tariff would not diminish our exports, or deprive us of our present markets, the question arises, whether it would not operate as a tax on the American industry, and as a discouragement to the various pursuits in which the nine-tenths of the people are now engaged, and which they think they have a right to follow without interruption from the government. It is impossible to state, in a message, all the objections that might be urged against a protective system; and my object is merely to point out some of its principal evils.

High duties protect only such articles as are not produced in sufficient abundance to supply the home demand, and which, of course, are not sent to foreign markets. Such articles, as not only supply the home market, but are also sent abroad for sale, can receive no protection from duties and restrictions. In England the landed interest is protected by this system, because the quantity of grain is not sufficient for the wants of the English people. The British manufacturers receive no encouragement from it, because they must supply the home market, and are exported to other countries in order to receive the price they can receive in from bounties, and from free admission of the foreign materials of which they are made.

But those who are engaged in manufactures, commerce and trade, and all who are consumers and not producers of broad-stuffs in that country, are subjected to a heavy expense and consequent diminution of their profits, for the purpose of protecting the landed interest; and they are compelled to pay an advanced price, not only on the grain produced in England, but on that which is received from other countries.

In this country, the amount of agricultural produce is much greater than will supply the home demand, and the surplus is sent abroad to contend for the markets of the world. The productions, whether of the land or sea, or of domestic manufactures, or mechanical labor, which are exported to foreign markets, require no protection, and can receive none, from a system of duties and restrictions. But all who are engaged in producing the various articles, which now supply the home market, are subjected to the loss of their profits by being compelled to pay higher prices for whatever they are obliged to use or consume; and their capital and industry would be taxed and discouraged for the purpose of ensuring greater profits to those who have thought proper to engage in other pursuits.

The protective policy diminishes the value of land in two ways, first by lessening the profits of agriculture, and secondly by diverting capital from agricultural investments.

It reduces the value of labor, by taxing the means of subsistence, and diminishing the amount of goods consumed, without lessening the amount of money paid for them by the consumers.

It encourages smuggling, increases the number of revenue officers, and multiplies crimes and punishments.

The protective policy in this country, operates unequally on different interests, and on different sections of the country; and falls more heavily on the business of the country than of the towns.

It shackles the commerce of the U. States, and operates as a bounty on the trade of the neighboring British provinces.

It induces a sudden extension of the manufacturing business beyond the existing capital of the country, which cannot be immediately withdrawn from other pursuits; and fictitious capital must therefore be supplied by new banks created for that purpose. New companies, without skill or experience, and trading on borrowed capital, soon begin to be embarrassed; and then it is found that a new tariff is required to remedy the defects of the old. The tariff of 1824 was thus followed by the tariff of 1825; and the effect of these measures, upon various interests of the country, may be inferred from the encouragement they given to ship building; a branch of business which gives employment and support to a greater number of mechanics, tradesmen and laborers, than the building of companies of the United States. Previous to 1824, copper, iron, hemp, sail duck, and other materials for ship building, were charged with oppressive duties; which were raised by the tariff of that year to so enormous a rate, that it seemed to be the determination of the government to drive our ships from the ocean. According to the statement made by Mr. Webster in his speech on the tariff bill, the duties on the materials used in the construction and equipment of a ship of 359 tons, with copper fastening but not with a copper bottom, amounted to fourteen hundred dollars. This tax of nearly four dollars a ton did not afford sufficient encouragement to the building of American ships; and was raised to the proper scale of protection by the tariff of 1828.

It has been seriously contended, that the extensive cultivation of cotton in the southern states is the effect of the American system; though no explanation is given why it did not have the same effect in the demand for it. The sugar of Louisiana has certainly been protected by the tariff, because the quantity produced was not sufficient to supply the home demand. It is doubtful however, whether the sugar planters have gained as much by the enhanced value of their crops, as they have lost by the higher price of the materials of which their sugar is composed. It is hardly necessary to show that the duty on cotton is entirely inoperative; and that no article, which is cheaper at home than elsewhere, and is sent abroad to find better markets, can receive the least protection from duties, and restrictions. Cotton might be brought into the United States from Egypt, and sold at a lower price for the interests of the southern states; because it would only be making a circuitous voyage to France or England, instead of being exported directly to those countries from the place of its growth.

The main principle of the protective policy is, that every country ought to produce for itself, whatever is required for the use of its inhabitants, and to provide a home market for the produce of its own industry. If this principle were carried into practice, all commercial intercourse between nations would cease, the great cities of the world would be converted into ruins; ships would no longer be seen traversing the ocean, and commerce would be banished from the face of the globe. It may be supposed, however, that a policy, which would not admit of universal application, might be beneficial to the United States, or any other country, whose diversity of climate and resources enabled it, with proper encouragement, to furnish all the necessities and comforts of life. This is the policy which the friends of domestic industry so earnestly recommend. If it were adopted, and could possibly be carried into effect, our exports and imports would cease, our navy and shipping would be destroyed; the principal source of foreign revenue would be cut off; the canals and roads, and the manufacturing cities, would be rendered unprofitable and useless; agriculture, commerce, and manufactures would perish from want of support; the southern states would become a desert, and our eastern brethren might set out on a new pilgrimage, and retire into some wilderness where the littleness of man had not been striving against the power of God.

But we may say that the advocates of a home-market and domestic supplies, only wish to apply their doctrines to particular branches of our foreign trade; and do not intend to destroy it altogether. They consider it specially desirable to provide a home market for the immense amount of cotton which is exported to other countries; and to employ our own capital in manufacturing our own goods, and receiving in return for it. It would then be found, that in getting rid of one difficulty, we would encounter another, for instead of exporting the raw material, we should be obliged to depend on foreign markets for the sale of it in a new form; and whether our exports consisted of manufactures or agricultural produce, we should be compelled to receive the same foreign productions in return; and it might still be said, that we were encouraging the industry of other nations, and neglecting the interests of our own citizens.

The present state of our foreign relations points out the only object which ought to be kept in view in laying duties and imposts; and that is, to provide a revenue for the defence of the country. The greatest amount of revenue is derived from moderate duties, which neither give encouragement to smuggling, nor materially diminish the consumption of the articles on which they are laid. The hope is still entertained of the question of duty between the United States and Great Britain may be amicably adjusted; and that there will be no serious interruption of the commercial intercourse and friendly relations which are of so much importance to both nations. But the grounds of controversy are becoming so complicated, that it is impossible to tell how soon a different state of things may arise; and it is therefore the wisest course to make preparations for defence, not with the view of bringing on hostilities with any power, but to meet aggression from whatever quarter it may come.

Hitherto, we have trusted too much to the justice and moderation of other governments; and even now, while dangers appear to be thickening around us, we are forming home leagues, not to repel foreign invasion, but to raise the price of domestic goods; and the congress of the United States, having already relinquished the proceeds of the public lands which were to be used for the purpose of raising a fleet, are debating whether a bill shall be brought in for increasing the revenue from imposts, to enable the proprietors of iron foundries, salt works, and manufacturing establishments to make a larger profit on their investments.

The security of defence against a naval power are perhaps of more importance to Maryland than to any other state in the union. A hostile fleet having possession of the Chesapeake bay, might cut off the whole of our trade, destroy our villages, and lay waste a large portion of the state. It would be impossible to guard every part of our shores, and while our forces were preparing to defend one point, the enemy might land in a different direction, plunder a whole neighborhood, and return in safety to their ships. The injury would not be confined to Maryland, or to the states bordering on the Chesapeake. The inland trade between the northern and southern states would be interrupted, the produce of a large portion of the country would be deprived of its most convenient outlet, the militia of the neighboring states would be continually called from their homes, and the enemy, after drawing the attention of the government from other points, might make an unexpected attack in some distant quarter of the union. This is the worst of the system, and it is possibly proper, but a description of what actually occurred during the last war.

These evils, and the disgrace attending them, may be avoided by having, in addition to our regular naval force, a sufficient number of steam frigates to guard the Chesapeake bay. In case of war, they might be stationed in Hampton Roads, where they could be ready for action, and could be called to assist in defending the fortifications at Old Point. They might follow a superior fleet, if their own force was greater than that of the steam vessels which accompanied it, prevent it from landing troops or ascending our rivers, and cut off its communication with the sea. But the probability is, that a large portion of our navy would be required to occupy a permanent position in our waters, while we had a strong disposable force to check its operations and take advantage of any accident or disaster that might befall it. In calling the attention of the legislature to this subject, I wish to be understood as only calling for the attention of the public to a subject, which is the duty of the general government to extend to every state in the union.

WM. GRASON.

LOUISIANA AND THE TARIFF.

BY A NATIVE OF LOUISIANA.

THE TARIFF.

This subject has ever been, and must continue to be, one of extreme difficulty. Through the duties on imports the national government has chiefly depended since its organization for the means to carry into effect its constitutional powers. The country now and itself unfortunately divided upon this mode of raising a revenue, considered, until lately, as almost inherent to our form of government. The question with our legislators should be—are the people of these United States ready for direct taxation, or not? If not, indirect taxes, or in other words, duties on foreign merchandise, must be continued to an amount adequate to the wants of the federal government. If so, where is the justice, in re-modelling the tariff, not to protect the labor of our own people against the labor of our foreign laborers. Here Mr. Benjamin Franklin said "that it was the duty of government to encourage, and protect industry in all shapes, in all instances, and by all means, and to root out indolence, and sloth, and idleness, and to root out all that is am not mistaken, was a disciple of the free trade school—so was Adam Smith, if not its very father. Let us hear him, page 8.

"Whatever tends to lessen the number of artificers and manufacturers, tends to diminish the home market, the best of all markets for the rude product of the soil, and still further to discourage agriculture."

This is sound doctrine, and in effect, what would become of England, if now, that by the loss of ten days' food, perturbation is sent throughout her social order, she were by a free importation of grain, to be enabled to produce 20 per cent. more? Why, she would be transferring the power of feeding her own people to the Crimea, to the United States, or any other large grain country.

The freedom of a people depends upon the proportion of necessities of life they possess within themselves—the larger the proportion, the greater the freedom. Complete freedom is where a people can live without their neighbor, when that neighbor shows himself unfriendly. Our union is free because we possess within it every necessary of life, and that to preserve such necessities, we have only to guard them against foreign labor, by sustaining at the cost of production our agriculture and industry.

France is said to have twelve millions of operatives and laborers. Suppose that, allured by that popular word, "free trade," she were to debase her agriculture and manufactures so as to compel the masters to reduce the wages of their servants 500 cents; it would be a reduction of the capital stock of 600,000 francs per day, which multiplied by three hundred working days, would make for the year 180 millions of francs. Let any one acquainted with the condition of the working class of that country say how long such a state of things could last. The same rule applied to England would to every kingdom in Europe. Can we then expect from Europe free trade in exchange for our free trade?

Indeed, if France were placed in this condition, that she had to sacrifice all her Parisian bankers, or debase her manual labor 50 cents, I would say, without hesitation, sacrifice your bankers; because, without a working class, at work, no wealth, no wealth, whilst on the part of the operatives, it would be a loss of subsistence. Society can live without wealth, whilst it cannot sustain itself without food; the one is a matter of vanity, the other a matter of life.

If the United States were to be reduced to the same alternative towards England, and she had to part with her navy, or with her working power by 50 per cent. of debasement, a mode of destruction as rapid as any other, if not more so, I would say again, give up our navy, however proud we may be of it; because, without our working power, it would be a useless expense, beyond our means to bear, and because we would have nothing worth keeping, our liberty being gone; whilst, by retaining our working power, we would soon be able to build another navy.

The theory of free trade, by Adam Smith, is a complete refutation of his own doctrine before quoted. In penning the one, he was the economist of Great Britain; in penning the other, he was the economist of the world. Let us now hear England, through the mouth of McCulloch, page 119.

"Our establishments for spinning, weaving, printing, bleaching, &c. are infinitely more complete and perfect than any that exist elsewhere; the division of labor in them is carried to an incomparably greater extent; the workmen are trained from infancy to industrious habits, and have attained that peculiar degree of skill and great head in the performance of their several tasks, that can only be attained by long and unremitted application to the same employment. Why, then, having all these advantages on our side, should we not keep the start we have gained? On every other people that attempt to set up manufactures, we have the greatest superiority, and we are, as compared with us. Their establishments cannot, at first, be sufficiently large to enable the division of employments to be carried to any considerable extent; at the same time that expertness in manipulation, and in the details of the various processes, can only be attained by a long and unremitted application to the same task. Hence, we are enabled to conclude that such such beginners, having to withstand the competition of those who have already arrived at a very high degree of perfection in the art, must be immediately driven out of every market equally accessible to both parties; and that nothing but the aid derived from restrictive regulations, such as the tariff, can prevent the total destruction of their establishments." &c.

Thus it is self-evident that the free trade contemplated by England and her economists, was the monopoly for her own operatives of the working power for the clothing of the human family; a monopoly to the exclusion of all other nations, and a monopoly attempting competition. The plan was gigantic, and worthy of Great Britain.

Russia was the first to be seduced by the popular and misapplied word "commercial freedom," and she entered the arena full of hopes. Let her own minister of commerce explain the result, after a few years' experience. "It offers a continual encouragement to the manufactures of other countries, and its own manufactures perish in the struggle, which they are as yet unable to maintain. It is with the most lively feelings of regret, we acknowledge, it is our own poor experience which enables us to see the truth of this statement. The evils which it details, have been realized in Russia and Poland, since the conclusion of the act of the 7th and 19th December, 1818. Agriculture without a market, industry without protection, languish and decline. Spices are exported, and the most solid houses are shaken. The public prosperity would soon feel the wound inflicted on private fortunes, if new regulations did not promptly change the actual state of affairs. The emperor, however, would not yield to representations; he desired to try the new experiment during a longer period; but he was particularly and above all things desirous that the reproach of leaving his engagements unfulfilled, should not attach to him; moreover, he still flattered himself that less disastrous years might compensate for the losses our trade had experienced at the first moment of the crisis; and it is only after losses have reached their height, that events have proved that our agriculture and our commerce, as well as our manufacturing industry, are not only to be depressed, but brought to the brink of ruin, that his imperial majesty formed the resolution," &c. &c.

The remedy applied by the emperor of Russia was exactly that pointed out by McCulloch, to wit: restrictive regulations and prohibitions, with which the present Russian tariff abounds. And indeed that is the true meaning of free trade. Home trade, judiciously guarded against the debasement by foreign competition, whereby the labor of the operative is protected, his wages depending upon the value of his labor. And this is in strict accordance with Adam Smith's doctrine, for he says "that the home market is the most important of all markets; and that whatever tends to diminish the number of artificers and manufacturers, tends to diminish the home market."

McCulloch, (page 413,) estimates the quantity of cotton consumed in G. Britain, at 240,000,000 lbs. which, when manufactured, he values at £31,000,000 sterling.

This amount he distributes as follows:

Spinning material, 240,000,000	47,000,000
Wages of 700,000 weavers, spinners, bleachers, &c.	18,000,000
Wages of 100,000 engineers, machine makers, saw mills, joiners, &c.	3,000,000
Profits of the manufacturers, wages of superintendence, sums to purchase coals, &c.	6,000,000
	£74,000,000

From which it is seen that of the above 314,000,000 pounds sterling of manufactured cottons, the producers of that commodity receive

The operatives thereupon, 21.34
Whilst the masters for the interest on their capital, the expenses of superintendence, of coals, &c. only receive, 6.54

The same proportions are applicable to the United States. The whole of this working power, for all other manufacturers. Is it not self-evident, that by far the largest interest involved in the tariff question, is that of our laborers and operatives, who, for political or other purposes, are used by the designing to throw odium upon the masters, the ruin of whom would immediately carry ruin to these very laborers.

The protection of home labor by a judicious tariff, does not produce high prices, but the very reverse, as is fully evidenced by our commercial history.

A few examples become here necessary, but first of all it is well that the modes operandi of the British manufacturers should be well understood. Home trade is the best, so says Adam Smith, and so is the truth, equally applicable to the American and British manufacturers. To the home market, therefore, the manufacturer looks for his profits, and to foreign markets for his surplus production. This surplus, he the loss which it may, must be forced into consumption. The accumulation is death to production—so force consumption at home is to debase production in its best market—to debase production is to debase the labor of the operatives; labor being an essencomponent of production, invariably moving with it in adverse or favorable circumstances, and sharing all its fluctuations as an indivisible whole. Thus it is that the British government, as the natural guardian of the people:

1. Protect the wages of their operatives and laborers against debasement from foreign labor, by all means in their power. Hence the origin of their corn laws, which may serve as their definition of the free trade doctrine of the operatives. And so it is.

2. Use every exertion to open new markets by inculcating throughout the world their principles of free trade, as applied to foreign countries, that their operatives by debasement of foreign labor, may monopolize such labor, in order to secure their surplus production against losses which would otherwise render such surplus a delusion. And so it is. That Great Britain not being able to compete with foreign agriculture for corn, prohibits foreign corn, that the products of her agriculture may be free from debasement by foreign labor; and that as nothing but the aid derived from restrictive regulations and prohibitions, (see McCulloch,) will be efficient "to prevent the destruction of foreign manufactures by British operatives in all markets equally accessible to both parties." The free trade contemplated by her, as before said, is the free introduction in all markets of her manufactures, whereby her operatives, by their superiority in the art, will be able to effect the total destruction of all competition.

The British manufacturer, feeling safe at home against debasement by foreign labor, protects himself against over production and its sequence, debasement; by resorting to foreign markets for the disposal of his surplus, which surplus is there sold without any restriction, and at the price of production, as evidenced by the New York venue sale throughout every year.

The operation of this surplus is the same as that of gold used by the besieger to debase the besieged into a surrender, not otherwise obtainable; let the surrender take place, and then the gold is made to be returned with compound interest. Our manufacturers have not to be content with producing their manufactures at cost of production, but with the surplus of those manufactures at debased prices. The free trade advocated by Great Britain, is the gold of the besiegers.

And now for the proposition that high prices are not a forced consequence of a tariff which judiciously laid, but the reverse.

From which it is seen, that as home operatives have been protected against the debasement of their labor, home prices have ruled low; that as that protection has been decreased, home prices have ruled high. And the reason of this is obvious.

Our great competitor is England. She enters foreign markets with her surplus production or labor, whilst at home we have to meet her with our full labor. She fights for conquest, we fight for freedom; if she fail, she only suffers in her surplus, her home labor remains at the same value. On the other hand, if she succeed, our home labor is prostrated or destroyed, and her operatives take the place of our operatives. Then she dictates her terms, and then the consumers are made to pay the expenses of the war with a vengeance, and their folly for swallowing the bait presented by the magic word "free trade." The whole of this working power is simply suppose the cost of production of iron to be, both in England and the United States, $75 per ton, and the quantity required annually, for our home consumption, 150,000 tons, all supplied by our own mines and workshops; suppose, also, the duty to be taken off or reduced to 10 per cent. of the value of the iron, on the most, could debase prices $25, which would carry ruin to our workshops, and turn adrift our own operatives, whilst opening a large field for her own.

What is true regarding iron is equally true when applied to any other manufactured article in the U. S. Supply and demand may never be the governing rule in the matter, but it will diminish the supply one per cent. and prices may fall or advance 50 per cent. below or above the cost of production; which, the moment the equilibrium is deranged, ceases to influence prices, which are then ruled by speculation.

1818—Flax cottons, made of yarn No. 14, weighing 1 lb. per 3 yards, 28 cts. per yard; 1841—do. do. do. 10 1/2 cts. do.

For the last ten years, our southern planters have not been paying, for the very same goods, which form the great bulk of cotton manufactures, required by the people, more than 10¢ a lb cents; and they cannot produce the same quality of better quality in England, for they can hardly compete with us in Mexico and South America, whose markets we enter upon a footing of equality.

So it is with all kinds of iron works. Our engines and locomotives not only take the lead in the West Indies, but also find favorable markets in Russia, for which we now load large orders. Let the engine be applied to any other article of American manufacture or produce, and the same result will be arrived at. Mr. McDuffie, of South Carolina, in a speech to congress, in 1830, has maintained "that a tax on imports eventually falls on the producer of the exports, and is consequently equivalent to a tax on these exports."

This proposition has been adopted by a large portion of the south as an incontrovertible truth—hence the war which has ever since been waged against the tariff, to which it has become so popular to attribute all distress of the south. In Russia, the tariff is substituted as our government is, a little reflection would have shown how much akin it is that war to that so beautifully told of the "blinds against the stomach," and unfortunately for us, we have arrived at that period of our democracy, when we may deduce from our own history, that the moral lesson contained in that allegory. Tacitus has said:

"Pacis prudentia honesta ab deterioribus, nulla ab nexis discernunt."

How applicable these words of the great Latin historian to our present would be statesmen! The doctrine of Mr. McDuffie to be true would have required a correlative, to wit: That the producers of cotton, tobacco, &c. should have been the only consumers of the manufactures of cotton, tobacco, &c. Is it so? Yet said the Southern Review for November, 1831, speaking of the position assumed by Mr. McDuffie: "We have never seen even a plausible attempt to answer it." Why Mr. Reviewer! Because it required no answer—the proposition is false; it cannot stand with its own demonstration. It is hardly necessary to say that the cotton planter is selling $30,000 of cotton and consuming only $3,000 of foreign commodities, and this is a very large allowance, pays only duties on $3,000, whilst the other consumers of the union pay upon $27,000. This is, however, assuming that high prices are a forced consequence of the tariff, which is the cotton planter's charge.

Let us now enquire how far duties on foreign imports influence prices at home. This is the text of most of the violent appeals to the passions of the people, by our stump orators, and by many and many of our great politicians in congress—indeed we have come to that, that may be said to be the time of Aristophanes, "do not touch that stump, an orator will jump out of it." The people are appealed to, to put down the infamous duties upon those commodities emphatically called "necessaries of life"—those taxes upon the labor of the poor—and the feelings of the ignorant are worked upon, in exactly the same manner as those of the famished populace of old Europe, by designing politicians. Have we a populace? Is there not food here in abundance for every man that will work for it? Are we not a people possessing equal rights—equal privileges? Is there one profession—one public office closed against the son of the humblest citizen? Are we not now in the land that the good people of these United States suffer themselves to be lowered down and assimilated to the starving populace of Europe, by their stump demagogues and congress speech spinners?

Unfortunately, when party feelings predominate in a country, principles are soon made to make room for men—real patriots are discarded, and the ignorant becomes the tool of the designing—action, through rules deduced from experience, is replaced by agitation and idle theories—the most palpable truths are denied, and honesty, talent and patriotism are driven out of every public office by calumny and detraction. The demoralization in the government carries demoralization among the people, until the whole becomes a mass of corruption.

But to return to the tariff and its influence upon prices in our home market—it has already been shown that the very same cotton goods for which our cotton currency had to be paid in 1816, have been at the current these last ten years at and under 11 cents. Coarse woollens have been declining in the same proportion. Had it not been for the fostering action of the tariff, our cotton planters would have had to pay for the engines they use for ginning their cotton 50 per cent. more than they now pay for the very same article to our own manufacturers. It must be yet to the recollection of our sugar planters, that the first engines and mills used by them were imported from England, and that their cost was 9 to $10,000—whilst for machinery equally good, and equally powerful, they have now only to pay from four to four thousand five hundred dollars—and all this has been brought about by that so much abused and so little understood tariff. Let any honest cotton planter, with Mr. McDuffie's doctrine before him, take a full account of foreign manufactures used by him for his negroes and plantation utensils, and my word for it he will find the amount under $1,000 even with the charge of 100 hands—and supposing the value of these foreign goods to be enhanced 30 per cent. by the tariff, he will see that his contribution towards the expenses of the federal government is a mere trifle—and it is for this that the country must be agitated—that the harmony of our union must be jeopardized—that that our union itself is threatened to perish!

Let us now see the operations of the tariff upon necessary life, or rather articles agreed to be so considered by habit; for I contend that, thanks to that monster, the very naming of which drives certain demagogues into hysterics, we could now live within ourselves, in the middle of abundance, if it became necessary so to do; and that is the only rational meaning of "freedom."

These are not theories but facts! You anti-tariffers of all parties, answer this plain question. Did the free admission of coffee in the United States enhance its price in Cuba, or diminish the cost of it to that good people to whom you devote all the power of your lungs? Had you given less freedom to your tongues and more time to your hands, you would have discovered that the low prices of coffee, compared to the current value of sugars in 1811, had induced the planters of Cuba to give the preference to the latter over the former; and that the natural consequence was a decrease of production and increase of price, which gradually attained the enormous rate of 27 cents. per pound. In the meantime, however, coffee having become the golden article, planters returned to it, and its cultivation was increased to such an extent, that prices, unduly raised by the tariff, were shown, and have not since recovered, notwithstanding its admission, duty free, in the United States—and as to our would be populace, they are paying as much for it as in 1830, when the government was collecting five cents. per pound.

The excess of production of any commodity whatever over the wants of consumption, carries with it a depreciation far beyond that excess. Prices must ever be ruled by supply and demand, as exchanges by gold and silver, and whenever otherwise, take care of the squall, it may soon become a tornado.

Despair is blind—South Carolina in its agricultural distress assailed its best friend, "the tariff"—that dependence—its real enemies were the hands of Alabama, of Mississippi and Louisiana. This is the proper place for a brief account of the workings of cotton:

A few plain questions here again naturally present themselves for the anti-tariff gentry. Was there no tariff when cotton in 1817, two years after the peace, was selling in Liverpool at 23d for uplands? Had there been any material change to that tariff, when cotton, in 1822, declined to 5s 8 3/4? And when in 1824, it advanced to 9 s 10, and 1825, to 16 s 10 1/2? And when, in 1826, it receded to 6 s 8 1/2, and in 1827 it fell to 4 s 7 1/2? What have you gained by the compromise bill—a bill, the very name of which ought to put the nation to the blush—a bill which is a flagrant violation of the constitution, for it cannot be put into operation without destroying the uniformity of duties? In 1832, cottons were selling in Liverpool at 5 s 8, and 6 s 2 1/2; and in 1840, at 4 s 8, and 6 s 10 1/2.

South Carolina did not study her interest, whilst she was preparing to resist the federal government, she ought to have suddenly turned her forces against the great fields of Alabama, Louisiana and Mississippi, and destroyed some 5 or 600,000 bales of cotton, and then Uplands would have immediately advanced in Liverpool to 23d, and even more! But to the point: the above tables show:

That the extraordinary increase in 1826 of our cotton crops, depressed prices for the 5 years ending in 1830 to an average of 6 1/2.

That the crops from 1831 to 1836 having presented no extraordinary variation, average prices advanced to 9d.

That the large crops of 1837 and 1838 again reduced prices, the average prices for these two years having only been 7 1/2.

That the crop of 1839 having been a comparatively small one, prices advanced to an average of 8 1/2, notwithstanding the perturbation caused in England by a short crop of grain.

That with the large crop of 1840, again came depreciation, average prices having receded to 7d.

And all this is easily accounted for without touching the unfortunate tariff of 1816.

Golden days of the cotton planter and manufacturer, both using their utmost exertions to work their mines, until at length debasement, inherent to over supply, began to show itself. To meet this great destroyer of industry, the manufacturer applied himself most diligently and industriously to improve his machinery, and to increase his works, and to obtain compensation by lowering prices, quantities making up for the difference of profits. In this his success was wonderful.

On the other hand, the planter, to meet the depreciation in the value of his cotton, applied himself to increase his crops, that quantity might make up for the difference in price—exhausted lands were abandoned for more fertile soil, and Georgia, Carolina, Virginia and Maryland soon saw their working power gradually removing to the virgin forests and rich alluvial soil of Mississippi and Alabama, where it was soon ascertained that one hand could produce per annum 6 and in some places on 10 bales of cotton, whilst 2, and at most 3, could have been obtained in the best fields on the Atlantic shore. This really produced a revolution in the culture of cotton.

The whole crop of cotton in the United States, as above shown, amounted in 1830 to 319,655 bales. During the 10 years ending in 1830, 746,147 " " "

And during the 10 years ending in 1840,

1,171,293 " " "

1840, it gradually reached 2,171,293 " "

The valley of the Mississippi alone, during the last year, producing upwards of 216,000 bales more than the whole crop of the United States in 1830, and the Mississippi and Alabama together producing 1,409,345 bales, or 1,089,990 bales more than the total crop of the United States in 1830, and 663,098 bales more than the total crop of the United States in 1830!!!

Unfortunately for both manufacturer and planter, consumption could not keep pace with such gigantic strides, and both had gradually to submit to the inflexible rule of supply and demand, and to all the vicissitudes and inequalities to which the balance of power is so liable to a case so plain, so deranged equilibrium, has escaped sagacious Carolina.

Whatever may have been the iniquities of the tariff, the depreciation in the value of cotton cannot be placed at its door—that depreciation has been the natural consequence of excessive production—the same cause would have produced exactly the same effect in any other exchangeable commodity, in gold itself; as before said, whilst 1 per cent. less than the quantity of commodities required for the consumption of the world, may produce an advance of 20, 30, and even 50 per cent. on the cost of production; 1 per cent. more may produce a debasement in exactly the same ratio. On the stability of the value of labor, depends the stability and well-being of a people. There can be no stability of the value of labor, without stability in the value of production, of which labor is a vital component. It is, therefore, an imperative duty with government to protect labor and production against all excess that may produce debasement.

Were British manufactures, freed from effective taxation, to be poured into our markets, as to bring our own manufacturers to throw their hands upon agriculture, which in its turn, would feed the morbid indolence of debasement, the only effect would be to transfer the clothing power from our workshops to those of Europe, in lieu of the increased consumption, whereby the Carolina market expected an advance in its cotton of 50a100 per cent. The value of production can only advance in the ratio of consumption, and surely the placing in the hands of England of the working power of America, would not have added a single consumer to the general consumption, but it would have produced this effect: that we should have acquired a monopoly, and we would have continued to be debased or to advance in the ratio of excess or short production, compared to consumption, and the great monopolist would have made us pay for the $50,000,000 of cotton manufactures we now produce for our annual consumption, 20, 30, and even 50 per cent. more than we now pay for our own people. And, suppose, for argument sake, that Carolina could be benefited $1,000,000 by this transfer of power; well, England might pay her such a bonus, whilst she would be, thereby, securing to herself an annual profit, which, at pleasure, she might increase to 10, 15, and even $25,000,000. But what would the Carolina planter, who would be equally so towards every other cultivator, and thus gradually the debasement in our manufactures of all sorts would throw us at the mercy of Europe for the $350,000,000 of merchandise we now manufacture for our own annual consumption. And to pay for this enormous sum, what would we have to do? We should have to pay more, and Europe can no more do without it than without the coals of its mines. Tobacco? We are almost the exclusive suppliers of that article. Flour! England will not receive it, notwithstanding her free trade doctrines, and for a very good reason: it would debase her agriculture, and make her dependent on others for food; which is slavery in its worst condition.

Sugar. This article furnishes another striking proof of the effects of supply and demand; and to it the attention of our representatives in congress should be specially called.

And during the whole of the above period, the British tariff remained closed for sugars, and the admission of 1836, of Bengals for home consumption. What have you to say to this, anti-tariff advocates?

In 1833 the people of England received for their own consumption, from their own possessions, 4,184,964 cwt. of sugars, for which they paid 46.80c. 50c.

In 1840, the emancipation of the West Indies reduced the annual supply of Great Britain 954,286 cwt. and the people had to pay for 3,210,678 cwt. about 49.35c. 11½ cts.

What is the effect of the tariff, or of supplies and demand? But we say the advocates of free trade to England admit foreign sugars, and that commodity will be as cheap as ever. But she will do no such thing, because—

1. She would thereby complete the ruin of her West India proprietors.

2. She would be thwarting her own prospects in the East.

And even if she were to admit foreign sugars for home consumption, it would be under a heavier tariff than ever adopted in the United States and the effect of such a measure would be to advance the price of sugars by their being made scarcer in other parts. The trade advocated by her, she has always taken and will ever take very good care not to put in practice. She is too patriotic to act otherwise. This doctrine she has lamely forth to the world, that she might, by debasement of foreign labor obtain the monopoly of the manufacturing power, (see McCulloch, page 419) and her emancipation of the West Indies has had no other object than the destruction of the cotton power of the United States, that through her East India possessions she may obtain the monopoly of that important commodity. "Do you doubt this? Read sir Robert Peel's speech at Tamworth: "Our possessions," (says the baronet), "in the East Indies, offer the means of acquiring a supply of sugar to us almost indefinitely, and in the case we need not run the risk of forfeiting the character we have already acquired at such an immense sacrifice, by the abolition of slavery and the slave trade, for we have a prospect of an increased supply of sugar from the West Indies, [doubtful] and a new supply from the East Indies, produced by free trade. These considerations lead me to the conclusion that it is not necessary to open the markets of England to sugar, the produce of slave labor."

What will be the action of the British government the moment they can obtain even a reasonable supply of cotton from their East India free-trade? Why the British markets will be as effectually closed against American cottons, the produce of slave labor, as they are at present against foreign sugars, the produce of slave labor!

And you, abolitionists, do you wish to know who are those freemen of the east? Open McCulloch's Dictionary, which in the imperial house of commons, is considered as high authority, and there you will find the following lines under the head of "East India company."

The claims of the company are founded on monopoly of trade; it being necessary to maintain forts, factories, &c., under the Mahomedan government, the great produce of the soil was divided into equal shares between the ryots or cultivators, and the government. We regret that we are not able to say that the British government has made any material deductions from this enormous assessment. The cultivators throughout Hindostan are wretched—their only object is subsistence—if they succeed in this they are satisfied. Indeed, Mr. Colebrooke tells us that the condition of the ryots is almost intolerable, and that they derive the miserable pittance of 2 annas, or about 3 pence a day, wages. The company carries a sword in one hand and a ledger in the other. In India, a commercial resident, with a large establishment of servants under him, some of them intended for coercive purposes, is stationed in all considerable towns, and is in a manner invested, and by no less authority than the marquis of Wellesley, that the intimation of a wish from the company's resident, is always received as a command by the native producers and manufacturers."

Now turn over to Mr. O'Connell's speech in the house of commons of the 13th February last, and you will see "that famine desolated India in the years 1766, 1777, 1780, 1782, 1792, 1803, 1804, 1819, 1824, 1829, 1832, 1833, 1836, 1837, 1838, 1839; and that during 1837 and 1838, it was necessary to employ men to shovle the dead bodies into the rapid part of the Ganges; the polluted load was covered with earthenware, the average destruction was 10,000 per month, it is doubtful if terminated at the present moment." Thus it is evident that the trade in India is a monopoly—that its free cultivators have to give one-half of their yearly income to the government, to build forts to keep them in awe; and that the other half remains at the mercy of the holders of the land, who, whereby the income of the poor cultivator is reduced to hardly 3 pence per day, about 6 cents, and famine is almost his constant visitor.

And it was to carry out these truly philanthropic views of Great Britain, that the would be philanthropists of the United States were appealed to, and that the doctrines of free trade and abolition were placed in their hands for circulation! That American citizens have been found to remove to the East Indies, in order to teach to the free operatives of that country the culture of cotton, and the art of separating the seed from the staple. What a strange association! But we say the advocates of the American Union to destroy the American manufactures; and to employ the American abolitionists to destroy American cotton, and the whole of the diabolical plan to be in successful operation! What has become of the American feeling which in former days carried the American farmer to the heights of Banker Hall? Are we already arrived at the close of that glorious beginning?

Another example, and one of great interest to Louisiana, to prove that supply and demand rule prices, and I have done.

McCulloch estimates the total product of sugar annually to be 508,000 tons, say 1,143,000,000 lbs. The average product of Louisiana is about 70,000 lbs. or 70,000,000 lbs. or a fraction under 6 1-5th of the whole product. Yet trifling as this appears to be, an early writer at the close of 1835 having recorded a 6-ounce increase to 25,000 lbs. prices in 1836 immediately advanced from 5 to 6 cents, the usual price in New Orleans, to 11 cents, and in Cuba, where the crop had been a large one, from 4 and 4½ cents, to 6½ and 7 cents! and the importations of foreign sugars into the United States that year amounted to $12,514,718½, say $5,768,000 more than in 1835.

For which the people had to pay specie, for the extra importation from the West Indies could not have created there an extra demand for our provisions, and provisions are very nearly the only articles taken in exchange for the coffee and sugar we import. The season from 1836 to 1837 was favorable to Louisiana; an average crop was produced, and again prices receded to 6 cents in New Orleans, and in Cuba 3½ cents, and our imports from foreign countries fell short of the previous year $5,311,512, the difference being supplied by our own labor.

Again, I repeat, what do you say to all this, anti-tariff advocates? It has been shown in a previous paper, that per statement in the house of commons, the short supply of 954,286 cwt. compared to the ordinary supply of 4,184,964 cwt. required for the consumption of Great Britain, advanced prices nearly 100 per cent. and it is now seen that a short supply of about 45,000 lbs. compared to the ordinary crops of Louisiana, advanced prices in Havana about 80 per cent. and in the United States for Louisiana sugars about 100 per cent. and that to supply this deficiency the people of the United States had to export $5,311,512 of specie to pay for the sugars required.

These are not idle theories but facts for the meditation of legislators!

would not be applicable. Might not the murder have been committed by others than slaves—and it was certainly most appropriate to the act.

Mr. Phelps said, if the yeas and nays had not been called, he should not have said a word. When the resolution was introduced he was prepared to vote for it, because it was merely a matter of inquiry. He would have done it also from courtesy to the senator who had introduced the resolution. He understood, in giving that vote, that he did not at all compromise himself as to the questions in controversy between this government and Great Britain. He did not regard it as an instance of compromise. The resolution was worded. The senator had a right to use the phraseology he pleased. It expressed a word recognised and understood in all places, and as known at the south, and well understood there and elsewhere. If he voted for the resolution, he did not consider he was exposing himself or committing himself to the subject.

Mr. Clay said that it was extremely desirable that, upon a subject like this, we should present an unbroken phalanx; that all party movements should be laid aside; and that we should be united in whatever was done. He rose simply to make a suggestion to his friends to see the most authentic account of this transaction of the Creole, and he had read the whole affair with the most thrilling interest. He would add, and it was very creditable to the relationship of servant and master, that but 19 of 135 slaves on board the Creole took part in the untidy. They had seen the most authentic account of the slaves who took part in this transaction. The issue, he had seen with the greatest regret, was what had been done by the British authorities on the coast. He hoped Great Britain would pause before giving her sanction to such enormities. In regard to the resolution, he did not think his was the best. It was premature. He had preferred that the executive had moved first; but, since the resolution was moved, he was prepared to vote for it. In regard to the term to which the senator from Michigan objected, it would be found that the term had been used, and the first article of the treaty of Ghent was to the effect that there was to be no slavery. This cautious language, and he hoped, by general consent, it would be withdrawn.

Mr. Porter said his motion had not been understood or appreciated. His only object was to give to the language of legislation the language of the constitution. He could be governed by no other motive.

Mr. Graham said that since the discussion had been going on he had looked to several laws passed by congress, and found the term "slaves" used. It had been used in almost all the laws relating to slaves or slavery in any form. Several laws were cited.

Mr. Hendricks added his own request to the favor of the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay,) that his colleague would withdraw the motion to amend the resolution, particularly as the amendment did not change the principle.

Mr. Porter said that, as well to gratify his colleague as other friends who had made the request, he would do so; and by general consent (the yeas and nays having been demanded) the motion was withdrawn.

And the resolution was unanimously adopted.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the exchequer bill, and Mr. Walker arose and said that he had no objection to the report, and that the subject referred to nor. The report which was before the senate, he would take occasion to say, was the work of a master mind, equal to any report which had ever emanated from any secretary of the treasury; and this was no slight compliment when so many distinguished gentlemen, excepting the one before the senate, had been at the head of the department. He believed the report was the report of the secretary of the treasury, and his alone, and that he would have scorned to put his name to any document of which he was not the author. Suggestions he might have received from others, but from what he knew of them, that they were his, and his ability, he knew that the report was his own.

Mr. Walker said he did not agree with the gentleman who characterised the plan submitted as augmenting executive power beyond any plan which had before been submitted. It had great preferences over the bills of the extra session, and was much more limited in its power; and its preferences being to the favor of the general bills, and the proposed bill of exchequer were briefly pointed out by the senator. Gentlemen upon the other side had painted most graphically the effects of those bills and of executive power, but they had painted their pictures with anti-bank and democratic paint.

Mr. Walker said that the report relating to the safe-keeping of the public money) he was willing to vote for, though regarding it less economical and giving more power to the executive than the sub-treasury plan. He would vote, by way of compromise, also, for another part of the bill, if it was modified to meet his views. He would vote for an exchange currency, if the certificates of deposit were issued dollar for dollar for specie deposited in the bank. He would vote for any other issues, and he agreed with what had been said by the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun), and the senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton), approving of the Bank of Hamburg. As was well said, that bank had been made the specie-granary of the world. He had at the extra session of congress thrown out his views in regard to a deposit bank, and those views were read to the senate. With some improvements, he would be in favor of that system. In connexion with the sub-treasury, some plan might be devised, so that any creditor of the government could receive gold and silver, and pay it when due for public debt, or certificates of deposit, instead of specie, where the depositor preferred to receive this to specie. He would have these certificates of a denomination as low as fifty dollars. These would become bills of exchange, would be issued dollar for dollar, and would be made payable to order, and would be some small plan in connexion with the sub-treasury act. He would not vote for it alone and he threw out his views very briefly for the consideration of the proposed special committee. A currency of 20 or 30,000,000 of this kind would do more good and have a better effect than $100,000,000 of paper money. It would facilitate the exchanges, cheapen them, and be convenient in the transmission of public dues. But, in connexion with this, it would be absolutely necessary to have a bankrupt law for banks. This alone would prevent the accumulation of depreciated bank paper, improve the exchanges, and do great good. It would be necessary to have a law to impose a tax upon the paper issued by the state banks. This would control these issues to a great extent. To impose such a tax, power was given in the constitution, as there was power there also to pass a general bankrupt law.

Any plan which proposed an issue of paper money upon an artificial basis (Mr. W. said) could never be supported. He had no support. The country held the same views; so did Albert Gallatin, whose views were, that the only benefit derived from a bank of circulation was to put paper money aloft instead of specie. The gold, without a bank, would be in circulation instead of the paper money. Instead of producing any benefit to the country, it would produce a great evil.

It drove out specie from the country for the purchase of foreign luxuries. Sixty millions of specie were sent out of the country, and six millions in foreign goods were brought in. A delusive credit was supplied. It was the most direct assault upon the manufacturers of the country. It brought the country in debt also to the amount of fifty millions of dollars, and this, in the end, was a debt to those identical banks. It produced a debt by the banks to the holders of their paper and individuals. It made the country $60,000,000 less wealthy than it otherwise would be, and the $60,000,000 in circulation was for $60,000,000 of floating debt, because paper money was not money. The banks, of course, had produced the convulsions which had fallen upon the country. There were, Mr. W. said, invested in bank buildings alone in the United States thirty millions of capital—this in the $50 banks—and all this was withdrawn from agriculture and other useful purposes, and the banks and country held the same views; so did Albert Gallatin, whose views were, that the only benefit derived from a bank of circulation was to put paper money aloft instead of specie. This was because Cuba was not fettered with bank paper. He had recently made a visit to Cuba, and spoke with some knowledge. There wages of labor were higher than in any state of the union. One dollar and a half were paid to a common day-laborer, and not in depreciated bank paper, but in gold and silver. Bank deposits had never stood at the door of Matanzas and Havana and established their bank no-chices. Lands were higher, as well as wages. Good farming lands brought one hundred dollars an acre, and uncultivated government lands brought thirteen dollars an acre. Look also at their commerce. We were told that the commerce of Cuba could not be conducted without bank paper, and yet Havana had more commerce than any state of this union, except N. York.

By way of compromise, and in regard to exchanges, if gentlemen would take the sub-treasury system, he would consent to take these certificates of deposit, when issued the dollar for dollar. But without this, in a few years exchange would not be more than one-half of one per cent, so many more would be the conveniences for transporting gold and silver from one point to another. The only expense would be the expenses of transporting specie. Exchanges between Havana and New York, and Jago de Cuba, a journey of twelve days around Cape Antonio, were but one-half of one per cent.

Mr. W. in conclusion, said he had thought it his duty to present these views in advance of the question of reference, and having done so he would close.

Upon the motion of Mr. Merrick, the senate went into executive session after which

The senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, JAN. 6. Mr. Taubman, of New York, asked to be excused from further serving on the committee on expenditures in the war department, alleging as a reason the arduousness of his labors on the committee of claims. The request was granted by the house.

Mr. Flannery, from the committee of ways and means presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be authorized to inquire into the expediency of repairing all anti-slavery appropriations for such necessary objects as have been heretofore included in the appropriation, and which are without authority of law.

And it was adopted without division.

Mr. Moore, reported the following resolution which was referred to the committee on the post office and post roads.

Resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of altering the rates of postage charged on steamboat passengers.

Mr. Sallstall, from the committee on manufactures, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on manufactures be authorized to send by witnesses and take testimony on the subject of the tariff, and to report thereon to the committee, and the interests of the country, and the testimony which those interests may require.

The resolution having been read by the clerk, Mr. J. C. Johnson said if the gentleman would so modify it as to provide for the appointment of a select committee, he would vote for it.

Mr. Sallstall presumed that the committee on manufactures could as well attend to this subject, as they had to act on it, as any select committee. The most satisfactory mode of obtaining evidence of the highest nature was always by the examination of witnesses. The only objection to this mode was the expense. It could not lead to the examination of witnesses. There was no necessity for the examination of a great many witnesses; but one or two, in all probability, would be necessary. If the committee found it necessary to examine twelve, fifteen or twenty witnesses, the expense would be trifling—trifling, indeed, compared with the importance of the subject to which it related. One month of the session had already gone by, and this bill ought to be reported with all promptness; there ought to be no delay on the subject. The committee had no disposition to summon a regiment of witnesses. They wanted intelligent information to satisfy their own minds. There was no member on the committee who felt that he possessed sufficient information to go on and deal with this important subject. This course was not without precedent. In 1827 the committee on manufactures were authorized to send for opinion and papers. He would only add, that in the opinion of the committee, the expense was almost indispensable that the power sought by the resolution should be granted.

Mr. J. C. Johnson observed that what had now taken place was precisely that course of things which he had foreseen and predicted when the reference of this subject to the committee on manufactures was made; and he was almost indispensible that the power sought by the resolution should be granted.

But the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Saltonstall), had urged the doctrine of precedent, and had reminded the house that the committee on manufactures had been empowered to make a similar inquiry in 1827. Yes, in 1827, and what was the result? The tariff bill of 1828, that "bill of abominations," which had been passed by a vote of 130 yeas throughout the country as brought it to the verge of a civil war; and then the party who had driven on the bill, and passed it at all hazards, were the first to abandon it; yes, they ran away from it at the first blast of the trumpet of South Carolina, and took shelter behind the compromise act. Mr. J. was not prepared to follow the precedent of 1827, and he was not prepared to allow the arrangement of the entire tariff of duties, to be paid by the whole country, in the hands of a committee representing only a single interest. No, let it go to an impartial committee—a committee, general and unbiased in its character, who should seek information alike from all quarters, and submit the whole to congress. He was not opposed to inquiry; far from it. On the contrary, he was earnestly in favor of it;

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Saltonstall) dug back to the precedents of 1827—ay, to the year 1827—the year next before the abomination of all abominations, the tariff bill of 1828. He had pointed to the footprints of the legislation of that day as precedents to be followed now! This, too, was just what Mr. W. had always said. He had always told the house that on this matter of a protective tariff they would be carried back to the example of 1828. He would follow no such precedent. He was utterly and irreconcilably opposed to a tariff for protection, and he would not take as his guide the prepara-

And here he might present his views on the general subject of the true tariff policy, but he did not consider this as the proper time to do so. He should reserve himself until the house received from the committee a bill prepared with or without the light for which they now were applying. He was content, for the present, that the house and the country should know the policy of the design was to impose on the country a protective tariff on the precedents set in 1825.

Mr. Tillamoth, of R. I. said he was willing to have the general inquiry made by a select committee, but that would not be at all inconsistent with granting the power now asked by the committee of manufacturers. On the contrary, all the friends of protection had been desirous of such an investigation, and his friend from Massachusetts had introduced a resolution to that effect at the extra session, but it had been refused. He must consider it a great misfortune that that resolution did not carry; but the favorable result of the inquiry had gone by, and although a similar measure might now be adopted, he presumed that legislation on the subject of the tariff would not end with the present session of congress. The system would probably hereafter undergo revision; but was it not obviously important that the committee should be empowered to inquire into the expediency enabled to examine witnesses, each in his own trade or profession, or who resided in its neighborhood, and were thus acquainted with the facts of the case?

Here the morning hour having expired, Mr. T. suspended his remarks.

Mr. Filmore had before the house sundry communications from the postmaster general, sec. of state, of treasury &c.

Mr. Filmore inquired of the speaker if there was any other business before the house; and, being answered in the negative, on his motion, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Bayard of Virginia in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the bill to authorize the issue of treasury notes; which was read by the clerk as follows:

A BILL to authorize an issue of treasury notes. Be it enacted, &c. That the president of the United States is hereby authorized to cause treasury notes, in lieu of those heretofore or hereafter redeemed, to be issued for such sum or sums as the exigencies of the government may require, but not exceeding the sum of five millions of dollars of this emission outstanding at any one time, and to be issued under the limitations of other provisions contained in the act entitled "to amend the issue of treasury notes," approved the twelfth of October, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, and as modified by an act entitled "an act additional to the act on the subject of treasury notes," approved the thirty-first of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty, except that the authority hereby given to issue treasury notes shall expire at the end of one year from the passage of this act, if not sooner terminated under the proviso to this section: provided, that the authority hereby given to issue treasury notes shall cease and determine as soon as the loan authorized by the act of July twenty-first, one thousand eight hundred and forty, shall be authorized by any other act, shall be negotiated and rendered available.

Mr. Filmore then rose and observed that he had but few remarks to make explanatory of the grounds of the bill which had just been read. He would very briefly state the reasons which had induced the committee to propose the bill.

He then read from the report of the secretary of the treasury the statement of the deficiency for the present year, and expatiated upon the deficiency for the present quarter, and the deficiency now actually existing in that department.

For himself, Mr. F. said he had, from the commencement, been decidedly in favor of the issue of treasury notes, and he was with the greatest reluctance that he had brought himself to consent to the measure. He might be permitted to say, however, that his opposition to it had never rested on any constitutional ground; it had always been directed against the policy of the measure. As to addressing himself to those who would oppose it on the grounds of constitutionality he brought his remarks to a close. If a majority of the committee of the whole should think with the committee of ways and means, they would vote in favor of the bill. He trusted, for the honor of the country and the preservation of the public faith, Congress would do its duty in the premises.

Mr. F. arose and said that the gentleman had laid down the proposition broadly, that whilst the general government had not gold and silver in its possession to pay its debts, yet treasury notes could not be resorted to; and that the government is bound to pay its debts in the only medium recognized by the law, that of gold and silver. If he understood the gentleman right, that was his proposition. He (Mr. W.) repudiated that doctrine. He held that gold and silver was not the only legitimate currency of this government. It might be demanded, but the creditor might take (Mr. W. was understood to say) any medium that was offered to him. If the proposition of the gentleman were true, that the government can only discharge its debts in gold and silver, what follows? The harshness of the sub-treasury itself. If the Government must pay out gold and silver, it must collect alone gold and silver.

The gentleman had talked about the unconstitutionality of issuing treasury notes. If the government could not get gold and silver to pay its debts in, was it not bound by the principles of common humanity, at all events, to give the public creditor evidence of its debt? Could not the government, as well as an individual, give its bonds? Was a treasury note any thing more than evidence of debt?

The gentleman had said that the government of the United States could not constitutionally pay its debts in treasury notes. He (Mr. W.) contradicted him in this. A treasury note did not pay the debt, on the contrary, it established the debt, and that was its only object. It was a solecism in terms to speak of paying a debt by giving a bond; the very fact of giving a bond, and not the debt itself, was the evidence that the government did not owe a debt, he agreed that it could not issue treasury notes; but if it did owe a debt, it was bound, if it could not pay it, to give evidence of it.

He had been no friend heretofore to treasury notes. It was only at the last session of the last congress that he contemned them at all. When the government owed a debt and could not pay it, the question was then presented, as it was now, whether they would wait for the restoration of trade, or of revenue resulting from trade, or resort to temporary means until real means could be obtained, or to a high tariff and land debt, for that was the question which was then presented and which now arose. The debt they contracted last session had done almost as much to destroy the credit of the government as the doctrine of repudiation itself. What did they now see? The government bonds refused in the market. And why? The debt ought to be sooner and sent to the people. When they were about to fund a debt, and negotiate a loan, they did not negotiate such a loan as it ought to have been. If they intended to have negotiated a loan, they ought to have given a sufficient time for it to run. Three years only was given; the loan had entirely failed; the credit of government was destroyed, and the issue of treasury notes was proposed. It would have done four or five months ago, to obtain the same amount of money. He had been opposed to the loan, because he had expected and had feared that it would result as it had, and bring disgrace on the credit of this government. It was not his fault that this disgrace now attaches to government. If they wished to provide permanent ways and means for government, and they could not collect them from the revenue, let them come boldly before the country, and say that they required a loan; and, whether or not the government would require ten or twelve years to pay it, that time would be required to tempt investment, and the government was bound, in public principles, he never need fear to avow them. If they owed money—if the public service required money—let them tell the people. He was for an enlarged public service in the various departments of government, especially in our navy. He was for paying the public creditors in gold and silver, and for providing the ways and means to pay it; but in negotiating a loan for the mere scarecrow that would be raised of a funded debt, he would not skulk back from the eight years to three years for it to run, and disgrace the government.

If they required a loan, let them come out and fund the debt, and let the constituents, from the prospectus now before him, be apprehended that this public debt was to run out to some forty or fifty millions before it would be arrested; for, in the midst of this general bankruptcy—distribution on the one hand and taxation on the other, of short loans and disbursements on the other, and of the means of payment, and he gave notice that, as the first means, and one of the most important of providing ways and means in this state of the treasury, he should, if the chair would entertain the proposition, and if no other gentleman proposed it, move that a provision be added to this act that the proceeds of the public loans which have come into the treasury since the operation of the act of the 14th of July, and that may come in hereafter, shall be applied first to the payment of the public debt—and these proceeds would pay the debt;—before any treasury notes are issued under this bill;—providing, also, that when there are no proceeds of the public loans in the treasury, these treasury notes shall be issued as provided in the act of the 14th of July.

Mr. Filmore desired to say, that if the design was to defeat this bill, and prevent the relief of the treasury by the supply of treasury notes it might afford, there certainly could be no more direct mode of doing it than by offering this amendment.

Mr. W. assured the gentleman from New York that he was the last man who would throw any thing in the way of meeting the demands of the treasury.

Mr. Filmore hoped the gentleman would withdraw the amendment, then; the treasury was now exhausted.

Mr. W. said he knew that. He had been waiting on the treasury since he first got here, and not a dollar had he got. The members of congress ought to be the very last to be supplied; they could not feel as others feel, unless they waited as others wait for their supplies. He would be glad to see a standing law that the legislative department, who are required to furnish supplies, shall never be supplied until the people are paid; and with a view to facilitate this, and with no desire to hinder this measure, notwithstanding the protestation of his friend, he would move the amendment.

Mr. Arnold desired to make a single remark. He had been struck with a remark of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. W.) on the subject of treasury notes.

[The reading of the amendment of Mr. W. was here called for by several voices, and it was read by the clerk.]

Mr. Arnold then continued. He objected to the amendment as being entirely out of order; but he merely rose to make a remark in reply to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. W.). The gentleman went for the issue of treasury notes; he (Mr. A.) went with him; but, although he went for them, the gentleman had said he would not receive one single dollar of them for his per diem bill.

Mr. W. denied that he had said this, explained his former remarks; but was not heard at the reporter's desk.

Mr. Arnold said that amounted to the same thing exactly. The gentleman came before the country advocating an issue of treasury notes, to be circulated throughout the land, but would not receive them himself. How could the gentleman reconcile this with honesty or honor?

Mr. Van Buren asked if this was in order?

Mr. Arnold said he would proceed then in order. This might suit the gentleman from Virginia (he continued) very well; he might have credit, or other funds, and be independent of his per diem; but what sort of a predicament does it place us in, (said Mr. A.) who are exactly situated as this government is now—who have neither money nor credit? [Laughter.] There were many of them who had to depend on their per diem before they could get their dinners—who were just like the government—who had neither money nor credit, and who must take treasury notes; and if the notes must be "shaved" at two or five per cent. they had to pay it. [Laughter.]

As to the point of order, he would say that there was no relevancy in any point of view in the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia to the bill. It was if any of the plainest questions that ever arose before the house, and the speaker must reject the amendment.

Mr. Filmore had hoped that the personal appeal he made to the gentleman from Virginia would have induced him to have withheld this amendment; some other occasion, because he was entirely satisfied, if they were to have a revision of the distribution bill, that they would nearly as soon have shorn off their provided for the present exigencies of the treasury.

But if the gentleman persisted in the amendment, (he Mr. F.) made the point of order, and suggested if they could introduce an amendment to repeal the act of the 14th of July, and to give the whole of the bill for raising revenue generally for duties. They had a rule of the house which provided that no amendment to a bill was in order that did not relate to the subject matter of the bill itself. Clearly a bill relating to the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands had nothing to do with a treasury note bill. He hoped, therefore, that the amendment would be rejected by the chair.

Mr. Weller moved that the committee rise. Tellers were called for, and the motion prevailing, by yeas 83, yeas 64, the committee rose. And the house adjourned.

FRIDAY, JAN. 7. Mr. Giddings presented a memorial from certain legal voters of Lenox, in the county of Ahtabaska, in the State of Ohio, praying congress to repeal the laws regulating or restraining the holding or transportation of persons as slaves in vessels of the United States sailing coastwise from one state to another; and to pass laws protecting the rights of all persons claimed or held as slaves who may be constitutionally or legally freed by going to sea, with the consent of their masters, beyond the jurisdiction of the state in which they are legally held as slaves.

Mr. H. Cost Johnson objected to the reception of the petition, as prohibited by a rule of the house in relation to petitions for the abolition of slavery.

Mr. H supported the objection, strenuously insisting that the memorial amounted to a prayer for the abolition of slavery on board any American vessel, whether public or private, in which a slave was carried three leagues out to sea—a new shape of the abolition question, and one that went beyond any thing heretofore attempted. He held that the deck of a merchant ship was a portion of the territory of the U. States, let her be in what part of the world she might.

The chair, after taking some time to compare the words of the memorial with the words of the prohibitory rule, decided that the former part of the memorial did involve a prayer for abolition, and therefore fell within the rule; but that the latter portion, which prayed the passage of a law "protecting the rights of all persons enslaved or held as slaves who may be constitutionally entitled to their freedom," did not; whereupon,

Mr. Giddings moved that this latter portion of the memorial be referred to the committee on commerce.

After some debating and confusion, the speaker, in reply to an inquiry of Mr. Johnson, asked the question before the house was on the motion to lay on the table the question of reception raised on the latter clause of the petition, which was not rejected by the rule.

Some excitement ensued, and the question being taken, the speaker declared the vote, on laying on the table the question of reception raised against the petition, which also carries the petition with it, yeas 104, yeas 86.

Mr. Giddings next presented a petition praying that the people of the free states be relieved from all obligations to sustain the institution of slavery.

Mr. H then objected to its reception, and moved that the question of reception be laid on the table.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative; yeas 105, yeas 86.

Mr. Giddings then presented a petition remonstrating against the admission of any new state into the union whose constitution tolerates slavery.

Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, moved to lay the question of the reception of the petition on the table; which motion, after a brief conversation, was carried; yeas 100, yeas 82.

Mr. Giddings said that, to justify himself to the country, he would declare that he held in his hand the petition of some ten thousand citizens from various states of the union, but mostly from Ohio, among whom were members of the senate and house of representatives of that state, and other gentlemen of the highest standing, praying to be relieved from the expense and disgrace of holding persons in slavery, and the slave trade. But after what had passed to-day, he said he should feel justified in withholding them, and would submit the question to the people of the free states to say how far they will submit to these legislative indignities.

Mr. Andrews presented a petition, remonstrating against the adoption of any rule by congress stigmatising petitions on subjects of slavery, or placing them in any on a different footing from other petitions.

Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, moved to lay the petition on the table.

On this motion Mr. Johnson called the yeas and nays, which were demanded by the house; and, being taken, resulted in yeas 99, yeas 89.

Thus the petition was laid on the table.

Mr. Andrews, after presenting one or two other petitions of a similar character, on which the question of reception was raised and laid on the table, said that he had some fifteen petitions of the same nature, which had been rejected by the house, but would forbear doing so, as he supposed from the decision of the house to-day they would be rejected.

Mr. Waller presented several petitions on the subject of slavery; which, on his motion, were laid on the table.

Mr. Carew said he had several petitions of this kind, which, although he was unwilling to occupy the time of the house by the taking of yeas and nays, he felt forced to present, to be disposed of as the house thought proper. He then presented a number of petitions, which were severally rejected or laid on the table.

Mr. Steady asked if it was in order to move a reconsideration of a vote by which the petitions presented by the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. H, had been laid on the table. He merely called the attention of the house to the fact, that, although the gentleman had voted for the adoption of the 21st rule, he yet felt himself bound to present abolition petitions.

Mr. Waller said he had felt bound to present the petitions of his constituents; and as, from the recent decisions of the house, they were rejected, he had moved to lay them on the table.

Mr. Steady said he wished it might be remembered that gentlemen who belonged to the whig party, and were opposed to the 21st rule, who presented such petitions, were influenced by like considerations.

Mr. G. Davis presented a petition asking for the repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. Carew moved the reference of the petition to the committee on the judiciary, with instructions to that committee to report a bill repealing the bankrupt law, and on this motion called the previous question.

Mr. Proffitt raised a point of order that the resolution must lie over one day, as giving rise to debate, and against the propriety of the previous question under the circumstances in which it was now moved.

He made a call of the house.

Mr. Chittenden moved to lay the petition on the table.

Pending which motion, a motion was made by Mr. J. T. Mason that the house adjourn; which prevailing—the house adjourned.

SATURDAY, JAN. 8. Mr. J. L. Williams presented the memorial of a convention recently held in Knoxville, asking an appropriation for a survey of the Tennessee river with a view to the improvement of its navigation.

Mr. Briggs, on leave, offered the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on public expenditures be instructed to inquire into the quality and amount of the goods purchased or contracted for by the new custom houses, and to report whether it be "fair, economical, and whether a proper economy has been exercised in the matter." Also, further to inquire whether there has been any reduction in the number of persons employed in the custom houses of the city of New York, or any reduction of the expenses of the same during the last year, and what reduction may be made in the number of persons employed in and expenses of said custom houses without detriment to the public service.

Mr. Lery asked leave to offer resolutions of inquiry of the secretary of war relative to the state of the Florida war; which were not received, objection being made, and which are as follows:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to report to this house the cause of the recent unobstructed passage of the hostile Indians from the Florida settlements at Mandarin; what force was stationed in that vicinity for the protection of the inhabitants east of the St. John's, and what measures were taken for the relief of the distressed inhabitants.

Resolved further, That the secretary of war be directed to report to this house what measures are employed for the protection of the lives and property of the inhabitants of Florida, and whether any and what further legislation is necessary to enable the executive to provide for the due protection and for the suppression of the Indian hostilities still pending.

Resolved further, That the secretary be further directed to report to this house what number of murders have been committed by the Indians in Florida since the disbanding of Read's brigade of volunteers, and of the measures taken to prevent such provision for the defence of the settlements of Florida as will give proper security of person and property to the citizens of said territory.

Resolved, That the said secretary be further directed to report to this house what forces have been withdrawn from the army at the adjournment of the last session of congress, the disposition made of the force thus withdrawn, and the reason of its withdrawal.

The house proceeded to the unfinished business of yeas and nays, on the question of the petition of Mr. Chittenden.

Mr. Fuller requested his colleague Mr. Chittenden to withdraw the motion to lay on the table, as many who were opposed to the repeal of the bankrupt law would not vote to lay on the table; and that the question be taken on the instructions, as that would be a test question.

Mr. Chittenden then withdrew his motion to lay on the table.

The question then recurring on seconding the demand for the previous question, Mr. Warren asked a division of the question, and moved to lay the instructions on the table.

After brief conversation on a point of order, the yeas and nays, having been asked and ordered, were taken, and resulted yeas 89, yeas 114.

Thus the instructions were not laid on the table. The question now being on seconding the demand for the previous question; Mr. Lane appealed to his colleague, (Mr. Carew), to withdraw his demand for the previous question, to enable him to make a further reference to his vote on the question now pending.

Mr. Carew accordingly withdrew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. Lane said that at the extra session he had voted for the bankrupt bill, not in accordance with his judgment, but in obedience to instructions, those instructions he considered still binding, and should, as at present advised, vote against the repeal of the bankrupt law; but were it not for the instructions I should certainly vote for its repeal.

[Cries of "order, order," were here raised, and Mr. L concluded by renewing the demand for the previous question.]

Mr. Thompson, of Mississippi, appealed to the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his demand for the previous question, that he might state the reasons for his vote.

[Cries of "no, no," were here raised.]

The demand for the previous question was seconded by the house.

The question being, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. Barnard asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered by the house, and being taken resulted as follows: yeas 109, yeas 97.

So the question was decided in the affirmative.

The question then being the main question on the instructions to the committee to report a bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. Waller asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the question decided in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Landaff, W. Andrews, Arrington, A. A. Armstrong, Beardsley, Bidlack, Birdseye, B. W. Blair, Aaron, B. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green, W. Thus the committee on the judiciary was instructed to report a bill to repeal the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. Care Johnson moved a reconsideration of this vote, and on that motion demanded the previous question.

The previous question was then ordered by the house, and the main question on the motion of reconsideration was decided in the negative without a division.

The second division of the question, viz. on the reference of the petition was then carried.

Mr. Marshall presented a memorial from the chamber of commerce of Louisville, and also a petition very numerously signed from citizens of Louisville praying for a repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. M moved to refer these petitions to the committee on the judiciary, with instructions to that committee to report a bill to repeal the law heretofore forthwith; and on this motion asked the previous question.

Mr. Steady moved to strike out the word "forthwith."

Mr. Marshall then modified his instructions by striking out the word "forthwith," and inserting "Monday next."

The demand for the previous question was then seconded.

Mr. Irvin moved an adjournment.

On this the yeas and nays were asked and ordered and the house refused to adjourn; yeas 38, yeas 158.

The question then being on the demand for the previous question; Mr. Marshall said he had just unstood that the regular day of meeting of the judiciary committee was Tuesday, and he would therefore modify his motion by inserting "Tuesday" instead of "Monday."

The previous question was then carried without a division.

And the question being on the main question, Mr. Fillmore rose and said that the yeas and nays which were ordered.

The main question on the reference of the petition to the committee on the judiciary, with instructions to report a bill to repeal the bankrupt law, on Tuesday next, was then decided in the affirmative as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Arlington, Alorton, Barton, Beebe, Biddick, Brinsley, Bowyer, Boyd, Brown, V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, William Butler, O. Butler, George W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Thompson, James Thompson, Tillingshast, Tomlinson, Tremblay, Van Rensselaer, Warren, Warren, Williams, Thomas W. Williams, J. Williams, J. L. Williams, Whitnott, Wood, York, Young—87.

Mr. Gentry moved to reconsider this vote.

Mr. Weller demanded the previous question on this

Without a division the demand for the previous question was carried; the previous question was carried; and a main question on the reconsideration decided in the negative.

Mr. Campbell said this was a great national festival on the 1st of January. He therefore moved that the yeas and nays be ordered.

Mr. Trillett said he hoped that they would not adjourn for this very reason.

[Crier of "order," "order."]

Before the question of adjournment was taken; the Mr. said he had received certain executive communications to present to the house, and he would then laid before the house a communication from the secretary of war, transmitting, in obedience to a list of contracts made by the various branches of the war department of the past year.

Mr. Stanton called the yeas and nays on the motion

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, the question was decided in the affirmative as follows; as 116, nays 80.

The house then adjourned to Monday, at 12 o'clock.

MONDAY, JAN. 10. The rev. John N. Maffei, the stated chaplain of this house, appeared and made prayer for the first time.

Mr. Fillmore rose and said that in the present embarrassed state of the treasury, he felt it to be his duty to ask the unanimous consent of the house to proceed with further proceedings on the call of petition for the present, that the house might proceed to the bill authorizing the issue of treasury notes, he hoped this could be done.

And he desired to state a single fact. He understood from the secretary of the treasury that the power to issue treasury notes had been exhausted, and that unless some means were applied to provide for the wants of the treasury, on this time warrants must cease to issue. Matters, therefore, were come to a point where the character of the nation was involved, and he did hope that the house would consent to take up the bill and dispose of it in one way or other, and on his motion,

The house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Hopkins of Virginia) and resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the issue of treasury notes.

Before the question was stated from the chair—

Mr. Wise rose and said that, when the committee rose last Thursday, the pending question was on a point of order raised on an amendment introduced by Mr. Weller, in relation to the renewal of the distribution law of the last session. He now withdrew his amendment.

Mr. Fillmore said that one or two slight amendments had been recommended in the bill, which he desired now to suggest.

He then struck out from the fourth and fifth lines the words "in lieu of those heretofore or hereafter redeemed."

The question was then taken and decided in the affirmative without a division. So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Fillmore said there was a corresponding amendment merely verbal, which he desired to offer. It was to strike out from the end of the 11th line to the end of the 14th the following words:

"And as modified by an act entitled 'An act additional to an act on the subject of treasury notes,' approved the 31st of March, 1840."

Mr. Weller then proceeded to state that he had heretofore, when the wants of the treasury required it, voted in favor of the issue of treasury notes for the purpose of anticipating the accruing revenue of the country, (and Mr. W. alluded more particularly to his course on that policy). He was willing to vote for the amendment, inasmuch as these notes were ought to be provided for their redemption. The bill before the committee required the recognition, on the part of this house, of a loan bill. He should, therefore, move to strike out that provision in the bill, and when that was done, he was willing to vote for the amendment, inasmuch as these notes were for the bill simply because the proposition came from an administration to which he was opposed—and most especially so, when the present state of the treasury was taken into consideration.

He should offer his amendment not for the purpose of embarrassing the bill, for he was as anxious as any that a vote should be taken on the subject, for the purpose of having a vote on the question of restoring to the treasury that which had been unconstitutionally been taken from it.

Mr. W. then offered the following as an additional section:

"And he further enacted, That so much of the act passed on the 4th day of September, 1841, entitled, 'an act providing for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and granting pre-emption rights,' as provides for the distribution of the said fund among the states and territories and District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, suspended; and that the said fund shall be applied to the payment of the outstanding treasury notes, as well as those authorized to be issued under this act."

The chairman decided the amendment to be out of order, and the decision of the chair after some discussion was sustained, by yeas 92, nays 78.

Mr. Cooper, of Pennsylvania, warned the committee that it was not his intention to inflict a long or short speech on the house, but he had some grounds on which he should oppose the bill now under consideration. He had heretofore, though under different circumstances, avowed his decided opposition to the issue of treasury notes; and he had done so because he believed that, as a means of supplying the wants of the treasury, it was insidious in its character, and tended to produce extravagant and wasteful administration of government. So long as a government was able to relieve its wants by the emission of treasury notes, it would be very likely to govern itself by the principles of economy; but if it were compelled, on the contrary, to resort to loans, and to pay for itself the pressing wants of the treasury, it would be very likely to resort to loans, and to pay for itself the pressing wants of the treasury, this all must admit; but, in selecting those loans, they were bound to adopt such as, while they furnished a supply to meet the exigencies of the treasury, would at the same time promote the prosperity and advance the true interests of the people. The question was, then, what was the true interest of the people? It was not to issue treasury notes to the same extent as a loan? If not then congress was bound to reject the one and adopt the other. Every body knew that, should treasury notes be issued with an interest of six per cent, they would soon find their way into the pockets of capitalists, and never would get into general circulation; but should a loan be negotiated, either at home or abroad—more especially if obtained abroad—the amount would obtain general circulation in the country, and thus the paper money market would be proportionately relieved; and thus the people would be benefited at the same time with the government. For this reason Mr. C. was in favor of a loan.

But the committee were told by the honorable chairman of the committee of ways and means that the government was in a state of embarrassment, and such embarrassment as required immediate relief. It might be so; if the chairman stated this to be the case he had no doubt that it was so; but let it not be forgotten that embarrassment extended beyond the government, and that the people were in a state of need of immediate relief, was pressing on the people in an equal degree. If the government was to be relieved, let the people be relieved too; a loan would operate to relieve both.

Mr. C. admitted that the Van Buren party might consistently enough go for this bill; but he was astonished, he was astounded, when he saw the whig party, with which he had been in the habit of acting, abandon the principles for which they had so long and so strenuously contended and lend their support to a system they had so vehemently denounced as impolitic and fraught with all mischiefs. He was especially surprised to see his friend from New York (Mr. Fillmore) bringing forward a bill of this character, and to find him sustained by others who formerly agreed with him in opposing the entire system. The gentleman, to be sure, told the committee that an agency had arisen, and that speedy relief was indispensable; that the government's drains had actually been protested, and that the treasury must be relieved, and that without delay. Who could forget with what pertinacity, from day to day, and from week to week, at a late session of congress, the whigs had resisted this expedient for relief? And was not a tale equally polluted with the same sound in their ears by the then chairman of the finance committee (Mr. Jones)? Had not that gentleman represented to congress the distressing embarrassment of the treasury.

That they first opposed getting the bill into committee; and, when defeated in this by the suspension of the yeas and nays, they then opposed getting the bill into the house, then on the previous question, then on considering the bill to its third reading, and again on its final passage, when but 5 out of 110 or 112 whig votes were cast in its favor. But one short year had elapsed, and now the very same men who had then so resolutely opposed the bill, were the first to bring it forward, and give it their support. He was not merely surprised, he was confounded at such a spectacle.

Mr. C. had opposed treasury notes on principle; and not from any factious opposition to Martin Van Buren.

But it was said that we must issue treasury notes because a loan could not be obtained in the country; and if we got it at all, we must obtain it in the foreign money market, which would require three or four months delay; and in the mean time the government would be left without funds to meet its engagements. But let us remember, that the entire American people were in the same condition; that multitudes of creditors had not merely had their claims postponed, but had lost them altogether. Let gentlemen compare the condition of the people with that of the government; and when they reflected on this, a delay of three or four months would not be so much deprecated. Was it not the case that the government greater than that of the whole people? He had some advocate of the bill would summarize and reply to this question.

It was no reason for the issue of treasury notes that Martin Van Buren had been ejected from power, and that another administration had succeeded to that then in possession of the government. Mr. C. was not sure but that the history of the country would demonstrate that which it seemed to have been unable to learn from the overwhelming elections of the last fall, viz. that it must return to whig measures; and that this was the only means of conciliating to itself the confidence of the nation. Had the measures recommended, and let us remember the whig measures of both houses, been carried into effect, it would have been no need of this resort to treasury notes; then there would have been no difficulty in obtaining the loan now become so necessary. Let the government learn, by bitter experience, the error into which they had fallen, and let them, though late, retract their steps. But, alas! the error is the same of these; but it was known in so far, that "returning were as tedious as go over."

Mr. C. did not intend to indulge in any language disrespectful to the government; but he should like to which had, indeed, been raised on the extra session, but which had been, nervously pressed in strains of manly eloquence, whose tones of thunder had not even yet ceased to vibrate the air. Nor could he comprehend why the sensibilities of gentlemen seemed now to be awakened into so much vivacity; he could not really understand it. And if gentlemen carried it much further, his suspicions would begin to be aroused. Much as Mr. M. must deprecate and deplore the course the executive had deemed it his duty to pursue, in regard to a great financial measure which had been submitted for his approval at the extra session, and which, had he proposed a law, would have saved the government from gentlemen on a course of measures like that now proposed, yet his deportment had ever been highly respectful toward that person as the chief magistrate of the republic. Nor could he but think that gentlemen who undertook to defend him in the strain in which the gentleman from Indiana had just addressed the house, but little consulted the dignity of the president.

[Here Mr. Profit interposed, and made some remark.

Mr. M. resumed. Did any thing he had said amount to a charge against the president? Could nothing be said which seemed in any degree directed toward that officer? No, must per the gentleman from Indiana, and it was "well" and "quite in royal style." [Much laughter.] And when a gentleman, in reply, answered the gentleman that he had not so much as been thinking of him, the gentleman threatened that he would "make them think of him!" he would "batter himself into their brains, nolens co-

Mr. M. had a question to put to the gentleman from Indiana. That gentleman knew the personal respect Mr. M. cherished towards him; none knew it better; but really the gentleman's course on this occasion had been such as to awaken some suspicion. This was a question between the congress of the U. States and the executive department. The house had no quarrel with "the guard," and, last and least of all, had the house of representatives a question with the gentleman from Indiana. If that gentleman was indeed the accredited organ of the president on that floor, then the president must be held responsible for what the gentleman said, and then Mr. M. understood that the gentleman, as president, "the guard," would not appeal to that house, but would make our appeal to the people of the United States for the correctness of our course. Now, was he to understand from this that the president meant to be a candidate in the next presidential canvass? If so, let the honorable gentleman, as his organ and representative, make that declaration, then he would know what to rely on. But to return to his subject.

Mr. M. said he was opposed to the policy of the bill. His repugnance to it was unutterable and invincible. Would any gentleman tell him that the government of this union, representing twenty-six great, populous, powerful and independent states, being in want of money for the public service, and going into the market to buy its bond having twenty years to run, at an interest of six per cent, could not obtain it—an assertion which amounted to little short of a declaration of bankruptcy. If that were true, then, terrible as it was, the nation ought to know it. This country had never, in any emergency, been on the verge of ruin as Great Britain—a power possessing five hundred and thirty ships of war, while we had sixty-eight—a power whose fleets, extending themselves along a line of two thousand five hundred miles, were able to girdle our entire seaboard, and might at their pleasure select any point of attack they deemed the most vulnerable—a power which had the actually gone to war with us, would have found no greater fleet than that to resist her; and who, had she made a descent upon the land, would have encountered no army but the free and hardy yeomanry of the land. An experiment, indeed, she would never again make, but would wisely have been content to keep her fleet in the ocean. There would have been the field of combat; for "Her march was on the mountain wave,

"Her home was on the deep."

Then we must have fought, each what it might. And did understand gentlemen as asserting that we could not, even in that emergency, have raised twelve millions of dollars on the bond of the government? No, help him heaven to deny that! The word of God is, "So far as the debt is concerned, no word of necessity existed, the government could have got from this great people a hundred or two hundred millions on its simple scrip.

But they were told there was a necessity for this emission of treasury notes. Mr. M. had denied it in the most emphatic and decided manner, and he had, he said, preferred a loan. He abhorred the whole treasury note system; not on coin, but had he considered the fact that he had not examined the constitutionality of it, but he abhorred it on every account, on national grounds; and, also, he would frankly avow it, on party grounds. How did we stand? The bank bill had been vetoed, the bankrupt law was gone, he supposed the distribution law was in little better condition; the loan had failed, and now they were to be thrown on the treasury note system. Heaven and earth! What had become of the fruit that was to result from the extra session? [A laugh from a portion of the house.]

Then, with all personal respect, and with the understanding that, after he had obtained from the honorable chairman of the committee of ways and means the information he desired, he should be at liberty to resume the floor and to comment upon it, he would again ask for the personal information which had been obtained by the infidalgable and persevering exertions of the honorable gentleman, apart from any facts contained in the official letters or report of the secretary of the treasury as to the power of the government to obtain, in the domestic market, the amount needed by the treasury on loan.

Mr. Filmore rose, in reply, that, in addition to that which the statesman had said, he had been permitted to see the original correspondence of that officer with our commercial cities on that subject, and he was of opinion that it went fully to sustain the statements made by the secretary to the committee. He had also taken pains to acquaint himself with the facts from those who were well acquainted with the condition of the money market; and all he had learned confirmed him in the same belief. It was, indeed, a thing undoubted with him that there existed no probability, even if there were a possibility, of obtaining the money needed by government on the loan already authorized—no, not even should the time be extended to twelve years—without an application to European capitalists.

In addition, he begged leave to say that a friend and colleague of his, doubting that such could be the fact, he had for his conviction obtained evidence of the appalling state of the public credit at the present moment. He here sent to the clerk's table a letter from Prime, Ward & King, of New York, addressed to the gentleman, in which it was stated that the amount could be obtained on the United States loan, even should the time be extended to twelve years, inasmuch as the United States six per cent. stock had been offered in the market at from three to five per cent., and was without buyers. They further stated that the government would have to allow seven per cent. to get in the market, and that the sum wanted might be obtained. They advise that bonds be given to run seven years for four millions, and that for five millions more treasury notes be issued bearing above seven per cent., since the notes bearing six per cent. were at one per cent. discount. The letter closed with the following reflections on the present state of the government credit, and gloomy forebodings as to its future depression to a still lower point, unless speedy and efficient measures should be adopted for its restoration.

Mr. F. stated, in conclusion, that a similar statement had been made to him from Boston, by the honorable Abner Lawrence, late a representative from that state.

Mr. Marshall resumed the floor. From the letter now read, he understood it to be stated, on the authority of Prime, Ward & King, of New York, that the requisite amount could be obtained in the domestic market, if government would consent to pay 7 per cent. and make its bond run twelve years; and that it could not be had for less. That was the present state of the credit of the United States government; and on that basis it was insisted that the government must return to the system of treasury notes. Why? Would our credit be any better or worse than that of the bond of government? They could not compel the public creditor to take them in payment of his debt; and, if not, would the public credit be any better on notes than on bond? If Mr. M. should go to a man to borrow a sum he had need of, and the man would not let him have the money on his bond, would 7 per cent. interest would he let him have it at any less interest on his promissory note? If he would, he must be a loser somewhere. If, then, these treasury notes were to go at an interest of 6 per cent. it must be by force—either by the force of necessity laid on the public creditor by law, or by actual strength gained by the public creditor. In the former case, in the present times, for no form of domestic despotism would ever attempt such a thing. The state of the public credit was now correctly known, and it certainly could not be made any better by treasury notes. In this argument Mr. M. reasoned fairly and sincerely, not from any party bias, but from the plain facts of the condition of the government of his country degraded. He was ready to let her know, and the first time she could get rid of these treasury notes, she could be better than before. To say, as he did, was not in the contemplation of gentlemen to cheat the public creditor to the extent of the failure of government credit in the market; that never could be seriously intended.

Unless, therefore, he obtained more light on a subject which he did not profess to understand as well as some gentlemen in that house, he must still profess himself in favor of the old plan—the whig plan, he would call it—of giving the bond of the government on time. He would rather have the government, and get the money by loan than attempt this most detestable of all modes of raising money; a mode to which he never could be brought to give his consent, unless in the most extreme circumstances of necessity. If these notes were forced on the public creditor, the government en carra hia; it dishonored itself by an act of open bankruptcy, and then there should be inserted a clause in the bankrupt bill to include the government of the United States. [A laugh.] What talk of public credit? What could so effectually strike a dagger through the very heart of the public credit as this? What this government to turn broker and bankrupt broker? To say, as he did, To say to the man paper! The political school in which he had studied never recognised such policy as that. It might, to be sure, be a neat financial operation; but it involved a question of the national honor. If you paid your creditors, pay them in something that was worth their debt. If you could not get the money in, in all conscience add the amount of discount, and pay the whole.

It might be a very unpleasant and very alarming thing to tell the creditors that the credit of the government was at seven per cent. below par; but he would tell them so; and, though his constituents could not bear it, he would tell them so, and insist for direct taxes than be driven to such a system. There could be no difference in expense between a loan and these notes, unless it was intended to cheat the public creditor to the extent of the difference.

Mr. M. had no desire to impeach this administration, or any other; that was not the question now—this was no time to criminate and recriminate, to cry over spilt milk, or to go back to the causes which had induced the present state of the country and the government; otherwise a long train of causation might be traced up by the eye of the philosophic statesman. There never was an effect without a cause; and the cause might be pushed, step by step, back, and back, till it was lost in the mists of antiquity. It was prosperity, and the very highest condition of public credit ever enjoyed by any nation on this earth—by an erroneous policy obstinately clung to, and still persisted in by what was called a whig administration—it had been reduced to our present state of public shame. But he dared not go into that investigation. It was not a great while ago when we had a surplus revenue of thirty-four millions per annum in the treasury, when we had the best currency under the sun; a currency such as the great governments of Europe never did or could possess, because none of them, extending of the same wide-spread scope, ever had a central power whose fiscal arm reached over the whole. Russia, France, Germany, never had such a glorious six-and-twenty states with a government whose hand controlled them all, and whose heart was strong enough to propel the vital blood through their remotest extremities. More than that. This government was the only one in the world which had no debts, which had ever paid off its national debt. No government was on record since the days of the Roman Empire which had achieved such a thing. But the American government had paid hers—paid it all to the last dollar, and that in good hard genuine coin; ay, and had besides an instrument by which it could throw its currency to all the ends of the world by the mere stroke of a pen. And all this after passing through a war in which all the odds were against her, with all the untamed energy of a young giant. And where was this once glorious government now? Her credit in the dust; openly disgraced; asking for twelve millions, and could not get it! Who our

But he would not touch on that theme; he alluded to it only to show the effects of this miserable, contemptible, luckstering scheme of temporary expedients. A system which had brought his country's honor so low, he never could be reconciled to. He would not touch on the subject of the public credit now, as it fitly for such an empire as this. Bad as our credit now was, treasury notes never would make it any better, but much worse, from the damning acknowledgment it involved that the government could not get money anywhere else.

Mr. Underwood obtained the floor, and moved for the rising of the committee. The motion prevailed, the committee rose; and thereupon the house adjourned.

CHRONICLE.

BANKRUPT LAW. Preparations are making by the judicial authorities of the United States for conveying the provisions of the bankrupt law into effect within their respective districts.

CAPTAIN BOLTON. The court martial which tried Capt. Bolton, rendered the following sentence:

"The court having found captain William Compton Bolton guilty of 'disobedience of orders,' in parting from the Ohio, on the coast of Spain, on or about the 4th day of April, 1841, in violation of a verbal order conveyed to him through messengers, and of the provisions of the law, in consideration of the manner in which the order was given, the court only adjudge him, the said Capt. Wm. Compton Bolton, to be privately reprimanded by the honor of the navy."

"The court is further of opinion, that the said captain William Compton Bolton, in the exercise of his command, was fully prepared and at all times anxious to sustain the honor and reputation of the American flag."

The letter of the secretary of the navy, conveying the sentence and reprimand to Capt. B. was as follows:

Sir: I enclose a copy of the finding and sentence of the naval general court martial in your case, recently tried at the navy yard, Philadelphia, which has been approved.

For a person of your high sense of personal and professional honor, this sentence is sufficiently executed by simply announcing it.

You are relieved from arrest, and will consider yourself as being on duty. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

A. P. UPSTILL,
Capt. W. C. BOLTON, United States navy, Philadelphia.

THE CHARLESTOWN AND FRESH POND RAIL ROAD. Length about 5 miles, was opened the 6th January. It is designed as a substitute for carrying lumber from the pond, 3,000,000 tons of which are said to have been exported there last season.

THE COMMERCE OF BOSTON. During the year 1841, there were 6,347 arrivals at Boston; of which 289 were ships, 283 ketches, 1,227 brigs, 4341 schooners, 177 sloops, and 43 were foreign arrivals, and 1,474 coastwise. The clearances during the period were 4,410, of which 1,369 were foreign and 3,041 coastwise. There appears to be about 1,700 more coastwise arrivals than clearances, which is accounted for many vessels sailing under a fictitious license that never clear at the custom house at all.

EXPLODING EXPEDITION. By way of Mazatlan and Vera Cruz, the Island of Commerce has received a file of the Sandwich Islands Polytechnic to the 31st July.

June 25th.—The United States exploring expedition, though fitted out as a peaceful expedition, and with small armaments, has done more fighting and been engaged in more combats, than probably the remainder of the navy for the last ten years. At the Fijies from 7 to 10, the natives were killed on the part of the natives, at the King's Mid group, from twelve to twenty—and at the Sanno, several villages were burnt. Besides these, many petty attacks have been repulsed without any known loss of life.

Many individuals in the United States may be induced from ignorance of the character of savages, to condemn these acts as cruel and unnecessary, but those acquainted with all the circumstances, will consider them proper and called for by the treacherous disposition of the natives themselves.

The British brig Ware arrived at Honolulu, July 20th from the Sandwich Islands, after having on board 120 natives. When she left, the U. S. ship Vincennes and brig Porpoise still remained at Fuguet's Sound. Captain Wilkes had returned overboard from Fort Vancouver to the vessels, he had been for a month anxiously looking for the Porpoise and Vincennes, which were long since reported at the river before this. The agent of the Hudson's Bay Company had extended to the officers every hospitality within his power.

THE FIRE AT BAYON ROUGE. The occurrence of a destructive fire at Bayon Rouge, (La.) is confirmed. It broke out about ten o'clock on the morning of the 23d ultimo, in the dwelling house of Mr. Baun. Thirty houses, lathies, outbuildings, &c. fell a prey to the flames. The loss of property is estimated as high as one hundred thousand dollars. Besides the burning of the houses, distress which the calamity has occasioned to the poor, many of whom have lost their means of subsistence, is a state of painful destruction.

FIRE AT DETROIT. The Advertiser extra of January 8 announces the destruction of property to the amount of $100,000 by a conflagration which started at 6 o'clock, and consumed the most valuable square in the city.

FLORIDA. A correspondent of the Savannah Georgian under date of Dec. 25, says:—The news from the ever-late expedition of a disorganizing nature. Col. B. L. Ord, who left Palatka on the 10th ultimo, has returned, after one of the most harassing and fatiguing sojourns that has ever taken place in Florida. He went as far north as Fort Pierce on Indian river, crossing on his way the south in quest of the famous spring Apopka. In his return he scouted the country between the St. Johns and the Atlantic, as far north as Palatka creek and from thence to Palatka. The whole country was under water, and as a matter of course, his command was much inconvenienced. It is said, and I believe with truth, that no foot troops have ever before been over the same country.

Company K, 2d infantry, under Lieut. Alboris, is in pursuit of the enemy said to have been seen in the neighborhood of Mandarin.

Tampa, Dec. 29, 1841. Colonel Worth has recently returned on an excursion into the everglades. His search for the enemy was fruitless. No recent signs were found to direct his place of retreat. A force of about 1,300 men from the army and navy is still scattered over the southern portion of the peninsula, which is actively engaged, and is likely to inflict their little security for their landing places for any length of time.

LATE MESSAGE. According to the secretary of the treasury's report, the duties and licensed tonnage in 1841, at the various districts on the lake is, at

Total, 41,184.
The district of Detroit excels any other. Cleveland next.

MARYLAND. Slaveholders' convention. On Jan. 12, they did assemble at Annapolis having representatives from every county except Carroll, Allegany, Caroline and Worcester. The following officers were elected. Robert W. Bowie, esq. of Prince George's county, president; gen. Thomas Emory, gen. Benj. C. Howard, W. Thomas R. Wilson, vice presidents; John A. Carter, Gen. W. Sherwood, secretaries.

Legislature. Mr. Preston has introduced a bill into the house to compel the banks to resume specie payment. It is not yet acted upon.

THE FINANCES. According to the report of the treasurer of Maryland, the receipts into the treasury from all sources in the year ending Dec. 1, 1841, were $985,970 3/4—the disbursements $894,492 03—leaving a balance of $91,478 33, which is subject to unexpended appropriations for $194,953 26, showing a deficiency of revenue of $103,475 33, which is to be added to the cost of the present session of the legislature, estimated at $55,000. The charge from all sources, on the treasury next year, is estimated at $1,245,483 07, which is to be supplied by the tax, the ordinary revenue, and the interest on the bonds received from internal improvement companies.—The result is, that the tax will be chargeable with the payment of $600,000 a year.

MAINE. The legislature of this state convened at Augusta on the 6th instant, and was organized by the election of Samuel H. Blake as president of the senate, and Charles Andrews as president of the house of representatives.

Vote for governor. The committee appointed to count the votes for governor, reported the following result: 86,511, John Fairfield; 47,354; Edward Kane, 36,730; scattering, 2,007.

The governor's message has nothing new or of importance respecting the northeastern boundary. The state's land agent Mr. Hamlin has made a report and offers negotiation for a line, by which the St. Johns shall form the eastern limit and the northern angle shall be cleared to England.

Middlesex. The number is forty-five thousand, three hundred and fifty-five; viz: 7 general staff, 45 division staff, 61 brigade staff, 1,655 cavalry, 2,217 artillery, 34,322 infantry, 4,841 light infantry, 214 riflemen. The whole number of companies is six hundred and ninety nine.

THE TREASURY OF MASSACHUSETTS. The report of the treasurer of Massachusetts shows that the receipts of the year have been $401,313 18. The expenditures $329,928 57. The balance at this time in the treasury is $71,384.

MEXICAN ARMED SCHOONERS seized at New York.—The collector, we are informed, is of opinion that the capture of schooner El Estero, on the 20th of Dec. 1841, by the act of congress of 20th April, 1818, which it is believed does not interdict a commercial operation such as building, fitting out and arming vessels by citizens of the United States for the purpose of selling them or arming them to a foreign power. That in order to come within the statute, there must be an intent on the part of those who build, fit out, and arm vessels, to employ them, while their property, in some form or another, is fraudfully paid to a community from some foreign power.

The vessels in question will probably be allowed to sail in a few days. (Cour. and Eng.

MASSACHUSETTS. On Wednesday, Jan. 5, the two branches of the legislature convened. Thomas Knapp was elected speaker of the house and the final vote of 1841, out of 233. In the senate Josiah Quincy was chosen president.

NEW JERSEY. The legislature assembled at Trenton on the 11th and organized with John Cassady as vice president of the senate, and John Ensey as speaker of the house. A bill is before them to compel the banks to resume specie.

THE DEBT OF OHIO.—The debt of Ohio is thus stated in the report of the auditor of the state to the legislature: Permanent loans $11,411,234 11
Loans hypothecated 1,356,000 00
Temporary loans, without 250,350 30
Surplus revenue, loaned by counties 53,000 86
Surplus revenue, loaned by auditor of state 27,800 22
Loans on mortgage, or mortgage companies 1,346,588 58
Domestic debt 551,516 00
Scrip issued to railroad and canal companies 551,516 00
Total $16,753,354 22

The loans and interest from the sinking fund to the canal fund are not included in this amount.

RHODE ISLAND. The people of Rhode Island have adopted the new constitution—a majority of all the inhabitants over 21 years of age having voted in its favor, as well as a majority of those who have always been entitled to vote.

KENTUCKY. From a statement of the revenue for the year 1841, from the various sources of taxation is $209,350 18. The revenue of the last year was $273,333 46—being a difference in favor of the present year of $124,000 72 cents—which difference results from an additional tax of five cents imposed by the last legislature. It is to be observed in the estimate that the taxable property in Kentucky during the same period had been only $8,401,218. The total value last year was $22,220,027. The total value for 1841 is $26,345,474. Kentucky is now ranked among the most fertile states in the union, and there is no danger that she will relinquish the distinction. She holds to the doctrine of the binding force of contracts, whether the same be individual, state or national, and she will keep her word.

[Frankfort Commonwealth.

PENNSYLVANIA LEGISLATURE. The senate on the 5th, chose John Stroud, (whig) of Lancaster, its presiding officer. Petitions for the repudiation of the state debt were referred on the 5th by the house to a committee to report on the 12th. The senate on the 12th, resolved accordingly, and the house unanimously adopted their resolution. On the 6th, the senate without a dissenting voice confirmed it. It is in the following words.

Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives, That the faith and credit of Pennsylvania be pledged for the security of her loans, shall be kept sacred and inviolate. Individuals may be found who shrink from their accustomed integrity of character when embarrassed or overpowered; but we are sons of the Republic, we authorize us, their representatives, to declare to her creditors and to the world, that her faith and credit shall be preserved inviolate in emergency; and that the doctrine of repudiation, which is a debt contracted under law, executed judiciously or injudiciously expended, shall never, until the last moral and political tie of her government is sundered, be visited upon her honest and concurring creditors, of this and other countries.

U. S. BANK OFFICERS ARRESTED. The Philadelphia U. S. Gazette states that the Mr. Austin Montgomery appeared before recorder Vaux and made oath against Nicholas Biddle, Jos. Copperwheat, Samuel Jaudon, John Andrews, and Thomas Dunlap, charging them with a conspiracy to ruin the currency of the United States by the Bank of the United States. Mr. Vaux had the process awarded. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon Nicholas Biddle, Samuel Jaudon, and Thomas Dunlap, appeared at their counsel, and gave bail in ten thousand dollars each to appear on Thursday next, at 4 o'clock, before the recorder, who will sit for a further hearing. Messrs. Andrews and Copperwheat did not appear.

REPUDIATION. This doctrine has been formally confirmed by resolutions in the legislatures of Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, New York and Pennsylvania. A resolution dissolving the houses of representatives in all the states prohibiting members from standing in its hall, in Virginia the line imposed upon one of their members by the house, for playing nardies was renitted.

SOUTH CAROLINA. Among the acts passed by the legislature at its late session was one to prevent emancipation of slaves. Any will or bequest, &c. to that effect will hereafter be null and void.

SHEEP HUSBANDRY. According to the best calculations there are 21,000,000 sheep in the union. This is an increase of about 5,000,000 within the last three years. These are worth at a fair calculation $70,000,000. About one-fifth of all these are found in the single state of New York. The average price of three sheep to the acre, would require 11,000,000 acres of sheep lands, or $12 per acre; making the amount of $132,000,000 invested in lands.

Aggregate amount invested in sheep husbandry in the United States is:

In sheep	$65,000,000
In land,	132,000,000
Total	$200,000,000

The annual crop of wool is estimated at 90,000,000 lbs. and worth nearly $40,000,000.

VIRGINIA LEGISLATURE. One of the opponents of the bankrupt law having moved a resolution for instructing the senators from that state in congress to vote for a repeal of that law, it was called up for action on January 7, and was refused to be considered by a vote of 65 to 65.

The Niger expedition. Fortsmith, Dec. 9. The Horation, Capt. Hutchinson Chapman, arrived here on Friday from St. Helena and the coast of Africa, and has brought home some of the officers who have been invalided belonging to the Niger expedition, and who had come down the river in the Sudan steamer. The accounts they bring home are up to the 1st of October, and are most deplorable. The mortality and sickness among the officers and men composing the expedition were great in the extreme, 26 had already died, and almost all were ill and unable to do duty. The expedition had reached the confluence of the Niger and the Chadha, about 270 miles up the former, but it was feared that on account of the sickness it would not be able to go further. It was intended, however, if possible, that the Albert should go up the Niger and the Wilberforce up the Chadha. The natives were friendly enough, and the kings received the presents offered them very graciously. A tract of land was purchased near the Atah country, where a settlement was to be formed.

Paris, December 5. Every thing remains perfectly quiet in this city at present. An extensive secret conspiracy to blow up the residence of the Royal family has been detected and suppressed.

From the tone of the ministerial Journal, it is evident that there is nothing out of the interference in the affairs of Spain.

CHINA.

The Swedish brig Albion has brought advices to New York from China to the 16th September, being 20 days later than the previous accounts which were to August 27.

The Albion touched at Batavia on the 21st October, and there learned that the British fleet had taken possession of the island of Amoy. This island is situated on the eastern coast of China, in the province of Fokien, about 15 miles in circumference, with a small harbor. A strong Chinese garrison has usually been maintained upon the island.

Extract of a letter dated, Macao, September 15. We are here left in a very uncertain position. The Mandarins are unable to offer the least resistance to the foreign enemy, and their feebleness emboldens the populace, and renders our situation in Canton somewhat critical, while active hostilities are being carried on along the coast, and the people along the banks of the river are so much exasperated that they have sunk blocks of granite and put other obstructions in a branch of it used by the men-of-war and steamers. Owing to this and some other movements, the commanding officer here went up the river three days ago with his small force, and the result was the destruction of Canton; a blockade and much bloodshed.

From another letter dated, Macao, September 15. Nothing certain from the north. Chinese reports state that Amoy had been taken, and the Chinese already killed.

The British ships-of-war had gone up Canton river, and had attacked the Chinese junks engaged in obstructing the navigation. A blockade and suspension of trade expected. Teas scarce. Exchange 4 9½; little done.

From another letter, dated Macao, 5 P. M. 15th September. I have already written to you several letters by this conveyance, which I now confirm, and have just heard, I hope in time for this vessel, of Captain Nias, (the commanding officer,) having issued a proclamation in Chinese, and commenced hostilities by attacking the villages on the banks of the river near where the obstructions were sunk, and by blowing up and utterly destroying Wang Tung and the fortifications at Cow Loom. There is a rumor of his intention to surround Canton, and I should not be much surprised to hear of the city being burnt before I get away from here. This it appears, as conjectured and stated to you yesterday, that the least provocation is now made the excuse for great violence, and the result is as doubtful and the anticipation of it as much clouded by a fear of suffering to the innocent people as at any former period. This news is just as heard in a letter from Canton, where the smoke of the burning villages was seen, the ransoms heard, and the people of Canton were fleeing in all directions, whilst the reports were that many people had been killed at the villages.

The Chinese say that Amoy was captured by the British; and there is a report that news of the recapture of Cusson, without the slightest resistance, has reached Canton.

We have heard it was the intention of Capt. Nias to go to the forts on the island of Wantung, and to erect this purpose he applied to brigadier Burchell for troops; but the brigadier replied that he could not spare any; it is rumored that Captain Nias will consequently, destroy the fortifications; such are the strict orders of Admiral Sir W. Parker; either to garrison or destroy the forts at Wantung, should any pretensions on the part of the provincial government render such measures necessary.

JAMAICA.

The Mobile Register of the 10th says: We are indebted to Capt. Wilson, of the ship Jos. Porter, which arrived on Saturday, from Kingston (Jamaica) for papers to the 31st ult.

The principal item of news, is the occurrence of disturbances among the negro population during the Christmas week, which made it necessary to call out the military in aid of the police—and to fire on the common, in such cases, the origin of the disturbances was trifling; some negro children made an unnecessary and noisy exhibition, which the police attempted to stop, when the negroes gathered in such numbers as to be bold enough to attack the police, and were driven off with difficulty. The crowds continued to increase nightly, and the ordinance police being found insufficient, the governor sent a special messenger to the assembly, requiring the aid of the militia. Quiet had not been restored when the Jos. Porter sailed. The negroes were still tumultuous, and the troops were gathering in strong force in the city to reduce them.

The discontent of the negroes sprang out of the prohibition by the authorities, of their annual masters by which a number have been killed. As the negroes were very indecent exhibitions, but very popular among the blacks.

The report heretofore brought to the United States, that the inhabitants of Kingston had objected to receiving the Creole negroes, is, as we suspected, incorrect. They were all welcomed as heroes, and sent into various parts of the island for better security. A novel notion is broached—that the British laws cover the Bahama waters; and that entry into them by American coasting vessels coming into the Gulf, ipse facto frees every slave that may be on board.

MEXICO.

We have been favored with a file of Mexican papers brought by the barque Eugenia, recently arrived at New York from Vera Cruz, from which we glean the following items:

The United States ship Peacock, one of the vessels of the extraordinary expedition, was lost off the mouth of the Columbia river on the 1st of July last. Her officers and crew, the chronometer, charts, &c., were all saved. It was expected that the brig Thomas H. Perkins would either be bought or chartered for the conveyance home of the crew of the Peacock.

On the 9th of October last the representatives appointed by general Santa Ana, two from each department of the republic, met and chose his president of the Mexican republic. The new president took the oath of office in the hall of the chamber of deputies, and the same evening appointed as his cabinet ministers:

Manuel Gomez Pedraza, minister of foreign relations and government.

Ciriano del Castillo, minister of justice and public instruction.

Jose Maria Tornely Mandevil, minister of war and marine.

Francisco Garcia, minister of Hacienda. [Senior Garcia declined the appointment, and soon afterwards died in the department of Zacatecas.]

General Pedraza resigned after he had been in office four or five weeks, and Jose Maria de Borneara was appointed as his successor.

Ignacio Trigueros was appointed secretary of the treasury in place of Mr. Garcia.

The provisional president had, by proclamation, evoked the constituent assembly for the 1st of June next.

The Diario del Gobierno of the 16th of October contains an official letter, dated Atlixco, 22d of September, from general Manuel Armijo, the commandant general of New Mexico, giving an account of the capture of the vanguard of the Texan expedition to Santa Fe.

The general states that intelligence of the approach of the Texan army was communicated to him by an Italian and a New Mexican, who were with the expedition, but who fled from it in advance for that purpose. That on the 17th of September the party of one hundred dragons under Col. Cook surrendered at discretion, and were deprived of their arms and clothing, which Gen. Armijo distributed among his own companions in arms. That the interpreter had been set at liberty on account of his good behavior, but that the other prisoners were on their way towards Mexico under an escort.

The same paper of the 18th of October publishes President Lamar's proclamation to the citizens of Santa Fe, one of the papers found upon the Texan prisoners. The proclamation is accompanied by a commentary from the editor of the paper, and subsequent numbers of the same journal contain the other documents found upon the Texans.

The number for the 24th of October states that president Santa Ana had directed a cross of personal distinction to be prepared at the public expense for General Armiño, with the following inscription: "In saving New Mexico the integrity of the national territory." To the chiefs, officers, and troops who partook in the capture of the Texan vanguard was also awarded the privilege of wearing upon their left arm a shield, in which, on a green ground, was to be seen a national eagle with out-stretched wings, bound with gold cords for the chiefs and officers, and with yellow silk for the other troops, the following inscription appearing on the ground of the shields of both: "Intrepidity and valor in defence of the Mexican territory."

An official letter to the secretary of war from Francisco G. Conde, commandant general of the department of Chihuahua, and at that place on the 26th of October, announces the arrival of 90 Texan prisoners there the day before, and that, for want of means to support them, they would rest there only two days, when they would be conducted to the border of the department of Durango.

Another letter to the same from the same person, dated the 5th of November, gives an account of the capture of the rest of the Texan expedition at Lake Colorado by Lieut. Col. Don Juan Andres Arebuelta, at the head of 230 men.

A report of the secretary of war, dated the 11th of November, is published, recommending a formal contest against Texas, and stating the quotas of troops which the several departments were to contribute for the purpose of recruiting the army.—Vat. Int.

We are informed by a friend who has letters from the city of Mexico to the 16th of December, that at that time general Santa Ana, the provisional president of the Republic, was dangerously ill of dysentery. The Texan prisoners of war were on their march to the capital. Three of them tired on the road just beyond Chihuahua, and could proceed no further; when the captain of the guard who escorted them, as soon as the fact was reported to him, had them arrested. They were all charged with barbarism, it is represented, and excited the indignation of all classes of the community, even in Mexico.

A constituent congress of the nation had been called by Santa Ana, to assemble in the city of Mexico on the 1st of June, of the present year, for the formation of a new constitution, in which the representatives of the departments (including Texas) were to be represented in the ratio of one deputy to every 70,000 inhabitants. The population of each department was stated in the decree of the president, based upon an estimate of the national institute of geography and statistics, and is made to amount, in the aggregate, to 7,044,140. The population of Texas is stated at 37,500.—Richmond Compiler.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.

BY AND WITH THE ADVICE AND CONSENT OF THE SENATE.
Deputy postmasters.—Leonard Bennett, at Lewiston, N. Y.; Geo. McNeir, at Annapolis, Md.; Samuel C. Andrews, at Rochester, New York; Henry Huggins, at New Haven, Connecticut; Charles C. Haddock, at Buffalo, New York.

DENMAN K. McRAE, esq. of Fayetteville, N. C. has been appointed bearer of despatches from the government to the United States minister, at Mexico, on the subject, as it is said, of the Santa Fe expedition, which was captured and butchered by the Mexicans. He is likewise bearer of despatches from the British minister to Washington.

Mr. MacRae arrived in Charleston on the 11th instant, in the steam packet Geo. Dudley, and left on the rail road on the next day, for New Orleans, where he will embark on board one of the revenue cutters at Mexico. [New York American.]

NORTHEAST BOUNDARY.—We learn that the commissioners for exploring and surveying the northeast boundary held a meeting in this city last week. Their operations during the past season have consisted in an accurate demarcation of the meridian line, from the place near Houlton, at the operations of major Graham were suspended last winter, to the survey of the line claimed by Messrs. Forster and Mudge on the part of Great Britain, and in an accurate examination of the height of land from the Kennebec road to the termination of the exploring meridian line.

We regret to learn that, owing to unforeseen difficulties upon the meridian line, and the fact that the boundary claimed by the two nations is much longer than could have been inferred from any existing map, the entire survey of the disputed territory has not been completed. The lines undertaken by Messrs. Renwick and Talcott were estimated, by the best authorities extant at four hundred and twenty miles. It is now understood that their surveys already amount to six hundred miles upon the line of highlands, in addition to the surveys necessary to connect their work with known geographical points. In spite of their having performed much more than had been anticipated, parts of the boundaries claimed by both governments had not been reached at the time when the winter operations were interrupted by the setting in of winter.

It will therefore be a matter of serious consideration with the administration, and congress, when the reports of their proceedings shall have been handed in, whether the facts obtained by the commission are sufficient to refute the unfounded claims of Great Britain in the eye of foreign nations, or whether the demarcation of the meridian line must be completed, and the gaps in the line of highlands filled up by the work of another season.

We regret to learn that the presentation even of the materials necessary for the decision of this question may be delayed for the want of the necessary funds, in consequence of the appropriation having been exhausted by the increased difficulties and extent of surveys of which we have spoken.—N. Y. Com. Ad.

THE ARMY.

Major Richard A. Ziegler, of the U. S. army, died on the evening of Tuesday the 4th inst. at Plauters' house, in Saint Louis, Missouri, where he was in attendance as a member of a court martial.—He had been indisposed some days before his death.

WESTERN ARMY. A committee of the Tennessee legislature have reported the following points as eligible sites for a national armory within the limits of that state, viz: 1 Cloud's Shoals, in Hawkins county; 2 Stone Fort, in Coffee county; 3 Falls of the river, in Sevier county; 4 the terminus of Central rail road on Tennessee river, in Hard county; 5 Brownsport, on Tennessee river, Perry county; 6 city of Memphis, Shelby county.

FLORIDA. The St. Augustine News of Jan. 8, says: The steamer Cincinnati arrived here on Wednesday last from Pilatka, with a detachment of troops under the command of lieut. colonel B. Riley, accompanied by several other officers. The colonel and his command again left here in the steamer on Tuesday morning for New Smyrna, where they are to land, and securing the country between that place and the St. Johns, cooperate with a force under Major Plympton, which proceeded up that river to Volusia, from whence they are to enter upon an active and thorough search of the country in pursuit of the Indians.

Intelligence, which can be relied on, has been received, through a letter from an officer at or near the army head quarters, stating that there were, at the date of the letter, (30th of December), 350 Indians in at Tampa ready for emigration, and that 100 more had been seen and talked with, who, tired of the war, were daily expected there.

Major D. Wilcox, of the 5th regiment U. S. infantry, died at Pilatka, East Florida, on the morning of the 3d inst. His remains were brought round to this city on Wednesday last in the steamer Cincinnati, and deposited in the military burying ground with military and Masonic honors.

Major Wilcox had long been afflicted with a pulmonary complaint, which a vigorous physical constitution, aided by a placid and most happy mental temperament, had for years enabled him to resist; and, indeed, till recently, had given hopes to his friends;—and all who knew him were his friends;—that he might finally overcome this most fatal and insidious malady. But alas! his has been but another melancholy instance of its too surely destructive nature.

Major Wilcox was about fifty years of age, and a native of Connecticut. He entered the army from that state early in 1812, at the commencement of the three years war with Great Britain. Though of respectable family, he was a thorough soldier, and supported such as in the army, by his own example and his war for himself. But he soon found his way to distinction, and was promoted on the field for his intrepid and brave conduct at the hard-fought battle of Bridgewater, where, in the charge upon the enemy's line of attack, which was captured, was severely wounded. He participated in 1813 in the Niagara frontier, with uniform credit, in all the arduous and well fought battles that made memorable and glorious to the American arms the fearful and bloody campaign of that year. He remained in the army from that time till his death, without reproach and with character and conduct alike unimpeachable and unimpeachable. He was an honest, unassuming man; a kind hearted and mild gentleman; an humble and pious Christian, and a brave and patriotic soldier.

THE NAVY.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.—The New York Journal of Commerce announces the loss of the Peacelock, in Columbia river, Oregon Territory. No lives lost—nothing saved except the instruments.

Extract of a letter from lieutenant J. T. McLaughlin, commanding the Florida expedition, to the secretary of the navy, dated

"Key Biscayne, December 23, 1841.

"I am happy to say the health of the command is improving. The sick list has decreased very much, although we have had five deaths within the month; and among them we have been called upon to lament Midshipman Niles, a most promising young officer whose ripening talent was developing the promise of great future usefulness. He died and was buried with military honors at Fort Simons on the Carlossabatchie, having received from the officers at that post every comfort and attention which the kindest feelings could suggest."

STATES OF THE UNION.

PENNSYLVANIA.

REPRISAL. Resolutions have passed unanimously by both houses of the legislature condemning the doctrine of reprisal.

The resolutions adopted in the senate were as follows:

"Resolved, That the senate reject the doctrine of repudiating the state debts, as unconstitutional, immoral, and subversive of the fundamental principles of our republican system of government; and that they will maintain the credit of the state unsullied, by making adequate provision to meet all her engagements with promptness and punctuality.

"Resolved, That we entertain the fullest confidence in the citizens of this commonwealth, that they will faithfully and honestly discharge all the liabilities of the government, and that they will preserve the credit of the state inviolate and inviolable.

The resolutions adopted in the house were as follows:

"Resolved, That the state stock issued by virtue of the laws of this commonwealth is constitutionally correct; and that the citizens of the state are legally and morally bound to pay and redeem the same.

"Resolved, That the faith and credit of the state do remain as heretofore unbroken, and that the property of the citizens, and the rights of the subject of taxation for the full and entire payment of all the just demands on the treasury thereof.

"Resolved, That the doctrine of repudiation of the liabilities of this commonwealth is obnoxious in its tendencies, and calculated to be destructive of the free principles on which the government is based, and that every good citizen is bound by moral as well as legal considerations, to cheerfully contribute his share towards the liquidation of the state debt."

GOVERNOR. On the 18th David R. Porter delivered his inaugural address on entering upon his second and last constitutional term as governor of the state.

STATE TREASURER. The members of both houses met on the 17th, and proceeded to ballot for state treasurer.

On the second ballot, Job Man, of Bedford county, received 77 votes. William B. Anderson, of Perry county 48. Scattering 4.

Job Man was then declared duly elected.

MARYLAND.

THE SLAVEHOLDERS CONVENTION, which assembled at Annapolis on Wednesday the 12th, adjourned sine die on Friday evening the 14th, and have recommended to the legislature the following regulations in respect to the colored population.

Proposition 1st. A law to prevent all manumissions by last will. Also by deed, to take effect in future.

Prop. 2d. To prevent manumissions except upon condition of instant transportation to some place out of the United States, and that, at the expense of the manumitter.

Prop. 3d. To prevent any free negro leaving the state, or to return to it unless he leaves as a servant of a white resident of the state and returns with him.

and such resident shall first file a declaration in the county clerk's office of his intention to take such servant with him; or unless he leave the state for the purpose of visiting some one or other of the American colonies on the coast of Africa.

Prop. 4th. To prevent all free negroes from coming into the state, except as servants of persons traveling in or through the state.

Prop. 5th. To prevent the transportation of any free negro by rail roads, steam boats or other common carriers out of the state unless vouchered for as free by some person known to the conductor of the rail road, or captain of the steam boat, and no rail road or steam boat company shall be liable for refusing to transport any free negro unless he be vouchered for as above; and any person falsely vouching for the freedom of a slave, to be liable to punishment. The company still to be liable for conveying away a slave as heretofore.

Prop. 6th. To offer a high reward, to be paid by the state, for the arrest and conviction of any person who aids a slave to run away, or induces, or attempts to induce a slave to run away.

Prop. 7th. That the owner of a runaway slave shall pay a reward for the apprehension of such slave; to be graduated by the distance from home where he was caught.

Prop. 8th. That it be recommended to the general assembly that they pass a law directing the courts of justice of this state, that whenever any free black shall be convicted of any offence, the punishment of which by the law as it now stands would be confined to the penitentiary, that they shall the duty of the court to order the convicted party to be sold out of the state for the period that they in their discretion might confine him in the penitentiary; and that if any free person or persons of color be convicted of any misdemeanor or misdemeanors, other than those which subject the party convicted to confinement in the penitentiary, that then the convicted party shall be punished by sale or banishment, in the discretion of the court, out of the state of Maryland, for a period not less than six months nor more than years; with a provision, that after the period of banishment or sale has expired, the said negroes shall not be permitted to return to this state, and that in case of death, no such negroes shall be allowed to be sold as slaves for life beyond the limits of the state.

Prop. 9th. So much of the act of 1831 as allows a manumitted negro (with a certificate) to remain in the state, to be repealed.

Prop. 10th. No free negro to have in his possession any gun, pistol, or other offensive weapon.

Prop. 11th. That the judges of the county and city court of Baltimore, appoint bailiffs monthly to attend the arrival and departure of every rail road car, and steamboat or other public vehicle of transportation to carry these laws into effect, and to compensate them by a portion of the penalty imposed.

Prop. 12th. That all free negroes shall be obliged to register themselves on or before the 15th of July next, and every twelve months thereafter, in the office of the clerk of the county, when they shall surrender their old certificates and the clerk upon request and being satisfied that any free negro thus registered desires to remove into the country, either temporarily or permanently, shall furnish him with a certificate of his registration, and if said negro shall remove permanently he shall file said certificate within ten days after his arrival in the county to which he may remove and if his absence shall be temporary he shall return said certificate to the clerk from whom he was within ten days after his return. A certificate of freedom of an older date shall be good, and the clerk shall annually publish a list of those registered in some convenient newspaper and send a printed copy to the secretary of state.

Prop. 13th. That the state pay the expense of any suits which may arise in any state where the state law may conflict with the act of congress of 1793, to test the constitutionality of such law.

Prop. 14th. To avoid all sales of girls hereafter to be made of slaves to free negroes and mulattoes, the slave so sold or given, to be liable to be sold out of the state, and the master so selling, punishable by fine in the discretion of the court.

Prop. 15th. That an additional provision be made to the act of 1835 ch. 325, to make it prima facie evidence of circulating such papers as are mentioned in the act of 1835, ch. 325, that the same have been found in the possession of any one within the state.

Prop. 16th. That every free negro shall give responsible security annually for his or her good behavior, and such security be not given such negro so failing, to be brought before some justice of the peace by a constable or any other person who shall cause him to be hired out, and out of his accruing wages pay the constable or person $10, and in case said negro thus hired out shall abscond from service, upon his apprehension he shall be sold out of the state.

Prop. 17th. An act to render penal the omission of sheriffs, magistrates and constables to enforce all laws respecting free negroes and slaves, and every constable before he proceed to act shall take an oath well and faithfully to execute all the laws of the state.

Prop. 18th. Free negroes with real estate to have it sold at their death and the proceeds to be distributed to their legal representatives and hereafter no free negro to be allowed to hold real estate or leasehold interest which shall have longer than a year to run.

Prop. 19th. That all free negroes who have been bound out within the last two years shall be free, by paying to the master, such sum as the orphan's court shall adjudge, and that it shall be the duty of the orphan's court of the several counties in the state and city of Baltimore, from and after the first of January, 1842, to bind out at the age of 8 years, the children of all free negroes then in the state, to serve until they arrive at the age of 21 years for males, and 18 for females. The master shall give security to be approved by the orphan's court to pay to the child when it arrives at the ages of 21 and 18 the sum of $75 for males, and $25 for females, provided, the said child shall leave the state or if previous to the child's arriving at the age of 21 or 18 as the case may be, it shall leave the state, or the parents shall remove out of the state, then the master shall give up such child, and if it has served more than 8 years the master shall pay to the child or its parents, such sum as the orphan's court shall determine.

Prop. 20th. That no meeting of negroes for any purpose shall be permitted after sunset, and all laws inconsistent with [this] provision to be repealed.

Prop. 21st. That if any free negro who may have a license from any Christian denomination, either to preach or exhort, shall hold or attend any meeting prohibited by law, he shall for the first offence be fined five dollars, and imprisonment, and for the second offence shall be sold out of the state.

Prop. 22d. Any retail dealer who shall sell or give to any negro, slave or free, or the agent of any such negro, any spirituous liquor or wine, or shall otherwise directly or indirectly furnish intoxicating drink to or for a negro, to be liable to a fine of $100, one-half to be paid to the informer.

Prop. 23d. To repeal the provisions of the act of 1825, ch. 15, as far as inconsistent with this provision.

Any person or persons who shall persuade or entice, aid or assist, a slave to runaway from his master, owner or employer, and any person or persons who shall harbor or conceal a slave or slaves knowing him or them to be runaways, and the fact of his or their being on the premises owned, rented or occupied by a free negro or negroes, shall be prima facie evidence of such knowledge, shall be liable to be indicted and upon conviction, shall, if white, undergo a confinement in the penitentiary for a period not less than five years, and if said person shall be a free negro and a convict of the same crime, he shall be sold out of the state, and the whole of the proceeds of such sale go to the informer, who shall be a competent witness in an action against such negro or negroes, and if such negro be a slave for life or a term of years, he shall upon conviction be sold out of the state, and his full value be paid to the owner.

Prop. 24th. To repeal that part of the second section of the act of 1833, ch. 224, "entitled an act relating to persons of color who are to be free after a term of years" which says "that the party applying for such grant has distinctly and particularly notified the clerk of the county of the contents of this law, and that this information has failed to correct his or her habits, before they proceed to issue any such grant of authority."

Prop. 25th. That each and every hawk and pedlar shall be made to pay at the rate of the sum of two hundred dollars a year for a license to trade as such.

Resolved, That a committee of five members of the convention be appointed by the chair, to prepare a memorial to the legislature in the foregoing propositions.

Whereupon the chair appointed the following gentlemen to compose said committee, viz: John B. Howard, Charles C. Pitts, Joseph M. Palmer, Tench Tilghman and P. F. Thomas, esqrs.

KENTUCKY.

The senate of Kentucky has unanimously adopted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the general assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, that it is the high and sacred duty of a sovereign state to observe the obligations of good faith in all her engagements, not only with her own citizens, but equally and alike with those of other states and countries.

2. Resolved, That the desperate expedient of throwing off state obligations in any case, by failing to provide as far as possible, for the prompt payment of public debts and liabilities, contracted under the authority of law, is abhorrent both to the government and the people of this commonwealth, and can never directly or indirectly, receive the countenance of either; that such conduct would be unworthy the enlightened age in which we live, shocking to the sense of justice, and a gross reproach to the republicanism of our government and to the honor of the American name.

3. Resolved, That copies of the foregoing preamble and resolutions be transmitted by the governor to the president of the U. States, the executives of the several states, and our senators and representatives in congress."

OHIO.

Matthew Birchard, late solicitor of the treasury of the United States, was elected on Saturday last by the legislature of Ohio to fill the office of judge of the supreme court of that state, in place of Peter Hitchcock, whose term of office had expired.

FLORIDA.

Tallahassee, Jan. 7. LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL. On Tuesday the session organized by the election of the hon. W. H. Breckenbrugh, president, and the house organized on Wednesday, Nathaniel W. Walker, esp. speaker.

The steamer Isis was burnt at Tampa on the 6th inst., having just returned from Gadsden point lighting a vessel. She accidentally caught fire and was entirely consumed.

THE CREOLE.

PROTEST.

Of the officers and crew of the American brig Creole, bound from Richmond to New Orleans, whose cargo of slaves mutilated on the 7th of Nov. 1842, off the Hole in the Wall—murdered a passenger, wounded the captain and others, and put into New Orleans, N. P., where the authorities confined nineteen of the waiters, and forcibly liberated nearly all the slaves.

By this public instrument of protest it is known that, on this second day of December, eighteen hundred and forty-one, before the William Young Lewis, notary public, residing in the city of New Orleans, duly commissioned and sworn:

Personally came and appeared Zephaniah C. Gifford, acting master of the American brig called the Creole, of Richmond, who declared that the said vessel sailed from the port of Norfolk in the last part of Virginia, on the seventh day of October last past, laden with manufactured tobacco in boxes, and slaves, then under the command of captain Robert Esau, bound for the port of New Orleans in the state of Louisiana.

That when about 130 miles to the north north east of the Hole in the Wall, the slaves, or a part thereof on board of said vessel, rose on the officers, crew and passengers, and commenced a riot, whereupon the captain, this appellant, and part of the crew, were compelled said appearer, then first mate, to navigate said vessel to Nassau in the island of New Providence, where she arrived, and a portion of the ringleaders of said insurrection were confined in prison, and the remainder of said slaves fled to the British authorities on said island, and required the aid of the British authorities to make record of the same, intending more at leisure to detail particulars:

And this day again appeared the said acting master, together with Lucius Stevens, acting mate; William Devereux, cook and steward; Henry Speck, John Silvey, Jacques Leconte, Francis Foxwell, and Blair Courte, seamen, all of the said vessel, and belonging to said vessel, who being severally sworn according to law, to declare the truth, did depose and say—

That when said vessel started as aforesaid, she was tight and strong, well manned, and provided in every respect and equipped for carrying slaves:

That said vessel left Richmond on the 25th day of October, 1841, with about 102 slaves on board;

That about 90 of said slaves were shipped on board on the 26th day of the month, of which 41 were shipped by Robert Lumpkin, about 30 by John H. B. and 9 by Nathaniel Matthews, and one by W. Robinson; that from that time about one or two per day were put on board by John R. Howell, until the said 25th day of October, so as to make the number 102.

The brig then proceeded to Hampton Roads and lay there one day, when about eight were put on board by Mr. W. H. Hall for Mr. Hatch, 2 by Mr. C. H. Shield, and 23 for Mr. Johnson, making the whole in number of 135 slaves.

The men and women slaves were divided. The men were all placed in the forward hold of the brig, except old Lewis and servant of Mr. Thomas McCarr-

The nineteen said that all they had done was for their freedom. They all showed signs of being free. They were much afraid of the nineteen. They remained forward of the mainmast. The nineteen took possession of the after part of the brig, and stayed there the whole time or were on watch. Some of the nineteen were hugging the female servants in the cabin, and one of them said he had picked out one of them for his wife. The nineteen and the other nineteen meddled at all with the women slaves.

The only knives found after the affray, were two sheath knives belonging to the sailors. The captain's bowie knife and the jack knife. None of the other negroes had any other knives. Madison sometimes had a bowie knife, and he showed it to the other negroes so as to show with that knife. On Monday afternoon Madison got the pistol from one of the nineteen, and said he did not wish them to have any arms when they reached Nassau. The nineteen paraded the deck armed, while the other negroes behaved precisely as they had done before the mutiny. About 10 o'clock, P. M. on the 24th of November, 1841, they made the light of Abaco. Ben, Madison, and Gifford alternately kept watch. Ben, Madison, Rutlin and Morris kept watch by turns, the whole time up to the arrival of the American consul. So close was the watch, that it was impossible to rescue the brig. Neither passengers, officers or sailors were allowed to communicate with each other. The sailors performed their usual duties.

The pilot who came on board as the brig approached Nassau, and all his men in the pilot boat were negroes. The pilot was acting under the legal authority of the island. He and his men, on coming on board, mingled with the slaves and told them they were free men, that they should go on shore and need not be carried away from there. One of the pilot's men told one of the female slaves, that he should clear her for his wife.

The regular quarantine officer came alongside, and Gifford went on shore in his boat. He conducted Gifford to the American consul, who accompanied him to the governor of New Providence and all the other Bahama Islands. Gifford then related to the governor all that he had said, and the governor sent Richard to that port. The American consul, in behalf of said vessel and all interested, requested of the governor that he should send a guard on board to protect the vessel and cargo, and keep the slaves on board till such time as they could know what they could do. The governor did so, and sent a guard of four negroes, and four sailors, and four bayonets, in British uniform, commanded by a white officer, who took possession of the vessel and all the slaves.

From Tuesday the 10th, till Friday, the 13th day of Nov. they tied Ben Blacksmith, Addison, Rufin and Morris, put them in the stocks, and placed a sentry over them, and told them there. They mingled with the negroes and told the women they were free, and persuaded them to remain in the Island.

Capt. Fitzgerald, commanding the company told many of the slaves owned by Thomas McGargo, in presence of many other of the slaves, how foolish they were, that they had not, when they were, killed all the whites on board and run the vessel ashore, and then they would have been free, and there would have been no more trouble about it. This was on Wednesday.

Every day, the officers and soldiers were changed at Black, A. M. There were 50 regular soldiers on the island, divided into four equal companies, commanded by four officers called captains. There was a regular sentry stationed every night, and they placed all the men slaves except the four which were tied, and placed a guard over the hatchway. They put them in the hold at sun set to let them out at sun rise.

There were apparently from twelve to thirteen thousand negroes in the town of Nassau and vicinity, and about three or four thousand whites.

On Wednesday, the 10th of November, about 9 o'clock, A. M. three civil magistrates of the island came on board and commenced examining all the white persons. They completed the examination on the Friday following. When the attorney general came on board with three magistrates, and the depositions were signed. The American consul was present the first two days. The magistrates were accompanied by a clerk. The attorney general on Friday placed the 19 nutmeins in the custody of the captain and his guard, and ordered them upon the quarter deck. There were about fifty slaves lying round the brig all filled with men from the shore armed with clubs, and subject to the order of the attorney general, and awaiting a signal from one of the civil magistrates; a sloop was towed from the shore by one of our boats and anchored near the brig—this sloop was also filled with men armed with clubs; all the men in the boats with arms. The fleet of boats was under the immediate command of the pilot who piloted the brig into the harbor. This pilot party before the signal was given by one of the magistrates, said, that he wished they would get through the business; that they had their time and he wanted his.

The attorney general here stepped on the quarter-deck, and addressing himself to all the persons except the nineteen who were in custody, said, "my friends, you have been detained a short time on board the Creole for the purpose of ascertaining the individuals who were concerned in this mutiny and murder. They have been identified and will be detained, and are addressing himself to the nineteen on shore and wherever you please." Then addressing the prisoners he said: "Men there are nineteen of you who have been identified as having been engaged in the murder of Mr. Hewell and in an attempt to kill the captain and others. You will be detained lodged in prison for a time, in order that we may compare them with the English government and ascertain whether your trial shall take place here or elsewhere." At this time Mr. Gifford the mate of the vessel, then in command, the captain being on shore, under the care of a physician addressed the attorney general in the presence of the magistrates, protested against the boats being permitted to come alongside of the vessel, or that the negroes other than the nutmeins should be put on shore. The attorney general replied that Mr. Gifford had better make no objection, but let them go quietly on shore, for if he did, there might be bloodshed. At this moment one of the magistrates ordered Mr. Merritt, Mr. McGargo, and the other passengers to look to their money and effects as he apprehended that the cabin of the Creole would be sacked and robbed.

The attorney general, with one of the magistrates, stepped into his boat and withdrew into the stream, a short distance from the brig when they stopped. When the boats were permitted to come alongside of the boats to approach instantly. With a hurrah and a shout, a fleet of boats came alongside of the brig and the magistrates directed the men to remain on board of their own boats, and commanded the slaves to leave the brig, and go on board the boats. They landed his orders, and on board the Creole, into the boats, and the boats, many of them, by this magistrate. During this proceeding, the soldiers and officers were on the quarter deck of the Creole, armed with loaded muskets and bayonets fixed, and the attorney general with one of the magistrates in his boat, lay at a convenient distance, looking on. After the boats were permitted to come alongside of the general and magistrate pushed out their boat, and mingled with the fleet, congratulating the slaves on their escape, and shaking hands with them. Three clerks were then given, and the boats went to the shore where thousands were waiting to receive them. When the boats were landed, and all the slaves except the 19 landed, a barge was sent from the bark to the Creole, to take on shore the 19 prisoners and the guard which had been left over them. They were taken on shore to the barracks, and the 19 carried thence to prison. One of them died the day after he had been put in prison in consequence of wounds received in the affray.

During the investigation carried on by the magistrates on board the Creole, and on the evening of the same day on which the slaves and prisoners were landed, the nutmeins were arraigned and identified by the witnesses.

Many of the negroes, who were emancipated expressly by the laws of New Orleans on the Creole, but were deterred from it, by means of threats which were made to sink the vessel, if she attempted to carry them away. Three women, one girl and a boy concealed themselves on board the Creole, and were brought to New Orleans. Many of the male and female all the foreign slaves who came to New Orleans, had it not been for the command of the magistrates and interference as before stated.

On Monday following these events, being the 15th day of November, the attorney general wrote a letter to Captain Ensor informing him that the passengers of the Creole, as he called the slaves, had applied to him for assistance in obtaining their baggage which was still on board the brig, and that he should assist them on getting it on shore. To this letter, Gifford, the officer in command of the vessels, replied that there was no baggage on board belonging to the slaves that he was aware of, as he considered their cargo and the property of the slaves. When the boats were left to go on board the brig, it was the property also of their masters; and besides he could not land any thing without a permit from the custom house, and an order from the American consul. The attorney general immediately got a permit from the custom house, but no order from the American consul, and put an officer of the customs on board the brig, and the delivery of the baggage of the slaves aforesaid, and the landing of the brig's boat. The master of the Creole, not feeling himself at liberty to refuse, permitted the officer with his men to come on board and take such baggage and property as they chose to consider as belonging to the slaves. They went into the hold of the vessel and took out the wearing apparel, the sheets, and other articles, as also one bale of blankets, belonging to Mr. Lockett, which had not been opened. These things were put on board of the boat of the officer of the customs, and carried on shore.

The correspondence which took place between the attorney general and master of the brig is in possession of the American consul at Nassau.

On the next day, Tuesday, Captain Ensor proposed to sell a portion of provisions, in order to pay his expenses while lying at Nassau, having more than enough for the remainder of the voyage. He refused to allow the provisions consisting of several barrels of meat and navy bread to be entered unless the slaves which had been emancipated should likewise be entered as passengers. The master of the brig refused to accede to this condition.

The next day, after the landing of the slaves, the officers of the government of New Providence caused to be advertised a vessel for Jamaica to take out passengers to that Island, (passage paid). A number of the slaves of the Creole entered their names. It was generally said by persons, white and black, that the object of the advertisement was to allow the provisions consisting of several barrels of meat and navy bread to be entered unless the slaves which had been emancipated should likewise be entered as passengers. The master of the brig refused to accede to this condition.

The master of the brig refused to accede to this condition.

The officers and crew of the Louisa and the Congress and the American consul were warmly interested in its success.

Indian Key is about four hundred miles from Nassau.

The nineteen negroes had thrown overboard and burnt all their weapons before they arrived at Nassau, and the aid thus offered of American sailors and arms was amply sufficient for the arrangement and supply of the Creole on her voyage. If there had been interference on the part of the legal authorities of Nassau, the slaves might all have been safely brought to New Orleans. It was that interference which prevented aid from being rendered in Nassau, and caused the loss of the slaves to their owners.

On the same day, on which the slaves were liberated, and before the attorney general and the magistrates came on board, the American consul and the captain had another interview with the governor. The consul stated that they wanted time to write to Pedian Key on the Florida to come and protect the war of the United States to come and protect the brig and cargo on her voyage, and a guard was wanted to protect the said brig and cargo in the mean time. The governor refused to grant one for that purpose. The consul then proposed to get the crews of the American vessels then in the port of Nassau, and place them on the brig to carry her to New Orleans, and asked the governor to station a guard on board, till the American sailors could be collected, but he refused.

A proposition was then finally made to the governor, that the American men then in port and in American vessels should go on board the Creole and be furnished with arms by the governor to defend the vessel and her cargo, (except the 19 slaves) and there also the governor refused.

On the 15th, the consul on behalf of the master of the brig Creole and all interested, proposed to the governor to permit the 19 men to be sent to the United States on board the Creole for trial, and this too was refused.

Two half boxes tobacco marked [L. Bars] were broken up and destroyed by the negroes, and about 6 or 7 barrels lying on the deck of the brig were thrown overboard to make room for them to walk the deck, the contents of which barrel they did not know.

On the 19th of November, the said brig sailed from Nassau, bound for the port of New Orleans, leaving captain Ensor at said port, unable to proceed on the voyage in consequence of the severity of his wounds—and nothing material occurred, during the passage aforesaid, until the 1st day of December, 11 o'clock, P. M. when they made the South West Pass bearing north by west, distant about twelve miles. At 7 o'clock, A. M. took a pilot on board, and crossed the bar of the said Pass, in tow of the steamboat Shark, discharged the pilot, and proceeded up the river for the port of New Orleans, where they arrived on the 2d day of said month, when the necessary surveys were called and they commenced discharging cargo, and thereupon the said appraisers, and especially the said acting master, did protest, and with their notary at their request, do most solemnly and publicly protest against the winds and the waves and the dangers of the sea generally, but more especially against the insurrection of the 19 slaves. Herein particularly named, and the illegalization of the British authority at Nassau, in regard to the remainder of the slaves on board said vessel, as the cause of all the loss and damage in the premises, and that no fault, negligence or mismanagement, is or ought to be ascribed to the said appraisers, or any part of the brig's company.

They then protested at New Orleans, this 7th day of December, 1841, the protesters bearing signing their respective names with said notary.

LECTURE ON THE WAR WITH CHINA.

DELIVERED BEFORE THE MASSACHUSETTS HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

By the hon. John Quincy Adams.

The existing state of the relations between the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the empire of China, opens up discussion questions of deep interest to the whole human race, and of pre-eminent interest to the people of the North American union.

Great Britain and China are at war. The questions which immediately rise for consideration, in this conflict between two of the mightiest nations of the globe, are—

1. Which of the two parties to the contest has the righteous cause?

2. What are the prospects of its progress and termination?

3. How the interests of other nations, and particularly of the United States, are already, or are likely to be hereafter, affected by it?

4. What are the duties of the government and people of the United States resulting from it?

For the solution of the first of these questions, we must resort to a statement of the facts in which the controversy originated, and for a candid application to those facts, of the laws of nature and of nations. But before entering upon the enquiry, it may be proper to remark that an eminent French writer upon the subject of international law, has contended that there can be no such thing, and he makes it a subject of grave and serious charge against the English law itself, that it applies the word law to the obligations incumbent upon nations. His argument is that law is a rule of conduct prescribed by a superior—a legislator, that is, an act of government, deriving its force from sovereign authority and binding only upon the subject. That nations being independent, acknowledge no superior and have no common sovereign from whom they receive the law. That all the relative duties between nations result from right and wrong, from conventions or compact, and from usage or custom, to neither of which can the term law be properly applied. That this system of rules had been called by the Romans the jus gentium, and in all the languages of modern Europe, the right of nations, or the right of gentes, the law of nations. Upon the rigorous analysis of the meaning of words it must be admitted that there is much force in this objection. Law and right, we know but too well by the experience of mankind, in all ages, including our own, are not convertible terms. Law, necessarily implies compulsion on one part, and obedience on the other. Right is the right of the creator to man, at once the charter of his own freedom, and the law of his reverence for the same right of his fellow creature. Man. In this sense right and law are convertible terms—but the law is the law of God, and the right is the right of man.

Then, to the writer to whom I now allude, that the nations speaking the English language, by the use of this word law, to express the rules of intercourse between nations, have habituated themselves to confound it with the municipal law of their own realm; and to infer that the same legislative authority which is competent to make the laws of the land for them, is equally competent to prescribe laws for all the nations of the earth.

How far this reproach of a French writer upon the freedom of the seas, (Rayneval), is justified by the facts which he alleges in its support, is not now my purpose, nor have we time to enquire. It believes that the law of nations, or the law of gentes, is now the mother tongue, not of one, but of many nations, and that whatever portion of them believe that the fountain of all human legislation is the omnipotence of the British parliament, we, as one of those nations, acknowledge no such supremacy. We think, with the great jurists of our mother country, that the law of nations is the law of God, and the language of speech rather too bold, and the first declaration of the act of our existence as a separate nation, was, self-evident, inalienable rights of all men by the laws of nature and of nature's God. This is the only omnipotence to which we bow the knee, as the only source, direct or indirect, of human legislation. This is the law of nations, and it identifies with it the rights of men associated in independent communities.

The practical organization of our social system is not altogether consistent with our theory of the law of nature and of nature's God, which has given to all men the inalienable right to liberty. The existence of slavery is inconsistent with the law of nature.

But we speak the English language, and what the men of other tongues call the rights of nations, we call the laws of nations. What, then, are the laws of nations, by the rules of which the right and wrong of the present contest between Great Britain and China are to be ascertained? And here we are to remember that the laws of nations are not a code, but not one code of laws, binding alike upon all the nations of the earth, but a system of rules, varying according to the character and condition of the parties concerned. The general law of nations is derived from four distinct sources, denominated by Vattel the necessary, voluntary, conventional, and customary laws of nations. The necessary law is the application of the laws of nature to the intercourse between independent communities, and this itself can be enforced only between nations who recognize the principle that the state is a state of peace. It is a religious principle of the Mahometan nations, that it is their duty to propagate their religion, and to conquer by their cruel, absurd and unnatural principle, was inscribed on the holy banners of the meek and lowly Jesus. The vision of Constantine himself, who seated christianity upon the throne of the Caesars—the vision by which he pretended to have been converted to the faith of the blessed gospel, falsified all its commands, and overthrew its precepts.

The cross of Christ was exhibited before his eyes, and the words inscribed upon it were, "thy this conquer"—conquer—persecute—enslave—destroy—kindle the fires of the holy heremauds, burn the heretics at the stake—tear his nerves to atoms by the rack, lash him with whips, pluck out his eyes, and slap them in his face—all for the salvation of his soul—by this conquer!

By the laws of nations, between the communities, subscribers to this creed, the bishop of Rome, the self-styled servant of servants, by the seal of the fisherman's ring, was for many ages invested with authority to distribute all the kingdoms of the earth, out of the pale of Christianity, to whomsoever he pleased. And accordingly, in January, 1445, his holiness, Nicholas V. did, of his own proper motion, without petition from any one, by his mere liberality and certain knowledge, after full deliberation, and in the plenitude of his apostolic power, give, grant and convey the whole kingdom of Guiana, and its negro inhabitants, to Alphonso, king of Portugal, and his son, the infante Don Henry, and their heirs and successors forever—and forty years after, in 1493, Alexander VI. the Nero of the papal tiara, the year after the discovery by Christopher Columbus, of the western hemisphere, did in like manner give and grant the same hemisphere to Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain. This was about twenty-five years before the publication of the thirty-five Theses of Martin Luther at the university of Wittenberg. That was the law of nations, between Christian communities of that day. Since the subsequent reformation, the power of the Pope to distribute kingdoms at his pleasure, is hardly an article of the law of nations, even among catholic communities. Yet even now there is a law of nations between Roman Catholics, strictly confined to them, and which is of no validity for any other portion of the human race.

Then, to the writer to whom I now allude, that the nations speaking the English language, by the use of this word law, to express the rules of intercourse between nations, have habituated themselves to confound it with the municipal law of their own realm; and to infer that the same legislative authority which is competent to make the laws of the land for them, is equally competent to prescribe laws for all the nations of the earth.

With the emperor's answer to the letter of his Britannic majesty, forwvell presents for him, for the ambassador and for every person of his suite, were sent to the hotel. Lord Macartney was extremely reluctant at coming to the conclusion that his embassy was at an end, and that he had nothing to do but to ask permission to depart and return to his own country. The king had tried and return to his own country. The king had tried and return to his own country. The king had tried and return to his own country.

and his Tartar courtesy, he just at this time received advice of the war which the national convention had declared against the king of Great Britain, and the Stadtholder of the Netherlands, and he comforted himself with the anticipation that by returning home immediately in the Lion, the ship which he had conveyed to China, he might at the same time perform the service of conveying in safety the East India company's fleet of merchantmen then bound to Europe.

This ship, however, which had landed him at the mouth of the Pihlo river, within three days journey of Peking, had already been ordered to the island of Chusan, and was returning to Canton. The distance from that city to Peking is from twelve to fourteen hundred miles, the whole of which Lord Macartney and his whole embassy were transported by inland river and canal navigation, at the cost of his imperial majesty, in the custody of a succession of Mandarin, civil and military of the very highest dignity—every where treated with distinguished honors, occasionally buffeted with humiliating insults, and never suffered to stay a single mile from the river or canal upon which they were boated, into the country through which they were passing; or to take with them one of his abundant retinue, in which they were conducted. They were nearly three months in the performance of this inland safe conduct; and at the expiration of his voyage and embassy Lord Macartney knew about as much of the condition of the interior of China as he had, during the two years of his abode in Canton; besides, in Pail Mall or Peking, within a stone's throw of the palace of St. James.

This embassy, however, appears to have been treated with more respect than any other from an European government during the two centuries of the reign of the Ta-Tsing or Manchu Tartar empire, and the narrative of George Staunton distinctly and positively affirms, that Lord Macartney was admitted to the presence of the emperor Kien-Long, and presented to him his credentials without performing the prostration of the Ko-Tou, the Chinese act of homage from the vassal of the sovereign lord. Ceremonies between superiors and inferiors are the portion of all nations. Nearly twenty-five years after the repulse of Lord Macartney, in 1816, another splendid embassy was despatched by the British government, in the person of Lord Amherst, who was much more rudely dismissed, without even being admitted to the presence of the emperor, or permitted to land in China. A second embassy was sent shortly after the failure of that of Lord Macartney, farred no better, although the ambassador submitted with a good grace to the prostration of the Ko-Tou. A philosophical republican may smile at the distinction by which a British nobleman saw no objection to delivering his credentials to the emperor, but could not bring his stomach to the attitude of entire prostration. In the discussion which arose between Lord Amherst and the celestial, on this question, the Chinese, to a man, insisted inflexibly that Lord Macartney had performed the Ko-Tou, and Kien-Long the successor of Kien-Long, who had been present at the reception of Lord Macartney, personally pledged himself that he had seen his lordship in that attitude. Against the testimony to the fact of the imperial witness in person, it may well be conjectured how impossible it was for the British noble to maintain his position, which was, after all, of small moment. The bent knee, no less than the full prostration to the ground, is a symbol of homage from an inferior to a superior, and if not equally humiliating to the performer, it is only because he has been made familiar by practice with one and not with the other. In Europe the bended knee is exclusively appropriated to the sovereign and his subjects, and no representative of any prince in Christendom ever bends the knee in presenting his credentials to another.

But the personal prostration of the ambassador before the emperor, was in the Chinese principles of exactions, symbolical not only of the acknowledgment of subjection, but of the fundamental law of the empire, prohibiting all civil and military interchange of equality between the government of China and the government of any other nation. All are included under the denomination of outside barbarians, and the commercial intercourse with the maritime or navigating nations is maintained through the exclusive monopoly of the Hong merchants.

It has been seen, that the British government and its agents had accommodated themselves to this self-asserting system of the Chinese. It was by establishing a monopoly on their part adapted to the monopoly of the Chinese system. The exclusive right of trading with China was granted to the East India company, and all the British subjects, except those with which celestial empire was transacted by means of commissioned supercargoes, appointed by these merchant princes, without diplomatic character, and without direct intercourse with any officer of the Chinese government.

But on the expiration and removal of the East India company's charter in 1833, the exclusive right of trading with China was discontinued, and thenceforth the quasi-political intercourse between the two nations, transacted by mere commercial agents of the East India company, ceased, and in the third and fourth year of the reign of William the IV. an act of parliament was made and passed, "to regulate the trade to China and from India."

In pursuance of the powers conferred upon the crown by this act, the sailor-king issued three orders in council. 1.—Constituting and appointing William John Lord Napier, William Chicheley, and John Francis Davis, "superintendents of the trade of British subjects in China," with an order for the government of British subjects within the Chinese dominions. 2.—Creating a court of justice for the purposes therein mentioned. 3.—Imposing duties on the ships and goods of British subjects trading to China, for the purposes therein mentioned, that is, of defraying the expenses of the establishment. The order for the imposition of duties was afterwards rescinded, and the order for the constitution of a court of justice was suspended for further consideration. The chief superintendent, Lord Napier, was instructed to announce his arrival at Canton, by letter to the viceroy. The superintendents were instructed to take up their residence at the port of Canton, and to be ready to receive their commission within the river or port of Canton, or at any other place within the river or port, or at any other place thereafter to be designated by an order in council, and not elsewhere.

One of the most remarkable transactions attending these transactions is, that in giving the instructions to the superintendents to take up their residence at Canton, and to the chief superintendent to announce his arrival by letter to the viceroy, they appear not to have been aware of the possibility of any objection to this course of proceeding on the part of the Chinese.

Accordingly, on his arrival in China, after organizing the board of superintendents at Canton, the superintendents, Messrs. Napier, Chicheley, and Davis, the commission, proceeded immediately to Canton. For the scenes which ensued of dramatic interest, partaking at once of tragedy and farce, recourse may be had to the official despatch of the chief superintendent to his Britannic majesty's secretary of state.

In obedience to his majesty's secretary of state, says Lord Napier in his letter of 9th August, 1834, to Lord Palmerston, "conveyed to me by your lordship, of the date of the 23d of January last, desiring me to announce my arrival at Canton by letter to the viceroy, which being rendered into Chinese by the rev. Dr. Morrison, the Chinese secretary and interpreter, was carried to the city gates by Mr. Astell, the secretary to the commission, accompanied by a deputation of gentlemen from the establishment.

It may be here stated, that during the interval employed in translating my letter, the Hong merchants, Howqua and Mowqua, arrived with the copy of an edict, addressed by the viceroy to themselves, for the purpose of being enjoined on the superintendents by their lordship. The Hong merchants, having already proved to the servants of the East India company, the utter inutility of such a medium of communication, and the compliance therewith only tending to degrade his majesty's commission, and the British public in general, in the estimation of the Chinese people, and to render the superintendents of the Chinese people, in their duties, altogether ineffectual, the Hong merchants were, consequently disoised, with an intimation that I would communicate immediately with the viceroy, in manner befitting his majesty's commission, and the honor of the British nation.

Mr. Astell was, therefore, instructed to deliver my letter to a Mandarin, and to avoid any communication with the Hong merchants, which might afterwards be represented as an official communication, and a precedent on all other occasions.

On the arrival of the party at the city gates, the soldier on guard was despatched to report the circumstance to his superior. In less than a quarter of an hour, a Mandarin of inferior rank appeared, whereupon Mr. Astell offered his letter, and transmitted it to his superior as on his way to the spot.

In the course of an hour several Mandarins, of nearly equal rank, arrived in succession; each refusing to deliver the letter, on the plea that higher officers would shortly attend.

After an hour's delay, during which time the party were treated with the greatest civility, not unusual on such occasions, the hongists and Hong merchants arrived, who, entreated to become the bearers of the letter to the viceroy.

About this time, a Mandarin of rank higher than any of those who had preceded him, joined the party, to whom the letter was in due form offered, and as formally refused.

The Mandarins having seen the superscription on the letter, agreed, that as it came from the superintendent of the Hong merchants, they were the proper channels of communication—but this obstacle appeared of minor importance in their eyes, upon ascertaining that the document was styled "a letter," and not a "petition."

The lieutenant was to be allowed a copy of the address, which was of course refused.

About this time, Kwang-Hong military officer of considerable rank, accompanied by an officer, a little inferior to himself, arrived on the spot; to whom the letter was offered three several times, and as often refused. The senior Hong merchant, Howqua, after a private conversation with the Kwang Heep, requested to be allowed to carry the letter, in company with the Kwang Heep, and ascertain whether it would be received.

This being considered as an insidious attempt to circumvent the directions of the superintendent, a negative was made to this and other overtures of a similar tendency.

Soberly, all the Mandarins took their departure, for the purpose, as it was afterwards ascertained, of consulting with the viceroy.

Nearly three hours having been lost within the city, Mr. Astell determined to wait a reasonable time for the return of the Mandarins, who shortly afterwards re-assembled; whereupon Mr. Astell respectfully offered the letter in question, three separate times, to execute two points in the instructions to the superintendents.—1. That the chief superintendent should announce his arrival at Canton, by letter, to the viceroy; and the other, that the superintendents should take up their residence at Canton. Lord Napier, with the open-hearted and inconsiderate boldness of a soldier, attempted to execute these points in obedience to his instructions to the letter, without, for an instant, conceiving that each of them was in direct conflict with the vital and fundamental laws of the celestial empire. This ignorance was very natural, and very excusable in a captain of the British navy, but how it came to be shared by the British civil and military secretary of state of the British empire, is more unaccountable. The instructions were explicit and positive. Had there been the remotest suspicion at the time when they were prepared, that their execution would meet with resistance by the Chinese authorities, it could not have failed to be noticed in them, and it could not have allowed the superintendents to proceed in such an event. Until then the official protector of British commercial interest, in China, had been a supercargo of the East India company, denominated by the Chinese a Taapan, whose representations or remonstrances in behalf of British subjects, to the government of the Celestial empire, and to the viceroy, were always presented in the form of petitions, and always communicated through the medium of the Hong merchants, without obtaining or claiming direct access of the Chinese dignitary himself. That this mode of communication was to cease from the time of the arrival of the superintendents in the East India company, was equally well known to the British and Chinese governments, and in the controversy which immediately followed this first collision between Lord Napier and the governor of Canton, the latter once and again asserts that ample warning had been given to the British merchants to prepare for the expiration of the privilege of the East India company, the functions of the Taapan would be superseded, some suitable messenger must be substituted to settle with the Hong merchants those trifling and insignificant concerns of commerce which it was far beneath the dignity of the government of the celestial empire to provide for or notice.

But I am already trespassing upon your patience— a brief and summary notice of the sequel, is all that your time will at present allow. The proud generous British noble mariner persisted in his determination to hold direct communication with the government of the two provinces of Loow and Kwang Heep, and to force his way into the interior by an armed force, till he was obliged to call for help had performed his passage, and for that frigate and another to force their passage up to Canton for the protection of his person from assault by the armed force

Mr. Benton contended that any country could have as much specie as it wanted. It was a vulgar error to suppose to the contrary. Banish the enemy of gold and silver, and there would be gold and silver enough in the country, and the world for the world. As soon as the lamp-black and rag statesmen quitted their places, there would be specie found in the country. Restore the reign of gold and silver, the money of the constitution, and you would have good times. Adopt the lamp-black and rag exchequer system of Robert Walpole, and you would have the reverse of all this.

[Mr. Benton here quoted from a pamphlet published in Charleston, South Carolina, giving a plan of exchequer almost (as Mr. B. said) precisely in the words of the bill before the senate. A copy-right had been secured for this in the courts of South Carolina, and Mr. B. said he would not like to come upon the present cabinet for damages, if they could not prove they took the plan from sir Robert Walpole. Laughter.]

Returning to the plan before the senate, Mr. B. said he considered the 19th century insulted by this system, calculated to pale the countenance of the vice system of an exchequer plan introduced in England, having, indeed, all that was bad in that, so that the mark of the beast was fixed upon it, and something much worse in the additions which had been appended.

Mr. B. having closed, a call for the question was heard on all sides, and the question being taken upon the report, without the yeas and nays, it was unanimously referred to the select committee of nine members, in conformity to the motion of Mr. Tallmadge.

The senate then adjourned to Monday.

JANUARY 17. The president of the senate laid before the body a communication from the department of state, the first article of which was the annexation boundary line between Texas and the United States.

Petitions remonstrating against any interfering with the bankrupt law were presented by Messrs. Tallmadge, Evans, Miller, Williams, Bates, Bagard, Buchanan, Henderson, Rivers, Porter, Young, Choate, Fessenden, Berrien, Smith, Sturgeon, and others. Mr. Walker, Merrick, Phelps and Woodbury, and were all referred to the judiciary committee.

Mr. Clay in presenting his said that he was charged with the presentation of a great many memorials, all remonstrating against any repeal or postponement of the bankrupt law, and that would not trouble the senate with them read. There were, first, one from the state of New York; two from the state of Maryland; one from the state of Pennsylvania; one from Newark, New Jersey; one from Boston signed by hundreds of persons, a city which, from its mercantile character, must be supposed to have knowledge on the subject, in which were numbered the names of those both able and unable to pay their debts; also, three from his own state, (Kentucky); one from the capital of the state, in which were the proceedings of a meeting strongly remonstrating against interference with the law, going into arguments to show why it should not be repealed or postponed. To this there were 400 signatures, all of which the secretaries of the meeting informed him were voluntarily made.

Mr. Clay referred to an opinion which had been thrown out under the sanction of some high commercial authority in New York, that the bankrupt law had better be repealed, and that the government should throw one hundred millions worth of property into the market to be sacrificed. Such a remark coming from that source, might be likely to have some weight. But it must be remembered that the estimate of one hundred millions was mere assumption and random conjecture, and no one could tell, with any degree of accuracy, what the amount would be; it might just as well have been set down at two hundred millions as at one. But, be the amount what it might, in estimating the weight of the statement, as an argument against the bill, it should be inquired, on the other hand, what would be done with this property should it be thrown into the market? Would it be sold, or the market? Not at all. On the contrary, it would be thrown into the market, to be sold under the hammer by sheriffs and other officers executing the process of the courts, and that without competition to raise the price. For, when the property of a debtor is sold, all his creditors, what motive could his other creditors have to enhance its value, by competition at the sale? None in the world. On the contrary the law remain undisturbed, what would be the cause of action under it? According to his understanding of the act, it would produce a distribution of the property of the debtor among his creditors; and, of course, when his property should be set up to sale, it would be the interest of them all to make as much out of it as possible. They would bid it up, instead of suffering it to be sacrificed for a song. He considered that, whatever might be the exact form of legal proceedings in carrying out the law, the result in practice would be, that, under the benign operation of the act, there would be a distribution of the debtor's effects, not only among all his creditors, but at the highest price they could be made to command.

Mr. C. went on to say that it was not his purpose to go, at this time, into a discussion of the subject generally. He had thought of the bankrupt act as a measure which came recommended to congress not only on the part of the advocates of justice, of humanity and benevolence, but recommended no less by the appalling existing condition of the country. If, among all the other distresses, discontents and disorders, which everywhere prevailed to so alarming an extent, the legislature should now slay the dog in the faces of those unfortunate men who had at length been liberated from irrefragable embarrassment by the beneficent operation of this law, it would produce such a state of excitement, distress, disorder and despair, from one end of the land to the other, that no man could foresee or even conjecture the consequences.

But he could not terminate the remarks with which he had deemed it proper to accompany the presentation of these petitions and memorials without advert, for a moment, to a circumstance which had a personal relation to himself. The senate would do him the justice to admit that he rarely intruded any thing of that description on their notice; never, unless under the impulse of some great emergency. An intimation had recently appeared in some of the public prints of the day that the movement now in progress in the other wing of the capital towards a repeal of the bankrupt law had originated with him, (Mr. Clay). He disclaimed to enter upon any thing like a defence against the charge so base and disonourable, and in the contrary to the feelings of the whole public life. It might, with equal probability or evidence, have been asserted that he was the author or prompter of the proposal of a gentleman near him to repeal the distribution law. He held the insinuation in profound contempt and scorn.

He could not but be permitted to refer to the delegation in the other house from his own state. At the last session every member of that delegation, with one solitary exception, had voted against the passage of the bankrupt bill; and even that single advocate of the bill, on his return to his own district, found so great and general a dissatisfaction with the provisions of the law, that, at the present session, felt it his duty to give such a vote as he presumed it would appear he had this day given in that body on the question of repeal. But it seemed, notwithstanding these known facts, that Mr. C. was to be held responsible for the votes of all the members of the other house, and he was to be held to that question. But those who imagined that Kentuckians were made of so supple, servile stuff as to take their public course in legislation from the dictation of any man, had yet to learn their true character. Those gentlemen had quite as good a right to dictate Mr. C.'s course as he had to dictate theirs. The representatives from Kentucky, in either house of congress, had enough of manly independence to judge and to act for themselves, and to vote as their own individual views of duty should prompt them. But this accusation, base and despicable as it was in itself, had notwithstanding assumed such a shape as to require Mr. C. to rise to bring it to the notice of the senate; and he felt very sure that it was only necessary for him to bring it home to the bosom of every senator, to have it promptly, instantaneously, rejected and repelled as utterly groundless. For, whatever might have been their difference of sentiment—and no man would wish more than to be at variance with them—there was no one who would be so disposed to conform to the will of the majority as to conform to the will of the minority. It is no more to the disadvantage of the majority to conform to the will of the minority than it is to the disadvantage of the minority to conform to the will of the majority. But those who imagined that Kentuckians were made of so supple, servile stuff as to take their public course in legislation from the dictation of any man, had yet to learn their true character. Mr. Young presented a memorial from citizens of Winnebago county, Illinois, asking that the Polish claims to land may be vacated, and that they be subjected to the right of pre-emption.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, from the committee on public lands, reported a bill, which had been referred, reported a bill, and also made a special report relative to the grant to Polish exiles. [The report maintains that the selections of lands under the Polish claim in Illinois were not made in pursuance of the provisions of the law on the subject, and that the law granting the land to the Polish exiles is still in force for their benefit. The bill declares these lands to be public lands, and removes all restrictions, subjecting them to disposal as other public lands under the law in force.]

Mr. Clay moved that the special order of the day, viz: his resolutions proposing a change of the constitution, be deferred till this day week. Agreed to.

Mr. Linn announced his intention to take up tomorrow his bill to repeal the distribution sections of the land bill.

After the transaction of business, relative to individual claims &c., the senate adjourned.

JANUARY 18. A report was laid before the senate from the secretary of state, in reference to the northern boundary of Missouri.

Memorials against or in favor of the bankrupt law were presented by Messrs. Tallmadge, Merrick, Evans, Rivers, Buchanan, Mangum, Miller, Walker, Woodbury, Porter and Merchoil.

Mr. Morehead stated that when the question came up he should have expressed by expressions of opinion in Kentucky and the instructions of the legislature of that state to vote in favor of repeal, though his own sentiments were in favor of the bill.

The bill which passed the house yesterday to repeal the bankrupt law was received and read twice. Mr. Evans the chairman of the committee of finance, reported the treasury note bill with amendments, one of which is to strike from the bill the amendment of Mr. Gilmer, of Virginia, to deduct from the amount of the loan bill, the treasury notes now issued.

The amendments were ordered to be read.

An amendment of the several treaty acts in the form of a supplementary bill was reported by Mr. Rivers, as chairman of the committee on foreign relations.

A resolution introduced yesterday by Mr. Walker, of Mississippi, instructing the judiciary committee to report the bankrupt bill with amendments, was taken up, and at the suggestion of Mr. King, modified so as to engage into the expediency of repealing, and the senate after the transaction of executive business adjourned.

JANUARY 19. Memorials from various quarters in relation to the bankrupt law were presented and referred.

The resolution submitted some days since by Mr. Allen, calling on the secretary of the treasury to say whether, in his opinion, the government could be carried on without calling to its aid the revenue derived from the public lands, without drawing from the people an equal amount in taxes &c., was then taken up, and by yeas 24 yeas 17, was laid upon the table.

Mr. Evans then moved to take up the treasury note bill, which motion was adopted.

Mr. Evans then, as chairman of the committee on finance, arose and addressed the senate. He concluded his remarks by saying that he would neither cease to make appropriations or put money into the treasury—one thing or the other was necessary. It became us as legislators, as citizens, and as patriots, to see what the country demanded, and to meet those demands. The condition of the country was such that it might not be very difficult to obtain the balance of the loan. The treasury was now such that we were required to pass this bill to meet the immediate and pressing demands upon the treasury, and he hoped the senators would allow the bill to go through with the least possible delay.

Mr. Buchanan announced the death of the hon. D. Dimock, representative of Kentucky, and moved in respect for his memory that the senate adjourn whereupon the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, JAN. 11. Mr. Cushing called the speaker to state the question.

The speaker said that on Saturday last, under the suspension, instructions were given to a committee connected with a certain petition, and a special report thereon was ordered to be made on this day by that committee—ordered by a majority of the house. The chair decided that that was not the regular order of business this morning, but that it was proper to proceed with a call of the states for petitions, under the suspension of Friday last, until that order had been fulfilled. The speaker then called on the gentleman from states. From this decision the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) had appealed; and the question was on the appeal.

The question, "shall the decision of the chair stand as the judgment of the house?" was taken, and decided in the affirmative by yeas 117, nays 24.

Mr. Fillmore said that, as it was the judgment that the report of the committee on the apportionment had not been made this morning, he hoped the house would go into committee of the whole on the state of the union.

The speaker said the question must be taken on the motion of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Fillmore), to postpone the reception of petitions; which motion, however, the speaker repeated, would require a vote of two-thirds.

The yeas and nays being asked there were yeas 151, yeas 53.

So, two-thirds voting therefore, the motion to postpone was agreed to.

Mr. Fillmore then moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Thornton asked the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and stood—yeas 106, yeas 103. So the motion was agreed to.

So the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Hopkins, of Virginia, in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill to amend the act of 1837, "to authorize an issue of treasury notes."

Mr. Underwood said that he was one of those who voted in favor of the loan bill, and who was also in favor of changing the system which had been adopted at the extra session of 1837 of issuing treasury notes. He now preferred the borrowing of money and the paying our debts, to the issue of evidences of debts of obligations binding us to pay at a future day. The creditors of the government ought to be satisfied, whenever their demands came due, by an actual payment, and not a promise to pay. After addressing the committee for some time, he offered the following amendment, which was read by the clerk:

Be it further enacted, That the notes issued under the authority of this act shall not be sold or pledged by the treasury, or any other department, for the purpose of raising specie, or other funds, but shall be issued alone in favor of the creditor of the government.

Mr. Gamble said that the part of the bill which induced him to give his support was this:

Provided, That the authority hereby given to issue treasury notes shall cease and determine as soon as the loan authorized by the act of July 21, 1841, or which may be authorized by any other act, shall be negotiated and rendered available.

This country was suffering. Should they withhold support from those who were entitled, not to the money, but to the justice of this country, because they could not adopt a measure of relieving their wants which they would elect? Should they delay? A delay of justice was very frequently a denial of justice.

Mr. Fassenden, then addressed the committee and in closing, said he desired to take the responsibility of seeing the operations of government suspended by withholding supplies, he was not willing to go with them. Should they stop, and not provide means to meet the pressing demands of the treasury, because they were committed, or imagined themselves to be committed, to this doctrine? He could not hold a doctrine of this description. Were he more committed than was the case against the issue of treasury notes, believing that the constitutional power exists, and that this course must be taken, or that the wheels of government most stop, he would vote for the passage of this bill.

Mr. Dean, of Ohio, next addressed the committee, assailed the whig policy and exulted. Mr. Tyler—in conclusion he said if this bill could be properly amended he was prepared to sustain it.

Mr. Floyd, of N. Y., explained the reasons which should govern him in voting against the issue of treasury notes, though he on former occasions had voted for their issue. Formerly the secretary of treasury had assured congress that their use was to be but temporary and the notes were to be paid off as they fell due. This was not now the case. Its former temporary feature was to be abolished as soon as the present wants of the treasury were supplied. He was prosecuting his address; when

On motion, the committee, there being no quorum, rose.

On motion of Mr. Adams, the house adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 13. Mr. Fillmore moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union.

The question being taken was decided in the affirmative, yeas 105, yeas 92.

So the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Hopkins, of Va. in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill to authorize the issue of treasury notes.

The pending question being on the following amendment of Mr. Underwood:

Be it further enacted, That the notes issued under the authority of this act shall not be sold or pledged by the treasury, or any other department, for the purpose of raising specie, or other funds, but shall be issued alone in favor of the creditor of the government.

Mr. J. G. Floyd, who was entitled to the floor, concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Arnold then spoke at great length on various subjects connected with the question before the house.

He assigned the reason why he should go for the issue of treasury notes; and, as he intended to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Underwood), he would read it now, that he might comment upon it in the course of his remarks.

He then read the amendment, which provides for the issue of treasury notes of any denomination not under five dollars. This amendment, he said, he had felt it his duty to offer, and he believed it a salutary one, which the country at large would approve of; but before he proceeded to discuss the amendment, he advanced his reasons why he should vote for this bill.

The chairman announced the pending question to be the amendment to the amendment, as proposed by Mr. Arnold.

Mr. T. F. Marshall moved that the committee rise. Which motion, by yeas 87, does not counted, was agreed to. So the committee rose, and the chairman reported progress.

Mr. Fillmore now asked the unanimous consent of the house to take up and consider the resolution offered by him this morning, in order to fix upon some time, (he was not particular when), at which the debate should cease, and the bill be reported. For himself, he was willing to agree to any time that a majority of the house might indicate.

The resolution of Mr. Fillmore being then read, to wit:

Resolved, That in consideration of the urgent necessity of the treasury, the debate in the committee of the whole on the state of the union on the above bill No. 61, be authorized the issue of treasury notes, from and after two o'clock to-morrow shall cease, and the committee shall then proceed to vote on all the amendments pending, and which may be submitted, and shall then report the same, with such amendments as may have been agreed to, to the house, unless the same shall be sooner reported to the house by the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. McKen rose and objected to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. Marshall suggested four o'clock to-morrow, instead of two.

Mr. Fillmore concurred.

Mr. McKen reiterated his objection to the consideration of the resolution.

The speaker said the resolution could only be considered by a suspension of the rules.

Mr. Fillmore moved a suspension thereof.

Mr. Clifford asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and stood—yeas 104, yeas 53.

So, two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. Fillmore then rose, and gave notice that he intended to move his resolution daily, that the country might know why it was that this measure was not passed.

Mr. Andrews, of Kentucky, moved that the house adjourn.

Mr. Stenrod asked the yeas and nays on that motion; which was refused.

The motion was put and agreed to. And at ten minutes past five o'clock the house adjourned.

THURSDAY, JAN. 13. Mr. Fillmore moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Which motion being agreed to without a division—

The house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Hopkins, of Virginia, in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill "to authorize an issue of treasury notes."

The state of the question was as follows:

Mr. Underwood had heretofore moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following additional section.

Be it further enacted, That the notes issued under the authority of this act shall not be sold or pledged by the treasury, or any other department, for the purpose of raising specie, or other funds, but shall be issued alone in favor of the creditor of the government.

Which amendment Mr. Arnold had heretofore moved to amend by providing that "notes may be issued of any denomination not below five dollars."

And the question immediately pending was on the amendment to the amendment.

Some conversation took place between the speaker and Mr. Ingersoll as to the range of debate which would be allowed in the existing state of the question. The chairman decided that debate was to be confined to the amendment of Mr. Arnold in relation to the denomination of the notes.

Mr. Arnold said, if the debate was to be limited to his amendment, he would, for the present, withdraw it.

The chairman then announced the question to be on the amendment of Mr. Underwood; and decided that the debate must be confined to that amendment.

Mr. Bronson, for the purpose, he said, of enabling the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Ingersoll) to submit the remarks he might be desirous to make, moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The question then recurring on the motion of Mr. Bronson to strike out the enacting clause of the bill—

Mr. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania arose and said his object in rising was to vindicate the action of the committee in reporting the bill under consideration. While this house, said Mr. I. is distracted with a diversity of opinions as to the proper mode of supplying the wants of the treasury, the government is in danger, like a long-creaked animal in the fable, of starving clear before the choice of protraction, postponement of the house is in favor of treasury notes, and another in favor of a loan. The committee of ways and means have informed us with what reluctance a majority of them came to the conclusion to report this bill. It was not until stern necessity convinced them that there was no alternative that they consented to

Mr. I. desired pardon for examining for a moment the constitutionality of the proposed measure; it would be difficult, said Mr. I. to find a resting place in the constitution between the power to "pay debts" and the power to "borrow money" where the power issue treasury notes did not exist.

Mr. I. then examined at some length, the various judicial decisions, in which the constitutionality of their currency had been recognised.

If instead of being the apologist he were the eulogist, of this bill, he might answer the objections raised by his colleague from Pennsylvania (Mr. Cooper) and the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall). The first of these gentlemen objected to the issue of treasury notes and inveighed against the inconsistency of the whigs, in resorting to them, and the other insisted upon his preference for a loan. Now where was the inconsistency? He (Mr. I.) was a whig, proud of the designation, and he admitted himself with the interests of the country. Government in times past, had used their credit in this manner, and, when it was done, it was with a view to the interests of the people; and with this view it was called for again.

It was said that these notes would find their way into the hands of capitalists. Very well, he said, it was obvious that they would answer the purpose for which they were designed; viz: to pay the government debts. As to what was said by the other gentleman about a loan, we were informed it could not be obtained in any reasonable time, to meet the wants of the treasury, and in the worst of all, we could not have to permit the government to be dishonored. Mr. I. trusted not—every principle of expediency, justice, and honor required that this bill should be passed. Mr. I. closed his speech, by renewing the motion of Mr. Arnold, that these notes should be issued of denominations as low as five dollars.

Mr. Gilmer then rose and went into a minute detail of the expenditures, and appropriations, and estimates for expenditures, for the purpose of showing the present wants, certain and probable, of the treasury. Mr. G. objected to the proviso of the bill (with respect to the loan) because he said that it would be time enough to provide for the estimate which he had enumerated when the house had sanctioned the expenditures; but sufficient to the day was the evil thereof.

Mr. G. said that if proper economy was used, there would be no necessity of increasing the debt beyond the $6,000,000 already incurred. He was for going with a strong, but not a rude hand into the departments and seeing what could be done in the way of reducing salaries, &c. He was for retrenching the salaries of the civil service, of the military and storekeepers, the expenses of congress, the franking privilege, &c. &c. If ever there was to be anything done in the way of economy, now was the time. Parties were in a condition now to do something in this matter if ever, and if nothing was to be done he was sure to leave it, and to proclaim to the people that this cry of economy and reform was a great humbug, useful before an election but abandoned after it.

Mr. J. C. Ingersoll followed the last gentleman, and ridiculed the idea of the necessity which was so much dwelt upon for this issue. Mr. I. said the country was not bankrupt; there was money enough—all that was wanted was to get it. He could name an individual, not half a mile from his own residence, who would be glad to put down is 1,000,000 or $2,000,000 at 6 per cent. with proper security.

Mr. I. was quite sarcastical upon the correspondence of Prime, Ward and King with the committee of ways and means. Brokers, he said, were the last

Mr. Gentry moved that the house do now adjourn.
Mr. Lewis Williams asked the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and being taken, were: yeas 101, nays 88.

So, at half past three o'clock, the house adjourned.

SATURDAY, JAN. 15. Hon. Christopher Morgan, representative from the state of New York, appeared and took his seat.

The business of yesterday respecting the bankrupt law was then resumed. The previous question upon Mr. Clifford's amendment to Mr. Briggs' resolution of instructions to the committee on the judiciary being seconded, upon ordering the main question, the yeas and nays were called, and were yeas 111, nays 88.

So the main question was put (being upon adopting Mr. Briggs' resolution, instructing the judiciary committee to report an amendment to the bankrupt law, which should include corporations, issuing paper, as money, in its provisions—modified by Mr. Clifford, so as not to revoke the instructions already given this committee to report a bill repealing the law)—and upon this, too, the yeas and nays were taken—they were yeas 98, nays 109. So the house rejected the resolution.

Mr. Boyd rose and presented a petition praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law, which he moved to refer to the committee on the judiciary with the following instructions:

That the said memorial "be referred to the committee on the judiciary, with instructions to report on this day, at 2 o'clock, in execution of an order of the house made on the 8th instant, a bill for the repeal of the act entitled 'an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved August 19, 1841.

Mr. B. moved the previous question before taking his seat, and again, after the instructions had been read, rose and made that motion.

Much tumult, motions to adjourn, questions of order and confusion arose. The word "instantly" was finally substituted for "two o'clock" and Mr. Boyd's instructions carried by yeas 110, nays 94.

Mr. Barnard rose and reported a bill, remarking that he did so in obedience to the peremptory order of the house, and under the decision of the speaker and the house.

And it was read as follows:
A bill to repeal the act establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved the 19th day of August, 1841, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. Winthrop rose and objected to any question being taken upon it, and insisted on his point of order. The speaker here read the order, or instructions.

This order, the speaker said, was limited in its terms, and could not be exceeded in its spirit. The order commanded the committee to report, but there stopped. The report had been made, but there was no further action. The gentleman from Massachusetts now raised the question of order whether any thing further could be done with the bill at present, the order having been discharged. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Hooper) had submitted that the next question was, "shall the bill be reported?" The chair did not doubt about the propriety of the question. The gentleman from Illinois. If the point of order had not been taken, the bill was now regularly up for action, that would certainly be the next question; but the question which now arose upon the point of order of the gentleman from Massachusetts was this: "Was it in order, considering the authority by which this bill was brought before the house, to press it further than the reading at this time?" In the judgment of the speaker, it was not.

Mr. Wise appealed from this decision. A motion to adjourn having been made, the speaker in reply to an enquiry, said that the appeal would the first thing in order on Monday morning, coming up as unfinished business.

Mr. Underwood. Then, if that is the case, we will adjourn.

The question on the motion to adjourn was then taken and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 105, nays 92.

At half past 5 o'clock, the house adjourned.

MONDAY, JAN. 17. The house having taken up the subject of the bankrupt law,

Mr. Everett moved to lay the appeal of Mr. Wise on the table. The question being taken, it was decided in the negative, yeas 103, nays 117.

The question was then taken on the appeal of Mr. Ingham: shall the decision of the chair stand as the judgment of the house? and by yeas 99, nays 118, it was decided in the negative, and so the house reversed the decision of the chair.

Mr. Granger then moved that the bill be rejected, and said that, in that motion he had a few words to make. He had not risen to speak against time. He should attend the house but a very few moments; but he was unwilling that the solemn action of the house be recorded in the proceedings of the last session of congress. He said that he had no doubt that the majority of the people of the country were in favor of the bill, giving hope to manyaching bosoms, should be repealed and crumbled into dust, and not one voice be raised here against the proceeding. He was aware that the few words he had to say would be of little avail; that the majority of the people of the country were in favor of the bill, and that the house was prepared to pass the bill, and that which it seemed in this case to possess. But, at the same time, he claimed to himself the privilege, belonging to the minority, of expressing his opinion before the report came to the world. He had supposed that, after the mature deliberation of the committee had on the subject, not only throughout this nation, but in this hall—after the most deep interest felt in this question, he had a right to expect that the legislation of the whole country was settled; that at least a consensus would be reached, and that the report of this law until the whole effects of a bill so solemnly passed had been seen by the country in its operation.—Scarcely three months had elapsed after the passage of the law with its usual solemnities before gentlemen here rose in their places and demanded its repeal.

He denied that there was any evidence that the people of the nation asked for the repeal. What had been the course adopted by gentlemen? Had they come in the usual forms of legislation, and met this question boldly on this floor to be discussed; or had they availed themselves of the rules of this house, by having their construction that had ever been put on their sense, and their own private wish, push it all through in a manner unprecedented in the history of this country. He defied any man, however bold, thirsty he may be for the passage of this bill, to point out any instance, from the formation of this government till this day, when any bill had been attempted to be passed through this hall in this manner. It struck him as a very singular proceeding, and he stood long enough to give a decent form of burial to this creature of their three months' creation. But, instead of that, he had been pained to see those gentlemen with whom he politically associated, and who, in very short months ago, recorded their names in favor of a vote of censure on the repeal, now come forward to clinch the nails in the very coffin of their power to spring. Wealth and power operating on the press might create for a moment apparent evidence of public opinion, which did not exist in the hearts of the people and the nation generally; but the poor and uneducated, who were exercised no such control, and he denied that there was any such control, even in the sections where the call for the repeal had been made through the public press in favor of such repeal.

He well knew that there was opposition to this bill. Never in the history of this government had there been any act of legislation which was calculated to ameliorate the condition of the debtor but there had been a number of acts of legislation which had ruined the debtor, by drawing his life out of him after death, and who never leave their victim until he is dead. Follow back the history of the legislation of this country, and they would find that there had been a number of acts to ameliorate the condition of man, and opposition was made to them by the courts. I asked whether the cry did not then go forth that there were annulling contracts, and whether, in those states where laws for their abolishment had been passed, the courts had not abused themselves against the operation of this law by saying that it was not for commercial towns, and on the highways, vociferating against concerning the obligations of credit and the force of contracts? And yet there was not one state in this country where the legislature had adhered to their action in passing these laws, but the public opinion had not silenced the clamor on this subject.

Try it when you will, and the mere money-lenders of a country will raise a clamor against every law which takes from them any supposed power to force the last dollar from a debtor. He was no leveller, he came not to make war on wealth, he detested the vulgar attempts made to excite jealousies between the rich and the poor, but the history of this nation and every other people on earth shows, beyond the possibility of dispute, that those who hold the money-power of a country are the last to yield to any relaxation of the severity of laws by which, having exhausted the means of payment of the debtor, they are enabled to cripple his energies for life.

In many places—he was happy to say not generally—the banks had struck at this law; and why? Because there had grown up in this country a system of dealing, which strikes at the root of morality, for the benefit of the banks. This law places every creditor on an equal footing; and the banks which, by the aid of kind friends, have given debtors a fictitious credit, when the bubble is about to burst, can no longer, under the operation of this law, take the property out of the pockets of the honest man, and keep themselves unscathed. They undoubtedly would raise the cry of vested rights, and say that they took their charters under certain laws, and that they must not now be interfered with. There was another class of debtors, who, hiding their property under one name and another, had gone on and kept the honest man out of his dues, who would, under this law, be brought up to answer and surrender all their ill-gotten and ill-earned wealth. They, too, would be found against this law.

He was one of those who had contended with all his energy, and what little power he might possess, to bring this country to a state of things in which there should be some permanency. He was one of those who had deprecated from his very heart the unhappy condition of things for the last twelve years; and now he was brought to the humiliating condition of seeing some of his valued friends lending their aid to those he had opposed, to present to this nation an instance of the most feeble legislation that could be found on our statute books. He doubted if the world could shew a more could show an instance of legislation like this.

If the bill passed, what hope was there left to the unfortunate world to avoid the evils of its repeal? This bankrupt law was the worst proposed; and for fifty years they would not see a successful attempt to do that which the condition of the country demands. Men would halt, if they found that they are called on to do an act which had before been passed, and, in three months after, was suddenly and completely scotched out. The last hope of the unfortunate of this world would be crushed if this law were to be repealed. He thought that it had been very common to denounce all those who were engaged in the speculations of 1835 and 1836 as mere adventurers, starting into the world with a bold belief that they could make something when they had nothing to lose. Those who knew him knew that no man had been more strongly against the excesses of the thing than he, and he had ridiculed the bubbles of that day more than he had, and more true than the great mass of persons engaged in these enterprises were without capital or character. It was a time of excitement—he spoke not of it to excite political feeling. This government had thrown within the reach of our people immense sums of money, which were expended on much easier terms than ever before known; and the enormous spirit was called into action; individuals did what they could, and every nerve was strained to arouse the energies and call forth the slumbering resources of our people.

Within his own knowledge hundreds and hundreds of men have embarked wealth and character in that activity and enterprise which had made the country follow it now is. It was unnecessary to repeat what he said, but he did not place the number of those who would have stayed in this law so high as many had done, but he believed that there were more than one hundred thousand in this nation who were not only ruined by the operations of those years, but who are as honest, faithful, and true, as the portion of community. Strike from the list of them all those whose character was doubtful—strike as it would be, and let the remainder of the strike from it every man who entered into business relying on his energies alone, and there would remain this number to be benefited by the operation of this law. There was a great class of men honest in the operation, who not only placed their energies in the operation, but who, at their fortunes also; and he held that this whole class, the fault was only that error of judgment which, in a young and growing nation like ours, will prevail more than in older countries, had a right to the operations of this law, and to be restored to usefulness in community and to surrender all their property. Had general stopping been made, the consequences of having done 200,000 men who could not have been doing beyond a mere subsistence from day to day, because they can hold nothing they produce? The activity, energy, and moral power of this country, which had 200,000 men to add to the wealth and honor of the nation, would have been at liberty to do what was ten times their own. The character, the wealth, and the morals of the nation, demanded that they should hold on to the law.

When he reflected on the thousands and thousands whom the repeal of this law would come as the death-knell to every hope, his very soul saddened within him. What was their situation? Prostrated by the misfortune of the times, and, even allowing that it was through their own indiscretion, they have struggled on till now under that sickness of heart which arises upon hope deferred. They have thought that the day of their deliverance was at hand; every arrangement has been made to avail themselves of the advantages of this law; and now that government which has held out to them the most flattering anticipations of relief, blasts them forever. He could hardly conceive a condition more fallen than that of the debtor, who has labored under the influence of the family of the benefits of this law, and now finds that the very power of legislation which gave him this benefit suddenly wrests it from him, and that the moment the doors of his prison begin to open they are closed against him, and he is hurried back to his prison, and he contemplates with grief and indignation the course of action he has followed in the history of this country.

He remembered to have read of a Grecian sculptor who purchased two slaves as models for his studios, over whom he held the power of life and death. To one he offered encouragement of freedom, and water of life, which he might give to a slave of that expression which is higher than the form of man, when raised from the depths of despondency to the buoyancy of hope. The other he ordered to be executed in his presence, and as he calmly watched the death struggle of his victim, secured to himself an imperishable name by transferring to the marble the form of a Roman citizen, the dying agony of a fellow-mortal. Pass this tale of the artist to the just mind, to turn them the palm of ingenious cruelty. His fame perpetuated on marble might be more enduring than that which is most deeply cherished in the broken spirits and bruised hearts of the unfortunate; but they would conquer him by having, in one short life, done more good than a hundred thousand of their fellow-citizens, the more the glorification of blooming hope, and wither and despair.

Mr. Marshall said with hope and withering despair, "I have no doubt that the foreign gentleman who purposed to discuss the merits of this law, which he presumed they were now about to repeal, He would make but one or two observations in explanation of the motion he was about to make. It was now upwards of one week since a vote had been given by a very decided majority of this house, ordering the repeal of a bill for the repeal of this law for last Tuesday. In one way or other, by calls of yeas and nays and by divisions of rules of order, they had been delayed until the present time. He knew that this law was to take effect on the first of January. If it was to be repealed at all, then it was in the last degree important that it should be done as speedily as possible. Nothing could be more impolitic than to delay this bill until the law takes effect in part, and for the benefit of a portion of the people of the United States. It was therefore, so far as he had any concern with the measure, that he had endeavored to get it passed as speedily as possible. It was known that this law was passed under very peculiar circumstances.

Allusion had been made by the eloquent and distinguished gentleman from New York (Mr. Cragger), to the course of members on this floor who voted for this law at the extra session and now were voting in favor of its repeal, as furnishing an example to the people of the country and unparalleled in the annals of legislation. He said that the gentleman, call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that when the law was passed its operation was suspended for a certain time; and that the policy pursued by congress at the extra session, which was the policy of repeal, for other reason was there for suspending its operation, save that the law should be laid before the people for popular examination and discussion? There was a large number of gentlemen who voted for the law on this consideration, that it would give the people an equal fair trial and opportunity to discover the feelings of the people, and if the popular sentiment should be found against the measure, that they might have an opportunity to repeal it. That was the condition on which vote were granted, and that was the condition on which gentlemen who acted thus, and since, by full and free communication with their constituents, had ascertained to their entire satisfaction that the people they represented were opposed to this policy, the charge of inconsistency is not applicable.

As to the public press, and petitions from the people, so far, Mr. Speaker, I say that I am concerned, (continued Mr. M.) that we have not the indisputable evidence of what the wish and desire of the people represent. It had been declared by one of the presses in New York, and published to all the world, that they who went for this repeal were enemies to freedom and in favor of British capitalists; and he, (Mr. M.) had been charged by a New York paper with having received $100,000 for the course he was now pursuing in the vote he was about to give, and his colleague from Kentucky had been included in the same charge; [Mr. Spring, all except myself] that they were paid by British capitalists to vote for the repeal of the bill for which they had voted at the extra session. He referred to this thing to show how little importance was to be attached to what a hireling press might say on the one side or the other.

He had alluded to these matters merely to explain the motion he was about to make. If the law was to be repealed, it ought to be done immediately—before the day of its going into operation. Therefore, under these circumstances, not from inconsiderate haste, or from rash and cruel zeal in this matter, but simply that the sentiments of this house might be tested before the day of the law going into effect, he had risen to move the previous question; and he now made that motion.

Mr. Sellers said that at the extra session, he had voted for the bankrupt bill, and his opinions in regard to the policy of such a law had undergone no change. At the time of the passage of that bill he had distinctly expressed his opinion in favor of its passage, for the express purpose of permitting it to be amended at this session. This was the stipulation, and he said it could not have passed the house without this stipulation. He believed at that time that the bill would meet the needs of the country, and he held that opinion. He believed it was imperfect, but, on repeating, as it did the insolvent laws of the states, and giving entire jurisdiction over the subject to the federal courts, it would effectually shut the door of the courts to the creditors of those who, owing to the expenses incident to applying to the state courts, would be precluded from the benefit of the law. He had hoped that the law would, at this session, have been so amended as that, while it extended the jurisdiction of the federal courts to the insolvent laws of the states, and to debtors whom the law would not deprive another class, equally entitled to consideration, of the benefit of that law. And he held the peculiar friends of the law responsible for not doing, in the amendment, their express promises, and endeavoring to amend the law so as to render it effective to the object which he referred. He would be compelled, therefore, to vote for the repeal of a law in the general principles of which he most heartily concurred, because, in his opinion, without some amendment, it would inflict great injury upon a large class of his constituents.

The main question was then taken, and decided in the negative. Yeas 97, nays 124. So the house decided that the bill should not be rejected.

After some further proceedings, the question on the engrossment of the bill was taken, and decided by yeas 124, nays 96.

And the house ordered the bill to a third reading now.

And the bill having been read by its title, and the question being, "shall this bill pass?"

Mr. Lewis Williams asked the yeas and nays on the main question; which was ordered.

The question, "shall this bill pass?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Landolf W. Andrews, Arington, Alton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Bots, Boyer, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burger, Bush, Caldwell, Calkins, Campbell, Canfield, Carver, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. So the bill was passed, and the bankrupt law of the extra session, so far as the house is concerned, was repealed.

Mr. Campbell, of Tenn. moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken; and asked the previous question.

And the question, (being on the reconsideration), was ordered, and, being taken, was decided in the negative.

So the vote was not reconsidered.

And the question being on the title of the bill; Mr. Arnold moved to to amend it by adding the words, "being the first important act of a public nature that was ever passed without debate."

The speaker, on a point of order raised by Mr. Wise, ruled the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. Profit and Mr. Campbell, of Tenn. simultaneously moved the previous question on the title. And there was a second.

And the main question, (being on the title of the bill), was ordered; and, on being taken, the title of the bill was agreed to.

Mr. Cathoun rose and said, I move that the house adjourn; and I call for the previous question on that. And, at a late hour, the house adjourned.

TUESDAY, JAN. 18. Petitions were presented, and among them the following:

Mr. Underwood presented one for the repeal of the law abolishing imprisonment for debt in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Sillers presented a petition from the citizens of Prince Georges' county, for the erection of a free bridge across the eastern branch of the Potomac.

Mr. Kennedy presented petitions from merchants in Baltimore, in favor of granting the committee on manufactures power to send for witnesses relative to the tariff subject.

A number of petitions from Pennsylvania were presented, asking that no law may be passed impairing the constitutional rights of petition.

Mr. Campbell, of S. C. moved that they be laid on the table, and by yeas 93, nays 75, they were laid on the table.

Another petition was presented, asking either the abolition of slavery in the District, or the removal of the seat of government, and numerous other petitions, having reference to slavery, were presented and laid on the table.

Mr. James presented several memorials, asking that all laws of the house may be repealed, restricting in any way the spirit of liberty which breathes in the constitution. On these petitions the question of reception was raised and laid on the table.

Mr. Ingersoll presented various petitions, and one from citizens of Philadelphia, praying for the amendment or repeal of the bankrupt law, which petition he moved to have referred to the committee on the judiciary with instructions to report a bill for establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States in which the imperfections of the act of 19th August, 1841, should be removed—and, upon these instructions, he moved the previous question. A division took place, and the motion was carried by 83 to 50.

Several petitions were presented from New York, asking that Sunday mails may be abolished.

Mr. Granger presented abolition petitions, which were laid on the table.

Petitions were presented, asking that the postage on all letters shall not exceed ten cents.

Mr. Granger also presented a petition from citizens of New York, asking for adequate security for their persons in all states in the union. Mr. G.

The question of reception being raised, was about to be put, when a motion to adjourn was made, and the house adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 19. Mr. Bidlack arose and having announced the death of the hon. Davis Dimeck, a late member of this house, who first appeared and who died on the 13th inst. at Montrose, Susquehanna co., Pa., delivered an eulogy upon his character, and then submitted the following resolutions, which were adopted.

Resolved, That at this house have learned with feelings of deep humility the intelligence of the decease of the hon. Davis Dimock, jr., late a member of this congress, and as an evidence of the sympathy which the members entertain and hereby tender to his surviving relatives and personal friends, they will wear crape on the left arm for many days.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased this house do now adjourn. And thereupon the house adjourned.

CHRONICLE.

UNITED STATES BANK OFFICERS. The investigation of the charge of conspiracy made against Nicholas Biddle, re-mailed the last evening of the recorder and the depositions, Nicholas Biddle, Saml Jaudon, Thos. Dunlap, Joseph Cowperthwait and John Andrews, were each bound over to the sum of $10,000, to appear at the present term of the court of general sessions, on the 14th of January.

(See last January 13.)

COMMERCE OF BALTIMORE. Total arrival from foreign ports during 1841, 402. Arrivals from eastward ports, 353. Cleared for foreign ports 420. Cleared coastwise, 353.

COMMERCE OF THE WESTERN LAKES. The following particulars of the commerce of the western lakes, from the same source, are given: The report of the United States engineer, dependent on the lakes, by a gentleman of "Boua," is made up, says the Buffalo Commercial, "from precise and accurate data which cannot be gained."

Previous to 1831 the whole commerce west of Detroit, was confined almost entirely to carrying up provisions and goods for the Indian trade, and supplies for the troops, and bringing back the produce of the fur trade.

From 1819 to 1836 one voyage annually was made by a steamboat to Michigan, and in 1832 steamboats chartered by government first appeared at Chicago, then an open roadstead.

In 1836 there were eleven steamboats, which cost $300,000 at Buffalo. These boats took away from Buffalo 42,566 passengers and brought back 15,526; and carried 252 passengers and freight that year. They received 252 passengers and freight that year. They received 252 passengers and freight that year. They received 252 passengers and freight that year.

In 1841 there were 18 steamboats, at a cost of over $600,000. The whole amount received for freight and passengers was $23,265 92 of which $9,372 was cleared as earned, west of Detroit.

For the years 1833, 6, 7, 8, 9, no details could be prepared without vast labor, and the attempt was therefore not made.

In 1840 a steamboat association had been again formed that embraced all the boats. Their number was forty-eight, from 150 to 700 tons burden, and the cost of their construction about $1,000,000. The aggregate earnings were $755,524 45. Eight boats ran regularly to Chicago, whose aggregate earnings were $302,757 93; of which $201,138 may be considered as business west of Detroit.

In 1840 the aggregate earnings were $767,132 27; of which $226,352 were earned west of Detroit.

For estimating the amount of business done by the rail road, no precise data are at hand. It is estimated that 250,000 tons of freight were carried, varying from 20 to 350 tons burden. Their cost is estimated at $1,200,000, and the freight carried at $750,000. Exact data cannot be obtained without consulting the custom house books at every point on the lakes.

In addition to these the vessels owned on both sides of Lake Ontario, which pass through the Welland canal and push their trade to the extreme end of Lake Michigan. The number that passed through the canal, was in

Steamers	1840	1841
Scows and boats	1,563	1,972
Tonnage	202,252	247,911

The amount of freight on this property, which was grown on the Ontario side of these waters, and earned on Lake Erie and the upper lakes, is estimated at $1,000,000, and the aggregate commercial business on these lakes is estimated at $1,700,000.

COMMERCE OF THE NORTHERN LAKES. The Detroit Advertiser gives a brief history of the progress of commerce on the northern lakes. In 1819 there was but one steamboat on them. In 1833 there were 11, costing $100,000 and receiving $222,212. The time of running from Buffalo to Chicago was 22 days. In 1841 there were 15 boats in service costing $600,000, and earning $235,360. In 1840 there were 18 boats, making the voyage in 16 days. In 1839 the boats increased to 43, their cost $2,200,000, and their income to $755,524. In 1841, 323 trips by steam were made from Buffalo to Chicago, and 81 to Upper Lake. Earnings of all the boats, $767,132. The number of sail vessels for the year is estimated at 230, their cost at $1,200,000, and their earnings at $755,000. The earnings of all the boats were about $1,000,000, making a total for the past year of $1,607,132. The emigration and licensed tonnage on the lakes for 1841 was 11,184 tons, of which 11,343 was at Detroit, 9,511 at Cleveland, 8,346 at Oswego, 4,000 at Buffalo, 3,043 at Sacket's Harbor, 2,643 at Huron, 170 at Mackinac, and 230 at Niagara.

The exchange on London and Ohio rail road orders are at 114 1/2 discount for Baltimore bank notes; specie 3 1/2; bills on London 13.

EXTRA ELECTION. The election for a delegate from Queen Anne's county to the legislature of Maryland, were a few years ago, at the Old River, and the election in favor of the Van Buren candidate, Wagon who received 605 votes; Hopper, (whig), 591—majority 11.

GRAIN—imported into Boston, during the year 1841—Of corn, 2,045,224 bushels, oats, 356,503; rye, 34,128; shorts, 43,947.

MISSISSIPPI. The message of Gov. Mcutt does the entire figure, for repudiating the $5,000,000 bonds of the late failed bank, and his excellency comments upon the triumph of the anti-bond paying party, in strains of exaggerated exaltation. He proposes to the legislature the propriety of examining under oath, all of the commissioners who were charged with the management of "The Affairs," he says, "it condensed into a report, and published, will prove that Mississippi stands fully justified in the stand she has taken, and that her faith, justice, honor, dignity and integrity remain unimpaired. Interest upon these bonds has not been paid for the last twelve months; and the governor says the Union bank will not hereafter be able to pay any portion of either principal or interest."

The message says, that the avails of the $5,000,000 bonds were all squandered within eighteen months of the bank commencing discounting. The value of the assets is estimated at $1,000,000. The management, and under favorable circumstances, the bank, at some far distant day, may take up its circulation.

The message comments with severity upon the distribution of the assets, and the distribution of that portion of it which grants pre-emption rights, from which great advantage is expected to the state.

The finances of the state do not appear to be in a very flourishing condition. (N. O. Rev.)

MECHANIC. Gov. Barry's message. Seven and a half columns of the Detroit Daily Advertiser are taken up with the various touches upon many subjects, and in a diffuse manner.

The school system of the state receives attention. It is recommended that the various existing enactments on the subject of public instruction be condensed into one, and published in such a convenient form as will ensure its circulation throughout the state.

The distribution law is condemned—but in moderate language. The rejection of a dividend, and the sale of the stock should be protested against. This no doubt will answer all the useful purposes of political opposition.

The system of internal improvements projected in Michigan some years ago, when speculation was the main object of the day, embraced about 500 miles of rail road, 253 miles of canal, and the improvement of five rivers. The probable cost would not have fallen short of fifteen millions of dollars, and the project was abandoned.

The governor recommends that such works as are near completion be finished, if possible, and that all action be restricted to such, including only those works as are now in progress.

The debt of Michigan now amounts to $4,200,000. There is due to the state from the Morris canal and banking company, and from the U. S. bank of Pennsylvania, about two millions for bonds sold to state institutions.

The following paragraph exhibits a bad condition of the state's financial affairs:

The same party, who held the great revenue of the state, in November last, as well as the interest due on the bonds of the present month, the late administration have found it impossible to meet, and the accounts then due consequently remain unpaid. This is, however, of present ability to pay anything interest, should it be made to be paid with indifference the faith of the state that has been pledged for both interest and principal. Our present inability to pay in a want of disposition on our part, and it should be our constant effort to procure the same.

The annual interest due on the bonds issued by the state, for no provision is made by existing legislation, is about $1,000,000. This amount cannot be raised by direct taxation on the part of the state, and the only resource is to be found upon them. Indeed, under the present circumstances of the country, little or no more can be raised from that source than will be required to defray the current and ordinary expenses of the government, and the equitable settlement of the state in relation to the five million loan, the principal, and consequently the interest, will be greatly lessened. It may comport with your views to lessen either, or actually to cancel our indebtedness by giving the five hundred thousand acres of land, relinquished to us by congress, or other property belonging to the state, in exchange for our bonds, in the event an arrangement to that effect can be made. The entire exequible settlement of the state, under the present policy, is by every true principle of political economy.

Under these circumstances, the state herself failing to meet her obligations, and under the pressure of circumstances which bear upon all, the governor with that peculiar consistency which prevails in some other quarters, as well as in Michigan, insists upon a compulsory settlement of the state, and the payment of the payments forthwith. Where they are to get enough to supply circulation specie, or how they are to keep it, the governor does not say. (Balt. Amer.)

MOD IN CINCINNATI. A disgraceful and lawless proceeding occurred at Cincinnati on the 11th inst. Some of the law-abiding citizens of that city, not fair, perhaps, because the objects of assault, were forcibly taken possession of, and their books, papers, notes and fixtures were destroyed and thrown into the streets. The officers of the law, and the city authorities, failed to do the civil authority in protection of the laws. A few spirited individuals did their duty, but the mass of the community evidently folloed their arms and were mere "mobsters." The call for the city government to convert and protect their authority, was ineffectual. Some of the firemen attempted to arrest the proceeding, but they and the few civil officers that were active, were driven off by the mob. The Cincinnati news was fully and accurately reported. The mobsters had escaped with the valuables. The MIAMI BANK was next assailed, its vaults forced and the books, notes, &c. strewn in the streets—$254,000, of which $18,000 were in specie, and the remainder in notes, and $126,1 in specie. One individual with $24,000 in notes has been arrested. LOGGIE'S office was run upon all days, but paid to the utmost. THE MECHANICS' AND TRADERS BANK was threatened, but escaped.

TEXAS. By the arrival of the steam packet New York, we have received our files of Texas papers to the 10th inst. The message of president Taylor to the department of commendable brevity. He begins by informing congress that he shall present to them facts and truth in their simplest dress, and that there is a little cause for the state of Texas, and that the state of Texas was declared in the message of his predecessor. With the United States a more definite and specific treaty is needed. Towards Mexico Texas stands in precisely the same position as it did in 1821. The state of Texas recommends no interference in the revolutions of that distracted country, and a sort of armed neutrality towards the people of Mexico.

The remarks of the Texas tribics are far from satisfactory. Gov. Houston urges the establishment of trading posts along the western border of Red river, protected by adequate force, and thinks this would serve to conciliate the Indians and keep them quiet.

The message of the Texas tribics is far from satisfactory. Gov. Houston urges the establishment of trading posts along the western border of Red river, protected by adequate force, and thinks this would serve to conciliate the Indians and keep them quiet. The nation is not only without money, but without credit. As a remedy for these evils the message proposes a total suspension of the redemption of the national debt until such a time as the government can redeem in good faith such as is ought to redeem. It further recommends the repeal of the law authorizing the assessment of double taxes, the reduction of the direct tax one-half, and that the government should redeem in gold or silver, or in paper of unquestionable value.

The message is in favor of a new issue of paper—a pretty expedient truly to retuse the liquidation of one of our national debts immediately to the government for the redemption of this note $350,000, it is proposed to reserve a million of acres of ground known as the Cherokee country. A loan of three hundred thousand dollars on the security of the public domain, is likewise suggested.

The message concludes with some sensible recommendations of retrenchment. (N. O. Rev, 10th.)

THE PENNSYLVANIA COAL TRADE. A table is published in the Journal showing the quantity of anthracite coal sent to market from the different regions in Pennsylvania, from the commencement of the trade in 1820 to 1842, together with the annual increase and consumption. In the year 1820, there were only 265 tons of anthracite coal sent to market, which was shipped from the Lehigh river. In 1831, the consumption of anthracite coal amounted to 150,000 tons. In 1841, including an overstock of 50,000 tons, the supply of anthracite in market was 1,000,366 tons, independent of the Wilkes-Barre coal. In 1831, the consumption of anthracite in market has been a steady increase annually in the amount of coal mined and consumed. With the exception of two or three seasons. Although the mining of coal for exportation commenced in 1821, the consumption of anthracite in 1835, five years later than the Lehigh, there has been 1,037,916 tons more sent to market from the Schuylkill region than from all the other anthracite regions in the state combined.

CONGRESS. Would that we could blot out forever most of the proceedings that have occupied the attention of the house of representatives for the last few days. We grow sick at heart in contemplating the scene there presented, fully persuaded as we are, that whatever nation allows its legislative body habitually to recur to a state of anarchy, is unequalled for the enjoyment of a permanent republican government. Our task however is imperative, the record must be preserved, if it be but to furnish an admonition to those who shall succeed the present generation. Next number will contain a condensed account of the proceeding to which we allude.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

By the arrival of the steamer Britannia at Boston, on the 23d, Liverpool dates to the 4th and London to the 2d inst. have been received.

A MINISTER EXTRAORDINARY.—FROM GREAT BRITAIN.

One of the most important items of intelligence by this arrival, is the appointment of Lord Ashburton as a special minister to the United States for the purpose of entering into negotiations for the final settlement of all difficulties between the two countries.—It is not probable that the position of Mr. Fox as resident minister here will be in the least affected by the arrival of this new diplomatist from the British court. This appointment cannot be regarded otherwise, so far as we can judge from all that has been published upon the subject, than as a proof that the present British ministry are desirous of terminating amicably the various unpleasant difficulties at present existing. The appointment of a gentleman having, from weighty considerations, every conceivable inducement to preserve peace between the two nations, interested with and possessing the confidence of commercial men every where, associated with us by family connections and having large landed estates here, cannot but be regarded as a friendly indication on the part of the British government. His identification with the great bankers, Baring & Brothers, has furnished a pretext to the panic makers to surmise that one of the objects of his appointment is to demand in some form a recognition by the United States government, of the state debts owned in Europe. That one motive of Lord Ashburton's visit to this country may be to look after the deep stake which Europeans have in the security of their investments in American stocks, we readily admit to be probable, but that any of them seriously contemplate urging the interference of the general government in the premises, we do not believe. They have been distinctly apprized of the true posture of their adventures in our funds, and must like ourselves, be content to keep the responsibility where it was when they contracted: We are prepared in all sincerity to welcome the new minister as the harbinger of peace, persuaded that he is not frightened from any unembarrassments.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The Great Western reached Bristol on the 16th of December, having made the voyage in thirteen days. The Recluse left after a passage of eighteen days. The Caledonia on the 16th, in eleven days from Halifax. The Jedda on the 31st, in the same time. Parliament to meet on 3d February, and the queen had signified her purpose of opening the session in person.

Mr. Everett, the American minister to the court of London, with Mrs. Everett and family, arrived in Upper Grosvenor street, from Paris, December 13. On Thursday, Mr. Everett proceeded to Windsor castle, on a visit to the Queen, and on the following day he took leave. On Wednesday, the 23d, he paid visits to members of the royal family in London.

The cultivation of cotton in the West Indies, on the American system, it is said is proceeding most satisfactorily. One of the superintendents says, "It only requires the means, constant application, decision, industry, and perseverance, to make this beautiful and productive country the largest producer of cotton in the world."

EUROPEAN TREATY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.—A treaty was signed in London, Dec. 20, by the Earl of Aberdeen on the part of Great Britain, the Count St. Aulaire on the part of France, Baron Schlenitz on the part of Austria, Baron Kohler on the part of Prussia, and Baron Brunow on the part of Russia, for the prohibition of the slave trade, in which it is stated the trade in slaves is declared piracy, and the right of search for the detection of violations of the treaty stipulated in the most extensive sense. A similar compact had been previously entered into between Great Britain and some of the minor powers.

The Liberals of the city of Dublin have determined to bring forward Lord Morpeth as a candidate for that city, in the place of the late honorable and lamented conservative member, Mr. West, who died last week, after a very short illness.

The message of president Tyler had been received and read with much interest and satisfaction. Its pacific tone caused an immediate rise in the funds.

The Excelsior Bull Exaro.—The final and revised statement of E. B. Smith to the treasury is to the following effect:

"That he was introduced so long back as 1830 to Rapallo, Solari, and one or two of their associates. That soon after, becoming entangled in an accommodation bill, he was tempted to 'borrow' an exchequer bill of £1,000, in order to raise money to meet his acceptances.

"That a speculation was entered into by Rapallo and his friends, which, if successful, was to have extricated all parties from their difficulties. But it proved most unfortunate, and plunged them into increased perplexity and trouble.

"That he subsequently lay in his power at any time to secrete and misapply almost any number of bills, wanting only the signature, and by a simple forgery to turn them into good and valid exchequer bills.

"That no person of rank or public character, whatever, was in any way mixed up in the transaction; the parties being himself, Solari, Rapallo, and another individual, whose office was in Basinghall street, at which place they used to meet and concert their plans.

"He believes the total amount fabricated to be about £340,000; but it is doubtful whether a sum of £40,000 is or is not included in this total.

"He still maintains that this whole amount has been paid, from time to time, in gambling transactions on the stock exchange."

DEADLY RAILROAD ACCIDENT.—On the 24th ultimo a train of freight cars on the Great Western railway was suddenly arrested by coming in contact with a mass of the embankment, that had fallen upon the rails at the deep cutting called the gullet. A frightful scene occurred. The engine, tender, and cars were wrecked, from a time to time, in passing were instantly killed, and fifteen or twenty very serious, some of them mortally, wounded. They were mostly industrious laborers and mechanics.

From the Morning Chronicle.

SPECIAL MISSION TO THE UNITED STATES.—Lord Ashburton's appointment has been favorably received, in commercial circles, and given a tone of confidence to the holders of state stocks. His lordship's appointment will be acceptable to the Americans, as the Messrs. Barings have been for many years most extensively engaged in American affairs, and, in fact, the agents of the American government in monetary operations. His lordship is besides a citizen of the great republic, and one of the largest landed proprietors, too, in the state of Pennsylvania. His talents as a man of business are well known. He is one of the largest house-holders in the United States, and lady Ashburton (late Miss Bingham) is an American by birth. Well versed in the history and value of state bonds, and of the peculiar structure of the American constitution, he will be able to press upon the attention of the Americans the necessity of practical provision for their public engagements. The Americans themselves are the greatest sufferers by the distress with which their securities are looked upon, for they are thereby deprived of one of their principal means of supporting their own prosperity, and until their credit be restored, their trade and manufactures must be in a depressed condition. An satisfactory arrangement of their differences with this country is, in the first place, absolutely necessary, as a prelude to the future happiness and welfare of the union; and this important object, we trust, will now be accomplished.

From the Times.

It gives us much pleasure to announce that the right hon. Lord Ashburton, at the request of her majesty's government, is about to proceed to the United States on a special mission, with the object of settling all existing differences between that country and our own. His lordship, who will sail in a few weeks, had been asked to undertake this service and had consented to do so, before the president's message had been received, so that the object of the mission, whatever be its character or results, has been had recourse to wholly irrespective of anything contained or omitted in that document. The step itself, we think, is a wise one, inasmuch as the introduction of new elements of irritation contingent upon either delay or success, would naturally render an amicable adjustment unattainable, and involve both countries in all the horrors of war.

Two things are clearly demonstrated by the appointment of this special mission: in the first place, that the conservative government, instead of initiating the wings in prosecuting a series of speculative political experiments are steadily addressing themselves to the repair of social and political evils, as by endeavoring to root out mercantile confidence, and, secondly, that Sir R. Peel's ministry is intent, by all practicable means, upon maintaining the blessings of peace.

Neither must it be supposed that Lord Ashburton's mission necessarily implies any deficiency in the instructions or powers of the American minister at her majesty's court. Those who are ambitious and powerful, we have no reason to doubt, are of a generous order; while, from a known discretion and ability of Mr. Everett, as well as from the very short period during which his excellency has been in this country, the presumption is, that, for various satisfactory reasons, it has appeared that the disputed points between America and England, which have hitherto been committed to Lord Ashburton and the Washington cabinet. The appointment of a special ambassador from this country is, of itself, a piece of marked respect to the United States government, which can hardly fail of being duly appreciated, and of moving the way for an amicable negotiation. The selection of Lord Ashburton for such a delicate mission secures us, upon the whole, to be deserving of commendation. His lordship is, by universal acknowledgment, the prince of British merchants.

FRANCE.

The ministry have triumphed largely in the house of deputies. M. Sauzet being elected president by 129 over M. Lamartine, and of 84 over both M. Lamartine and M. Buge.

An endorsement had been published, accompanied by a report from marshal Soult, reducing the French army one company in each battalion, or from 353,000 to 344,000 men, and 15,000 horses, by which a saving will be made of 30,000,000 francs per annum.

The whole of the persons accused of having taken part in the attempt to assassinate the royal duke, a well as those charged with being concerned in the complot in which the attempt was said to have originated, have been found guilty, with the exception of Prioul.

Quenisset, the principal, Colombier, the owner of the wine shop, and Just Brazier, are condemned to death. Dufour, having no doubt confessed, is sentenced to deportation for life, with Alexandre Petit and Jarrasse. Boggio and Mallet are sentenced to fifteen years detention; Lanois and Baucheron to ten years. Dupuy is condemned to five years detention, and Bozin undergoes the same sentence. Bonzet, Considère, Martin, Fongezay, and Prioul are acquitted. It is understood that the life of Quenisset will be spared.

The conviction of Dupuy was considered as a violent attack upon the freedom of the press.

The king of the French opened the session of the chambers on the 27th ult. with the following speech from the throne:

"My lords peers and deputies: Since the close of your last session, the questions which excited in the east our just solicitude have just reached their term. I have concluded with the emperor of Austria, the queen of Great Britain, the king of Prussia, the emperor of Russia, a convention which concentrates the common intention of all the powers to maintain the peace of Europe and consolidate the repose of the Ottoman empire.

"The great burdens imposed upon the country have experienced considerable reductions. It would have been my lively wish that a balance should have been immediately established between the expenditures and revenues of the state, which you will achieve without weakening our military organization, and without deferring the execution of those works which are to increase the national prosperity.

"A project of a law will be presented to you for completing the principal line of a great system of rail roads, calculated to ensure those rapid and easy communications with all parts of our territory which will prove a source of force and riches to the nation.

"I am endeavoring, at the same time, by negotiations prudently conducted, to extend our commercial relations, and open new markets for the productions of our soil and our art.

"Such labors honor peace, and render it stable and fruitful at the same time. I have reason to reckon that it will not be disturbed, receiving from all the powers the most amicable assurances.

"I have taken measures to prevent any external complication from disturbing the security of our African possessions. Our brave soldiers are pursuing on the coast, and land and forever French, the course of their noble labors, in which I am happy that my sons have had the honor of concurring. My perseverance shall complete the work undertaken by our courageous army, and France will introduce into her civilization as the consequence of her glory.

"The financial laws, and others having for their object to introduce useful improvements in the public administration, will be presented to you immediately.

"Whatever may be the burdens of our situation, France would support them without difficulty if faction did not unnecessarily obstruct the course of her powerful activity. I will not dwell upon the intrigues and crimes of the factions, but let us not forget gentlemen, that it is that which debars our country from fully enjoying all the blessings which Providence has caused to appear, and which retards the development of that legal and pacific liberty which France has at last achieved, and of which I make it my glory to ensure her the possession.

"We shall follow up the task, gentlemen. My government will do its duty. It will maintain ever and constantly the authority of the laws, and cause them to be respected, as it will respect them itself. Your loyal support without difficulty if faction did not unnecessarily obstruct the course of her powerful activity. I will not dwell upon the intrigues and crimes of the factions, but let us not forget gentlemen, that it is that which debars our country from fully enjoying all the blessings which Providence has caused to appear, and which retards the development of that legal and pacific liberty which France has at last achieved, and of which I make it my glory to ensure her the possession.

SPAIN.
Intelligence has been received from Madrid. By a decree, the regent had suppressed the whole cavalry of the royal guard, the officers of which all belonged to noble families. These corps are to be replaced by two regiments of infantry and two of cavalry. The high and very significant names had been given; the Duke of Albufera, and the Duke of Medina and Isaura, and the others of Sagunto and Paria. It had been resolved that, hereafter, the guard of the palace should be entrusted in turn to the different corps of the garrison.

The cortes of Spain were opened with great pomp at Madrid on the 26th December. The young queen and regent were present, and were seated on the throne, the regent on the right and the queen on the left. The president of the council handed the speech to the queen, which she passed to the regent, who read it. It is much taken up with local questions, the state of the roads and bridges—of the means of education—of the Basque provinces for reforming the judiciary, and rendering judges independent. But it is a remarkable speech from a Spanish throne. As to European nations, it speaks of the relations with all as friendly. There is no specific allusion to the United States. Treaties have been made with the republic of Ecuador, Uruguay and Chili, and with the other republics, not yet recognised the same conduct will be adopted. Apartments were preparing for the reception of the infant Don Francisco and his family.

It was expected that the municipal elections both in Madrid and in the provinces would be carried by the democratic party.

The ministry had prepared a municipal bill, which was said to be extremely liberal, and no doubt was entertained that it would meet the approbation of the cortes. Several other bills, equally important, were also on the point of receiving the sanction of the cortes; and among them was one relative to the cottons of Castilian manufacture, and another regulating the corn trade.

AUSTRIA.

The French journals contain a letter from Vienna stating that the commercial and financial crisis having compelled the undertakers of rail roads to demand government that they must either suspend or delay their labors, the Austrian cabinet, which attaches the highest importance to the termination of the rail road between Trieste and the Danube, has come to the decision to aid the contractors. A disarming has consequently been ordered on a great scale. Thirty thousand horses are immediately to be disposed of, and the sums arising from this sale, and from others connected with the disarming, are to be exclusively applied to public works, but especially to rail roads.

ALGIERS.

Algerie, it is said, is to be constituted a vice-royalty, and the duke de Nemours to be made viceroy. The French minister of war has received from General Bugeaud a dispatch dated Algiers, December 6, containing the intelligence that several thousand of the banks of the Tafna have been sent to the mouth of that river to convey their chiefs to Oran. This news was announced to the governor general in a letter from Colonel Tempourre, commandant of native cavalry, had gone to meet the chiefs at a distance of twelve leagues from that town.

Colonel Tempourre, had also sent word that Ben Hammed, Abdel-Kader's khalifa at Tlemcen, had been completely defeated by Ali Yamani, who is allied to the French, and had been forced to retire toward the frontiers of Morocco with only 250 horse; that the regular battalion had been entirely dispersed that the men had disbanded and retired to their homes; that all his baggage had been pillaged, as had also been the town of Tlemcen, by the Arabs, and that this place had been completely evacuated by Abdel-Kader's adherents. General Bugeaud and the Beni Zrouet, on the one side, and the Beni Cheh, near its mouth, were in open revolt against the Emir.

General Changarnier had made another sortie from Blidah into the Atlas, and had brought in some prisoners and cattle. All the Sahel, or hilly country between the frontiers of the Medja, was perfectly tranquil—natives continued to trade with the French in Algiers, and some had reported that Ben Salem had been again defeated by Ben Diar, khalifa of El Mokrai, who is the chief the Medja, and allied to the French. Lieutenant Pelle had returned to Algeria with a razzia among the tribes of the east. He had killed 200 sheep and 1,500 cattle, and had broken 20 Kabyles.

RUSSIA AND CIRCASSIA.

Intelligence had been received at Constantinople, by way of Trebizond, of a victory gained by the Circassians over the Russians; the most signal and decisive, it is said, that has occurred since the beginning of the war.

A large expedition, consisting of thirty thousand men, had been disembarked on the coast, with a view of destroying the grain, which had been cultivated by the Circassians after the harvest, when a storm having suddenly risen drove the ships from their anchorage.

The Russian officers, availing themselves of the opportunity, assailed them fiercely from every side, and the Russians, separated from their stores, which had been carried out to sea, were compelled to commence a disastrous retreat through a country consisting entirely of mountain, forest, and dells.

The exception of two thousand, who escaped to Anapa, the whole of thirty thousand were killed or made prisoners; such are the accounts received from Trebizond. Further details of this tremendous disaster of the Russians are eagerly expected.

TURKEY AND THE EAST.

By the Levant mail, we have advices from Constantinople to the 27th, Alexandria to the 25th, Smyrna to the 26th, and Athens to the 30th Nov.

The armaments continued in the most national cause being assigned for such demonstrations. Jealousy of Greek intrigue, and a vague apprehension of the future, appear to be the only motives for the sultan indulging in so much unnecessary expense. Kosrew Pasha is living in a retired manner, and apparently is not desirous of again entering into the councils of the Porte.

Selim Pasha, with an army of 3,000 men, has forcibly pacified the Maronites of Lebanon; but the Druses retired into the mountains and defied him.

The chief features of the advices brought by the Levant mail were the change of ministry at Constantinople, the appointment of Ismet Nispet pasha to be grand vizier in succession to the late Reschid Pasha. Accounts from Athens had reached Malta, announcing that the king of Greece had declined the mediation of the three powers to whom the Porte had addressed complaints, declaring himself the head of an independent state. It was rumored that the Turkish fleet would direct its course towards Greece in a few days.

The Journal of Smyrna of the 9th ult. announces, under date Beyrout the 1st, that the energetic measures taken by the Turkish authorities had put an end to the calamities with which Syria was visited during the last two months. Reschid pasha, at the head of a strong Ottoman force, had arrived at Zable, in time to prevent the participation of Christians from resorting to cruel reprisals against the Druses, and to repress all further hostile movements on either side.

Troops sent from Damascus replaced in that position those commanded by Reschid pasha, part of which occupied Deir-el-Kamar, and the rest returned to Beyrout. The pasha of Damascus succeeded in averting the threatened participation of the Christians in the Musulman population. Detachments of troops patroled the streets day and night, and maintained public tranquillity.

Several Musulmen, convicted of having burnt two Greek churches, had been sentenced to the galleys, and to the payment of the costs of their reconstruction. The Greek patriarch, in return for the favor of the offenders, had obtained a remission of the first part of the sentence. On the 23d November, an English war steamer reached from Malta, with orders for the British to evacuate Syria. All the officers, detached here and there throughout the country, had in consequence been immediately recalled.

The park of artillery at Beyrout, and the rest of the material was already partly re-embarked, and the final evacuation was to take place on the 4th. The English station before Beyrout was to consist of only two steamers and a frigate. The French had a brig and a corvette on the coast, and the Austrians a corvette. The latter, however, were expecting another vessel of war, with a view to the removal of the general of Austria in Beyrout, on board.

From Egypt we learn that the new tariff of duties has been put in force in Cairo, which authorises the exaction of 9 per cent. interior duty on exports, and 2 per cent. interior duty on imports, whilst an additional 8 per cent. import and export duty must be paid at Alexandria.

"The cotton crop of last year," says a correspondent, "has been very small in consequence of the great devastation of the Nile, and it is expected that that of this year will not be much more abundant, owing to the same cause. Of 73,640 bales exported last year, 20,340 bales have gone to Liverpool, 35,421 to France, 1,000 to the United States, and the only now remain in store about 1,500 bales more. Only a few bales of the new cotton have yet arrived in Alexandria."

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

THE TRADE OF THE LAKES. The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser of the 29th repeats the request that we will do justice to the statements they have made with a view of correcting the errors which they attribute to General TALLYMANT, but which as is shown in the communication which we insert below from the gentleman, ought to be attributed, if they exist, not to General Tallmadge, but to Mr. Woodbury, the late secretary of the treasury, from whose official report to congress Mr. Tallmadge derived the statements which are objected to as erroneous.

In the Register of the 15th inst. the first one published after receiving the Buffalo paper containing their statements and remarks in relation to this subject, we inserted the article from that paper almost entire, for the purpose of eliciting the truth. Whatever and wherever truth be, to that our allegiance is first due, and so far as is in our power that obligation shall be fulfilled. Our publication has had the desired effect, by calling forth the explanation which follows from General Tallmadge, but which, as it relates also to another and more general topic of interest, we place under the caption of FOREIGNERS AVAILING OF OUR FREE TRADE SYSTEM TO MONOPOLIZE ALL TRADE.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 19th, 1842.
To the editor of "Niles' National Register."

SIR: The agent for your Register, a few days since, showed me the paper of January 15, containing your remarks with extracts from the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser, of 29th ult., in relation to the address delivered by me at the American Institute, in October last. The extract from the Buffalo Advertiser says—"general Tallmadge makes the following statement, professing to be derived from the documents sent to congress second March, 1841—showing the tonnage and vessels which entered the United States in 1840."

"The commerce and navigation on the western lakes exhibit a cease yet more extraordinary:

Kake Ontario.	Vessels.	Tonnage.
American,	509	63,317
British,	1,011	213,060
Lake Erie.
Detroit—American,	7	503
British,	155	12,000

Buffalo, Cleveland and other places seem to be omitted, and the tables are too imperfect to state the commerce of the Upper Lakes."

Your extract continues;—"the figures here given for number of vessels, must of course be intended for error."

"Now what does this statement mean? Is it pretended, in the face and eyes of facts, that the commerce of Lake Erie is almost entirely in the hands of the British and carried on in British vessels? The reverse of this is known to be the case by every man of common intelligence, who has ever heard of the commercial transactions of our western waters! This is very true, and therefore, general Tallmadge, deceived the tables, besides the omission of Buffalo, Cleveland and other places, was to me too imperfect to state the commerce of the Upper Lakes."

Your extract continues—"to show the glaring error of general Tallmadge's statement with regard to the business of Detroit, we give the amount of tonnage, registered at Detroit, for the year 1839—341 American vessels—derived from an official source. There were 22 steamboats, 36 schooners, 8 sloops, 1 brig and 1 ship, with an aggregate tonnage of 7,472 tons. The return of 1840 must show an increase of this result, so much more important to the commerce of American vessels, with the grand total of 1,333 tons produced by their aggregated business!"

Was there ever, such an unworthy perversion of an address, giving a table from a public document, sent to congress 2d March, 1841? The omission of Buffalo and other places pointed out, and the table declared to be too imperfect to state the commerce of the Upper Lakes. Yet your extract has the assurance to call it "general Tallmadge's statement," in his desire to make out his case."

This bold denial, is evidently without any reference to the table 2d March, 1841. It is now before you. It was read at the public meeting, and it now is to be read: page 272 of Mr. Woodbury's report from 1840, as follows:

Detroit—Michigan.	No. Vessels.	Tonnage.
Entered—American,	7	503
Foreign,	155	12,310
Cleared—American,	68	4,796
Foreign,	119	2,570

In a like table of the commerce of the lakes for 1839—page 278—280. It is stated

Detroit—American,	No. 43.	Tonnage, 9,206
Foreign,	39,	2,162

In the same table is the following—
New York—American, 1579
Cape Vincent, 1329—the same Cape Vincent sent 1840 " to gain credence, for public tables containing such seeming discrepancies, and representing the village of Cape Vincent as having entered in 1839 more vessels than New York, and more than double the number of Boston. So too, the tables 1840 of "entrances" and "clearances," and certain known districts—Buffalo creek in particular, or any other districts on Lake Erie, within the state of New York. These and several other like circumstances, induced a belief that errors had crept into some of the tables, and they were not to be relied upon as an accurate statement of the commerce of the lakes; especially as they set down the commerce of the lakes and the Atlantic cities to the "British American colonies" as much less than the apparent and believed amount and shipments of American produce to Canada alone.

The object and the inquiry is after correct information. The tables do not purport to give the coasting trade, but only to set down the coasting tonnage.—Perhaps all may be correct, and "all discord, be harmony, rightly understood." But the local press would oblige the public to give statistics of both the foreign and coasting trade.

The American Institute, has long been desirous to obtain correct tables of commerce and especially of the commerce of the lakes. About a year ago, one of its members, a request was made, through the "Times and Star" newspaper, asking the western press to collect and give the statistics of the lakes; and suggesting as a reason the supposed imperfections of the public tables. It is only when objections are urged against American produce, being diverted to British channels, to aggravate a false power, that certain presses in America can be aroused into action, and then in active vituperation.

The published address professes to be "a summary report," and certainly is known to a very numerous audience to be only about one-third of the spoken word. Yet by the same summary, and indiscreetly states the supposed imperfections of the country's tables; and then proceeds in nearly two pages to conjecture the amount of the diverted trade, from circumstances; from hearsay; from public rumor; from mercantile letters; from the alleged sudden rise of tolls on the Welland canal from £12 to £50,000 tons. Yet by the corresponding decrease of the tonnage and tolls of the New York canal, all the tonnage and tolls of the New York canal, which is withheld, by the paper from which you "extracted," while it seizes upon one of the conjectures; as to the Welland canal, and says it is not well founded. If either, or all of the circumstances so conjectured above suggested are found incorrect, it may vary in proportion, but will not effect the principle urged: the diverted trade.

Mark the following: stated from the table of the New York canals—and which is omitted in the reported address.

1535 Freight Tons.	153,191	Tolls.	$1,548,956
" "	636,347	" "	1,614,336
1837 "	611,757	" "	1,292,623

This decrease of freight and tolls, followed the loss of our West India trade, under our diplomatic agreement. British regulations to cherish her carrying trade, at the same time began, to divert American produce by the Canadas and the Welland canal; and notwithstanding the opening of other canals and tolls into the lakes, and the new settlements and greatly increased productions, and equal in extent to that upon the New York canal, not regained in 1840 the amount from which it fell in 1835.

To appreciate the importance of the lake trade, it must be remembered, they extend in land, more than 2,000 miles; and into valleys and a country unequalled in fertility; and presenting a sea coast upon the American side of the lakes, more equal in extent to that upon the Atlantic. It is known, the Welland canal claims more than a moiety of the produce which other floats on the lakes. One of the topographical engineers, in a report April 20, 1841, states the wheat imported from American ports as 2,310,000 bushels, and the bulk of such an importation has been given to the Canadian trade, that the wharves and storehouses, hitherto in use at Kingston, were last year found totally inadequate, and property was piled upon the wharves and covered with temporary sheds. Vessels laden with produce, after being detained three weeks and upwards, waiting their turn at the wharves, finally came over to Oswego and landed their cargoes."

We know that the British had obtained much of the carrying trade of American produce, and were desirous to bring this fact to the attention of our government, but we did not before know we were also furnishing our ports and storehouses, to give facilities to take the carrying trade of American produce to British vessels.

The following table may further illustrate and will afford materials for useful reflection.

"From the Rochester Democrat."
CANAL NAVIGATION—FAIR. &c.

The canal being closed, very little has been done in flour or wheat the past week. By reference to our canal collector's books, we find the quantity that has gone east this year is much less than last. Say cleared from, and passing here

Bush. wheat.
In 1840,	1,217,534
In 1841,	1,035,962

Deficiency in '41, 221,562 629,968

The greater part of this deficiency has occurred since the 1st of October, as the quantity received at Schenectady, West Troy and Albany from 1st October to close of navigation, Bush. flour.	Bush. wheat.

In 1840 is	797,053
In 1841,	594,361

Deficiency in 1841, 202,692 220,731

Allow that it takes 4 bushels of wheat to make a barrel flour, and the deficiency at tide water since 1st October is equal to 252,743 barrels flour."

The known customary prices of transportation from Buffalo to tide water is one dollar per barrel of which 34 cents is on the part of the canal, and 61 is for canal tolls. This exhibition of a public loss of water, on this one item of flour, diverted to British markets of $252,743. It would have required, to have removed this flour to New York, 527 sloops of eighty tons each, carrying 480 barrels each; and four hands to each sloop, would have been employment to 2,091 seamen. Assuming that this amount of flour had arrived at New York, it would have required for its exportation 70 ships of 300 tons each, each carrying 3,600 barrels; and employed 700 seamen. The British understand these results and wisely frame their commercial measures accordingly. The falling off of this one month, in this single article of flour, illustrates the injurious effects of the diversion of the lakes, diverted into British channels. The merchants, the labourers, ship builders, indeed every condition of life, and above all, the employment and advantage for our seamen are injuriously effected. The advantages of the return cargoes are lost—the prosperity of the country and the strength of the nation are essentially impaired. The ship building at New York is yearly decreasing, and many of her vessels are lying without employment at our docks.

In 1839, N. York built 106 vessels tonnage 17,951

1840, 72 " 13,786

"I was aware that the declaration in the address of "That there was an alarming and rapid reduction of American commerce in foreign vessels" would occasion surprise." But it is not on this account, the less true. The tonnage of vessels which entered the U. States in 1839 is

American vessels numbers 7,211 tonnage 1,575,946

Foreign " 4,571 " 712,363

This shewing one-third of the American commerce, in number of vessels and tonnage is in foreign bottoms, and principally under the British flag. Mark its rapid advance!"

In 1821 the British tonnage was 55,188 and the American tonnage was 765,093. This showing the proportion of British vessels which entered the U. States was 7 1/10 (seven one-tenth), per cent. compared with the American tonnage employed in the foreign trade of the United States. In the year 1835 this proportion was increased to 39 per cent. In the year 1840, the proportion of the foreign commerce was about 46 per cent.

The trade between the U. States and the British colonies presents some startling facts. I quote from an able writer.

"The British tonnage cleared from American ports for the British coast in 1834, '35 and '36, was 51,800 tons; the American tonnage cleared at the same ports during the same period, was 477,100 tons. Being more than nine times as much! The British tonnage cleared from the American ports, for the colonies during the years 1837, '38 & '39, was greater than the American tonnage cleared from the same ports during the same period, was 477,100 tons; being nearly eleven times as much as the British tonnage. In 1839 the British tonnage cleared for foreign ports was 421,500 tons! Being equal to one-third of the total amount of American tonnage, cleared for foreign ports; and shewing an increase of four hundred and forty-six per cent. in the British tonnage; while our own increase of tonnage during the same period, was only fifty-two per cent."

The poet says—

"'Tis greatly wise to walk with our past hours
And ask them what report they bring."
The second act passed by the first congress 1789—secured to the tonnage of our merchants a monopoly of the China trade; and gave paramount advantages in all other foreign trade, by discriminative duties.
A pound of hyson tea, imported in a foreign vessel, paid twenty-five cents more duty, than in an American vessel. The same act allowed a discount of ten per cent. on the duties upon goods imported in American vessels.

The third act of the same congress fixed a duty of six cents per ton on American vessels, and all foreign vessels fifty cents.

To exclude foreign vessels from the coasting trade, they were subjected to a duty of fifty cents per ton, for every voyage. American vessels, paid six cents per ton, only once a year.

Such were the principles of protection established by the fathers of the revolution and enacted the first session of congress on the organization of the new government. The consequence of this system, has been a possession of the whole of the coasting trade; and for a time an increase of American tonnage unexampled in the history of navigation. In 1816, the province of Nova Scotia passed an act intending to secure the trade in plaster of Paris to British vessels. It became known here in February 1817, that the royal assent had been given to this act. On motion of Rufus King 17th February 1817, congress instructed the committee on foreign relations to "report measures to regulate the importation of plaster of Paris, and to counteract the regulations of any other nation injurious to our own, relative to that trade." A bill was reported and passed in the house; which went to the senate, reading three times, and with amendments, returned to the house, concurred in, and became a law in one day.
The hostile measure was effectually and decisively counteracted.

In 1818, and with almost equal celerity, an act was passed, prohibiting the entry into our ports, of British vessels, arriving from places from which American vessels were excluded. It is due to the memory of Rufus King, who was an ardent advocate of this measure, and in truth the parent of the bills of 1817 and 1818.

The spirit, which had sustained us in the recent war, for "free trade and sailors' rights" had not then, become extinct. But a shade "has come over us;"
and mark the consequence. In the year 1815, the "registered tonnage" of American vessels engaged in foreign trade was $54,294 tons. The acts of 1817 and 1818, with the system and the spirit to counteract, which created them, have passed away. The report of the treasury table No. 17 shews the registered tonnage for 1839 to be 834,244 tons (any alleged corrections of the account will not vary the result).—
Thus in the period of twenty-four years since 1815 our position has been doubled; the system of our commercial regulations has been altered; and the "registered tonnage" of American vessels in foreign trade has usually been lower and in 1839 continued fallen off 20,000 tons in its amount.

In 1813 the "coasting trade" was "enrolled" 513,853 tons.
In 1839 it was 1,027,724 tons.

Thus showing an increase of nearly treble in its amount of tonnage. The system of its protection, established in 1789 has been continued, and foreign vessels have been excluded.

The scheme of giving a free trade, to those who deny it to us and refuse reciprocity and the sympathy of foreigners and nations, against our wealth and "burden the means for the benefit of the free," had not found advantage into the coasting trade. The contrast presented in the table of the treasurer will best illustrate the experience of the past and afford wisdom for the future. The "registered" and "enrolled" and "licensed" tonnage for 1839, together amount to 2,006,478 tons. It is from this tonnage that our American navigation and commerce are represented as prosperous.

The augmentation of our commerce and navigation in foreign vessels can never increase our naval strength. The surrender of the transportation of American produce to British vessels may aggravate American trade, but it will not foster a carrying trade, and a nursery for American seamen. Such measures can never prepare this country to assert its rights, and maintain its independence against a colossal and gigantic power,—the like of which the world has never witnessed—not even in the days of Roman dominion.

It was asked in the British parliament why certain commercial advantages had been allowed to Prussia; they were refused to America? The answer was that English goods found their way on to the continent through Prussia; and from her situation, no harm could come from her; but the United States by their increasing navigation were becoming dangerous; and must be kept down.

The case of Wellington, it is said was not long since asked, if it was probable there would be a war with the United States? He replied, the time is not yet! when that comes it will be a big war: see me prepare for it, first!!

To attempt to meddle with the English carrying trade, would be with her, a cause of war. Her commercial regulations are intended to secure her own carrying trade, and to supplant that of other nations, to cherish her commercial marine as a nursery for seamen, and to build up her naval strength. Such are the measures of English preparation for a crisis in affairs.

Allowing a free trade and an open commerce to nations, which refuse us a reciprocity, an empty treasury and repudiation with a strict observance of party discipline; and a congress, busied in taking "yeas and nays" on questions of order and motions to adjourn, seems to be the measures of American preparation, for the support and the defence of this country.

The post character of "Niles' Register" pledges it to the cause of truth, and its zealous support of all measures for the public prosperity. This question of the carrying trade of our produce and the ruinous increase of American commerce in foreign vessels is one of immense moment. It is left with you.

I am very respectfully,
JAMES TALLMADGE.

STATES OF THE UNION.

NEW YORK.

FINANCES OF THE STATE. We have before us the annual report of hon. John A. Collier, comptroller of the finances of this state, and a more clear, straightforward, admirable document never emanated from that office. It is a fitting counterpart of governor Seward's message. We endorse the most important facts set forth in the report. (N. Y. Tribune.

For what contracted.	Year.	Total amount.
Eric & Champlain canal, (old) 1845	$2,921,037 25

Add debt for completed works 5,732,169 14
Debt of the general fund 1,255,193 43

$17,561,567 91

On which the annual interest is $9,018 06
The aggregate of state stocks loaned to rail road and other improvement companies up to the close of the last fiscal year (Sept. 30, 1841) was as follows:
Delaware and Hudson canal $200,000
New York and Erie rail road 2,100,000
Ithaca and Oswego rail road 315,700
Canajoharie and Catskill rail road 200,000
Auburn and Syracuse rail road 200,000
Auburn and Rochester rail road 200,000
Hudson and Berkshire rail road 150,000
Saratoga and Blossburg rail road 70,000
Tonawanda rail road 100,000
Long Island rail road 100,000

Total of loans of state credit $4,335,700
On which the annual interest is 220,056 50

All these companies have paid promptly their interest, except the Ithaca and Oswego, and Canajoharie, and Catskill, which failed to do so in July last,
and the state was compelled to make good the deficiency. The aggregate of the loan to both of these companies is $415,700, and the annual interest there on $24,386 50. The Ithaca and Oswego is completed at a cost of $570,000, and the state has a first lien on the same, as also on the Catskill and Canajoharie, which twenty-six miles are completed and in operation. It is believed that the state will ultimately lose nothing by the Ithaca and Oswego, and probably not by the other. The state stocks were mainly issued to each by hon. A. C. Flagg, (late regency comptroller), under a law directing him to do so, upon proper proof that a larger amount of their own means had been previously expended upon the works by each company.

The first loans to an incorporated company were these made to the Delaware and Hudson canal company in 1827 and 1829, by regency legislation, upon a report from Silas Wright, jr. chairman of the canal committee; the latter loan recommended and approved by gov. Van Buren. These loans fall due in 1846 and 1847, and will doubtless be reimbursed by the company. In 1831, Mr. H. M. Flagg, auditor of the state credit of six millions—four millions to the city banks and two millions to individuals—was recommended by Gov. Marcy, and passed by a strict party vote, (the whigs against it), but it was not carried into effect. In 1838 a similar loan to the banks, for public relief, of $7,500,000 of state stocks, was recommended by Mr. Flagg, and passed by the Van Buren senate, but rejected by the whig assembly.
Total of state stocks issued as above $17,561,567 91
Add total of temporary loans, 30th
September 1,855,000 00

Clear canal surplus for 1841 $605,751
The item of $64,851 for "damages" above is not properly chargeable to the annual expenditures, being for permanent purposes.

The nett proceeds of canal revenue (says Mr. Collier) for the past year would pay the interest upon all the existing debt, and the interest at six per cent.
upon an additional debt of $10,000,000; or, if all the contingent liabilities of the state for loans of its resources were thrown upon the state, it would still pay the interest upon the whole debt, contribute its annual $200,000 toward the support of the government, and have about $400,000 to spare, applicable to carrying on the public works, or to the interest upon a new additional loan for that purpose of six or seven millions of dollars.

SECRETARY OF STATE—SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES. Mr. J. C. Legrand, speaker of the house of delegates having been nominated as secretary of state by gov. Francis Thomas, vice Mr. Sif-ford, of Frederick county, declined, on the 27th resigned the duties of that office, and the hon. Daniel S. Biser was elected in his place.

Librarian. Mr. J. H. T. Magruder, esq. has been nominated state librarian by the governor, vice David Ridgely, removed. Mr. Ridgely was the first librarian of this state, and deserves the credit of having brought that valuable department from non-existence to a department of twelve thousand volumes.

His leaving it will be regretted by all men who know him, and the more so, as he has a large family, and is without resources. He never has been an active politician. The rule of party proscription however, has been brought down upon him.

FINANCES. Abstract of the treasurer's report. The treasurer of the western shore, in obedience to the 3d sec. of the act of December session, 1834,

REPORTS.
That in the year ended 1st Dec. 1841,
he received $927,555 50
And there remained in the western shore treasury, 1st Dec. 1841 53,414 86

Making an aggregate of 980,970 36

Of the sums so received and amounting to 23,767 50
There were for revenue accrued before year 1841, 23,767 50
To which add, repayments, 605,632 24
Loans of 1841, special deposits, state stock sold &c. &c.
Making 631,839 74

Which deducted from the receipts in the treasury in 1841, shows this sum to have been the amount of revenue accrued in 1841, which was received in that year, viz:

Of the said aggregate in the western shore treasury in the course of the year ended, 1st Dec. 1841, amounting to 985,970 36
He disbursed that year 894,492 03
And there remained in the western shore treasury, 1st Dec. 1841 91,478 33
This balance is subject to the extended appropriations, the 1st Dec. 1841, to the amount of 195,953 36
And showing the treasury to have been deficient 1st Dec. 1841, by the sum of 104,474 92
To that deficiency it is proper to add the probable cost of the present session, which is estimated at 55,000 00
And would make the charge for these accounts upon the receipts of the current year, 159,374 93

ESTIMATES.
The probable receipts in the current year, in virtue of subsisting laws he estimates at 300,000 00
And leave applicable to the payment of other expenses of the current year, 140,525 07
The probable further demands on the treasury for the current year he estimates at 1,317,405 57
Leaving this balance, $1,176,880 50 to be raised (in such manner as the general assembly shall direct) for the service of the current year to end with the 30th November next—
And to it should be added, the further sum necessary, to pay the demands to be due 1st January, 1843, before any action of the assembly then to be in session, could be had to provide it, 33,603 17
Making, $1,215,483 67
To supply this large sum—post legislation lies upon three sources.

1st. The authority of the commissioner of loans by resolution No. 3 of March session 1841, to borrow—which remains unexecuted to the amount of $317,801 97, but is considered unavailable.

For its partial execution in the past year, commendable zeal and active as he has been, the commissioner was largely indebted to the patriotic sensibility to the wants of the state, of some of its public institutions and private citizens.

2d. The tax, by ch. 23 of March session 1841, directed to be levied on the property within the state thereby made assessable—the execution of which has not yet progressed so far, as to enable the treasurer to hope materially augmented, by the entire, or nominally or practically.

His experience however, admonishes him that, not more than one-half of the amount levied, may be expected to come into the treasury in the year in which the law makes it payable therein, no matter how long the date of payment may be postponed.

3. The state's distributive share, of the proceeds of the public lands of the United States, of every uncertain amount and receipt.

The vain effort to fulfil with the first of those improvements, such of the obligations of the state for 1841, as it was intended to provide for, has been a work of arduous difficulty and deep humiliation to the officers charged with it—while the burthens of the treasury, without any notice or reason to anticipate, were materially augmented, by the entire failure of the Seneca and Tyde Water canal companies, to comply with their engagements.

The generous confidence with which the public credit was essayed in their service, without even the motive of a stockholder, appealed strongly, no doubt, yet vainly, to their patriotism, to make any sacrifice rather than disappoint the just expectations of a beneficent government—and their failure in punctuality adds another and a memorable one, to the monuments before subsisting, of the improvidence of trusting to the incorporated companies, of keeping of the public honor.

Of the four or five imposing companies, who have wielded the administration of millions and the co-operation of pre-eminent talents, and who successfully solicited the confidence of the general assembly, in their promises, with emphatic solemnity, to pay the interest on the debts incurred at their instance and for their service, but one only, has proved unfaithful of the magnitude of the trust, in that respect reposed in them.

The rest have, in quick succession, thrown the burthens they sought for their own shoulders upon the back of a treasury already heavily laden—although in accordance with the policy of their own conception, no other provision than their engagements to pay, had been made by the legislature to sustain them, and before any substitute had been prepared or could be matured.

It had as its apology, and as any must be, this is the only one that can be made, for the suffering and privation to which the public creditors will be unavoidably subjected.

The treasurer indulges, no degree of indignant feeling or asperity in the expression of it, that is not called forth, by his sense of the responsibilities of the department he has charge of, and which the events he spends of, have alone embarrassed.

To him, it would be a far more pleasant duty, to exhort than to impute—and indeed, he has become persuaded that, all these companies, in the zeal with which they prosecuted their several works, and the excitement induced by the arduous difficulties they encountered in that service—each with human family, regarding the completion of its particular work, of paramount importance to the state and to the world as well as to itself—entirely lost sight of the very subordinate trust to observe punctuality with the treasury, until it had become, wholly beyond their power.

Unfortunately for the state, the most costly work in which she is concerned and consequently most costly had in the past year, been of necessity entirely suspended, far short of its completion.

The act of the last general assembly to provide for its prosecution, proved to be wholly impracticable.

Without its conditions, it must in the nature of things have been unexecuted. Even with them, had they been fulfilled, it would have been of very doubtful efficacy.

If without them, the act could have been efficient, the conditions were worse than useless—in that they required obligations of the companies concerned, to do what their obvious interest and the very purpose of their enterprises made essential to their own success. They would have added to their difficulties if not impaired their ability—and the due execution of which, would have occasioned long and unavoidable delay, incident to the process. But in truth, the only reasonable hope of giving vitality to the law, rested upon the willingness and ability of the companies to comply with the conditions imposed. Had they been fulfilled, that, the additional debt it authorised to be incurred, would in no degree add to the burthens of the public treasury if it did not reduce them.

Had the duties therefore, with which it charged the treasurer admitted of his exercising any discretion in the matter, he would have required their fulfilment as scrupulously and fully, as the minister of finance would have added to their difficulties if not impaired their ability—and the due execution of which, would have occasioned long and unavoidable delay, incident to the process. But in truth, the only reasonable hope of giving vitality to the law, rested upon the willingness and ability of the companies to comply with the conditions imposed. Had they been fulfilled, that, the additional debt it authorised to be incurred, would in no degree add to the burthens of the public treasury if it did not reduce them.

The other stockholders of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, continue to look upon the unassisted and disproportionate efforts of Maryland in this service, with cold and calculating complacency—in the belief that, necessity will oblige her to overcome all obstacles for their common relief. But the necessity that has no law, implies that, the ability to fulfil its mandates, and that it is well had that, the ability of the state to supply such necessity, is for the present at an end. Until her revenue shall be shown to be adequate to the wants of her treasury, present and prospective, she is as helpless for the further prosecution of the canal, as the feeblest of its stockholders. Those who would supply the materials for the stock of the company convertible into it or redeemable with its proceeds, would be wholly unable to comply with their contracts, when they found as they would find, that neither would raise money or its equivalent.

To the treasurer, however, the law assigned specific duties, including all discretion.

The 10th section required him to take, satisfactory bonds—not in view singly, of the sufficiency of their penalties—their obligatory qualities—or their availability—but of all these, in the first instance.

The companies respectively, tendered their corporate bonds only, and decided that they would in no other way comply with the conditions of the section. The treasurer considered them in every respect unsatisfactory. He required, therefore, augmented penalties—designated modifications of their tendered bonds should be made available for the indemnity of the state by liens upon their several estates in Allegany county—and that these should be shown to be clear of title and unincumbered, by the certificate of the deputy attorney general for the county.

The 12th section expressly required him to take bonds with security. The companies considered the corporate bond of one of them as principal, and of the others as sureties. The treasurer considered such a compliance with this section as merely nominal, and required liens for these also, upon unencumbered estates of clear title. In aid of these last bonds, he decreed it his duty moreover, to require additional security.

No information laid before him, authorised him to treat their possessions in the country, if clear of title and unencumbered, as being to be worth more than a million of dollars when the canal shall have reached Cumberland—whereas he believed himself called upon to take security for not less than a million and a half. He was plainly instructed by the act itself in the 10th section, to assume that "the canal would reach Cumberland, before any effective effort would be made by the companies to open and complete the several rail roads necessary to connect it with their coal mines," and to require that the security to be taken, should be adapted to such a contingency—contingency wherein the state must have looked altogether to these bonds, for the whole amount required to be secured. If liens could have been had, upon unencumbered estates of clear title and of the value of one million of dollars—this ultimate security, would have rendered it not less than a million of dollars to have obtained, a policy or policies of insurance for the prompt performance of the condition of the bond under the 12th section, from some one or more of the several companies with large capitals, incorporated by the states for the very purpose of assuring the performance of contracts.

But had all this been attained, the treasurer thinks, he would have had insuperable difficulty in enforcing it. He would have been obliged to have been obtained by the president and directors of the canal company from the contractors, in pursuance of the 8th section. He certainly could not have been satisfied with the customary security of withholding a portion of their compensation—very good security for the doubt not, when money—and utility—inasmuch as he thinks, when stock, would in effect be, the commodity withheld.—It would be apprehends, have been followed, if necessary, by unavoidable evasions of the law, of which it was seen to be easily susceptible, and by every possible sacrifice of the state's securities, without any material or compensating advantage to the state.

The act itself must be, and will be fulfilled—if not rightly by the other stockholders, or from motives of interest and the impulses of enterprise, by the mining companies—by Maryland, so soon as she shall have recruited her exhausted strength.

Adequate revenue, is now the pressing want of Maryland. Any measure involving her honor or her interests—and he invokes her legislature therefore, to devise and adopt without a moment's delay, such a system as will be most likely to furnish it, and to furnish it quickly.

Private wants, beyond the necessities of life, are fanciful. They grow upon their indulgence, and are most difficult to overcome, by stern self-denial.—But the public wants are real and inexorable. They will not brook denial or delay, and are rapidly augmented by either.

Last year, $300,000, would have saved the honor of the state and kept the treasury solvent, had the authorities of the several counties and the city of Baltimore, be forthwith directed by law, to levy for the service of 1842, a dollar in the hundred—and fifty cents, annually thereafter, until further order.—No apprehension need be entertained, that the revenue thence, will for the present be excessive, or that it will at all times be an easy and a pleasant duty, to reduce the rate.

The crisis demands of the general assembly, mainly promptitude and decision, and appeals irresistibly, to the honor and honesty of their constituents. Under the sanative action and influence of these, the em-barrenness of the public finances would soon be found to be temporary and evanescent—the public burthens, be gradually and speedily reduced—the public works, be completed and disencumbered—and Maryland be placed, ultimately and perhaps early in a condition of exuberant prosperity.

The deep disposure to ensue on her impending insolvency—the foul stain it cast upon the hitherto bright and unblemished escutcheon of our venerable state, must make every son of Maryland who has heart or conscience hang his head in shame—at home and abroad—here and every where—as long as it shall endure.

Could these have been averted,—were the magnitude of the public debt and the burthens it brings, alone to be contemplated—heavy as they are, considerations are not wanting, which should alleviate and even reconcile us to them.

From the first place—the debt, it should be remembered, has been incurred for the achievement of great public improvements—of which the acknowledged benefits, are to endure and to increase with their enjoyment—and these are fit objects of extraordinary public expense—second only in point of legitimacy, to those incurred for the preservation of domestic order and the public defence, and, with obvious and suitable restrictions, confessedly to be postponed to these, solely upon grounds of necessity and not of choice. It has been incurred too, in obedience to a spirit which, in the same period, animated and inspired in the same cause a large majority of our sister states, and which is not to be postponed to any for its wild or desperate, or impulsive, or exemption from such visitations, is not to be expected of communities any more than of their members.

In the next place—its amount is, as a matter of account, greatly exaggerated. In such an aspect, it is seen to be a debt exceeding 15 millions of dollars—sums which, borne upon the people of the state, it does not exceed ten.

More than three millions of it, for example, are yet unsold—and when these shall have been sold,—the successful progress and uniform punctuality hitherto, of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company for its service, they were issued, warrant the belief that, it will not in future, fail to pay or yield the interest, as heretofore.

The revenue received from that company and from the Baltimore and Susquehanna rail road company, with every indication that the amount will yearly increase, is already sufficient to pay the interest upon millions more. So that the real debt of Maryland does not practically exceed, ten millions of dollars.

A very acceptable communication, this moment received from the president of the Susquehanna and Tide Water canal companies, and in time only to be thus notified, gives most gratifying assurance, that their debt for interest may be expected to be paid year in the current year, and that their future payments will be uninterrupted.

With assessable property, of which the recent valuation for assessment, cannot well prove to be short of two hundred millions of dollars—a single year's income, estimated at 5 per cent. would rid us of the entire debt.

The ability of Maryland then, to pay the interest only of such a debt, is indisputable—and seeing that it has been deliberately contracted—and affirmed—and augmented—by successive legislatures—of their own repeated choosing—through a long period of 15 years—the willingness of her people to pay it, ought not to be and cannot be, questionable.

Individuals and individual companies, are no doubt to be found in every country—who are ready to incur debt beyond their means of payment and to find means to evade it. But for a whole political community—to do either—and especially a republican community—claiming and exercising the right, and the capacity of self government—would be to exhibit to the world a spectacle, that could cease to be shocking, only to be loathsome.

Lastly—It is the interest only—we are called upon or will have to pay.

No government ever provided more judiciously or amply, for the payment of the principal of her debt, than Maryland has done—by the institution of her sinking fund, and the means of it—and upon no subject is more gross misapprehension, understood to prevail.

Of course, the treasurer assumes always, the good faith of the state, and its ultimate, if not uninterrupted solvability.

This borne in mind throughout—he proceeds to say that—

Every dollar, of so much of the capital of this fund as is destined to redeem the debt incurred for the construction of our public works, has been furnished by the public creditors—upon terms proceeding from the state—and such as must have, most materially enhanced ed the price she received for her securities, by securing their ultimate redemption.

Not a single dollar of it has been directly contributed by the state—except for the purpose of letting into her treasury far more than an equivalent.

Not a dollar of the income of the fund, either on mortgage or in effect, has been paid by the state.

Both capital and income are exclusively the property of the public creditors, until they shall have fully performed its office by absorbing the whole of the public debt—and then the fund and the debt will expire simultaneously—thus and then only, ensuring to the benefit of the state.

Take, for illustration, the principal item of the fund, derived from the sale of the three millions of six per cent debt per $31, of 1821. The loaned millions made so much of the public debt, which the state received and applied to the prosecution of her works. But the purchasers of the debt paid also to the credit of this fund, upon the terms proposed by the law, upwards of half a million more. Now the state has paid the interest upon the millions, but not upon the half million appertaining to the fund—and this half million, in accordance with the terms of the contract proceeding from the state, were confided by the purchasers, to the administration of the state's treasury—for and as their property—for their security.

The half million, it is true, was a portion of the price of the stock—but a portion indissolubly associated with the condition of the price—and no man can tell how much the stock would have sold for, without the condition.

Try it by the fate of the 5 per cent loan of the year 1816, which cost $500,000. It was put into the market with a profit of better security, but then contingent—and although the debt of the state was little more than a million at the time, it was with difficulty sold for.

Try it by the fate of the 6 per cent, debt of the year 1817. It was judiciously fitted for the London market by promising to pay the interest there—and by promising to pay it in dollars. It procured security too abundant not to be seen to be impracticable—and it bore upon its front, the purpose of borrowing interest as well as principal. It was literally harked, abroad and at home, and out of eight millions thirty-four thousand only ever found a purchaser, and that far below value.

These reminiscences have reference to the manner, of forming the fund, and are used to shew that, it was judicious and productive.

No body has ever pretended that the fund was of magical origin or oceanic power—or that a debt itself, by its means, and the application of it, could be repaid. But the manner of raising the means may be reckless—or of ruinous cost—or prudential and economical.

Its practical efficacy is considered to be obvious. Its actual operation so far, from year to year, has proved even more absorbent of the public debt than was ever anticipated—and so soon as it shall fall of ready capital here—it will be the duty of the treasurer to put it in action abroad, by the state's chosen agents in London.

Then, as to its income—

It is received chiefly, from the state's commissioner of loans—but he pays it, not as interest upon the fund, but as interest upon the public debt—precisely as to any other proprietor of the debt—

That it is received from him at all, is purely accidental.

If the treasurer had, in the exercise of his lawful discretion, invested it in the public debt of New York, or of Massachusetts, or in the stock of the Bank of England—then, those states or that institution would have paid it, and yet Maryland, in either case, would not have paid one dollar the less, for interest on her debt.

If the public creditors had insisted, upon constituting the Messrs. Baring & Brothers of London, the fiduciary of the fund—or any body else, one foot within the limits of Maryland—and that they were invested in any other securities than those of the state—it would have been beyond the jurisdiction and control of any of her authorities.

Ought it to be—shall it be?—less safe or sacred, in the hands of the state's own treasurer—

Shall it be less secure—because that treasurer, in procuring to invest the funds in the securities of Maryland—has made them her citizens the ultimate fruiters of her resulting interest in it—and equally consulted the interest of her creditors, by furnishing those of them who have occasion to sell, with an established and growing market.

It is erroneously supposed by some, that when the state's public debt is sold, the state's security, he buys for the state, and with means exclusively the state's, when in truth, he buys only with the income of the fund—confined to him by its creditors, and exactly as any other individual administering a trust fund, would be bound to do—consulting to the utmost of his ability, equally the interest of the state and its creditors—he cannot consist of no body, but is always ready to give for what others do not want, whatever they were willing to give for what they did want—that is to say—the market price.

This brief exposition of the constitution, nature, and operation of the fund, he humbly submits to the general assembly, in the hope of impressing them with its own sense of its value and importance to the people of Maryland. If he has succeeded, he will have his ample reward, in thinking he has done the state some service—and this, he persuades himself, is his single motive for the effort.

AMERICANS CAPTURED NEAR SANTA FE BY MEXICANS, &c.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT
TRANSMITTING THE INFORMATION RECEIVED BY THE RESOLUTION OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE 14TH INST. IN RELATION TO AMERICAN CITIZENS CAPTURED NEAR SANTA FE, &c.

To the house of representatives of the U. States:

I transmit to the house of representatives, in answer to their resolution of the 14th inst. a report from the secretary of state, and the papers by which it was accompanied. JOHN TYLER.

Washington, January 18, 1842.

Department of state, Washington, Jan. 17, 1842.

The secretary of state, to whom was referred the resolution of the house of representatives of the 14th inst. requesting the president to communicate to that house all the information in his possession, which may not be incompatible with the public interest, touching the American citizens captured near Santa Fe, in Mexico, and who are, or may have been taken relative thereto by this government; and any information he may have, and not incompatible with the public interest, concerning American citizens now British prisoners in Van Diemen's land, has the honor to lay before the president the papers specified in the accompanying list, and to state that the despatch from Mr. Ellis, numbered 49, which probably contains information upon the subject of the first part of the resolution referred, has not yet reached this department.

No further information in regard to the subject of the second part of the resolution has been received since the date of this despatch, of the 16th of July last, which was communicated to the house of representatives by the president, with his message of that date. All which is respectfully submitted.

DANIEL WEBSTER.
To the president of the United States.

MR. WEBSTER TO MR. ELLIS.
Department of state, Washington, Jan. 3, 1842.

Sir: The friends of Mr. Franklin Combs, son of general Leslie Combs, of Kentucky, have applied for the interposition of this government in behalf of that young gentleman, who accompanied the late Texian expedition to Santa Fe, in Mexico, and is supposed to have been captured, and, if alive, be held in bondage in that country, with the other survivors of the expedition. It has been represented to this department that young Combs has never been a citizen of Texas; that he did not repair to that country with any intention of relinquishing his allegiance to this government, or of assuming a Texian name; that he went thither in the autumn of 1840 upon private business of his father, and for the benefit which he was assured his feeble health would derive from the milder winter climate of that region. It was, however, detained there by both causes until about the time when the expedition referred to set out. This he determined to accompany, for the object of confirming his health, and gratifying a curiosity, both liberal and natural, in regard to the unknown lands through which the course of the expedition lay.

As there is no reason to doubt the correctness of this information, you will, accordingly, forthwith make the necessary representation to the Mexican government upon the subject, with a view to avert from young Combs, if he should be alive, the dangers to which he may be or may have been exposed. You will state that, from the respectability of his family, and for other reasons, there can be no ground for the belief that he will ever be again wanted in the expedition for any other objects than those mentioned; and that if he had been aware that the views of the Texian government, in despatching it, had been hostile or predatory, rather than friendly and commercial, as they were understood to have been at the time, he would not have gone in its company. If to this it be objected that the expedition was military in its array, and must therefore be presumed to have had warlike designs against the Mexican authorities, it may be answered that the avowed motive of the members of the expedition, in bearing arms, was to ward off the attacks of hostile Indians, and especially of the Camanches, who, it is well known, roam in great force along and across the track which was to have been pursued. This objection would apply, it will be said, only to the young Combs, as he was no soldier, and had never been in battle; and if found with arms, there could in his case be no better ground for the opinion that they were to have been used for purposes of attack, and not for those of defence, than if he had accompanied one of the caravans from Missouri to Santa Fe, by means of which, at least, it is now generally admitted, the trade is carried on between this country and Mexico, to the mutual advantage of the parties.

Although young Combs is the only American citizen who accompanied the expedition for whom the interference of this government has been asked, it is understood that there was another who, as little desirous to be subjected to any penal proceedings on the part of the Mexican government. This is Mr. George W. Kendall, of New Orleans.

You will press this case with the utmost earnestness on the Mexican government, as the government of the United States feels itself bound to interfere, and to signify its cordial expectation that the lives of American citizens will not be sacrificed, who have not intentionally done any thing of a hostile character against Mexico. Even if the conduct of young Combs was indiscreet and ill-judged, yet this government cannot suppose that the government of Mexico will treat him as an armed combatant found among its enemies.

You will spare no pains to impress the Mexican authorities with the feelings which would be excited in this country, if any harsh proceeding should be adopted towards this youth.

You will avail yourself of the opportunity of making to that government the communication to suggest that, while this government is well disposed to maintain with strict fidelity amicable relations with the Mexican republic, and will not attempt to screen from merited punishment any of our citizens who may be guilty of an infraction of the laws intended to preserve the relations, yet that summary, sanguinary, or undue punishment, either to Mexicans, or citizens of the United States in Mexico inevitably tends to excite and foment in this country an acerbity of feeling against Mexico which will be much more apt to defeat the supposed objects of those punishments than if the offenders were to have a fair trial, and then convicted, were to be punished in due proportion to their offences. You will, however, make this suggestion in a conciliatory tone, without allowing it to be supposed that this government has any intention to dictate the policy to be adopted by that of the Mexican republic upon this or any other subject, and, supposing their disposition towards the United States to be amicable, it is at least at this point a way by which it may to us reciprocal disposition as well as the integrity of the Mexican territory may be more effectually maintained. Accustomed ourselves to regular judicial proceedings, fair and full trials, and mild punishments, the opposite course, as exercised by other governments, always serves to check the growth of amity and good will.

Any reasonable expenses which may be necessary to defray the charge of a special messenger from the Mexican capital to the place of captivity of young Combs and his American associates, or for any other proper purposes necessary for their safety and liberation, will be paid by this government, and will be defrayed by you, and for them, in the name of this department, specifying in your drafts their purpose, and sending with them such vouchers as you may be able to procure.

The interest which we feel for Combs, whose case has been particularly presented to us, and for Mr. Kendall, leads us to the desiring that, in this communication in the way most likely to carry it soon to your hands. I am, sir, your obedient servant,
DANIEL WEBSTER.

To Powhatan Ellis, esq. envoy extraordinary, &c. Mexico.
P. S. Since the above was written, application has been made to the United States of Mr. C. H. Howard, a citizen of the State of New York, who, with the youth of nineteen years of age, who accompanied the expedition, and who, we are informed, was not a citizen of Texas. You will likewise inquire into his case, and do for him any thing else which you can do with propriety.
D. W.

ME. WEBSTER TO MR. ELLIS.

Department of state, Washington, Jan. 6, 1842.
Sir: I addressed you on the 3d instant, in behalf of Franklin Combs, and Mr. Kendall, captured by the Mexican army, with the Texian expedition, near Santa Fe. The object of this is only to say (what, perhaps, you would not have failed to understand) that, if it should be found that other American citizens were made captives, under like circumstances, and with similar claims to immunity and release, you will exert the same interference in their behalf. I am, with regard, your obedient servant.

DANIEL WEBSTER.
To Powhatan Ellis, esq. envoy extraordinary, &c. Mexico.

MR. WEBSTER TO MR. PEYTON.—EXTRACTS.
[PRIVATE.]

Washington, Jan. 6, 1842.

DEAR SIR: Your letter to the president, of the 21st of December, has been read by him with great interest and anxiety, although it was the first communication upon the subject. Letters had previously received from General Combs, and information communicated from other quarters, upon which immediate steps were taken. A special messenger has been despatched from this department, with an instruction to our minister at Mexico, of which I enclose a copy. The president will interfere for the life and safety of young Combs, to the full extent of his duty. You must be aware of the delicacy of the question, at least as it presents itself to us, without more knowledge of the facts.

The president wishes the most effectual means taken, consistent with justice and propriety, to secure his safety. * * * On receipt of this, if you should be of opinion that the object in view would be promoted by sending a private agent from New Orleans, to co-operate with the American minister in Mexico, the president is willing that such agent, to be selected by you, should be immediately despatched, and his necessary expenses will be defrayed by this department. He cannot receive any public character, as we have a minister on the spot; but the president's great desire to do all that can be done, leads him to say that if you think a private agency might be useful, he wishes it to be instituted, and that you would select such person as you deem the fittest for such duty. He the more readily submits this part of the case to your discretion, as, before this communication shall reach New Orleans, you may very probably be in possession of much more information than has yet reached us; and there are likely to be many citizens of New Orleans who are acquainted with the facts.

As this agent will have no public character, he can only act under direction of the American minister, to whom he will report himself on his arrival. And the main advantage to be expected from such agency is this: that a person of respectability and address, well acquainted with Mexico, its manners and language, and perhaps with its present authorities, and acquainted, also, with the character, family, and connexions of Combs, Kendall, and other American citizens who may be in like condition, may, by unofficial means and personal efforts, co-operate usefully with Mr. Ellis, as you think advisable, on the whole, that such agent be immediately sent, and you will give a copy of this letter as his instructions.

The collector of New Orleans will have instructions to convey Mr. McKee to the fittest port in Mexico, by the revenue cutter or other the most prompt mode; and if you should think it useful that Mr. McKee should be immediately sent, should proceed to Mexico, he may use the same conveyance. You will see by the enclosed that, although not applied to by his friends, Mr. Kendall's case has not been overlooked; and it is the president's wish, that if any other American citizen, innocently in company with the expedition, should have fallen into the hands of the Mexicans, the same interference may be made in his behalf. I am, &c.

DANIEL WEBSTER.
Baird Peyton, esq. U. S. dist. attorney, N. Orleans.

Department of state, Washington Jan. 6, 1842.
DEAR MR. D. W. McKee has been the subject of a despatch from this department to Mr. Ellis, our minister at Mexico. He has left this city for New Orleans by the southern route. On his arrival, it is the president's wish that you give him the most speedy conveyance, by the revenue cutter or otherwise, to such a port in Mexico as may be convenient for the greatest success in the performance of the duty entrusted to him.

I send by this post a letter to Mr. Ellis, to your care, which forward by Mr. McKee, if received in season. Yours, with regard,

DANIEL WEBSTER.
To the collector of the customs, New Orleans.

Mr. Alvarez, consul of the United States for Santa Fe, to Mr. Webster.

Independence, Missouri, December 15, 1841.

Sir: I address this to you to make known my arrival in the United States. After some repose, which is necessary to recruit my health, impaired by a toilsome journey, I shall proceed to the seat of government, to lay before the president and yourself the injuries suffered by the American residents at Santa Fe and myself, from the hands of the Mexican authorities. At present, I forward the accompanying printed narrative, which I find nearly agreeing with the facts as they transpired subsequent to the arrival of the Texian expedition in New Mexico.

I am charged with a statement, signed by the American residents, which shall be my duty to lay before you as soon as I can be allowed a personal interview. Your obedient servant,

MANUEL ALVAREZ.
To his excellency Daniel Webster, sec. of state of the U. S.

Mr. Ellis to Mr. Webster.
Legation of the U. States, Mexico, Dec. 16, 1841.

Sir: Trusting that the New York packet may not leave Vera Cruz before this communication reaches that place, I avail myself of the occasion to inform you that brigadier general McLeod, who commanded the Texian expedition to Santa Fe, Mr. Van Ness, his secretary, Dr. Falcoeur, Mr. Navarro, thirty officers, and one hundred and thirty-one soldiers, prisoners of war, entered Chihuahua, on their way to this capital, on the 29th of November. They were escorted by a guard of two hundred Mexican soldiers.

In looking over the daily papers printed here, I was shocked at seeing the painful intelligence announced of the fate of three of those young men, whose names I have not been able to ascertain.—The following is the substance of the publication alluded to by me.

From the Siglo XIX. of the 14th December.

"We have the pain to announce to the public an act of barbarism, committed by captain D. Damaso Salazar, who escorted the Texian prisoners to Chihuahua. Captain Salazar had the iniquity to kill three of these prisoners in cold blood, because they had become weary. It was reserved for Salazar to eclipse the triumph of Señor Arango by this cruel and brutal act. Every one is indignant at such an atrocious act, peculiar only to a cannibal. Don Jose Maria Ellis, colonel of the army, and commander of Paso del Norte, is preferring charges against this barbarous captain; and Señor Conde, governor of the department of Sonora, is expressing his indignation, which does so little harm to Mexicans, whose humanity is their principal device.

"We hope that such a scandalous act will be punished with all the severity of the law."

This cold-blooded and barbarous act meets with that reprobation and indignation which its atrocity is so well calculated to excite in the minds of all honorable and humane men. The unfortunate Texian prisoners will be here in the course of two or three weeks. I cannot imagine what punishment this government will inflict on them.

The uniform practice of this legation has been not officially to interfere in the behalf of persons who have placed themselves beyond the protection of our government, by entering into the service of that of Texas. If I am mistaken in this principle of public law, I beg you will be pleased to inform me how far I can proceed, in my representative character, to serve the Texian prisoners. I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant.

POWATHAN ELLIS.

DEBATE ON THE EXCEQUER BOARD.

SPEECH OF MR. MANGUM, OF N. CAROLINA,
IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE DEC. 30, 1841.
In opposition to the project of the secretary of the treasury for an exchequer board.

MR. MANGUM commenced with a promise very frequently made in congress, to occupy but a short time in the remarks he had to offer. It was not his design to go into any thing like a regular dissection or analysis of the tremendous project submitted in the secretary's report; yet, inasmuch as very strenuous efforts were making to press such a public mind in its favor, Mr. M. did desire to express his views of the scheme; in presenting which he desired it to be clearly understood that he spoke for no interest, clique or party, either in the senate or out of it; the opinions he should express were his own. He had no wish to come into any consultation or comparison of views upon the subject, but had resisted such consultation when proposed to him; because, looking at all the past, he was disposed to "let bygones be bygones," and, regarding the actual state of the country and the amount of the public distress, he was prepared to meet gentlemen who should propose any feasible measure for its relief in a broad and catholic spirit. On all this subject, however, he had no opinion. He was, secondly, a gentleman, but he did not set so much value upon them, nor did he deem them of any great consequence to others; but such as they were, they were his. There was no reflection which could not but have occurred to every man. They had here presented to them a paper marked by economic ability, drawn up by a gentleman, the production as it was said of a gigantic intellect, or, as others had expressed themselves, of the first mind in this republic; and gentlemen on all sides of the house had vied with each other in bestowing upon it their highest eulogiums.

Immature, however, as he was in criticism, he was compelled to differ in his judgment on the logical qualities of this production, as well from the astute and ingenious senator (Mr. BUCHANAN) from Pennsylvania, as from the able and learned senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN), than whom no man in this country was better fitted to judge of the value of the suggestion of a gentleman like him. It was very remarkable that the report passed over, and seemed studiously to avoid, those points of argument connected with the general subject, on which the ablest minds had for years done battle; and in the deductions which it did make, so far from exhibiting the force and clearness of the argument, the conclusions drawn from premises had down being inconclusive, abrupt, and, in one instance especially, monstrous. There was one fact, in reference to the plan suggested in this document, which must have struck all who witnessed the proceedings of that body. There was a suggestion of the protection of silver, and one of the first minds of the age—a mind familiar for twenty years with the public affairs of this country, and closely identified with a great and glorious, and victorious political party—and yet, wonderful to tell, with all this acknowledged ability, all this experience and knowledge of public affairs, and all this familiarity with the history of a great and important subject, when the result of its labors was presented to the senate, not a man had been found who would rise in his place, and say "I will take it." A project was thrown out, backed by enough of intellectual power to force almost any principle upon the assent of other minds, and yet there was no man so poor as to do it. The result of that was, not one so poor as to do it. And why? The case was plain. It was an attempt to unite things essentially incompatible—to drink at once, and in the same cup, from the mouth and from the sources of the Nile. And here he must be suffered to say, that the course of the honorable senator, and of those who were on this occasion associated with him, habitually cherishing, as they did, the most exalted respect for the source from whence this document came, was such as entitled them to the respect of every candid and upright man. They stood manfully by their principles, be they good or bad, and were too honest and too true to six pints of the full which had been artfully prepared to catch them.

To the honorable senator from New York (Mr. TALLMAGE) he would say that, although he was willing to do any thing which could consistently be done, to relieve the distresses of the country, and was prepared to receive and consider whatever that senator and his committee might propose as a substitute for this scheme, yet he was not prepared to exert his efforts in such a measure which would be wholly unavailing, he feared so. How did it happen that nobody could be found to come into this new project? Was it not, obviously, because old principles had been abandoned? Whatever motives might have led to the presentation of such a scheme, it was not received, and of those who were to receive, or to hold power, it was altogether a new conception, and one that seemed artfully suited to the feelings of the time. Such, at least, would be the opinion of it entertained in one part of the union. If Mr. M. were to not about a dissection of this remarkable production, he did not know that it would be worth the while to sit in it so long away from the operation. Nobody put the measure forth as a thing to be adopted; that seemed not even to be thought of; as it stood, it was repudiated on all hands. In endeavoring to speak favorably of it, gentlemen did not speak of it, but of something else—something as yet in mid-air, something which was not there, but was as yet a mystery.

After all the long consideration which had been given to the general subject, and their familiarity with all the leading points involved, here, at this late hour, a project was presented as occupying an intermediate ground, and all men of all parties were called upon to come together and unite in supporting it.

For a long week Mr. M. had pondered the project, and had endeavored to divest his mind of every feeling but a desire to find the truth. He had viewed the proposal, not like the advocate who had written it, but with a history that government had done to his duty. And he was compelled to come to the conclusion that even in the worst of times this government had never yet seen, never had there been so bold, so reckless a push for absolute power, as was now unblushingly made in the paper before the senate. He repeated the assertion. Never, never, in the whole history of this government, had there been witnessed a push so bold; or one which, if successful, must be attended with consequences so vast, and so disastrous to the liberties of this land. With a government possessing a power of patronage which, even in the feeblest hands, was of threatening aspect to liberty—a patronage which, spreading itself like a mycophyte, insinuated its attenuated fibres through all the interstices of society, and by its tempting power, operating to subdue all that manliness of principle, that hardy virtue, which characterized our fathers—to propose to superadd to this threatening, this portentous amount of patronage the entire money power, which, in the hands of government, would be in the hands which pull the wires and move the puppets of party—if he believed the country was prepared for such a measure as this, he should feel a depression of mind which nothing could cheer; he should look upon his children with tears, and must despair of the welfare of the country for centuries.

What a concentration of power! did it not attempt to achieve! In the present prostrate and down-trodden condition of our state banks—he spoke of that spurious and multitudinous herd which had sprung up under the misrule of a late administration—institutions rotten throughout and tottering to their fall; if government should attempt to put in its place a paper currency which should be in sound and general credit, those banks would pop, one after another, like guns discharging in a burning ship, from one end of the union to the other. This government machine, fabricating a paper like this, was to spring up amid the general blight and barrenness as a reviving and fertilizing agent, and to furnish life and vigor to the language of the eloquent author of the report? Yes; no doubt; and when it should have germinated and sprouted; when it should have put forth its root downward and borne fruit upward, while the whole land round about was a barren desert; when it should have spread its branches far and wide and covered the face of the earth with its verdant foliage, then the seeds were to be laid in that "tranquillity and repose" which the writer of this report thought so desirable—the repose, the stillness of an inexorable man, mercenary despotism. To such a measure Mr. M. never could consent; he would not, should not. Could any man in this country consent to such a measure, the nation of money to be placed under the control of this new institution? It was to issue a paper circulation to the amount of fifteen millions. Then it was to receive fifteen millions more upon deposit. Here was, at once, an amount of thirty millions of dollars, enough of itself to overflow the whole country, and he saw no guards in this bill to prevent the amount being extended to a hundred millions annually by its dealing in exchange, should congress establish a high tariff, or even but a liberal tariff, whose annual importations should now replenish the now empty treasury with an income of twenty-five million dollars, that alone might enable the government to raise its lend over the heads of our creditors, and to use the power of the wand of its power to the destruction of the public prosperity. But should there be superadded to this a new capital of thirty millions, and the power to trade upon this to the amount of two hundred millions more, subsidizing every thing to its own support, where would the government's power end? It has been said that there should have been extended over the land, what chance could possibly remain for the existence of public liberty? Place a man of even moderate ability and of thirty-five years of age, in the presidential chair; put in his hands this mighty concentration of power, political and fiscal, and if he did not ruin the country in the present year, in the next year of his life, it must be owing to his own virtue, and not them who armed him with such an engine of oppression.

This capital was in a strange condition. Not a mail reached it from any quarter of the country which did not bring the evidence of real distress, of the most appalling suffering. Our proudest cities, so far from being exempt from the general lull, were very far from it. The police of New York, for instance, would be an interesting inquiry to ask how this was brought about. Mr. M. would not detain the senate, or weary those who understood the case as well as he did, by retracing the course of events which induced a state of things so deplorable. Congress had stricken down that institution which until the year 1856, had exerted so efficient a power in regulating the currency; when at once, the bank again had swept over the land, and they came up, from the destruction of the old institution, like frogs from the waters of the Nile, until the country was covered with them. The policy of the state governments, meanwhile, had created an immense debt, and the means of payment did not exist; and thus the people were reduced from the condition of the brightest and palmiest prosperity to the deepest distress and despondence. The expedient which had been resorted to for borrowing foreign capital had produced at the time a fearful state of pauperism. But while the nation was fluctuating in all that abundance produced by the influx of borrowed wealth—while all was going on gloriously and a stranger would have supposed that the country had attained to the highest pitch of national strength and public prosperity, a sudden reverse was experienced. The foreign debt was demanded; the means of meeting the demand was not to be found. Individual and public distress soon spread in every direction. The extremity of the pressure gave birth to the revolting idea of repudiation. If, then, to the reflux current, which was sweeping away the magnificent wealth, which had added to the nation's riches, and to the still more anti-American doctrine—and, I may add, in my judgment the atrocious doctrine—of repeal of charters, and the destruction of vested rights, and add yet to these the tergiversations and treachery, in public and the falsehoods, forgeries, frauds and all other means of obtaining the means of a private life, was it not a wonder that men who possessed capital should look up and hoard their resources, and not expose them to a mass of population already deeply tainted, and more and more imbibing the poison of agrarian principles?

In a state of things like this, or rather upon the approach of such a state of things, the American people had risen as one man, and thrown off, by a burst of indignation, the individual whose maladministration had, as they believed, brought about this unparalleled state of corruption and distress. They thought that they were about to substitute for his reckless misrule their own system of remedial measures. Every man of state or of high position in that expectation. The history of this natural crisis would be read by our patriotic children with wonder, as a page exhibiting the strangest, most unaccountable, and most useless tergiversation which the whole volume recorded, or would be closed and passed with leading and repugnance. The people were not to be deceived. The measure proposed by their friends in congress as the only panacea for the public ills had been offered, adopted, and vetoed at the extra session. And here Mr. M. must be suffered to say that, although voting for that measure, he had always felt great doubt in regard to its expediency. He was not prepared to see the nation exposed to its effecting at once all that good which its friends in their sanguine moments promised themselves, and, perhaps thoughtlessly, promised to others. He had never been a friend to banks; he had never touched a bank by any vote of his until last summer. The entire system was bottomed on such principles that it appeared to him, to carry its own death within itself. The measure which the whigs had proposed, he believed, might indeed mitigate, and for a time repress the evils connected with it. It might withstand something of that surgle force with which the mad excesses of the system were sweeping over the country.

But there still appeared to him to remain one great desideratum, which he thought it his duty to suggest, and that was the principle within the system itself which should operate to check excessive issues, and prevent those fearful alternations of expansion and contraction which so shook the system of public credit, and spread such frequent ruin throughout the mercantile community. If any such principle could be introduced, and if it were in any way connected with it, and it certainly had never been applied. Whatever might be said of the regulating power exerted over the state institutions by a bank of the United States—and such an institution did exert that power to a certain extent—yet still in proportion to the degree of confidence which the public placed in it, and to the amount of private debt, it was invariably disposed to push their issues to extremes. Mr. M. was no bank agent nor bank machinist, and he admitted that the tendency of a U. States bank, in exerting a regulating power, would be to break up of the state banks as were essentially unaccountable operations in which, however salutary in the end, would be attended with a vast amount of private distress in their respective vicinities. The mere displacement of capital which was necessarily involved in subscribing to so great a number of banks was in itself a great evil, and must necessarily produce great stricture in the money market. Then the explosion of rotten banks which must necessarily accompany a

7th. Hulmer moved that the majority bill be its second reading; then: which motion having been agreed to, the bill was read a second time.

"The discussion upon the treasury note bill was resumed at one o'clock, as the unfinished business, the question being "shall the bill pass?"

Mr. Calhoun said that when we were called upon to propose additional reductions upon our expenditures, we ought to act with the greatest caution. To vote taxes, except in the case of exigency, was nothing more than the severest spoliation. We were called upon to make this appropriation upon the estimates of the department. He knew too much of these estimates to place much reliance upon them. He was not vote for the bill because he held it to be unnecessary. Retrenchment and economy would save more than this amount from the treasury. It had been proposed to increase the expenditures of the navy two millions of dollars over the past year, and he was not ready for this. Deduct two millions from the recommendation, and it would be millions saved. These appropriations, at least, might go over to the next session. The expenses of the marine corps amounted to nearly six hundred thousand dollars, nearly six hundred dollars a head—two hundred dollars a head higher than the army. He would not say that the marine corps was a necessary department, but in proportion so high as this. Between the reductions which might be made in the marine corps and the navy two millions and a half might be saved. Then there was an estimate of sixty-five thousand dollars for surveys, which ought to be taken from the sales of public lands. It is $263,000 were for surveys. Then there was a patent fund of $153,000, which he did not understand. He presumed it was for patents received, and ought to go into the treasury. Then there was a considerable amount credited to trust funds. Then the head of pensions claimed considerable attention. The fallacy was at the rate he had lived, of three hundred thousand dollars a year. This added, made a very considerable amount.

He had turned his attention also to the treasury department, and there found over a million and a half appropriated to harbors. This was the most extravagant expenditure of the government. Appropriations, and he little expected to see such appropriations recommended. All added together would make four millions and eight hundred thousand dollars, and half a million might be added to it. But this was not all. Greater reductions could be made in the economy of administration. He trusted Congress could do but little except to co-operate with the administration. This was difficult to be done, but nevertheless it might be done. If retrenchment saved us five millions, economy would save us five more.

The expenses of this government were of three classes: the civil list, the army, and the navy; and all of these had been increasing since the year 1823. The remedy now was to compare the present with the past, mark the difference, and compel the difference to be accounted for. He cited 1823, and intended to make that the standard, because that was the standard for him, the government being then essentially and almost entirely self-sustained. Also, because in 1823 we commenced the system of protection, which had done so much evil. We had made two tariffs since then, the origin of all evils. The civil list rose in seventeen years from about $2,000,000 to $6,000,000—nearly a threefold proportion compared with the increase of population. As the population had increased to $1,700,000, the increase of contingent expenses had been fivefold, and compared with population, sixfold. The aggregate expenses of the two houses now amounted to more than $250,000. The expense of collecting revenues had also been enormously increased. From 1823 it had cost us $1,000,000 to $1,700,000, an increase of one million of dollars. The expense on collection in 1823 was but one per cent. now one per cent. and 5 1/2. Under the tariff these increases were made from 1824 to 1828. Estimating the expenses of collection at $800,000, about $1,000,000 would be saved. The military had increased in this proportion, and the light house department also. In the war department in 1823, (the only year for which he had estimates) the expenses per man were but $351, now the increase had gone up to $100 for each individual. At one time it had been as much as $350 for each individual. $1,000,000 had been expended here in the army proper, including the military and naval alone. It might be said that one was a cheap and the other a dear year. For otherwise; meat was never cheaper, clothing never as cheap as now. All this resulted from the expansive force of a surplus revenue. In 1822 he had reduced the expenses of every man in the army. All this had been done by changing the organization of the department—the administration of the department had never before been considered; and he, by reforming all this, produced the necessary retrenchment. Under the tariff, the expenses of a man went up from $12 to $16.

Mr. Calhoun then made some comparisons between the expenses of the British navy and the American navy. Mr. C. contended there should be no difference in the expenses of the two navies. We should build as cheap and employ men as cheap, or we should not be able to compete with the British navy. If our navy should prove vastly more expensive than the British navy we might as well give up, and he recommended this matter to the consideration of the senate. Mr. C. followed up this with a table prepared by himself, showing, in gross amounts, where the expenditures had been increased. From his figure he drew the inference that the expenses might be reduced very much.

He called upon the chairman to look and see where the pruning knife might be employed. He contended that $17,000,000 were sufficient to meet the permanent needs of the government, and that this sum would be more adequate to the whole population. This sum, by economy, could be brought down to fifteen millions, and thus save nine millions over the present estimates. This could be done in three or four years—the executive leading the way, and congress co-operating and following the executive. The expenses of three or four years, by economy and retrenchment, there would be no public debt.

Mr. C. said he had now more than made good his pledge to bring down the expenses of the government five millions of dollars. The question now was, whether we should pursue the loan bill and borrow money, or live without it. Mr. C. testified that all our evils had grown out of the tariffs of 1824 and 1828. The tariff had been seductive, and opinions prevailed that a tariff was a blessing. Even sensible men, whom he had heard, had argued that it would be better to have a tariff, even if the money was, whether we should have no tariff. He who insisted on raising more revenue by an increase of duty would find himself mistaken. If duties were raised to twenty-five, thirty, and thirty-five per cent. smuggling would be resorted to, and to prevent this an increase of expenses would be necessary. The smuggling would be made and sold. Circumstances were such that we could not have a tariff, and we had to have a virtuous and poor community than the richest in the world. Better to be a moral people than the richest. If gentlemen persisted in the course they had pursued at the extra session of this congress, no man could foresee the evil which would come. There never was a wiser saying than that of Edmund Burke, that the finances were the state. It was due to the late administration to say, that when they were going out of power the expenditures were in the course of reduction, particularly in the treasury department. The bill before the senate was one that would have no tariff. He who insisted on raising before. The bill before the senate was not a revenue bill as it came from the house, and we had made it one. We had changed the form of the loan bill into a revenue bill, and here was the point of order. The entrenched that, by common consent, it might be made in order, and pass this evening.

Mr. Evans rejoined. He said it was not his object to be entangled to the question of the tariff. He was not a tariff man, or to refer even to many of the evils he had brought forward. They required more time and reflection than could now be given to the subject. Above all, he desired not and did not feel called upon to defend the late administration from the severe rebuke which he had received from the senator.

Mr. Calhoun interrupted and said he did not mean to rebuke the administration. He himself had not been for many years past identified with any party, and but a looker on in fact rather than an actor with the two great parties.

Mr. Evans continued, and remarked: Well, then, the present administration for the state of things of which he complained.

Mr. Calhoun, interrupting Mr. Evans again, said he did not mean to be so understood. He had good feelings for the present secretary of the treasury and administration. They meant well, he believed, and were doing as well as they could in the way of correcting the evils he complained of.

Mr. Evans said somebody is responsible for the state of things, and the question is, who is it?

Mr. Calhoun, again interrupting Mr. E. said that it was the system he complained of. He did not mean to rebuke the administration.

Mr. Evans continued speaking in a party sense. He said the present administration had not been the course of the committee on finance in relation to the bill under consideration. He had not proceeded far in defending his own and the action of the committee in reference to this bill, when he referred to the remarks of the senator from South Carolina, and said he had taken part on the other side of the question, when

Mr. Calhoun again interrupted him, and said that his position had not been such as to prevent extravagance.

Mr. Evans said, in reply, that the proper time to check the expenses and prevent extravagance was when they had commenced.

[Mr. Calhoun, (in his seat). Not when the treasury is empty.]

Mr. Evans continued, and reminded the senator that he had been here and sat by when all those laws were passed, and now for the first time rose to complain. The committee of finance, he added, were not providing for the execution of the laws which the preceding administration had passed, and now it was proposed not only not to execute those laws for the future, but not to pay for expenses incurred under them in time past. He would deduct from the expenses of the navy and the marine corps two millions and a half of dollars. The bill before the senate provided for the payment of the salaries of the officers and men of the navy, and of the marine corps which the administration preceding us had increased. The navy had been increased, the army increased, and obligations contracted, which this bill provided to pay for. Who was to blame for this? And the senator blamed the finance committee, also, and stated that he had seen the question of the committee rooms of the military and naval committees. Obviously it was not the business of the committee of finance to do this.

Mr. E. further stated, also, in reply to the senator from South Carolina, that the present administration had done much already in the way of retrenchment—much, in the way of providing for the reduction of contingent expenses of congress, &c. He also explained what was said by Mr. Calhoun in reference to the Smithsonian fund, interest to be paid upon it, and upon the trust funds—information which the senator from South Carolina, in his speech, had sought from the senator from Maine. Referring to the expenses of government, he stated that all these expenditures were made by former laws, which we were called upon to execute. We were not making laws, but executing laws, whether good or bad, already made. And here he would remark that the evil was more in the application of the money appropriated than in the appropriation itself. These expenses, however, were to continue. The expenses of the Florida war would not be terminated for years to come. The expenses of survey referred to and complained of were also expenses of last year, and not yet all expended. He referred, too, to the collection of taxes. These had been increased in 1829 and 1830 twofold, and have been doubled since. Whose fault was this? These expenses, he was glad to inform the senate, were now in the course of reduction. But Mr. E. put it to senators on the opposite side, would stopping supplies, withholding appropriations created under prevailing laws, pay our public debt? Would these sustain the public credit? If they would not, and they were willing the public faith should be sustained, he called upon them to pass this bill.

Mr. Calhoun, at the close of his remarks, had raised a point of order, which was, that the bill before the senate was not in order. His point of order was, that the treasury bill, as it came from the house, was merely a bill to substitute treasury notes for a portion of the loan authorized at the extra session of congress. The senate had struck out this proviso, and made the bill a loan bill. The constitution declared that revenue bills should originate in the house. The treasury bill, as it came, had violated the constitution by its amendment.

Mr. King called upon the chair for a decision upon the point order.

The chair decided that there was no point of order to decide. The question raised was a constitutional one, and the chair had no control over it. The solemn judgment of the senate was to be given upon the amendment, and it was for the senate to decide upon the constitutionality of its own action.

The point of order was debated at length by Messrs. King, Calhoun, Berrien, Wright, Graham, Rives and Walker, when it was withdrawn by Mr. Calhoun, and the question demanded by yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill. The result was—Yeas, 20.

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Evans, Gilman, Huntington, Kerr, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Rives, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Woodbridge.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Beaton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelvey, Pierce, Preston, Sciort, Smith, of Connecticut, Sumner, Tappan, Walker, Van Dusen, Wright, Young—20.

And the senate adjourned.

A bill for the apportionment of representatives among the several states, according to the sixth census.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That from and after the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty three, the house of representatives shall be composed of members chosen agreeably to a ratio of one representative for every sixty eight thousand persons in each state, composed according to the rule prescribed by the constitution of the United States; that is to say:

Within the state of Maine, 7; New Hampshire, 4; Massachusetts, 10; Rhode Island, 1; Connecticut, 4; Vermont, 4; New York, 35; New Jersey, 9; Pennsylvania, 25; Delaware, 4; Maryland, 6; Virginia, 15; N. Carolina, 9; South Carolina, 6; Georgia, 8; Alabama, 7; Mississippi, 4; Louisiana, 4; Tennessee, 11; Kentucky, 10; Ohio, 22; Indiana, 19; Illinois, 7; Missouri, 5; Arkansas, 1; Michigan, 3.

Mr. Clifford hoped, he said, that the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. Everett) would consent to an earlier day than that proposed by him for the consideration of the bill. Many of the state legislatures now in session were anxiously waiting for action of congress on this subject. And if action of congress was not made of it an extra session of these legislatures would become indispensable, or the subject must necessarily go over for one year from the regular time of election.

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll was understood to say that he had himself received resolutions from the legislature of his own state on this subject. If there was no prompt action on it the expense and inconvenience attending a special session of the legislature must follow.

Mr. W. C. Johnson moved to recommit the bill to a select committee, to be composed of one member from each state of the union.

Mr. Stuart, of Illinois, said they would have to settle the matter by compromise at last, and it would have to go into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and be decided by a majority of the house. He moved to refer the bill to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

By this vote, the reference having been made to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, the other motions were suspended.

Mr. Everett then renewed the motion to print 5,000 extra copies of the report and bill, which motion was carried.

The speaker announced the business before the house to be the further consideration of petitions under the suspension of the rules for that purpose.

Mr. Adams said he had yesterday presented a petition solemnly calling on the house to remove him from the post in he occupied as chairman of the committee on foreign relations; and he had asked to be permitted to be heard in his own defence against the charges therein made, a privilege of his own as a member of this house and as asserting the privilege of every member. And for the reason that the committee on foreign relations might choose a chairman if they thought proper, he had given notice that, after defending himself from the charges made in the petition, he should move its reference to that committee. He was pleased to have the motion to lay on the table was made, and the chair now decided that this question was not laid upon the table.

The speaker said it was his opinion that, the motion to lay on the table having been carried, every thing connected with the petition in the ordinary manner was closed upon the table. The question of privilege was not pending at the time the motion to lay on the table was made, and the chair now decided that this question was not laid upon the table.

Mr. Warren moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday, by which the whole subject was laid on the table. He said that he came from Georgia, whence the charges therein made, and he had said that that petition professed to be a hoax, and that the gentleman from Massachusetts that he believed the paper was a hoax, an error factum. (Cries of "order, order.") Mr. W. concluded by moving the previous question, which was seconded by the house.

The question on the motion to reconsider was then taken, and decided in the affirmative.

The question then recurring on the motion to lay on the table—

The speaker in reply to an inquiry by Mr. Wise, said, in his judgment, the question of privilege was not involved in this motion; and that that question was not pending before the house, when the motion was made, in a manner that made it a question to be laid on the table.

The question on the motion to lay on the table was then taken, and decided in the negative.

The question then recurring on the motion yesterday made by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Marshall), viz. that the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) be permitted to be heard in his own behalf touching the charges made in the petition against him.

In the course of the discussion on the point of order, and whilst Mr. W. C. Johnson was giving his recollection of what had occurred, Mr. Adams interrupted him by saying, "the gentleman speaks falsely."

Mr. W. C. Johnson said that before he took his seat he would withdraw his point of order, after the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Warren), was carried; and would say but a word or two in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the members around him agreed in the accuracy of his (Mr. J's) statement, and he appealed to the recollection of all the members who were present, if their recollection did not accord with his, (Mr. J's). And he (Mr. J.) would say that, if other gentlemen felt privileged to be rude and coarse in passion and wantonness, that no department by others, no ebullition of feeling, no scene of excitement, no violent and coarse assault from that gentleman, would ever betray him for a moment to depart from the rules of parliamentary property and the decorum of a gentleman.

Mr. Everett moved the previous question; which was seconded by the house.

The question, "shall the main question be put?" was decided in the affirmative.

The main question (being on the motion of Mr. Marshall) was then taken by yeas and nays, at the call of Mr. Wise, and decided in the affirmative as follows: yeas 101; nays 49.

Mr. Adams then took the floor, and was about proceeding in his remarks; when—

Mr. John Campbell moved, he said, to a privileged question, and moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken; on which motion he wished to submit a remark or two.

Mr. C. proceeded in his remarks, and contended that there was no question of privilege involved in this subject. He thought the evidence of the fact was, first, that whatever charge had been brought before the house against the gentleman from Massachusetts, had been done by the gentleman himself, who stood in the light of his own accuser, and who had the privilege of withdrawing that charge if he chose, and he claimed his right to do so. If the gentleman was allowed to defend himself, he must, of course, defend those who pursued a different course; and, therefore, it was the duty of all these gentlemen—a duty of self-respect, a duty which they owed to themselves, unless they had full assurance that they should have an opportunity to reply—to vote against allowing the gentleman to proceed.

Mr. J. Campbell and Mr. Wise rose to points of order, v. contending that the debate should be confined to the strict question of reconsideration; Mr. Adams, at the same time, contending that it was his right to speak upon the general question, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Campbell) having, in his remarks, opened the whole subject.

The speaker was understood to say that the remarks of Mr. Adams and South Carolina were very brief, and were necessary to explain the charges imputed to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the debate should be confined to the question of reconsideration.

Mr. Adams then continued. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Campbell) had made: one of his points that he had a right to answer a charge made against him of disqualification for being as chairman of the committee on foreign relations because he presented this petition himself. Did it deprive him, he asked, of his right of self-defence because he was the first to make known the charges to the house? He said that he had taken a newspaper paragraph in which a charge of this kind was made against him, and brought it before the house as a question of privilege. This had been done in many instances. The ground of the gentleman was utterly untenable. He had another reason for raising the question of privilege. It was a letter from the person who transmitted the memorial to him, written in a very respectful manner.

Mr. A. here read the letter, which was dated at Clarksville, December 10, 1841, and which was signed James Playfair, requesting him (Mr. A.) to present to the honorable body of which he was a member the accompanying petition, and stating that it had been a matter of consultation with the meeting, out of which this petition grew, to whom the petition should be transmitted, and that they had foreborne to send it to their representatives for presentation to the aid copies of letters that might arise between them and Mr. A. to whom, for this purpose, they had directed it.

Mr. A. continued. The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Hoberman) had yesterday undertaken to say that this was all a hoax, and that there are no such persons in Georgia as are described in this memorial.

Mr. Hoberman had said that he knew of no such person in the county in which he resided, and he now said that he believed there was there no such person as James Playfair. He had learned that the gentleman from Massachusetts had a petition of this sort in his possession perhaps a week ago, and that he called on him and made inquiry with reference to it, and, on examination, he saw that the petition and the names were all in the same handwriting, which writing he did not know. There were among the names many of the surnames of persons residing in that county, but he knew no persons who bore those surnames with the same christian names. He had stated these facts to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and that he considered the petition a hoax. The letter might not have come from an individual residing in the state, but might have been thrown into the post office by a traveller. Under these circumstances, if a letter or a petition had come to him from Massachusetts, with this precise information given to him by the representative of the immediate neighborhood whence it purported to have come, he should have put it in the fire. He would not have allowed it to have disturbed the house, and wasted the time of the country by its presentation. If the gentleman had put the petition into his pocket no one would have known of it.

Mr. Adams then proceeded in his remarks, and said that he put his defence on the ground that, whether the petition was a hoax or not, he was entitled to be heard in reply to the charges therein made. The charge was a hoax, and it came from the infamous slave traders.

Messrs. Wise and W. C. Johnson here simultaneously rose, and called the gentleman to order; insisting that he should take his seat.

Mr. Adams, claiming that his remarks were in order, and that he had a right to proceed—

The speaker decided that the gentleman from Massachusetts was not in order.

Mr. Adams then proceeded in his remarks. This charge had been made (he continued) against him, and he claimed his right to answer it. The gentleman station which the speaker had assigned him until another chairman was chosen. He knew perfectly well that the whole slave-trading representation of this house was against him, with one single exception. Yet he would avoid the decision of the majority of his house upon the question of allowing the petition to be referred to the committee on foreign affairs, that they might choose a chairman if they thought proper, and he gave warning to all parties, whigs and democrats, that he was willing to abide by their vote. When he spoke of parties, he hoped the house would permit him to give some evidence of what he knew to be the disposition of various parties as respected him and this question. If it had been secret before, it was now disclosed by a gentleman, late a senator from Alabama, in a letter to his constituents, [a portion of which Mr. A. here read]. By so much of the executive journal of the extra session as had come to light, it appeared that in general the abolitionists and the whigs were confided by southern whigs while northern democrats voted against them.

Mr. Smith, of Va. here rose to a point of order. (Cries of "let him go on.")

Mr. S. said that the house had decided that the gentleman from Massachusetts should have the privilege of defending himself from the charges made in the petition, and he asked if the gentleman was doing it? (Cries of "yes" yes" and also of "no, he is establishing the fact.")

Mr. Adams then proceeded, and further read from the letter of the late Alabama senator, which stated that a coalition had been formed between southern whig leaders and the abolitionists, as well as the federalists, for the purpose of securing an extraordinary alliance was not less indispensable for the preservation of the union than for the safety of the south. This letter (continued Mr. A.) contained precisely the same charge in substance against those whom it called the abolitionists of the north, as this petition charged against him. He had other evidence of the same spirit, in a letter which he found written to a place called Arceneum. In it there were heavy charges against all the whig party, and—

Mr. W. C. Johnson rose to a question of order.

Mr. J. was requested that the gentleman from Massachusetts might not be interrupted, for he was so near the end of his remarks, and his trials of wrath upon him (Mr. W.) that it had no effect upon him.

Mr. Adams. I am glad of it.

He said he was producing evidence of the existence of precisely the same spirit in which the fac-morial was addressed, which tended to disfranchise all the members from the north. The same spirit animated the letter from which he had read; and it pervaded the letter which he was about to read from Accomac.

The speaker said that in his opinion the gentleman was now out of order, and that from the leave given him by the house he was not permitted to read the letter.

Mr. Adams appealed from that decision, and asked the yeas and nays.

After a few remarks from Mr. Wise upon a point of order, the house having refused the call for the yeas and nays, the question on the appeal of Mr. Adams, being "shall the decision of the chair stand against the reading of the house?" was taken by tellers, and decided in the negative, yeas 76, nays 78.

Thus the decision of the chair was reversed. Mr. Adams then said he should have the pleasure of reading those extracts from this letter, which he would intend to prove the identity of sentiments contained therein with the charges of the memorial to which he was referring.

[He then read portions of the letter relative to complaints which had been made against the "corporal's guard," the friends per excellence of the president, for not supporting any of the whig measures proposed at the extra session; and in which the question was asked, what measures were meant—whether it was the abolition movement to keep the houses of representatives disorganized until the 21st rule was suspended or abolished; or was it relative to the constitution of committees, so that, if the question of the recognition of the black republic of Hayti was referred, it went to a majority of non-slaveholders.]

What committee was that, continued Mr. A. Is this identical committee; and the speaker was charged with a violation of his duty in the appointment of that committee. After further enlarging upon this point, Mr. A. said he had spoken thus in illustration of the principle that the feelings which burned in the bosom of him who wrote the letter were the same as were contained in this memorial. It was not an individual or personal feeling, but it was slaveholding, slavetrading, slavebreeding, and the complaint was that the majority of the committee were not appointed of slaveholders.

Mr. Rogers rose to a question of order, and did not intend to make his seat until he had decided the question. This house had given the gentleman from Massachusetts leave to defend himself against the charges in a certain paper in his possession, and he had no right, in doing that, to pour out the bitterness and gail of his heart against an unwilling party to his countryman. (Mr. R. L.) insisted that in defending himself, and in reading this paper, the house had not given the gentleman permission to go into the question of slavery or non-slavery, and he now demanded of the speaker to put an end to this disgraceful proceeding, and to arrest the gentleman from Massachusetts in disgraceful himself, and by doing so in disgraceful himself, and playing off the Harlequin here in the grand inquiry of the nation, [loud cries of "order, order," and] and he called on the chair by the honor of the nation to arrest this proceeding.

The speaker said that, in his judgment, this whole matter was out of order, but inasmuch as this same point had not been settled, and the decision of the chair had been overruled, he could not now arrest the debate.

Mr. Adams said he had not got to the sweetest part of his letter yet.

Mr. Hayner appealed from the decision of the chair, and by yeas 69 to 66, the decision of the chair was reversed.

Mr. Linn now moved that the house adjourn, and by yeas 86, nays 57, the house adjourned.

Monday, Jan. 24. Mr. Adams rose and proceeded to state, that at the time he was arrested on Saturday, he was reading from a newspaper a letter purporting to come from a gentleman, a member of this house.

Mr. Andrews, of Kentucky, inquired of the speaker whether, after the vote of Saturday, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) could be allowed to proceed without a vote of the house?

The speaker remarked also that the chair had not on Saturday been disposed to arrest the gentleman from Massachusetts, but that on Sunday, at the order of the house, the decision of the chair had been overruled by the house. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Andrews) objected to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) proceeding without leave of the house, and under this decision, the chair had no alternative but to refuse the rule.

Mr. B. then asked that the gentleman from Massachusetts be permitted to proceed under the leave of the house granted to him.

The question on this motion being taken was decided in the negative; yeas 76, nays 81. So the house refused leave to Mr. Adams to proceed in his remarks.

The speaker announced the question to be on the motion of the petition offered by Mr. Adams on Friday last.

Mr. Wise submitted a motion, in the following form:

"The house having allowed Mr. Adams, by its vote, to defend himself from a charge contained in a paper or petition in his possession, and to read a portion of a letter of Mr. Wise to prove that he (Mr. W.) had also made the same or a similar charge, and to comment upon that portion of the letter; Mr. Wise now asks the privilege and the permission of the house to reply to the remarks of Mr. Adams, and to speak in his own defence and to the question of privilege raised by Mr. Adams."

Mr. Warren moved to amend it, so as to show that the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) was not heard at large, but was stopped.

Mr. Adams hoped that the motion would also be so amended as to add that "he had been arrested by the house, and forbidden to proceed when just entering on his defence."

Mr. Bots moved to lay the whole subject on the table until the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and being taken were yeas 101, nays 78. So the whole subject was laid on the table.

Mr. Wise then rose and withdrew his objection to the reception of the petition.

And Mr. Adams, in form, moved (in accordance with his previous intimation) the reference of the said petition to the committee on foreign affairs, with instructions "to choose a chairman if they should think proper."

Or, Mr. A. was understood to say, he had no objection to put his motion in the form of that made by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Hopkins) the other day, which was to instruct the committee to act in conformity with the prayer of the petitioners, because he (Mr. A.) considered the gentleman as having said so.

Mr. Hopkins nodded and expressed assent.

The speaker here said that no such motion had been entered on the journal as having been made by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Hopkins). The gentleman had submitted such a motion, but it was out of order.

Mr. Warren desired to know if it was in order to submit a motion instructing the committee on foreign affairs to proceed, at their first meeting, to choose another chairman.

The speaker said yes; there was nothing disrespectful to the house in such a motion.

Mr. Lewis Williams rose and moved to lay the petition and instructions on the table.

The speaker here announced, finally, that the petition, given rise to debate, must lie over.

Mr. Adams said he hoped the day would come when he would have an opportunity of making the whole subject, and when the gentleman from Accomac (Mr. Wise) would have an opportunity of emptying his whole heart.

So the petition, giving rise to debate, was laid over.

But Mr. Gilmer rose and desired to be informed by the speaker whether the committee on foreign affairs had not the power to propose to appoint another chairman, without instruction from the house. The whole subject, and when the gentleman from Accomac (Mr. Wise) would have an opportunity of emptying his whole heart.

So the petition, giving rise to debate, was laid over. But Mr. Gilmer rose and desired to be informed by the speaker whether the committee on foreign affairs had not the power to propose to appoint another chairman, without instruction from the house.

The speaker said that he could not take official cognizance of any thing of that kind. The committee, when they assembled in their room, could look to their own rules, and see what was the extent of the power they possessed.

Mr. Gilmer. I presume they have the power, and may do so without instruction from the house.

Mr. Adams. Leave that to the committee on foreign relations.

Mr. Gilmer said he, for one, was willing to meet the responsibility.

And then, in further execution of the order of the 7th rule, the presentation of petitions and memorials was continued, the call resting still at the state of Massachusetts.

And a number of petitions were presented by Mr. Adams.

Mr. Adams presented the following petition:

To the congress of the United States: The undersigned, citizens of Haverhill, in the commonwealth of Massachusetts, pray that you will immediately adopt measures peaceably to dissolve the union of these states—

First: Because no union can be agreeable or permanent which is based on vast prospects of reciprocal benefits.

Second: Because see a vast prospect, the resources of creation, of the whole, annually destroyed by the views and course of another section without any adequate return.

Third: Because (judging from the history of past nations) that union, if persisted in in the present course of things, will certainly overwhelm the whole nation in utter destruction.

This petition is signed by Benjamin Emerson and forty-five others. I move its reference to a select committee, with instructions to report an answer to the petitioners, showing the reasons why the prayer of it ought not to be granted.

Mr. Hopkins. Is it in order to move to burn the petition in the presence of the house?

Mr. Thayer rose and moved that the petition be laid on the table, with instructions that the country might understand what its character was.

Mr. Wise, (addressing the speaker.) Is it in order to move to ensure any member presenting such a petition, and to move that the house do now proceed to inquire whether a member has offered such a petition to this body, and to proceed accordingly?

The speaker said he did not think that a proceeding could be taken, but it would be for the house to determine.

Mr. F. Wiercher raised the question of reception, and moved to lay that question on the table; remarking, that he did not think that such a petition should be allowed to come within the walls of this house.

Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, rose and was understood to say that he did not think that a petition of such a character should be thus lightly passed over.

Mr. Thayer (having, he said, misapprehended the effect of the question just put) moved to reconsider the vote laying the question of the reception of the petition on the table. He has explicitly stated, in the first instance, that his object was to have the petition printed, that the country might understand what its character was.

The speaker was understood to intimate to Mr. Thayer that, even if the vote should be reconsidered, the first recurring question would be, not on the motion submitted by him to lay the petition on the table and print, but on the question of reception raised by the gentleman from Georgia, and the motion to lay that question on the table.

Mr. Thayer persisted in his motion.

Mr. Gilmer thence rose and submitted, as a question of privilege, the following resolution:

It is ordered, &c., in proceeding to the consideration of this house a provision for the dissolution of the union the number from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) has justly incurred the censure of the house.

Mr. Underwood objected to the resolution, as entirely out of order.

Mr. Gilmer said he hoped the resolution was in order.

The speaker referred to the journal of 1836, which contained an account of a case similar to this, and went to show that this, being a matter of privilege, was in order. He said, and with this authority, it was his duty to submit to the decision of the house the question of privilege moved by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. Adams said he hoped the resolution would be received and be debated, and that he should have the privilege of again addressing the house in his own defence, especially as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Gilmer) had thought proper to play second fiddle to his colleague from Accomac, (Mr. Wise.)

Mr. Gilmer said he played second fiddle to no man. He was no fiddler, (loud order, &c.) but was endeavoring to prevent the music of him, who, in his opinion, was a bad fiddler.

"In the space of one revolving moon,"

"Was seen a sun, a moon, a fiddler, and a fiddler."

Mr. Ward said it would be recollected that the decision to which the speaker had referred on the journal was a hasty one, which the speaker and the house regretted at the time, because it gave rise to a discussion of some two or three weeks. He therefore hoped, much as he respected the honorable gentleman from Virginia, that they would not see a scene of this kind again enacted on this resolution.

Mr. Rogers inquired if this debate was in order? The speaker replied in the negative.

Mr. Rogers inquired what was the question before the house?

The speaker said it was on the point of order of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Underwood.)

Mr. Underwood said he would not appeal from the decision of the chair.

The speaker then announced the question to be on the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Gilmer.)

Mr. J. C. Clark moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. J. F. Bower moved a call of the house.

Which motion having prevailed, the roll was called, and 111 members answered to their names.

Mr. Adams moved that this day be a day of fasting and prayer.

Which motion was carried, and the house adjourned.

The whole amount of money paid by the township collectors to the trustees of districts in townships, from which reports have been received, is $29,699 32-100. Estimating the amount received from the state in those townships at $16,500, it would follow that in the townships and portions of districts from which reports have been received, the inhabitants have raised $23,199 32-100, making for every dollar received from the state $1 40 raised by the inhabitants. The last year for every dollar received from the state the townships raised $1 40, and this is purely voluntary, and exhibits the great interest of the people on the subject of common school education. —Free Press.

PHILADELPHIA TRADE. The annual report of the Philadelphia board of trade signed by Thomas P. Cope the president, Jan. 17, says, "A committee was appointed last winter to confer with the canal commissioners, and to urge the necessity of a REDUCTION in the cost of transportation on our public works. It was suggested that a DRAWBACK should be allowed on all goods transported on the entire route of the state works between Pittsburgh and Philadelphia, and that some reduction in the tolls should be made. The commissioners agreed as to the propriety of the measures proposed, and promised at an early period to give their attention to the subject. No change has yet taken place. The consequence has been, that much of the produce of the west destined for this city, instead of taking the short and direct route by our public works, has taken the circuitous one by way of New Orleans, and has been attracted to New York, by the compensatively low prices of freight on the Erie canal, and the fact that the canal is the property of a large and influential group of members of this association, for the purpose of towing boats descending the Susquehanna canal to Havre de Grace, laden with the products of the western States, and the fact that the canal is situated between Chesapeake and Delaware canal, and hence back to Havre de Grace with merchandise. The success attending this enterprise has surpassed the anticipations of the promoters, and has created a new and important portion of the trade of our own state that had heretofore found Baltimore its most accessible market. In order to facilitate this trade, a considerable reduction on the rates of towing boats has been made, and the following boats, loaded with produce, have been towed from the Chesapeake and Delaware canal. During the past year four hundred and fifty-nine boats were towed from Havre de Grace to this city, and five hundred and two boats from this city to Havre de Grace, many of them 70 tons in burthen.

TARIFF MEETING. At a meeting of citizens in Cincinnati on the subject of the tariff on the 13th inst., a committee was appointed to report a memorial to congress in relation to the promotion and protection of American industry. At an adjourned meeting on the 17th inst., a memorial was accordingly presented on the part of the committee by Mr. Mansfield, one of its members. Other meetings and proceedings have been of late held in various parts of the country looking to the protection of the respective interests which are suffering by the present compromise act.

Since the above we have seen Nashville papers of a later date which state that Mr. Laughlin's resolutions have been laid on the table by the house of representatives. It has also passed a resolution to go into the election of United States senators on the 7th inst. and another in favor of the repeal of the bankrupt law. [N. O. Bee.]

CHRONICLE.

CONGRESS. On the 25th ult. the bill from the house for the repeal of the bankrupt law was rejected by the senate by a vote of 23 yeas to 22 nays (see p. 359). The law therefore went into operation on the 1st of the present month.

The debate in the house of representatives on the question of privilege involved in the presentation by Mr. Adams of a petition from 46 individuals of Haverhill, Mass. praying a peaceable dissolution of the union, has since the 24th of January been the chief subject of discussion. We have condensed the debates for the first few days, chiefly from the able reports of the National Intelligencer, to which paper we are constantly indebted, and brought them down to Thursday morning the 27th. On that day Messrs. Underwood, Botts and Arnold spoke, and as incidental to their remarks was a charge against the secretary of navy by Mr. Botts, of his having been previous to his entrance upon his office, an open and avowed advocate of disunion. The charge has been denied by Mr. Upham, and Mr. Botts has promised its proof. On Friday, 28th, the debate was continued by Mr. Marshall and Mr. Adams. On Saturday the 29th, the treasury note bill with the amendments of the senate was passed by the casting vote of the speaker, there being 100 yeas to 100 nays. On Monday the 31st, the death of the late senator from Rhode Island, the hon. T. D. Dixon was announced and both houses adjourned, and on Tuesday attended his funeral. On Wednesday, the discussion was renewed, Mr. Adams urging the passage of his resolutions calling for testimony to substantiate his defence. Mr. Holmes of S. C. opposed but they were granted and continued. On the 3rd, Mr. Gilmer concluded his remarks advocating the original violation of the constitution, and Mr. Adams replied. On Friday, he continued his defence.

FLORIDA. A correspondent of the Savannah Republican, under date of the 29th ultimo, writes as follows:

"On the 25th inst. Major Plympton, in command of 30 men of the 3d Infantry, gallantly encountered, under every disadvantage, Hulick Tadeo, a chief of the head of Hawk river, which runs into Dunn's Lake, east of the St. John's.

A well concerted fight ensued, that lasted forty-five minutes. The enemy retreated, leaving two warriors wounded on the field; one has since died. One soldier was killed and two wounded. The evidence of blood on several trails leading from the battle ground was a guaranty that some of the Indians had suffered from ball and buckshot.

"Troops are in every direction, and about being put in position to heed this celebrated chief, with every hope of success, whether he wends his way north, or south, or west."

CHINA.

STATISTICS. Mr. Paulhier, of Paris, has published a translation of certain official documents from the "Ta-tsing hway-tien," a collection of regulations of the reigning dynasty, which relate to the population, the lands, and the revenues of China. The date of the edition is not apparent from the copy of the work, which is in the royal library at Paris, but from internal evidence must be posterior to 1812; the preface is dated 1810. The results of these documents, being founded upon returns made for official and revenue purposes, are therefore to be relied upon.

The census of the population is directed to be taken by means of registers accurately made, by special military officers, Manchou, Mongol and Chinese, under the supervision of the board of finance. The manner in which the numbers are obtained is as follows: the governor and lieutenant governor of each province causes little tablets of wood (mun-pai, "door tablets") which are attached to the doors of the different houses, in order that the exact number of persons inhabiting each may be inscribed on them, to be collected by certain officers every year, when the assessment is made, and sent to the board of finance where they are arranged, and a list is drawn up from them at the end of the year. The returns distinguish males who have reached virility, and are subject to contribution, denominated "Ting" and women and youths below puberty, who are called "Kow," or "moths." The whole population (Ting-how) in the eighteen provinces of the empire, amounted, in the seventeenth year of Ken-king, or A. D. 1812, to 361,693,179 souls, exclusive of the eight Tartar banners at Peking, and of the population of the dependencies beyond the frontiers of China proper, which are not included in the returns.

The numbers in the several provinces are as follows:
Chih-le, (including Moukden and Kirin),	29,240,655
Shan-tung	28,958,764
Shan-se	14,094,210
Hoo-nan	23,037,171
Keang-soo	37,843,501
Kan Whuy	34,166,059
Sze-chuen	29,046,899
Fokeen, (including Formosa),	14,779,158
Che-keang	26,256,784
Hoo-pih	27,370,098
Hoo-nan	18,653,597
Shen-se	10,097,256
Kan-shu	15,354,875
Shan-se	24,438,678
Kwang-tung	19,174,030
Kwang-se	9,318,955
Yun-nan	5,561,320
Kwei-choo	5,288,219
	361,693,179

In the registers, the "honorable" population (leang) is distributed into four classes, namely, the people (min), the military (keun), the mercantile class (shang), and the "free-people" (tsao); the tsao, or vile population, comprises slaves, hired servants, courtiers, and art-craftsmen, and certain other classes of particular localities. The registers of adventurers (naon), persons who move about from place to place (keu), cross the frontiers, and lodge at inns, are required to be kept with great vigilance.

The lands throughout the empire are classified under various heads, amongst which are the ho ten, or fields for study, that is, land appropriated to the public education of the people. "In each province," says the Chinese Commentator, "there are establishments for public instruction, which have lands appropriated to their support, and to the common maintenance of those who prosecute their studies there." All the lands in the empire are measured, and the quantity of cultivated land in the eighteen provinces, in the year 1812, was 7,915,351 king, and 96 mu, or about 150,000,000 English acres, or cash. Backmaking the total at 68. 3d. and the cash at one-tenth of the total, the aggregate sum will be upwards of ten millions and a half sterling. The copper cash, however, which is collected only in the province of Kan-shu, is the para, a coin with which the Mahomedan tributaries of China, in Yarkand, Kashgar, &c., pay their capitation tax, and which is worth less than a half-penny; this would make the money revenue amount to £10,279,220, thus distributed:

Chih-le	£1,045,715	Hoo-pih	£344,166
Shan-tung	1,073,360	Hoo-nan	376,250
Shan-se	1,235,312	Shen-se	515,520
Hoo-nan	1,104,281	Kan-shu	132,502
Keang-soo	1,133,755	Sze-chuen	252,485
Kan-whuy	603,205	Kwang-tung	336,553
Keang-se	674,432	Kwang-se	150,428
Fo-keen	431,362	Yun-nan	118,763
Che-keang	922,560	Kwei-choo	42,037

The amount of the revenue in grain and in silver of different kinds, was 4,356,582 shih (stone), a measure which is nearly equal to the French hectolitre and in forage, 5,494,780 shuh, trusses or bundles.

TRADE AND COMMERCE—TARIFF.

For Niles' Register.

MR. EDITOR: In the Register of the 11th December, 1841, I find an editorial article under the head of "trade and commerce." As that article in my humble opinion is well calculated to lead many persons into erroneous conclusions in relation to our export and import trade; I request you to insert a few words I shall say upon the subject, together with what comments you see proper to make upon it yourself.

After giving the secretary's "statement exhibiting the value of imports and exports annually, from 1791 to 1841" you make the following remarks: "Systems are tested by aggregate results. Here are the actual proceeds of our existing system as operating for fifty years. The exports exceeded the imports in only seven out of the fifty. Excluding the year 1840 and the total amount of the excess in the other six of those years was but $25,000,000—with that year the excess of exports was altogether $59,109,578, whilst the excess of imports during the remaining 44 of the 50 years is $803,428,630. In the whole fifty years the excess of importations over exports is $753,319,557, being an annual average of over 15,000,000 of dollars! What other nation on earth could have sustained such a drain. Take the period since the enactment of the compromise bill and the progressive reduction of the tariff thereunder, up to 1839 inclusive and the average excess of imports was nearly thirty millions annually. This was continued until our resources and credit both failed, and disaster is upon us."

The writer of this paragraph obviously intended to convey the idea, that the $753,319,557 dollars, the excess of our imports over our exports for the last fifty years, had operated as a drain upon us, and had finally almost dried up our resources; that we were impoverished in consequence of this inequality between our imports and exports to the average amount of 15 millions of dollars a year for that time. So far from this being the case, however, it is evident that the drain of the United States of the sum he supposes we have been losing; with the exceptions of the amount to which the states, corporations and private individuals in this country, are indebted abroad; estimated by some at 300 million of dollars. Thus $553,319,557 at least may be set down as a drain upon the United States. To make this evident, take for example a single year, say 1832. The imports in that year were $101,029,356 and the exports for the same year $57,176,943. In that year, according to the principles laid down in the paragraph before quoted we were drained to the amount of $13,352,323. I now propose to show very briefly, that instead of this being a drain upon us, we were deriving a profit by our foreign trade to the amount of $13,352,323; and that this apparent excess of importations, was really indicative of prosperity rather than adversity.

It must be remembered that the value of our exports as found in our custom house books, is the value our products have previous to exportation; and the value of imports also so found, is the value of goods in the countries from which they are imported.—Thus, suppose a merchant of Baltimore ships ten thousand dollars worth of products to Liverpool; the custom house books of course show an export of ten thousand dollars. But the merchant has to pay freight, insurance, &c. and lay out of his capital well before he gets a return, which he would not do if he did not export to sell his cargo for an advance in Liverpool. He there disposes of his cargo for $11,500, which is 15 per cent. above our custom house valuation.—With the proceeds of which he purchases cutlery to the amount of $11,500, which, when he returns to Baltimore is entered on our custom house books as $11,500. Imports showing an excess of imports to the amount of $1,500 in this single transaction and no foreign debt contracted.

Now, so far is the United States from losing in this transaction, she has gained $1,500. For the Baltimore merchant has derived a profit as we have seen of that amount, and our person who has sold the goods for the $57,176,943, the products of our country valued here and entered upon our custom house books in 1832, and exchanged for other articles in foreign countries for $101,029,356 would show a gain instead of a loss of $13,352,323 or about 15 per cent. although the imports exceed the exports by this sum. No whole ship is fitted out with products valued at $5,000 and is so entered on the custom house books, but returns with oil worth $24,000, which is entered also as so much imports, showing an excess of $16,000 of imports above exports and the vessel never touched ports at a foreign port.

I think it is therefore clearly evident, that if the custom house books be taken as a correct balance of exports and imports, our shipping merchants must have been in a losing business, as much in proportion to the amount, as the supposed Baltimore merchant would have done if he had sold his cargo in Liverpool for only $10,000 instead of $11,500, that is, all the cost of freight insurance and all the expenses of the voyage.

WM. E. LUKENS.

January 7th, 1842.

REMARKS.

Our correspondent invites us to a field which is of vast circuit, and in which deliberation, time and material are required to manage a controversy as it should be,—embracing little less than the whole sphere of political economy. Surrounded as we have been ever since we took charge of this publication, with immediate and pressing demands upon every hour in order to keep way with affairs in the accumulating difficulties of the times especially in monetary concerns, we have seldom been at liberty to take a seat at the editorial desk, a sufficient time to concentrate our mind upon a subject as we would wish, in order to present our views suitably to our readers. And now, we are compelled to snatch but a hasty moment and devote but a brief space to an examination of the positions, assumed by our correspondent, under a sense of duty to our country and to our position and a full persuasion of the importance at this time especially of the topics to which he calls attention.

There is plausibility in the example adduced by our correspondent. He has in brief terms summed up the substance of arguments which we find made use of in various directions by the opponents of a reciprocal or countervailing tariff. We admit his premises without hesitation, so far as a fair legitimate trade conducted by our own citizens upon bona fide capital of their own is concerned. This is but the common benefits of commerce, enhancing the aggregate amount of wealth by exchanging the surplus of those who have to spare, with those who want, impoverishing neither those who sell nor those who buy. Of the many millions of value which annually exchange hands between this and foreign countries, a large proportion is of course within this wholesome limitation—fair business transactions—wholesale trade, resulting in bringing to us what is worth more to us than what we have parted with, and thereby increasing our wealth and comforts as well as the wealth and comforts of those to whom we have imparted of our abundance.

But whilst admitting this benign influence of a properly regulated commerce, and allowing that to the above extent the amount of our imports should exceed our exports, according as values are estimated in our official schedules, yet we deny most explicitly that the excess of imports is a true index of the prosperity of a country. On the contrary, so general is the tendency to far overleap that wholesome limit, that excess is almost an invariable result of unregulated trade. The propensities of men in all countries and all ages, have been to indulge themselves not only in the excess of what they fancy they want—as they can pay for with what they have at the time, but beyond that—to the utmost extent of what they hope to have some time hereafter wherewith to pay. The sad experience of involvements which disappointment in these sanguine hopes occasions—the millions upon millions of wretches incarcerated in the jails, which the attempts to collect those debts incurred upon the communities where they have been incurred—the wreck and ruin of fair prospects—fortunes—credit and character, which follow in the train—are sad evidences, alas, too obvious every where around us, of the fatal tendencies of this excess.

Can it be possible that our correspondent recognizes no limit to the excess of importations? Can he,—can any one of those who advocate the doctrine of the largest liberty in trade, have seriously persuaded themselves that the more we import over what we export—in other words, the more we buy over what we sell, the wealthier we are becoming? Assuming, as our correspondent has done, the truly round round sum of over five hundred millions of dollars which we have imported over the amount of our exports within the last fifty years, they tell us that that is the real increase of our wealth by the transaction—the actual profit made by allowing imports to exceed exports,—and hint at no limitation. We wish to know, if such a policy be sound and what we make, the richer we shall be and the more prosperous our country.

Though such would be the necessary consequence of carrying out their arguments to their inevitable result, yet our opponents would no doubt consider it unfair to attribute such extravagance to them. True, they hint at no limit the excess which imports may be allowed to exceed exports—because it might spoil the effect of the flattering picture of prosperity which they have drawn for us. But if we demand an answer to the ultimate conclusions to which their arguments tend, they would no doubt claim some bounds to their proposition. They would insist, that though the balance of trade might and ought to preponderate in favor of importations, yet there must be some limit to the extent to which excess can safely be indulged. The idea that the more we can obtain from others beyond the value of what we part with, the better off we shall be, is too preposterous to be maintained.

Wherever that limit is, it is just as absolute in its demarcation between prosperity on one hand, and poverty on the other, as if the line were supposed to be in an exact equality between imports and exports.

The advocates of "free trade" (so called)—tacitly admit the existence of such a limit—but they say that it is so small and so easily to be exceeded, that by the operations of a commerce, unrestrained altogether on our part, although it be ever so much restricted towards us by the regulations of those with whom we trade. "Commerce should be left free—it can best regulate itself"—is their doctrine.

To this our answer is—that by this process, as is now exhibiting in the experience of this country, excess of importations is only limited by the poverty and sufferings of those who admit it. The infliction of distress is inevitable—and the extent of that distress is only limited by the capacity of the victim to endure.

When we have at once the radical difference between the two parties on this question. The one party is for leaving the country to endure forever this grievous method of ascertaining where the limit of excess of importations is to be applied.

We will, under their process, be required at all times to get whenever other countries still consent to receive of us what we have to spare—we will be required in addition, to have the last farthing in the purse drained out by the quiet but effective process of a premium upon specie—and we will constantly be harrassed as we are now, to make up as much as we possibly can of the still formidable and even existing balance of trade by obligations bearing interest—payment of which is procrastinated it may be from time to time, which is alas but predicating upon years of toil yet to be endured.

"Balance of trade?" did we say? Our ingenious correspondent has objected, and we admit, that it is not exactly the amount of the balance of imports over exports—but it is the balance of imports over what our exports will pay for, that produces the difficulty, and which he and those who agree with him, limit at no amount of trade. Our poverty alone is the limit their expedient suggests.

The advocates for reciprocity in trade, on the contrary, maintain that it is the province and duty of government to anticipate, and by wholesome provisions and restrictions to prevent the occurrence of this condition of suffering and exaction. They hold that this can be done and ought to be done—that all other governments have uniformly and do now protect their people from pursuing any trade unlimited that would evidently impoverish them. They show that our own government from the moment of its formation until the fatal introduction of this new theory under the operation of which the present condition of the country has been mainly superinduced, did maintain the demand for a reciprocity of trade with all nations, on prescribed restrictions against their restrictions, whenever it appeared to be our interest to do so. To this wholesome policy under which the country so long prospered they insist that our government ought to return. Our present condition at least so indispensable a duty in communities as between individuals.

We allow, then, that the amount of our imports may extend to the utmost that our exports will pay for. But we insist that every step beyond that is a stride towards poverty and distress. We insist that the balance of trade left unregulated on the one side, and artfully restricted by regulations designed to work to their own advantage on the other side, will inevitably tend to enrich one party by impoverishing the other—and we say this is the present condition of things, and that this condition will become worse and worse the longer the case remains open to exist.

But let us attend for a moment to the example which our correspondent has adduced.

Because one provident farmer sells his crop for more than it has cost him to produce it, and thereby in his sphere of commerce, is able at the end of the year to import upon his plan more than he has exported, he is authorized to conclude, as portended by our correspondent, that he is authorized to conclude, as portended by our correspondent would seem to have done, that every one who can contrive to effect it, is right in buying as much more than he can sell as possible? The theory is, that he is enriched to the extent of the value of what he gets, beyond the value of what he has parted with. Is this theory tenable? Would it not be an idle waste of words to combat it?

By arguing from isolated cases, which occur in so wide a field as that which the commerce of nations affords, almost any proposition may be rendered plausible. As an offset to the case adduced by our correspondent, suppose we select one of the many thousand instances which are constantly occurring, of a less prudent character.

We will assume that the very same individual who is introduced by our correspondent, has been seduced by the profits realized by a number of transactions similar to the one above detailed, to extend his operations and to avail of a well established credit which fidelity to his engagements would not permit him to withhold when he had occasion for it. Suppose built for him his whole wealth upon the basis of the prevailing infatuation to which our system renders all Americans so liable. He is seized with the spirit of speculation, and fancies that by a skillful use of his resources, thousands might be made where only hundreds had been. He now extends the ramifications of his trade to every corner of the globe, and is established here—a warehouse there—farms and flour mills in the wheat growing sections—plantations in the tobacco region—cotton estates in the south—or sugar estates in the southwest—ships await his freight in the seaports and notified factories wait at his command. Meantime a prospect of a splendid speculation is perceived. No matter what accounts are brought that the weather threatens a failure of the grain crops of Europe for instance. If he can but secure flour at present prices here and get it to England in the nick of time when scarcity shall have brought their sliding scale of duties down to its lowest fraction, his fortune is made at a single dash.

But how is this to be done? It requires large funds, and his means at home having just been exhausted in heavy purchases of—say negroes, to stock his southern plantation; he must resort to his credit abroad for the occasion—and without hesitation orders are forwarded to his European correspondents to ship forthwith $500,000 worth of sundries merchandise—at six and twelve months credit. It arrives—is sent to auction, sold at sixty and ninety days—and with the proceeds, flour is bought and shipped under the full persuasion that from its sale the foreign duty would be paid as well as the foreign bills he had incurred, and a speedy return realized.

Before his flour reaches Liverpool however, the weather has changed. Every appearance indicates a splendid harvest. The duty upon flour had changed of course with the weather. Instead of being allowed to enter the article at a nominal duty, it is now equivalent to an exclusion. His agent places it in bond, hypothecates—and finally has to sacrifice his sour flour for little more than will pay charges.

We leave to the superior arithmetical tact of our correspondent, to show how much either the speculator or his country, has been enriched by this entire transaction, even supposing that the official valuation of the imports in the case had exceeded just as much as he pleases the home valuation of the article exported.

Again: The addition which our correspondent and others who take similar views, make of freight charges, profit, &c., in order to increase the value of our exports so as to approach the value of what we import, is but an accumulation of unnecessary figures,—for if our exports are entitled to those additions, so also are our imports, to at least as much—nay more—and the result would be, if the sum were fairly stated, that the balance of trade is in fact at least as much more against us, as the per cent. allowed for those charges added to the total amount, would increase the amount of the imports beyond what it increased the amount of the exports.

By the way, every one that is conversant with this point, is aware that our countrymen, but a remote approximation to their actual value. They are set down at the foreign valuation, and as our duties are levied upon such valuation, the lower they place the estimate, the less duty they have to pay. Upon this subject we have abundant proof that in many cases the value placed below the actual value, is not only the value of the goods—and in almost all cases the revenue is swindled by their agents' entries at our custom houses. This is one of the many expedients by which they are superceding our own fair traders who cannot of course in this case compete with their wiles.

Could a fair and full valuation of the imports be ascertained, could the actual price which our people have ultimately to pay for foreign goods imported, be set down, the real disparity between our exports and imports would astound all of us. A balance of five hundred millions against us, would fall far short of the reality. But we presume that according to the consoling theory of our opponents, the more we pay for them, the wealthier we are.

As to the amount of the actual indebtedness of this country to Europeans, in the form of government stocks, state stocks, corporation and internal improvement stocks—liens upon real estate—balances of long deferred claims, as well as for goods imported, and yet to be paid for, the sum would astound our correspondent as well as of other authorities to be very far below the real aggregate. But of that at a future time.

Another, and a still more material error in the view which the advocates of the "largest liberty" in trade seem all of them to have fallen into, is, their assuming that of the import as well as the export trade—that all our commerce is in the hands of Americans! By a continuance of our present system we have already forfeited much that we once enjoyed of both, and if persisted in, we shall have a slim account of freight, profits on shipping, tonnage, and capital, to balance the foreign account for those same items. We must leave to our correspondent to state and work out for us the real result in which the trade is in the hands of foreigners instead of our own citizens, exports as well as imports done on foreign account, and the balance of trade in the transaction made up by shipments of specie.

The answer to all this we presume would be, that "trade if left free, will regulate itself."

Were left free, on all hands, it might regulate itself somewhat better than it has been allowed "free trade" as it is called,—a trade left free on one side, and interdicted and restrained on the other. Whilst one party models restrictions, exactions, and exclusions, to suit their own interests and the other party quietly submits and allows the "largest liberty" to the consumers, and the market to regulate and "regulate itself" to the advantage of both. The profit of such intercourse is like the handle of a jug, all on one side. The extent to which imports may exceed exports by this process will be limited it is true, but where? Exactly at the point where the impoverished nation becomes no longer able to pay. No,—a little beyond that—just when their last shred of credit fails—there, and there only is the limit which these anti-tariff advocates of free trade insist that the line and limit of excess should operate. A free people ought of course to be left at liberty to ruin themselves if they see fit. Do we not allow every spendthrift prodigal to squander his estate just as fast as he pleases? Aye, and often to ruin his too credulous wife.

As infallibly as gratifying every want and every extravagance which either money or credit can procure, leads to the impoverishment and ruin of an individual, so will the same indulgence if allowed by a nation, prostrate its citizens into like distress. The "largest liberty" knows and regards moral restraints as little in the commercial circle as it would in the social circle if we had no laws to restrain it. The limit which lawless nature prescribes in the one case is the extent of physical power and appetite. In the other the limit is defined by absolute suffering; distress and poverty at last interpret the barbarous maxim, "let the law be the law." The further we are from your purse, your monied institutions prostrated, your industry estimated for years to come, and drawn upon; when your estate is mortgaged for more than it will bring, and your ingenuity fails in expedients to raise the wind upon your previous good name, you are left to the law, and the law is sustained, of how much, according to this theory our imports may exceed exports; and the balance of trade is allowed to vibrate, as from these very causes it recently has done. Foreigners will sell us no more, because they have ascertained that we can pay no more. And even then its "our poverty and not our commerce" to limit our expenditures. Such is human nature.

Our notion is, that it is the province and duty of every good government to foresee, anticipate, and by wholesome regulations to avert such a condition of things. In short, we would have the "largest liberty" in trade restrained to a due regard to the public safety, the public law, and the public honor, just as faithfully as moral and legal obligations in the social sphere are intended to compel observances in individual cases. We maintain that the government which neglects this duty, fails of the object for which governments should be instituted and the consequences they ought to protect are left a prey to lawless cupidity.

The native tribes upon the frontier of civilization furnish a striking and perpetual illustration of this condition of things. Without a government to regulate intercourse with rapacious neighbors, they have and must have "largest liberty" since they are over to over to part with the very materials upon which they should subsist, poverty beyond endurance, and all the exasperating passions in its train of miseries absolutely extirpate tribe after tribe in a single generation. Humanity recoils from a contemplation of the price that indulgence costs its victims from the moment that foreign avarice is allowed to lay its baited snares in their every pathway. From that moment they are doomed. Brief is the tragedy of their fate, brief only because its severity is beyond the measure of mortal endurance. The last of the Seminoles will soon follow the last of the Delawares and Mohawks.

Our citizens of the adjacent countries, ours might find an intermediate stage of poverty to arrest its late. Such a position for instance as Ireland has for so many centuries occupied in trade with her more powerful sister kingdom.

The master power will not indeed strangle the goose from which she can derive golden eggs. The son of St. Patrick is allowed to deliver for his potato for the market, he is exempted from the county quarter's rent, pay his government taxes, or the church's tithes. His capacity for endurance however, as well as for production is most accurately ascertained, and up to the very point of intersection is the measure of exaction graduated by the hand of power that is upon him, and in whose power grasp he has been from century to century, helpless as infancy.

Continue to maintain the suicidal course in regard to trade, and what Ireland is to England, America will soon be to Europe. Allow Europeans unencumbered liberty here, and permit them to enforce such restrictions as best accords with their own interest upon the trade of the United States—kept open and carried a few more years, and the mistress of the commerce of the world will have re-achieved her control over her former colonies. Our wants or supposed wants will be her exchequer and collectors in every avenue of society. Nicely graduated poverty will be served into props for her sceptre here, just as it has been in ill-fated Ireland, in India, and will soon be in China. Anti-tariff champions under the imposing flag of "free trade" will marshal on their side against every attempt to adopt a system of reciprocity. Partisans on this question will exult themselves in conflict with each other at the awful instigation of those master-slaves who work the wires that control the machinery of governments and trade just as dexterously here as they have done elsewhere throughout the world. Tariff and anti-tariff men will be the Corkinians and Fardowns of the field, engulfing each other scarce less for the amusement than for the instruction of the foreigners, who only control us through the agency of our own factions.

Is this picture—the very thought of such a result too humiliating? Turn to the faithful page of history and see by what process the prosperity and commerce of republic after republic has been sapped and trophies borne off to enrich and empower those whose eyes never wink in their aim—whose grasp never relinquishes their object. A people whose agents have now the assurance to come here and preach "free trade" at the corners of our streets, and at every board of exchange, and yet at home practice towards us and our trading partners the most aggravating restrictions and exactions?—Is this the policy which they have for some time past in maintaining a predominance on their side, and the hopes of North American prosperity will soon become as prostrate as is that of our South American neighbors from exactly similar causes. Through the potent lever of the money power, opening every avenue of trade—of steam power in its new and most formidable ramifications—and of naval power, as their auxiliaries—and factions as their agents, the dominion of the world is their aim, and the control of the resources of this union, through its mistaken policy of legislation, is but an incident in their grand scheme—a scene in the grand drama. Their present pursuit is to continue to lead our own agency to the accomplishment—closing our eyes to their ultimate views, we may be led on blindfold. The precipice is not far ahead in the path.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

MEETING OF THE AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY, &c. The twenty-fifth annual meeting of the American Colonization Society was held in the Fourth Presbyterian Church, in this city, on the 18th instant. The hon. H. Clay was present, and in disposition from attending the meeting, and the rev. Wm. Hawley, one of the vice presidents, presided.—The annual report was read, from which it appears that the cause of colonization is in a highly prosperous condition, both in this country, and in Africa.—The report, however, will soon be published and will speak for itself.

The rev. C. C. Farnside, of Philadelphia, at the request of the executive committee, delivered a highly interesting and impressive discourse on the life, character and death of the late Thomas Buchanan, governor of the commonwealth of Liberia, which will shortly be published, as the board of directors have requested a copy for this purpose.

The hon. H. CLAY was re-elected president of the society, and the vice presidents of the last year were re-elected, with the following changes, viz: major general Winfield Scott was appointed, vice major general Macdon, deceased; the rev. president of Wayland, of Rhode Island, vice N. Brown, esq. deceased; and the rev. A. A. Bond, D.D. of New York, and the rev. A. Alexander, D.D. of New Jersey, were added to the number.

After the society adjourned, the board of directors met and continued in session two days, during which time much business was transacted.

A very respectable number of delegates appeared from the different state societies, though several of the states could not be represented.

The executive committee laid on the table a letter from hon. S. Wilkeson, which they had received in December last, tendering his resignation as a member of the executive committee; whereupon it was

1. Resolved, That the resignation of judge Wilkeson be accepted.

2. Resolved, That the thanks of this board be presented to judge Wilkeson for his arduous services while general agent of this society and member of the executive committee, and especially for his devoted and gratuitous aid during a period of great difficulty and embarrassment, and that he be assured of their high respect and confidence, with the most ardent wishes for his future welfare.

*Our government last year derived about fourteen millions of dollars, duties from the whole amount of imports—say 121 millions in value, and our strict consumption—122 at that. Whereas upon a single article, viz. the 20th August, 1841, our duties received in exchange last year, for which they pay us, were seven millions of dollars—Europe exacted duties of the amount of thirty-five millions of dollars! This is their "reciprocity" and "free trade."

*See Gen. Tallmadge's letter in the last Register.

Committees were appointed on the fiscal transactions of the year, the general state of the colony, and other subjects, and made reports entirely satisfactory to the board.

On motion of Mr. Whittlesey, it was Resolved, That it is expedient to appoint for the present year, a corresponding secretary, whose duty shall be defined by the executive committee, and whose services shall be under their control.

Whereupon the rev. R. R. Gurley was unanimously elected to that office.

The following gentlemen were elected members of the executive committee for the ensuing year, viz: W. W. Seaton, M. St. C. Clarke, H. L. Ellsworth, R. S. Cox, H. Lindsy and R. R. Gurley.

There was no person appointed to fill the station occupied during the past year by Judge Wilkeson.

After the transaction of much business of a minor character, the board adjourned.

The greatest harmony prevailed during the meeting, and much good is expected to result from it. [Nat. Intd.]

Gen. Chambers, from the committee appointed to report business for the convention made the following report.

The committee of one from each delegation, have had under consideration various propositions, relating to the subject which has caused the assemblage of this convention, and respectfully report the following as the result of their deliberations—

That a memorial be presented to the legislature now in session, praying for the passage of a law embodying the following propositions.

Proposition 1st. A law to prevent all manumissions by last will. Also by deed, to take effect in futuro

Prop. 2d. To prevent manumissions except upon condition of instant transportation to some place out of the United States, and that, at the expense of the manumitter.

Prop. 3d. To prevent any free negro once leaving the state, ever to return to it unless he leaves as a servant of a white resident of the state and returns with him; and such resident shall first file a declaration in the county clerk's office of his intention to take such servant with him.

Prop. 4th. To prevent all free negroes from coming into the State, except as servants of persons travelling in or through the State.

Prop. 5th. To prevent the transportation of any free negro by rail road, steam boats, or other common carriers out of the state unless vouched for as free by some person known to the conductor of the rail road, or captain of the steam boat, and no rail road or steam boat company shall be liable for refusing to transport any free negro unless he be vouched for as above; and any person falsely vouching for the freedom of a slave to be liable to punishment. The company still to be liable for conveying away a slave as heretofore.

Prop. 6th. To offer a high reward, to be paid by the state, for the arrest and conviction of any person who aids a slave to run away, or induces, or attempts to induce a slave to renounce.

Prop. 7th. That the owner of a runaway slave shall pay a reward for the apprehension of such slave; to be graduated by the distance from home where he may be caught.

Prop. 8th. To re-enact the law for transportation of convicted free negroes for felony, passed 1825 ch. 93.

Prop. 9th. So much of the act of 1831 as allows a manumitted negro (with a certificate) to remain in the state, to be repealed.

Prop. 10th. No free negro to have in his possession a gun, pistol, sword or other offensive weapon.

Prop. 11th. That the judges of the county courts and city court of Baltimore, appoint bailiffs monthly to attend the arrival and departure of every rail road car, and steamboat or other public vehicle of transportation to carry these laws into effect, to compensate them by a portion of the penalty imposed.

Prop. 12th. That all free negroes shall be obliged to register themselves on or before the 15th July next, and every twelve months thereafter, in the office of the clerk of the county, and no certificate of freedom of an older date shall be good. And the clerk shall annually publish a list of those registered in some convenient newspaper and send a printed copy to the secretary of state.

Prop. 13th. That the state pay the expense of any case which may arise in any state where the state law may conflict with the act of congress of 1793 to test the constitutionality of such law.

Prop. 14th. To avoid all sales or gifts hereafter to be in debt of slaves to free negroes and mulattoes, the slave so sold or given, to be liable to be sold out of the state, and the master so selling, punishable by fine in the discretion of the court.

Prop. 15th. That an additional provision to the act of 1833 chapter 325 be made, prohibiting the reception of such papers, as are alluded to in that law, unless the person receiving the same forthwith return the same to the post office.

Prop. 16th. That every free negro shall give responsible security annually, for his or her good behaviour of such security be not given, such negro, so failing to be brought before such justice of the peace, by a constable or any other person in who shall cause him to be hired out, and out of his securing wages, pay the constable or person $10.

Prop. 17th. An act to render penal the omissions of sheriffs, magistrates and constables to enforce all laws respecting free negroes and slaves, and every constable before he proceeds to act shall take an oath well and faithfully to execute all the laws of the state.

Prop. 18th. Free negroes with real estate to have it added at their death and the proceeds to be distributed to their legal representatives and hereafter no free negro to be allowed to hold real estate or leasehold interest which shall have longer than a year to run.

Prop. 19th. That all free negroes who have been bound out within the last two years shall be free, whenever they shall determine to leave the state, by paying to the master, such sum as the orphans court shall adjudge, and that it shall be the duty of the orphans court of the several counties in the state and city of Baltimore, from and after the 1st January 1844, to bind out at the age of 8 years, the children of all free negroes then in the state, to serve until they arrive at the age of 21 for males, and 18 for females. The master shall give security to be approved by the orphans court, to pay to the child when it arrives at the respective ages of 21 and 18 the sum of $75 for males, $25 for females, provided the said child shall leave the state; or if previous to the child's arriving at the age of 21 or 18 as the case may be, it shall consent to leave the state, or its parent shall remove out of the state then the master shall give up such child and if it has served more than 8 years the master shall pay to the child or its parent such sum as the orphans court shall determine.

Prop. 20th. That no meeting of negroes for any purpose shall be permitted after sunset, and all laws inconsistent with [this] provision to be repealed.

Prop. 21st. That if any free negro who may have a license from any christian denomination, either to preach or exhort, shall hold or attend any meeting prohibited by law, he shall for the first offence be subject to a fine and imprisonment, and for the second offence be sold out of the state.

Prop. 22nd. Any retail dealer who shall sell or give to any negro, slave or free, or the agent of any such negro, any spirituous liquor or wine, or shall otherwise directly or indirectly furnish intoxicating drink to or for a negro, to be liable to a fine of $100, one half to be paid to the informer.

On motion of Gen. Chambers,

Which was rejected.

Gen. Chambers moved to insert after the word "law," the words "to take effect after the 1st of January 1844;"

Determined in the negative.

Mr. Johnson offered the following substitute:

That no negro shall be manumitted unless by deed, to operate in presenti and upon condition that the slave, or slaves, so manumitted be sent beyond the limits of this state at the expense of the manumitter, and that no slave be manumitted by last will and testament, unless the slave or slaves so manumitted be sent beyond the limits of the state, within twelve months from the death of the testator at the charge of his estate; and in neither case shall the manumission take effect unless the same may be done without prejudice to the rights of creditors.

Determined in the negative.

The 1st proposition was then adopted.

Mr. Spence offered the following proposition:

To repeal the provisions of the act of 1827 ch. 15, so far as inconsistent with this provision.

Any person or persons who shall persuade or entice, aid or assist, a slave to runaway from his master, owner or employer, and any person or persons who shall harbor or conceal a slave or slaves knowing him or them to be runaways, and the fact of his or their being on the premises owned, rented or occupied by a free negro or negroes, shall be prima facie evidence of such knowledge, shall be liable to be indicted and upon conviction, shall, if white, undergo a confinement in the penitentiary for a period not less than years, and if such person shall be a free negro and convicted of this offence he shall be sold out of the state, and the whole of the proceeds of such sale to go to the informer, who shall be a competent witness in an action against such negro or negroes, and if such negro be a slave for life or a term of years, he shall upon conviction be sold out of the state, and his full value be paid to the owner.

Which was adopted;

Mr. Hanson offered the following proposition:

That each and every hawker and pedlar shall be made to pay at the rate of the sum of two hundred dollars a year for a license to trade as such.

Which was adopted;

Mr. Spence offered the following proposition:

To repeal that part of the 2d. section of the act of 1833 chapter 224, entitled "an act relating to persons of color who are to be free after a term of years" which says "that the party applying for such grant has distinctly and particularly notified such servants of the existence and effect of this law, and that this information has failed to correct his or her habits before they proceed to issue any such grant or authority."

Which was adopted;

Gen. Chambers offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five members of the convention be appointed by the chair, to prepare the memorial to the legislature which is proposed in the foregoing proposition.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

—In the yeas on page 348, 3d column, Mr. Mangum's name was omitted. With his name, the yeas stood as correctly reported 21 to nays 20.

JANUARY 25. Numerous petitions were presented and referred, in favor of the bankrupt law, and a few against it.

Mr. Pierce submitted a resolution calling upon the secretary of the treasury for full information in respect to the commission of investigation into the affairs of the New York custom house.

On motion of Mr. Berrien, the chairman of the judiciary committee, the senate proceeded in committee of the whole to consider the bill from the house repealing the bankrupt law.

The chairman stated his views in full upon the bill, and the proposed question of repeal. He regarded the action of the senate as presenting a spectacle at this time over which the enemies of free institutions might rejoice, showing as they did the instability of American legislation. He felt called upon to resist the question of repeal for many reasons, official as well as personal. In the first place he was opposed to the repeal, as wrong in itself. In the second place he had been solicited by unfortunate men to speak a word in defence of the bankrupt law. Finally, a majority of the members of the Georgia legislature had expressed themselves in opposition to a bankrupt law. As to the bill of the extra session, he regarded it as adequate to the public wants. If it was not, there had been no evidence of the fact since its passage, and experience founded upon the practices of the law would afford the best evidence of its inefficiency. He, therefore, trusted that the law would be enforced, and that time might be had to test its virtues and its errors. Mr. B. next proceeded to consider in detail the complaints against the bill before the senate.

The law of 1800, the English bankrupt system, and all the laws in relation to this subject were minutely examined. The constitutional power of congress under this law was fully considered, and it was argued that the grant of power was as full and ample as any one could desire. It was a grant of plenary power over the whole residue of the subject. In the operations of the law he thought the constitutional power would be admitted. Mr. B. referred to the opinions of the supreme court to sustain the constitutionality of the law. More than this, it was said that a good reason was found for action upon this question from the fact that the action we were called upon to make was not only in harmony with law of the land, but in harmony with the acts of beneficence.

At three o'clock he gave way to a motion that the senate proceed to executive business, after the transaction of which, the senate adjourned.

JANUARY 26. Mr. Smith, of Indiana, presented a petition from citizens of Harrison county of that state praying a repeal of the bankrupt law and expressed his views briefly by his own action should not comply with their wishes. He had given his views at the former session and did not intend to take part in the present debate. He had looked for an expression of the opinion of the legislature of his state, but as he had received no instructions he was determined, if he should err, to err on the side of humanity.

Other petitions for or against repeal were presented and all referred to the judiciary committee.

Mr. Clay presented the resolutions of the state of Kentucky, against the repudiation of state debts.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill from the house for the repeal of the bankrupt law, and Mr. Berrien concluded his remarks against its repeal.

Mr. Smith, of Connecticut, next addressed the senate and believed that seven-eighths of the people of his state were opposed to the bankrupt law. They had originally opposed giving the power to congress, nor did he now believe it to be constitutional.

In conclusion he said that he might have misunderstood the views of his constituents in opposing the law, but he believed he did not.

Mr. Huntington, of Connecticut, had no evidence that a majority of the people of his state were opposed to the bankrupt law. A new legislature had been chosen since he had given his vote in favor of the bill, and they had not, although they had discussed several national measures, spoken upon this subject. He should vote for this benevolent, wise and humane law.

Mr. Bayard arose and was about to express his reasons of opposition, when on his motion, the senate adjourned.

JANUARY 27. Many petitions in relation to the bankrupt law were presented against repeal or postponement.

Mr. Young, of Illinois, in presenting one from citizens of New York, against its repeal, expressed his views in few words upon the bill. He considered the law as a temptation to dishonesty inasmuch as a man who had $300 and owed $1,000 would pay a thousand by surrendering the three hundred. It was not true as the senator from Georgia, (Mr. Berrien had contended), that we did not have a lien upon the hopes and expectations of the people. Such a doctrine would destroy the basis of legislation, general spending of debt. In his state the bankrupt law would produce more evil than good and he should therefore vote for repeal.

Mr. Tallmadge said that the senator from Illinois has stated that, under the act, the bankrupt is entitled to the sum of three hundred dollars out of his effects, after he has got his discharge. And he has depicted to us the enormous injustice which might be practised in the new states. He says the bankrupt might owe one thousand dollars, and from his indebtedness be discharged by the bankrupt law; and then, with the three hundred dollars allowed him out of his effects, he could purchase a quarter section of land, and have enough over to build his log cabin, purchase his team and commence the world again, at the expense of his creditors, a respectable farmer. If this were all true, there would be some foundation for the senator's objection. But it is altogether a mistake. The three hundred dollars allowed by the law is merely for the necessities of the bankrupt's family, his wife and his children. It can, in no case, be applied to the discharge of his debts. It is for the use of the assignee, under the supervision of the court, to allow that sum or less, as he shall deem proper.

The proviso of the third section, will, at once, put this matter at rest.

From this proviso, it will be seen that my friend from Illinois has entirely misapprehended the act in relation of the three hundred dollars to the bankrupt; and, with the explanation which I have given, his objections, of course, fall to the ground.

The senator from Illinois also encounters another difficulty, namely: that there is no particular amount of indebtedness required to entitle the bankrupt to take the benefit of the act. He is aware of the objection which would be raised if a particular amount were required; that it would be said the act was for the benefit of the poor man, and that the poor man would be excluded. Now, Mr. President, when the original bankrupt bill was reported by the committee, it required that one should be indebted to the amount of five hundred dollars in order to be entitled to the benefit of it. I moved to amend it so that one should be indebted to any amount whatever may be his indebtedness, be it great or small; my amendment was adopted, and the door is now open to the small as well as the large debtor. There is no evil in this; none will apply unless they feel their condition hopeless, and that they can incur the expense of conforming to its provisions. The door is thus open to all, whether their indebtedness be little or great.

The senator from Illinois also thinks the operation of this law would be a kind of repudiation of debts. Sir, there is no sort of analogy between the indebtedness of individuals and of states. The wealth or means of a state does not consist merely of her public property—that is a mere item—but it consists in the wealth and means of her citizens; in their ability to contribute to the public burdens; in their ability to aid, by their labor, to the productive industry of the state; and, therefore, in the ability of the state to meet her engagements. This is what constitutes a state. She cannot rely on the mere amount of public property to meet her engagements. She must rely on the means, on the brawn and muscle and sinews of her citizens. She must strike off the shackles which bind the limbs of men, whom God designed to be free men. She must put them in a condition to support themselves, their wives and children, instead of being a mere open friend, ready to do the bidding of the community. To decide the question of repud as speedily as possible, will induce me to forego any further remarks at this time.

Mr. Young said he did not disagree with his friend in regard to causes of hopeless insolvency. He would extend relief to such. He would not however give relief to those who having some little property were to be discharged for an inconsiderable debt.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law, and Mr. Bayard arose and said that there was an extravagant hyperbole in estimating the number of bankrupts at 500,000. By the last census there were 900,000 engaged in commerce, manufactures and trade. There might not be 900 persons who would seek the benefits of the law. Mr. B. next discussed the constitutional question. His great objection to the law was its unconstitutionality.

Mr. Chaote, of Massachusetts, said that three reasons he would state for sustaining the retrospective part of the law. Massachusetts a creditor state, was in favor of the law. The legislature had passed resolutions in its favor. There were due to that state at this time $15,000,000 in the southwest. It was not a romantic notion of the rights of the creditor, but a fact that actuated Massachusetts in its favor. The creditor can now get nothing, and the property surrendered would not be lost in being surrendered. The debtors by being once free would become the customers of his state. And also it was a moral right to pass such a law. In Boston night after night the eloquent appeals that this bill might remain the law rose and tell like the billows of the

Mr. Benton commenced his remarks in opposition to the law again, but yielded to a motion by Mr. Sevier, and the senate adjourned.

JANUARY 25.—Mr. Graham presented a bill making an appropriation to reopen Roanoke inlet. The waters of Albemarle sound, now had their outlet to Pamlico sound and the Ocracoke inlet to the ocean, and vessels were compelled to perform a voyage of 120 miles in going south and returning by Cape Hatteras to the north, with expense of lightage over the shallows, and be exposed to the dangers of the cape. The commerce of that section amounted annually to $3,000,000 and employed 100,000 tons of shipping. The bill contemplates reopening the inlet 60 miles north of Cape Hatteras, the passage through being 3 mile in length, and was referred to the committee on commerce.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law and Mr. Benton concluded his remarks for its repeal. The question was then called for, and the yeas and nays being ordered the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, Graham, King, Linn, McRoberts, Morehead, Pease, Prentiss, Rives, Sever, Smith, of Connecticut, Surgeon, Tappan, Woodbury, Wright, Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Barrien, Choate, Clay, Clayton, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, M'Nair, Merrick, Miller, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Williams, Woodbridge—23.

[Before the vote was announced, Mr. Mangum said he desired to say that his friend Col. Preston was absent by understanding, with a senator from Louisiana, (Mr. Mouton), opposed to the repeal, and who had left the senate upon special business, as was known to the senate. The two senators had paired off.]

And the senate adjourned to Monday.
JANUARY 31. Mr. Simmons announced the death of his colleague the hon. Nathan Fellows Dixon, of Rhode Island, and delivered an eulogy on his character and services.

Mr. Woodbridge then arose and offered resolutions of the usual respect, to wear crape and attend his funeral, and that the senate do now adjourn, whereupon the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

When the house adjourned on Monday, Mr. Chapman, of Alabama, said in prefacing a motion made himself also to adjourn that we had now arrived at the last point; it was a grave question, and deserved the solemn and deliberate consideration of the members. He therefore moved that the house adjourn, &c.

TUESDAY, JAN. 25. Mr. Fillmore from the committee on ways and means reported bills making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government for 1842, with a report for the army and military academy for 1842; for the navy for 1842; for the expenses of the Indian department for 1842; and also for pensions for 1842, which were all referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union. He also moved resolutions which were agreed to, discharging the committee from the further consideration of a bill for the relief of the heirs of the late John A. Bland, and referring the same to the committee on military affairs.

The house took up, on motion of Mr. Fillmore, the treasury note bill and the amendments made thereto by the senate, but Mr. Cooper, of Pennsylvania, having moved to lay them on the table, the vote was yeas 92, nays 111, and the question recurring on the amendments of the senate, Mr. Spring arose and commenced same remarks, when he was cut off by the expiration of the time for which the unfinished business of yesterday had been postponed.

The unfinished business of yesterday was the resolution offered by Mr. Gilmer in censure of Mr.

Adams, which Mr. J. C. Clark had moved to lay on the table. Mr. Clark's motion was negatived by yeas 94, nays 112. (Mr. Adams voting in the negative.)

Mr. Marshall then arose and submitted resolutions which he desired Mr. Gilmer to accept as a substitute for his motion, and as follows:

Whereas, the federal constitution is a permanent form of government, and of perpetual obligation until altered or modified in the mode pointed out in that instrument; and whereas, the members of the said instrument, by their character and powers from the same, are sworn to support it; and the dissolution of the union necessarily implies the destruction of that instrument, the overthrow of the federal government, the annihilation of the national existence; a proposition, therefore, to the representatives of the people to dissolve the organic laws framed by their constituents, and to supplant which they are sworn to support, is a proposition, which no man can enter into the execution of the political powers created by it and entrusted to them, is a high breach of privilege, a contempt offered to this house, a direct provocation to the people, and a violation of the laws against perjury, and involving necessarily in its execution and its consequences the destruction of our country and the

Resolved, therefore, That the hon John Quincy Adams, member from Massachusetts, in presenting for the consideration of the house of representatives of the United States a resolution praying for the dissolution of the union has offered the dearest and holiest thing to the house of which he is a member, an insult to the people of the U. States of which that house is the legislative organ, and will, if this outrage be permitted to pass unrebuked and unpunished, have disgraced his country, through their representatives, in the eyes of the whole world.

Resolved further, That the aforesaid John C. Adams, for his insult, the first of the kind ever offered to the government, and for the wound which he has permitted to be aimed, through his instrumentality, at the constitution of the United States, and the peace and security and liberty of the people of the States, might well be held to merit expulsion from the national councils, and the house deem it an act of grace and mercy when they only inflict upon him their severest censure for conduct so utterly unworthy of his high position, and they do hereby do for the maintenance of their own purity and dignity; for the rest, they turn him over to his own conscience and the indignation of all true American citizens.

Mr. M. then addressed the house in their support. He disavowed any personal feelings against Mr. Adams and any sectional feelings against that portion of the union which he represented. Their family names had been in years gone by connected together in the country's history. Mr. M. had in his youth advocated his election to the presidency and throughout his administration had supported him. He had always been courteous towards him and had himself made the motion to give the gentleman the floor to vindicate himself from the charges made against him.

But when a proposition so monstrous as this was brought forward, and at such a time of confusion and difficulties, coupled with a motion of reference to a committee to take the matter into consideration, he was struck with horror; he would not have believed it possible. There might be men out of the house wild and reckless enough to invite this government to dissolution, perjury, treason, moral treason at least; but that there was a man on this floor who would have assumed the responsibility, he had not thought. He had heard whispers of the kind on the street but had rejected them with incredulity. To press this thing by without notice on the part of congress he thought would be sacrilege. This proposition coming from the quarter it did, assumed a political importance and consequence. He, through whom the proposition is made to pull down the temple, was once the high priest ministering at the altar. His name had gone abroad with that of the union. He deprecated sectional distinctions. The people of the north were bound as strongly to maintain the perpetuity of this union as those of the south. Would they say that this congress should take measures of consideration of a matter which those who hate their country its union and its peace have started. The instructions coupled with this proposition, that the committee report against the prayer of the petitioners did not affect the question, except to make it worse. Was such a monstrous proposition to become matter of legislative consideration? If presented, the precedent, so far as it went, amounted to this, that in the judgment of the mover the dissolution of this union was a fair subject of legislation—a debatable question, to be looked upon by the eye of a legislator as a thing within the scope of his power. That was the precedent which was to be established upon this journal, and which he would meet at once with the severest possible rebuke within the power of this house. Had it been his own father who had moved this proposition, he should have pursued precisely the same course towards him which he had done here.

He hoped that the action of this house on this subject might go abroad to the nation and to the world; and whatever else of misery or of mischief might hereafter in coming years ensue, that at least this congress would for one moment, permit any member of this body to make himself the vehicle by which a proposition so monstrous was to be laid before this body, which could not be sustained without doing to themselves and incipient ruin to all who were to come after them.

Oh what a source from whence to present a proposition for a dissolution of the union! Massachusetts, of all lands on which Heaven's sun sheds its bright radiance—Massachusetts to come forward to lay before the man numbering and signing his name, a proposition to make for the first time a proposition to dissolve the union! If she has any shame left it be aroused, and let the severest censure of this house fall upon him through whom this proposition has been brought forward.

Mr. M. having concluded—

The speaker informed the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) that the position which he held authorized him to occupy the floor at this time.

Mr. Adams arose slowly and said that he had little to say at the present time. The gentleman from Ky. (Mr. M.) had said that he had no personal hostility against him but was grieved that the instructions of his constituents had been poured on him (Mr. A.) the vials of the wrath of this nation as having committed the greatest crime of which man is capable. The gentleman had thought, he (Mr. A.) supposed, that he was making a great deal of political capital. He was surprised at the charges the gentleman had brought against him, and he had not been prepared to meet them. The constitution defined what treason was, and it was not for him (Mr. M.) or his party mind to confound that which he had done with treason. He here desired the clerk to read the first paragraph of the Declaration of Independence (which was accordingly read). If there was a principle to be laid on this earth, established by what had just been read it was the right of the people to alter change or destroy their government whenever it became oppressive to them. If the people had not the power of coming here and undertaking a process of this kind to state their grievances, there could be no such right existing. As for himself, the instructions which he had come with his motion for reference, refute any slanderous imputations against his attachment to the union and its constitution. Whatever gentlemen might think of the petitioners they were not the only men to whom the opinions expressed in their petition were familiar. He wished to meet them, to reason with them, and convince them that they would not come to adopt this measure; but that there were privileges and resources that could be resorted to without that last, the right to which is so clearly established in the Declaration of Independence. These petitioners complained of the oppressions of the last eight or ten years. Mr. A. regretted that he (Mr. M.) was not one of those who would not to confirm and repeat the oppression. He did not allude alone to his great activity and instrumentality in obtaining the repeal of the bankrupt law. When the time should come for him to answer this resolution, if the house should think proper to act upon it, he would enter at large into the grievances which might be justly complained of, among them the denial of the right of petition.

The gentleman, in one of his fits of candor, not long ago, had said that he was sensible that the course pursued on this subject was a wrong one, and in conversation with him (Mr. A.) had said that he would vote for the repeal of these petitions, and yet he would whenever he was called on against their reception.

Mr. Marshall. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts say that I declared that I was in favor of receiving these petitions?

Mr. Adams. Yes; you did. Not this petition, but former petitions. He contended that the gentleman himself, by saying this, had received the petitions, or was at least in the reception of these petitions, and admitted that it was an oppression on the part of that portion of the union to refuse to receive their petitions. And when he (Mr. A.) came to that in the defence which he should make, if called on, he should consider other matters of oppression which he had acted on, he had acted on and state before this house how that portion of the country whence that gentleman came, was endeavoring to destroy the right of habeas corpus and of trial by jury, and all the rights in which the liberties of this country consist.

He would show how, in that portion of the country, that was a systematic attempt even to carry it to the dissolution of the union, now carrying on between different states. He would look into the controversy between Virginia and N. York, between Georgia and New York, and between Georgia and Maine, in order to prove the constant system and purpose to destroy all the principles of civil liberty among the free states; and by power to force the detected principles of slavery on the free states of this union. He would show it by documents and by reference to arguments which had been used in such a manner as to give no man a house in which to stand the truth of it. He had seen, and he was now seeing, that among those measures so constantly and so perseveringly pursued, was the project of smuggling this country into a war with Great Britain for the purpose of protecting the slave trade, African and American. He had seen that that was the object of this house, and he was now seeing that this petition was to give the alarm to the people of that portion of the country whence he came. It was time for them to take the alarm, or they would find themselves smuggled into a war for the protection of the slave trade, and that the most absurd and false principles of the house of commons, as they were called by our minister in England, all for the purpose of smuggling this country into a war with that government under pretence of defence against her aggressions. He would show all this in the utmost detail if he was called on to defend himself against this charge.

It was to be sure, a matter of some importance to him what the decision of the house might be upon this subject at this time. But it was of infinitely more importance to the portion of the country whence he came to know the conspiracy which is existing, in order to force the system of slavery upon them. It was a state of things which he was sure that it would be otherwise remedied, he said that the course provided in the declaration of independence was the course it was proper that the people of that portion of the country should take, and which they were bound to as a duty. If the right of habeas corpus and the trial by jury were to be suppressed, and abolished, in the name of society, in the name of northern democracy, it was time for the people of this union to see if they could not throw it off, and to present petitions like this.

He said his opinion was that the time for this measure had not yet arrived. If the petition was received, and the committee reported why his prayer should not be granted, he proposed that he would be satisfied with it, and that the vast portion of the free people of this union, who are very near agreeing with these petitioners, would be propitiated, and would see that there are other remedies to be pursued; and among them, first and foremost, was the restoration of the right of petition, which had been suppressed, in the last seven years, in which he had been struggling to restore for that length of time.

They had made a law establishing a home squadron. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. J. G. Floyd), a few days ago, had said it was a great humbug. He (Mr. A.) now believed it was. But he must confess, when the bill came to this house, in his mind he had favored it very much, thinking it ought to sustain the honor of the country. He had read the report of the secretary of the navy, and seen what was the object of this home squadron—that it was for furnishing a convoy for slave trading vessels!

What was the essence of the objections of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) against a petition of this sort? What was the reason he had taken such tremendous fire at the presentation of such a petition? Not at its being contained in the smallest degree by him, (Mr. A.) but the mere fact of the presentation of the petition of others who complain of oppression. Turn it to high treason, and to-morrow they would have a proposition to alter the Constitution, to make a change in the mode of electing, in the other end of the capitol to alter the tenure of the executive power; that was a dissolution of the union, a change of the tenure of the powers of the different departments of this government; and by it they totally dissolve this government. They could not have another if they dissolved this, and he, as he said, was not a man who was not attached to this government, to which the gentleman was so much attached, as any thing they could do in reference to the prayer of this petition. While in one part of this house there was a regular formal proposition made by a predecessor of that gentleman for an alteration in the constitution of the house, (Mr. A.) in the other part of the house, in his belief, to be equivalent to a dissolution of the union; for, in its consequences, he had no sort of doubt it would be so. All this was very fair and proper. The gentleman had made a very eloquent speech, and was answered; but who ever thought of his being charged with high treason, and with being the author of a right which cannot be taken from the people of the United States, or any individual, to petition this house for peaceable measures for the dissolution of this union, as well as any thing else; and this being the case, he did not hold that the house had a right to suppress that right on the part of the petitioners. Still less to suppress the right of free reason. If so, the next thing they would be to declare that it was high treason to ask for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or for the prohibition of this infamous slave trade. And with reference to the bankruptcy law, which the gentleman took a most special interest, the bill for the repeal of which had been pressed through this house in violation of every form and right of freedom of speech; if there had come a thousand petitions against its repeal, the gentleman would make it high treason to present them. He would not do worse than he had done—that was to prevent the presentation of petitions when they were here. He (Mr. A.) knew that the people of the free states had been and were under great grievances and oppressions, from the acts of this house, for the last seven years, and especially in reference to the right of petition. When gentlemen looked at the bankruptcy law, and at the resolution, consider that Kentucky had had ten days for the presentation of petitions, and the bill had been carried through in accordance with their prayers, while the other portions of the union were deprived of the right of presenting petitions at all. If they had not violated the right of petition they would never have seen this petition, and they would never have seen that tyranny and oppression which had carried the people far beyond the bounds of reason for the remedy.

He was not acquainted with the persons who had signed the petition; they did not belong to his congressional district, but to a portion of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, as pure in virtue as any in this nation; and he was not prepared to suppose, surely not that he should be charged with high treason, but in the expectation of the feeling which any unusual petition produced in this house under this gag rule, by which the house constructively suppressed any petition they thought proper—aware that there would be opposition, he had taken the precaution to request the gentleman from that district to ascertain from the vicinity of the place whence the petition came, whether there were such persons there, what their character was, and how far he might depend upon it that it was a genuine petition proceeding from a respectable source. His colleague had done it, and ascertained that the petitioners were respectable and respectable persons ought to be heard and received. They were not, perhaps, of that pure aristocratic blood which the gentleman from Kentucky once boasted that he came from, but men quite as good as any of that blood of which the gentleman was so proud.

He would apologize to the house for having said even so much. He could not possibly suppose that this house would entertain the proposition at all; but if they did, he should ask an opportunity—

Mr. Cooper said. If he understood the resolution aright, the adoption of it was to be the end of the matter; and any defence which the gentleman might propose to make must be previous to the adoption.

The speaker stated to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) that the question before the house would be on the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall).

Mr. Adams said if it was the intention of this house now at once—[cries of "now, now"]—to proceed to the decision of this resolution, he must submit. Was it ever known that, to a man on whom charges of this kind were started of a sudden and totally unexpected, no time was to be allowed for his defence.—If the ordinary course of business in this house—the printing of the resolution and fixing the time for its consideration—was to be done, and then the house to make the motion and then water to decide this resolution, he must submit. He was in the power of the house.

The speaker said if the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) desired further time, he himself, or a friend for him, could of right submit a motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. Everett would merely state that the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky presented probably one of the most important questions that had ever been offered to the consideration of the house. He would say that if the doctrine of the resolution was carried out, it would produce a revolution by force in this country—"peaceably if they can, forcibly if they must"—not that the intention of dissolving this union prevailed in the eastern states in any greater degree than in other portions of the union. But if no peaceable mode could avail for the redress of grievances, it should become intolerable, then it must be done by force.

Did the gentleman contend that, under the provisions of the constitution, if every section of the country should be satisfied that government had failed to accomplish its objects, there was no mode of producing this peaceably, but that it must be done by a revolution and dissolution and then was the doctrine of resolution. The constitution contemplated any change, any alteration, from the smallest to the greatest principles of this government; and not only this, but provided for the future government, whenever the crisis is present, for in the different conditions of the union, should be found next bearing. He hoped we should have no forcible revolution; if there ever should be a cause for a dissolution of the union, the remedy would be found in the provision of the constitution, and would be peaceable.

It would be perfectly competent to the states to add an amendment to the constitution, which would change it in every feature. The people were omnipotent as to the effect of the change. He looked on the resolution with alarm. It was an initiatory step to consequences which he hardly dared to contemplate.

But he rose, in consequence of the importance of the question to the country, and of the position in which the gentleman from Massachusetts was placed, to move that the resolution be printed, and the postponement of this subject to some day that the house should choose. He thought, when matters were proceeding to this point, they should go deliberately to work, and not act in precipitation. He would submit the motion that the substitute be printed, and its further consideration be postponed until Tuesday next.

Mr. Wise. I rise not to utter one word upon the question. I would not raise my voice in this hall on a question like this, and I will not say that I will raise my voice from the tomb may be heard. I ask that the Farewell Address of Washington may be read here. I have marked the passages I wish the clerk to read.

[Here the book was sent to the clerk's table, and various passages, relating to the necessity of resisting the first attempt toward dissolving the union, and warning his countrymen of the danger of foreign influence, were read.]

Some of them, at Mr. W.'s desire, were read twice. At the close of one of them the voice of Mr. Adams was heard, exclaiming, "that should have been thought of when the gag was put on."]

The clerk having apparently gone through—
Mr. Wise said he had had these portions, of that venerable document read and recited, it is said, that had been present here, and witnessed the recent scenes in this hall, could not have pictured them better from the life than he had prophesied them in this address. He had marked the rise of the spirit of division from its very dawn, and had pointed to its cause, its fearful cause, which was the effect of foreign influence.—"The influence of the work upon the mind," was the question throughout this nation. Some were moving in the general cause from religious feelings—feelings of religious fanaticism—unconscious, blindly unconscious, of the consequences—the dreadful, the inevitable consequences of the course they were pursuing.

Mr. Wise resumed and said he would not persist on this subject, and for the reasons he was stating when interrupted. Persons were operated on in their adherence to abolitionism from various motives. Religion and sincere conviction persuaded some, political motives others. The latter that those who were governed by political motives, he believed, designed to produce that effect towards which their course tended. From the earliest day of the republic there existed two great parties distinguished as the English party and the French party, the Jacobin and the Tory. Some had taken part even from the infancy of the nation. Some were better than the gentleman from Massachusetts. This antipathy to the slaveholding portion of this union, this inborn hatred to the democratic party, wherever it might be located, had grown up with that English or Tory party which had denounced Thomas Jefferson as "the red waistcoat," representative of the country party, and had been in secret alliance with France. The nation had evidence of the hatred of this English party to Mr. Jefferson, and its antipathy to slaveholders, in doggerel rhymes aimed at his domestic relations. No one better knew to what poetry he alluded than the gentleman from Massachusetts, the gentleman who it was that wrote those scandalous lines on the domestic life of one of the purest patriots of the revolution. He could tell who it was that could turn and forsake the friends of his father, in the fury of his apostate zeal, could prey upon the dead like the vampire.

Mr. Everett again interposed, and called Mr. Wise to order for irrelevancy.

Mr. Adams. I hope he will be permitted to go on. Mr. Wise resumed. He said that after writing doggerel rhymes on Mr. Jefferson—after deserting the early friends of his father, and trampling on the dead of his father—after going for the domestic crumbs, and then setting out for Ghent—

Mr. Everett here inquired of the chair whether a personal attack on an accused party could possibly be in order on a motion either to print or postpone?

Mr. Wise. I have mentioned no names. I spoke generally of the English party and its adherents; but, if he can fit anybody, let him wear it.

The speaker replied that it was not for the chair to know that the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia were intended as a personal attack; he would be out of order and wholly inconsiderate in the speaker to say that the gentleman alluded to any particular member of the house; he was understood to be speaking about some political party in the country. If his remarks became personal, the chair would call him to order.

Mr. Wise resumed, and said that if, after all his earnest and repeated attempts to arrest the debate, gentlemen would insist on debating this subject—

"Come on, Macduff,
And damn'd be he who first cries, hold, enough!"

He was not, to be sure, prepared in body, for he had a severe cold in his lungs and head; but he was at all times politically, mentally, and morally prepared to meet the occasion. He again said, that after treading on the graves of members of the old English party, the early friends of his father, and then going to Ghent and incorporating in our treaty with England a provision for the payment for slaves, which had stood the severest test of the British government, and then turning to assassinate the murderers, like those on board the Crooke, but for runaway, who had forsaken their masters' plantations, and gone on board the British fleet—that same authority now came forward and told this house that we could not consent to go with England for the support and maintenance of slavery, and this under flagrant circumstances of violence done to the national flag in behalf of mutineers and murderers!

Mr. W. here said something, not more than half heard, about the gentleman's again turning, because the democracy of the south would not acknowledge (here his voice was quite lost in the babel of sounds that filled the hall.)

Mr. W. when again heard, was observing that there were certain great points of history to which might be traced all that occurred of late in reference to this subject. If we went back to 1801, we should find the old English party defeated and prostrated by an old Dominion slaveholder. And if we went down to 1828, we found the same party vanquished again by a Tennessee slaveholder. It was these successive defeats which had enabled certain leaders to array the elements of opposition at home against the democracy both of the south and the north, for not only had the southern democrats been denounced as enemies to freedom and to the right of petition, but even the delegations of New Hampshire and Maine had been reviled as gag politicians because they considered the provisions of the constitution as the only true foundation of our liberties. Whatever might have been the change which denounce the signal declaration of independence there had certainly been a revival of the old English feelings in a certain quarter after the defeat of 1828. Father and son had successively been prostrated by the democracy of the north and the south, and that was the reason why the union of southern democrats with the northern democrats was so warmly welcomed by our English American politicians.

Not a democratic fall to understand—but he, would not put it on mere party ground—he would say let no American citizen fail to see through the hypocrisy of these self-styled philanthropists. Let them not fail to notice the consequences of the course they pursued. The black army of sixty thousand men was raised in Jamaica, and every O'Connell was issuing his mandates to every Irishman in the United States (and Mr. W. esteemed the Irishmen and did not wish to see them misled) to join the abolition English American party, and strengthen it by their votes, our country had succeeded to it by an ex-president of the United States, a proposition to dissolve the union. Yes, while the English abolitionists were moving on Jamaica, and contemplating to make their next demonstration on Cuba—while they were establishing lines of a commercial marine connecting England and West India with this country, and thus opening the way for a military marine to follow, which at the first sound of the tocsin would pour in armies of trained free blacks upon the whole south, this proposition to dissolve the union was simultaneously brought forward.

There was another very singular contrast in the events of the present hour which he could not fail to notice. At the same time that England was maintaining the most odious and abominable system of slavery that was to be found on the face of the globe, and using it as an instrument in the production and culture of a deadly vegetable poison, to be in-posed by force on a people so unwelcome and so timid in their national character that they had taken the pains to build an immense wall to keep themselves aloof from other nations; and while the British marine were cruising on an expedition for this very end, her own party in this country were pressing in this hall that America could never go to war with England for the sake of maintaining the tenure of slave property.

Mr. W. said he wished to be distinctly understood. He spoke of this body of men which was called the old federal party. His own father (he was understood to say) had supported the principles of that party, and every relation he had in the world, living and dead, had been old-fashioned Virginia federalists. Nor should they ever want an advocate where he was present. But there had been members of all parties who united together and took sides with a foreign government against their own country. This faction had been composed of men who had never felt any sincere attachment to free institutions, but had ever been disposed on the contrary to array themselves and wield their influence in opposition to them. This was what he meant by the old federal party. He never had given that name to the English party, as it had once existed in this country. He mentioned this in justice to himself, and to prevent misunderstanding. To return, then, he again inquired how were the gross and glaring inconsistencies which were waged by England—a far more cruel and expressly on slavery of the severest kind—did not tolerate a war against England in behalf of the rights of the slave-holders? And how happened it that men who held these sentiments should be found bringing forward toy plans for upturning this government. Mr. W. here said he held in his hand a paper printed at Nassau, New Providence, to which he made some reference, not understood by the reporter, and then proceeded to read long extracts from another document entitled Frazier's Magazine; the writer of which maintained that, however it might be doubted how far it was lawful to enter into a crusade against the slaveholders, the purposes of such a crusade, there could be no doubt as to the morality of making a war with such a nation, commenced on other grounds, to be subservient to the object of setting free three millions of oppressed human beings, in which reference was also had to the black military force which was being organized by the government of our southern states, through whose agency a war with us might be brought to a speedy close, and a dissolution of the union immediately effected. A course like this the writer insisted to be dictated by philanthropy. Mark it, cried Mr. W. old and young, philanthropy is involved in behalf of an object like this, and the gentleman from Massachusetts says yes to it.

Mr. Adams. Yes, no doubt.]

The gentleman had said more. He had declared that, in case of an insurrection of the slaves against their masters, if the power of the north should be invoked under the constitution to aid in suppressing such a war, the effect might be emancipation.

Mr. Adams. Yes, sir.]

The gentleman had gone yet further, and had maintained that if the 21st rule should be continued in force this session, three-fourths of the states of the union would be ipso facto absolved from their allegiance to the constitution.

Mr. Adams here interposed to explain. He had not said that such would be the case, but that the rule would be such, and the effect might be emancipation. The policy were persevered in, and the rule were permitted to remain for the future as a settled rule of this house, that then those states would be absolved from their allegiance to this government.

Mr. W. resumed. The house had persevered in it, and here was the proposition of the gentleman to dissolve the union, and the corresponding question, whether the dissolution would follow, ipso facto, should the 21st rule continue. Let the world judge of such a course.

Mr. Adams. Yes, let the world judge.]

Why was it that the gentleman told the house that in moving the reference of the memorial he had at the same time moved instructions to the committee to come to a resolution that it was not expedient at this time to read the prayer of the memorial be complied with? Yes, he had moved such instructions, and what did they amount to? No more than this: that it was not expedient to dissolve the union just at this time—not yet—not now. For the present, the process of agitation had not gone on quite long enough.

the water. In connexion with this subject, the late governor had, with true wisdom and philosophy, discussed the proposal of abolition made by them to the people of the United States, and had very clearly and convincingly shown that the design of those who urged it was, while they gave personal freedom to the negro, to establish a new and more extensive market to abolish black slavery that we might have in its room that white slavery which was the lot of the serfs in some of the despotic European governments and of the operatives and lower classes in Great Britain. These benevolent gentlemen asked us first to free ourselves from the shackles of the old constitution, by introducing among them that distinction which marked the systems of monarchical government. Mr. W. observed that, wherever black slavery existed, there was found at least an equality among the white population, but where it had no place such equality was wanting. He then asked us to consider the question which we must be brought at last. Look at England. We would not compare the white man of the north and the white servants there, or stop to show their inequality. The principle of slavery was a levelling principle: it was friendly to equality.—Break down slavery, and you break down equality. Mr. W. then appealed to the democratic principle of equality among men. [A laugh in one portion of the house.] Mr. Wise then appealed to the "democracy" of the house for our defence against this abolitionist-dissolutionist party, and went into an argument to show that at the instigation of this party, the late governor had been nominated for the presidency, and a Thomas Morris, of Ohio, for vice presidency. This Mr. Birney of Pa., [series of "no"] of Mass. then, [series of "no"] a cosmopolitan then, and this Mr. Morris was set up in prompt response to the advice of that foreign English agent, Sturge. The speaker then proceeded to show that England and America as a critical juncture in consequence of our present relations with England, upon which relations, he enlarged and the questions now open between the two countries. They were first the N. E. boundary, but the house of Brantree (for there was a place called Brantree in the State of Maine, and the capital town of the state of Maine. There was the Oregon question, and here he complimented Mr. Cushing as having done every thing that he could have done for that question. He would call upon Kentucky to aid him in strengthening the naval arm of the U. S. by establishing a new navy on the African coast, and said that he would have exerted against the protection of the whale fishery in the western seas that was exerted against the establishment of a home squadron. [Mr. Adams. A home squadron in the Pacific.] No, he said no such thing.—Another question was the right of search upon the African coast, and the right of improvement of the river, of suspicion, and of Dartmouth prison. We were defending "free trade and sailors' rights."—Another question was the confiscation of American property in the British colonial courts. Another question had reference to the shielding of fugitive criminals against extradition. Another question was the controversy and the mediated monopoly of the tea trade. Another was whether she was to regulate our relations with Mexico and Texas.—The bans between Texas and the U. S. were forbidden by the foreign abolitionist English party and the northern states might be allowed to destroy the southern states, while the south must be checked by the State.

One fact, that had been brought out to view, (whether on good authority or not he did not pretend to know,) that although there had been so much loud declamation in a certain section of this union against Texas for refusing to abolish slavery within her borders, yet it now appeared that when Mexico emancipated her slaves, it was charged by a certain secretary of state then in office as being an act unfriendly to the United States. Mr. W. gave the name of the individual (but the reporter could not catch it) on whose testimony this was said to have been lately discovered in a pamphlet recently put forth by that person, he had declared that, having had personal access to the archives of Mexico, he there saw despatches from the American secretary of state protesting against that act of emancipation as an act unfriendly to the United States. Mr. W. added something here about the negotiation of the treaty of 1823, which was too impetuously interrupted, and he reported without hazard that the session was understood to be to court our southern views for the presidency, but of this the reporter is not sure.

He next adverted to another open question with foreign power other than Great Britain. While Texas as was no favorite with the Anglo-American Abolition dissolution party, there was another state which enjoyed the warmest beams of their favorable regard; he alluded to our black sister republic of Hayti and it was a great object with them to get her independence recognised by this government, for the purpose, he supposed, of seeing the Quashipompo caricature, which had once created so much merriment in that hall, actually realised. Yes, Quashipompo appeared, in the person of a tall, thin, black-skinned, black-haired, dressed out in all the negro finery of his diplomatic costume, as one of the foreign ministers, and to attend the president's levees in solemn state. He would next walk into this hall, and be introduced to southern gentlemen here as their equal, if not a superior. He would then be introduced to the ladies, and be received at our entertainments, and, as a high foreign functionary, he must of course give entertainments in return. This was the sort of amalgamation so earnestly sought to be introduced by a certain class of zealots among us. This was what Mr. W. W. Phelps, the abolitionist, would call a "good" amalgamation introduced, not into the country merely, but into the court. And he did not doubt, if monsieur Quashipompo should enter here with his crooked negro shins and his splay feet, shining and glittering in negro splendour, and thus to be introduced to the ladies, that he would shortly become thirty or forty gentlemen of that house who would be forward in showing him every mark of affectionate welcome and personal respect and reverence. Was this to be tolerated? Was it to be endured that an English influence was to be introduced into our country, and that our very practical tests of universal emancipation?

Here, then, Mr. W. said, were eight distinct and delicate questions in the foreign intercourse of this government, all having a direct bearing on this fearful subject.

Mr. W. he eulogized the secretary of the navy for his able report, and said the home squadron was intended for any thing but the convoy of slave traders. We were to have no home squadron however; emancipation, emancipation by the aid of a foreign maritime power, was an object too dearly cherished, at home and abroad, to be given up by putting the country in a state of defence. This was the true meaning of the movement against a home squadron. And he warned gentlemen (here Mr. W.'s voice suddenly suffered a syncope, and the sentence was irrecoverably lost to the reporter's ear.)

When our population had been but three millions we had proved ourselves able to achieve our independence. When it was seven millions we carried to a successful issue a second war for free trade and sailors' rights; and he was determining whether we were to conquer or be conquered now when our population had reached seventeen millions. But those defences which British cannon had failed to break down, were now to be broken down by a British party infamy. On you, gentlemen, Mr. You shall have your reward. I am so far as to come within chief justice Marshall's decision in Burr's case, and you shall get your help! England had one naval depot at Halifax and she was making another in Bermuda. Such was the rumor. She was planting herself at both ends of our coast, and she would be there. But England was not to be suffered to go on and prepare her dockyards and her arsenals, and to establish one depot after another; she was to make contracts to supply them, not only with her own citizens but with the merchants of Boston; she was to establish depots at points, and from those points to form point to point, and from an unbroken line of speedy communication; every thing was to be put in readiness to facilitate the approach of a combined force to act simultaneously against the coasts of the United States; and we were to do nothing, we were to stand home, we were to let our ships be taken, our leaders, our men in the shape of defence, lest, furthest, we should be providing defences for slave property.

Mr. W. said that, on a subject so vital and so general as this, he looked to the north as he looked to the south. He had as much confidence in the one as in the other. When war did come, if come it must, the Connecticut sailor would meet the sailor on the Chesapeake, and both would act with the sailor from New Bedford, and they would fight side by side to defend the common honor of us all.

He said it to be were two modes in which our federal union was to be broken. One was that he had just adverted to, the striking down of our national defenses; and, while the south should be left defenseless, to excite insurrection, and then interfere with the treaty-making power. The other was, that the south, which the north was not merely to be abandoned to, but was to be actually driven off, driven away from the residue of the union; and this was by the enactment of a high, onerous, unequal, oppressive, unjust, unconstitutional tariff. On this point there had already been raised the invidious distinction between free labor and slave labor. The former, he said, had been the darling of the Federalists, the latter the bane of the Tories of England, when he raised this cry of free against slave labor, had taught them the actual truth and philosophy of that cry, and had exposed it to its merited contempt.— Yet, in the face of that demonstration, we heard the self-same cry raised by the tory party on this side of the water.

The abolitionists and the dissolutionists might again assemble at Hartford, and declare it against their religious sense of right to go to war with England to defend slave property; but their fate would be the same as had in religious retribution overtaken their predecessors—to be hated—to be ever after suspected—to become a by-word—and, he would not say, to be politically damned in the minds of all true-hearted Americans and of their descendants.

Mr. W. has thus far been speaking of Great Britain as of an enemy of the United States. He did not wish to be mistaken. That England was grasping in her policy; that she was tory in her policy just now; and that she might plead the pretext of a fiery, patriotic, and patriotic policy, was true. But the United States both here and in her own dominions, he did not doubt. But he was not one who either hated or dreaded Great Britain. From England and from Scotland he derived every drop of the blood in his veins. From that fatherland he derived our laws and our institutions. He was a native of the land of Shakspere, of Milton, and of Locke; it was, moreover, the land of magna charta. He loved her, honored her; he loved her arts; he loved her learning; he was proud of his descent from her; but he hated English arrogance; he hated English selfishness; he hated English policy. He was a policy to encourage the most friendly intercourse with her, and he felt disposed as a man to add to that feeling of friendship a feeling even of veneration.

But he, for one, would say that, if a war with England had come—just as such a war was necessary to receive among us an American feeling, the old spirit of American pride and independence—he cared not how much blood and treasure it might cost. Let war come, rather than that we should rust in peace and suffer an English party to destroy the institutions of our country. Yes, let the war—go forth. Again, he would say, that, if a war with England was necessary, it was a thing to be done with honor and revival, and that American aid and love of country which he had achieved our independence, the sooner it came the better. Peace with England was no doubt our true policy; but if we could not maintain peace without degradation, it was our true policy no longer.

Mr. W. said he had hitherto been speaking against the danger of foreign influence. But, let it be remembered that the voice of that farwelled address which Washington bequeathed as his last legacy to his beloved country, warned us no less against the danger of foreign influence than against the ruinous consequences of arraying the north against the south—the east against the west. Yet, what have we seen in the very teeth of that address, solemnly read in this hall? A deliberate proposition to separate the northern from the slave holding states of this union! A petition, asking not merely for a separation of the two sections, but for a separation in the most offensive and irritating terms—denouncing slavery, as a despotism which ought to be destroyed by the forcible interposition of the federal government! A petition which asked the residue of the union to unite against thirteen of their sister states, united with them in the same principles and the same rights! I need not to hear that farwelled address of Washington denounced here, or elsewhere, as a “sage.”

Mr. Adams here interposed, and said that on this point the gentleman was mistaken. When the clerk in reading from the address, came to that clause in which the father of his country called upon his countrymen to frown upon the first attempt to dissolve the union, Mr. A. had said, "you ought to have thought of that at the time you put on the gag." And now the gentleman might go on at his own discretion.

Mr. W. Wise resumed. He should not so far imitate the example so often set by the gentleman from Massachusetts of going on, after he had been corrected at a point of fact, just as if no correction had been made. Mr. W. had been mistaken; and he was glad to find that he had been in an error.

Yet he had not been surprised at what he supposed he had heard; because the union of these twenty-six happy independent sovereign states was a much more sacred thing than Washington's farewell address, sacred as that was. The thing Washington had said could not be taken for granted, for it was a new thing, and it was surely more sacred than the address which recommended his countrymen to preserve that thing which it was an act wholly partaking of sacrilege—a act from which the gentleman shrank with horror—to denounce the address, oh how could he ask, as a son of one of the venerated patriots of the revolution, that he should do this to him? He had seen Washington and heard his living voice—who else who served his country well, and had in return been rewarded by that country—how could he bring him-subject, not among the people, but am ex sollicitudine. He resolved to put them in a predicament in which, if they voted to receive this memorial, they should take the consequences for all time to come; or, if they refused to receive it, to tell him on what ground they could ever hereafter vote to dissolve the union. Here was the true line between the right of petition and the right of legislation; and in the great ardor in behalf of the cause, neither seemed to have been almost entirely forgotten.

With these remarks Mr. W. had done with the subject forever. He left it to the house to decide what course they would pursue with the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. W. having concluded,

Mr. Underwood rose and was recognised by the speaker; but,

Mr. Adams rose and said he desired to say a very few words. He wished to make a preliminary point. He questioned the right of this house to entertain the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Marshall), and he called upon the speaker to decide that question.

The point raised by Mr. Adams was then reduced to writing, and in the following words:

"Mr. Adams makes the point of order whether the house has the right to entertain this resolution, because it charges him with crime, inasmuch as this house has no jurisdiction; and because if the house entertain the jurisdiction they deprive him of rights secured to him by the constitution of the U. States."

Which having been read.

Mr. Adams asked that the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Marshall), might be read, inasmuch as they charged him, (Mr. A.), in the first place, with subornation of perjury; and, in the second place, with high treason.

And the preamble and resolutions of Mr. Marshall having been read—

Mr. Adams proceeded. I request the clerk to read, in support of this point, or of the inquiry, as the speaker or the house may think proper to consider it, the sixth article of legislation of the constitution of the United States.

The clerk then read as follows:

"The resolutions of the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; that he be confronted with the witnesses against him; that he be compelled with the witnesses against him to produce a compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

[After some interruption,]

Mr. Adams proceeded. I propose to address the house on the ground that they have no jurisdiction in the case; that they cannot try the culprit, still less can they punish him. The honorable charges two crimes, the first being capital, the second of the party accused is at stake; and the other as gross and aggravated as it could be if it were capital; and, therefore, the house could expel me. This is the batheo of the proposition. If I were guilty of these two crimes—

[After some interruption,]

Mr. Adams proceeded. I did not make this point of order yesterday, because I was, in fact, tried, so far as the proceedings went, without knowing what the charge against me was. I was not permitted to read the resolution; it was sprung suddenly upon me; and there was a determination to decide the case immediately. The speaker intimated to me that if I made any thing, it was my defence. I must do it now. I made what defence I could at that time, without knowing what the charge was; but when I came to read the resolution in the newspaper, I found that a charge of two crimes, among the gravest that can be committed by man, were made against me, and of them, I have said, involving the forfeiture of my life. It seemed to me that this was not the proper tribunal, and I thought it was the duty of the speaker to have stopped the thing instantly. I did not this morning make the proposition, because I desired that the gentleman from Aconee, (Mr. Wise), should have an opportunity to pour out all the words which make the whole volume which he has been treasuring up and accumulating for the last two or three years past, which he has so often manifested a disposition to discharge, and which, finally, he has had an opportunity of doing to the utmost extent of his power. He has done so, and I say in reply to him on this subject, I propose not to enter into the history of my life from the time I was in the cradle up to this hour; to ransack every thing, good, bad and indifferent, I have ever done, and to put the worst construction upon it. I repeat, I have very little to say at all. I am unwilling to occupy the time of the house with myself or my own history in any shape or form; and it is most reluctantly that I am compelled to do so.

The gentleman asked to be excused from voting, because, he says, on a former occasion he excepted to me as his judge; and, therefore, it was just and fair that I should except to himself.

Sir, there is another occasion which I hope the house will be able to try me for the only thing which, in my opinion, they can try me for. It is to say, a contempt of the house, under the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Gilmer), the late governor of that state. But there was, I say, an occasion, about four or five years ago, of a trial of the honorable member of the house for crimes. There came to this house then a man with his hands and face dripping with the blood of murder, the blotches of which were yet hanging upon him; and the question was put, upon the proposition of those very democrats to whom he has this day rendered the tribute and homage of his thanks, that he should be tried by this house for that crime—the crime of murder. Sir, I opposed the trial of that crime by this house. The house thought proper to refer the subject to a committee, and that committee reported—I am not sure that it was an expulsion; I think not. The report if I recollect—(and I should be glad to be corrected)—was to the effect, that the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Gilmer, which, as I have said, I suppose to be the only one on which the house can act, because the house will see what was done on a former occasion when a member was brought up for trial—that report, I think expressly required the expulsion of a man far less guilty than the other one of the blood which was upon him; because he happened to draw the trigger which levelled to the earth another member of this body. But that far more guilty man, who, I say, came into this house with hands and face dripping—with the blood-spots were yet visible upon him—I opposed as much as possibly could, that the man by this house, because it was (like the present) a case in which the charges made were of the highest nature—charges involving the very lives of the parties; and I thought that they should be sent to the proper tribunal. I thought that they should be tried where they might have the advantage of a competent instrument (holding up the constitution of the United States) by which they should have the right of a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime was committed—that they should be confronted with the witnesses against them—that they should have the benefit of compulsory process to obtain their own best evidence—that they should have the aid of counsel in their cause.

I was willing that the parties to that atrocious crime should be sent to their natural judges—to have an impartial trial—and that the action of this house, either by expulsion or otherwise by censure, should not take place. I expressed that opinion in this house, and I expressed it very strongly opposed its action; and it is very probable that I saved the house from the censure of the house at that time. I contributed as much as I possibly could to that end; and I wish, if I am to be called upon to answer for crimes before this house, or even to answer on a charge of contempt, that the precedent should be required to—that the fact should be put upon the table should be brought fresh to the memory of the members of this house.

The report of that committee was not finally acted upon; and by its not being finally acted upon, the man of whom I speak escaped all punishment from the house, although his hands are reeking with the blood of murder, and that too, the murder of an associate brother member of this house.

Mr. Wise here interrupted Mr. Adams.

Mr. Adams. Ah! Does the gentleman rise to a point of order?

Mr. Wise, (addressing the speaker), said he rose to inquire of the speaker whether his (Mr. W.'s) character or conduct was involved in the issue before the house, and whether it was in order for the member from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) to charge him with the crime of murder, and with being stained with innocent blood? A charge made by a man who had—had he applied to the members who were present at the time to confirm the statement—defended him (Mr. W.) from the charge on the floor at the time, and not upon any technical grounds, but upon the merits of his case and conduct. And who had, as he (Mr. W.) was informed, by one of his (Mr. A.'s) own colleagues, secured the attendance and presence of the large assemblage of thousands of people in Massachusetts, in primary assembly, and who pledged himself to the truth of his defence; and yet who has since, from personal revenge for subsequent causes of hostility to him, (Mr. W.) again and again, no less than three times, uttered insinuations and recriminations against him on this floor? Mr. W. said he had never escaped from trial in the case referred to. So far from it, he had even earnestly sought a trial from the house which arraigned him, and he was most unjustly refused and denied a trial. He was willing now to be tried—to go to Maryland and be tried—to be tried here or any where by a fair and impartial tribunal.

And he would now, for the first time, solemnly declare that he was not responsible for any thing which occurred in that duel, except what occurred on the ground of self defence in life a friend. And this he was at any time ready to prove whenever the fact was legitimately questioned or tested. And now he pronounced the charge made by the gentleman from Massachusetts as base and black as it was the traitor was black and base who uttered it.

Mr. Adams was understood to deny that he had ever justified the charge made by the use.

Mr. Wise repeated, he had been told so by one of the gentleman's own colleagues.

Mr. Adams. I say I never did defend the man on the merits of the case, and I never did believe but what he was the guilty man, and that the man who pulled the trigger was but an instrument in his hands. This was my belief in the beginning. And now he may go to his democratic friends from the north, to whom he has paid such tributes of applause, and we will see how they voted throughout the whole of that proceeding. I say nothing of the article in the Democratic Review, which I suppose the speaker saw published at that time. That Review is known to have been the publication of the democracy of this union, and there was an article in it at that time which would show what were the opinions and feelings of the democracy of the country on this question. The man, from which I took, at that occasion I take now, I demand that this house should not undertake to try me. Yesterday there was a considerable portion of this house ready to adopt the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Marshall). Where did the gentleman get his law. As I certainly not from him, from which I took, in the manner in which every American citizen ought to speak of him. And when that gentleman referred to the relations which had existed between his uncle and my father, I did feel surprised that it did not disarm him from such a charge as he has made against me. I respect that gentleman and his talents; I think he will exert an effort at redemption of which he has recently taken the form, and that when, in the compass of two or three years, he shall have redeemed that pledge, he will blush himself at the want of that temperance to which he has devoted himself, in the very measure before the house. I think he will be able to make himself the ornament and the glory of his country.

He means to do so, let him go home—let him go to some law school, and learn a little of the rights of the citizens of these states and of the members of this house—let him learn that if there is a disgrace in this house, the preservation of such resolutions as these which he has offered to the members, charging him with crimes, ready to add them as proofs of crimes, and offering them as if the party implicated had been tried and found guilty. That is the foundation of his resolution: nor can the house adopt them without deciding that the person is guilty of the crimes.

And now, I ask whether the person is to be presumed guilty of these charges, and whether the house is to inflict the punishment upon him which, the resolution says, is founded upon his commission of these crimes. That article of the constitution which has been read provides that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury." The gentleman deny me the right of that impartial jury? He must do so before this resolution can be passed? He must deny me the power of being tried by an impartial jury. And will the gentleman say, that if I am to be tried by this house I shall be tried before an impartial tribunal? No, the speaker has sense and candor to say so. He himself is not impartial: the very draught of his resolution shows it.

I wish to speak of the slave-holders of this house and of the union with respect. There are three classes of persons included in the slave interest as representatives here. As to the slaveholder, I have nothing to say against him, except that if I am to be tried by him, I shall not have an impartial trial. I challenge him for partiality—for pre-judgment upon this question, as a question of contempt, which I repeat, is the only charge on which I can be made to answer. He is not to be tried by a slaveholder who has not only an interest, but the most sort of all interests—a personal, pecuniary interest—which will govern him. I come from a portion of the country where slavery is known only by name; I come from a soil that bears not the foot of a slave upon it. I have no interest in the descendants of Bradford, and Winslow, and Carver, and Alden—the first who alighted on the rock of Plymouth. And am I, the representative of the descendants of these men—the free people of the state of Massachusetts,—that bears not a slave upon its soil—am I to come here and be tried for high treason because I presented a petition—a petition—to this house, and because the fancy or imagination of the gentleman from Kentucky supposes that there was anti-slavery or the abolition of slavery in my name, charges me with subornation of perjury and of high treason, and he calls upon this house, as a matter of mercy and grace, not to expel me for these crimes, but to inflict upon me the severest censure they can; and to decide upon that, there are one hundred members of this house who are not judges. Is any one of them impartial? No. I trust they will not consider themselves as impartial men; I trust that many of them will have those qualms of conscience which the gentleman from Aecemac (Mr. Wise) assigns as his reason for being excused; and that they will not vote upon a question on which their personal, pecuniary, and most sordid interests are at stake.

Mr. Wise. I never avowed any such reason. The reason is, the personal loathing, dread, and contempt I feel for the man.

Mr. Calhoun, of Massachusetts, rose to order. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. A.) had proceeded with his remarks without interruption, and Mr. C. insisted that the same right should be secured to the gentleman from Massachusetts. (Mr. Adams.)

(Some words passed between Mr. Wise and Mr. Calhoun, of which nothing, beyond the accompanying gesticulations on the part of the former gentleman, is known to the reporter.)

Mr. Adams proceeded. I object therefore, to the resolution, in toto, as not only injurious to my rights, to the rights of my constituents, and injurious to the rights of all the free people of the United States, but because those who are to decide upon it are, so far as they are slaveholders, charged with it if they were jurors. They are not the judges by whom I ought to be judged; and they ought, every one of them, to exclude himself—either from that motive, or, if they please, the motive which the gentleman from Aecemac assigns.

Mr. Speaker, I will not multiply words. I simply say, that, as I cannot be tried by this house for the crimes alleged as the motives for the trial, so I protest against any attempt to force me to submit to the house to dismiss the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, as one upon which they have no power whatever to act. But, as I cannot prevent the action of the members of the house, whom I consider partial, and therefore disqualified from pronouncing on my rights, as well as the power of the majority. If they say they will try me, they must try me. If they say they will punish me, they must punish me. If they say that, in grace and mercy, they will spare me expulsion, I disdain and cast their mercy away; and I ask them if they will come to such a trial and expel me, I defy them. I have your threats to go to that will have something to say if this house expels me. Nor will it be long before the gentlemen will see me again.

It appears to me to be so clear that there is no right in this house to try and punish me, or to show me that mercy or grace which I disdain to receive at their hands, that argument is unnecessary. But they say so, I shall then require the application of the benefits which the constitution secures to persons tried for these crimes in judicial courts. I shall then claim to be heard in my defence fully—without interruption—without being set down again, as I was on a late occasion, after the house had promised to hear me, precisely as I was when I was coming to the most pointed proof of the case I sustained. I hope it will not be so. I hope that if I am to be tried for crimes, and to have the tender of the contemptible mercy of the house, I hope, I say, that it will be done in form: that a day will be assigned when I shall have the opportunity of speaking for myself, when I shall have the opportunity of collecting a few of those documents of which the gentleman from Aecemac has been making a file and bundle, that he might exonerate his bile upon me.

Here Mr. Adams concluded.

A conversation followed between Mr. Adams and the speaker in relation to the form in which the question on the point of order should be put to the house; when, on the suggestion of the speaker, Mr. A. consented that it should be put in the form of consideration, to wit: "Will the house consider the resolution?" And this question the speaker said was not debatable.

Mr. Marshall (who was indistinctly heard at the reporter's desk from the position he occupied) said he wished to offer a very few remarks in reply to the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts. (Mr. Adams.) There were two points to be considered—one a matter of law, and the other a matter of fact.

The gentleman had assumed, in the first place, that the man charged by him (Mr. A.) as a subduer for that of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Gilmer) charged him (Mr. A.) with subornation of perjury and high treason, and that the censure of this house was invoked against him for these two offences. A very superficial examination of this resolution would satisfy a very gentleman, he (Mr. M.) thought, that the gentleman was mistaken in the fact. He (Mr. A.) was not charged with subornation of perjury or high treason, and in point of fact was not put on trial on either of these charges. It was charged that a proposition

"To the representatives of the people to dissolve the union, because of the franchise of their constituents, and to support which they are commanded by these constituents, to be sworn before they can enter upon the execution of the political powers created by it and entrusted to them, is a high breach of privilege, a contempt offered to this house, a direct proposition to the legislature, and each member of it, to commit perjury, and involving necessary and inevitable, and its consequences the destruction of our country and the crime of high treason."

Now this petition was not drawn by the gentleman, and he was not charged for it.

Mr. Adams. Why am I to be punished for it?

Mr. Marshall. Because, as a member of this house, the gentleman had permitted himself to be used as a vehicle by which a petition involving within itself the gentleman's own mistake in the fact, the representative body of the nation; and the charge against the gentleman of offence against the privileges of this body, for which he (Mr. M.) had ventured to arraign him, was not that he (Mr. A.) had petitioned for this object, or sanctioned the prayer of the petition, because a journal showed that he had at the same time moved instantaneously the passage of the petition. The gist of the charge was high treason itself, but that it would involve in its execution, if carried into effect, the consequences of high treason. That was the charge—that the gentleman had made himself the vehicle by which a proposition so gross was to be laid before this honorable body. This was a fair statement of the fact. The resolve—

Mr. Adams. What is the word "therefore?"

Mr. Marshall again read from the resolution: "Resolved, therefore, That the honorable John Quincy Adams, member from Massachusetts, in presenting for the consideration of the house of representatives of the United States a petition praying for the dissolution of the union, has offered the deepest indignity to the house of which it is a member, an insult to the people of the United States of which no house is capable, and will, if this outrage be permitted to pass unrebuked and unpunished, have disgraced his country, through their representatives, in the eyes of the whole world."

That was the charge, (continued Mr. M.) So far then for the fact. The gentleman had charged him with charging him (Mr. A.) with high treason. There was no such charge there.

Mr. Adams. It is involved in the resolution.

Mr. Marshall. God knows in what crime the gentleman may involve himself before he gets through this matter. He (Mr. A.) was only charged with making himself the vehicle for the presentation of this, and therefore with being liable to the contempt of this house. But even if it was, and the gentleman was charged with it: suppose the gentleman had offered a petition of his own to the house of representatives to dissolve this union, and had really done so, and that the members of the house, the petitioners were guilty of, did it follow that in point of privilege before this house, they would be entitled to inflict on him the punishment the law had established for this crime if he was found guilty of high treason? Was the inquiry made for the purpose of visiting him with punishment under the rules of this house, or with trying him, for the purpose of inflicting the penalty of the law?

If a member of this house should in the rotundo murder one of his fellow-members, because murder is tried by the law of the land, could not this house, so far as its laws extended, expel or censure the member under their rules? If the argument of the gentleman was correct, the same way of escaping censure or punishment before this house was to be guilty of some crime worthy of death. He denied the matter of law. If a member of this house bore arms against the United States, he was guilty of high treason; and if the fact were known to this house, did it follow a matter of law, because the courts of the United States would punish him, that therefore this house could not censure or expel him? He thought not. The house had the right to inquire into the matter, and to inflict punishment according to the law of parliament, of which they were the judges, and sole judges

Then, if he had not read his law utterly in vain, there would be the point of order to the house, and the gentleman had referred which would protect him, even if the charge were made, from the punishment of this house; and, second, he would find that there was neither in the preamble nor resolutions a charge of this kind. The preamble was simply a statement of the petition itself, and a declaration that it did not affect the house, and that the gentleman, forsooth, did the gentleman from Massachusetts learn his law? Not from his father, he was sure. These were doctrines that not only his (Mr. M.'s) uncle, but the gentleman's father, never taught. A petition to the congress of the United States to dissolve the union, or that they were to support it, was not an organic law of the land! If John Marshall or the Elder Adams ever thought the constitution of the land could be repealed by an act of congress, he had never found it in their writing; if so, his respect for both the gentlemen would be most essentially lessened.

He would go into more of this hereafter. He had made already the point of order to the house, and to the question whether the house had a right to entertain such a resolution? He thought there was not the most remote shadow of a doubt on this subject. He then referred to the case of John Smith, relative to his trial and expulsion from congress in 1807, and stated some of the facts connected therewith, and that the gentleman from Massachusetts would know whether the facts were true or not.

Mr. Adams said the gentleman from Kentucky, together with other members of this house, who had taken their pleasure to accumulate themselves on him, and ruin him if they could, it seemed were not sufficient from their own knowledge of law to meet him, but they must receive little dirty pimpling notes from the gentleman from Massachusetts, and he presumed that the gentleman from Kentucky was conscious that, without referring to this argument of his (Mr. A.'s) in the case of John Smith, he could do nothing. He wished every member of this house would read this case, and the reply; and they would see that this statement was a falsification from beginning to end, and then they would know the details of the history of this case, and said he was willing that this precedent should be taken and acted on; but was not willing to hear it stated that John Smith was expelled, and that through his (Mr. A.'s) influence.

Mr. Fillmore said he moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

The yeas and nays were asked by several members, and being ordered, were taken, and resulted in yeas 90 nays 100.

So the house refused to lay on the table.

Mr. Arnold appealed to Mr. Adams to withdraw his question of consideration, to allow him an opportunity to address the house.

Mr. Proffit moved that the house adjourn; which prevailing—the house adjourned.

THURSDAY, JAN. 27. Mr. Bots having requested that Mr. Adams withdraw his question of consideration in order that he (Mr. B.) might make his remarks on the main question, the speaker enquired of Mr. A. whether he withdrew the question.

Mr. Adams replied that he was desirous of making the question of consideration, from constitutional violation that the house had no right to try him. It was a proceeding against him, which he must protest as depriving him of this right, and for that reason he had been willing, when the motion was made yesterday to lay the whole subject on the table, it should be laid on the table, and he would not engage in any unprofitable debate, as the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Underwood) had denominated it, and which he (Mr. A.) was sure could not be more painful to any member than himself. He (Mr. A.) was desirous, if possible, to dismiss the subject; and, as business, he would not interfere, with the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) had indulged in a long tirade against him, he (Mr. A.) was content to let it pass, without making any remark whatsoever. He wished, therefore, that the subject should be dismissed, because, if taken into consideration, a debate of at least three weeks would follow, and the most important business of the country would, during that time, be set aside.

The speaker here intimated to Mr. Adams that if the gentleman withdrew his motion, the speaker would feel compelled to give the floor to the gentleman from Kentucky. (Mr. Underwood), if he desired it, who had risen to a point of order before the point raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. Adams said he did not intend to withdraw his proposition. I cannot withdraw it, because the house has no power to try me. I protest against it, because I believe, as I have said, that if once broached, a debate of three weeks is inevitable. So far as I am personally concerned, or so far as concerns the cause for which I am to suffer, if at all, I have no desire to be admitted on the contrary, I am desirous to give to the house and the nation all my thoughts. But this is not the time—this is not the place. I have an account to settle with my constituents—and I call upon them here to attend to every act of this house, as well as mine, on this subject. I shall prefer going directly to them.

The speaker, interrupting Mr. A. here remarked that the gentleman from Massachusetts was aware that this question of consideration was not debatable.

Mr. Adams. Well—I cannot withdraw the question of consideration. If the house choose to consider the resolution, let it be their act. All the consequences that may follow shall be the act of the house. Let me encourage the speaker, and not me. I will not be necessary in arresting the action of this house upon the public business at this time.

Some confusion ensued in distinguishing now the question before the house, and by yeas 118, yeas 73, some of the members having changed their votes in consequence of not apprehending the question as understood by the speaker, it was deemed to consider now the resolutions of Mr. Marshall.

The speaker gave the floor to Mr. Underwood.

But Mr. Adams rose and demanded the benefits of the sixth article of the amendments to the constitution of the United States, which said article is in the following words:

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

And Mr. A. desired that the motion might be entered on the journal.

Mr. Underwood then resumed the floor, and addressed the house at considerable length. Mr. U. instanced cases to show that efforts made by this house to punish members for any infractions were all generally ineffectual. He mentioned the case of a member of this house in the Graves and Ciley affair, and he would prove that it was a palpable violation of the constitution for this house to undertake to go before the civil authorities in taking cognizance of crimes committed by its members. If the gentleman from Massachusetts had been guilty of the crimes alleged, Mr. U. resolved, this is not the tribunal before which he ought to be arraigned—were it otherwise, I object to the course proposed. To my mind, it is worse than bathos to say that, whereas a member of this house has been guilty of "treason and subordination of perjury," therefore you will censure him!

Mr. Marshall then interposed, and asked if the resolution charged the gentleman with treason, if he did.

Mr. Underwood said these crimes were implied in the very act of presentation of the petition, and that if the resolution was considered, they were called upon to inflict censure, mere censure, in a case which called for the severest punishment.

Mr. U. passed on to the subject of petition. Every one knows, said Mr. Underwood, that the gentleman from Massachusetts was not alone in his views of the right of petition. My doctrine is, there exists no right to petition, where there exists no authority to grant the prayer of the petitioners. I have voted against the 21st rule, because by that rule you exclude petitioners who have a right to be heard, as well as those who have not. A thinking people will not tolerate the existence of any rule that conflicts with their just rights.

As a slaveholder I have differed from my brethren on this floor in reference to the whole gag proceeding. I wish the question discussed—discussed to the heart's content of all who choose to discuss it; and let me say to my friends, and brethren of the south, that if we cannot bear the discussion of this question, we are already gone—gone beyond all hope of redemption.

He said, in reference to all these rules, denominated gag-rules, "away with them." They, (the south), were the weaker portion, were in the minority. The north could do what they pleased with them; they could adopt their own measures. All he asked was, that that they would let them, (the south), know what these measures were, and then they would show their hands; and when he and his constituents knew precisely what was intended, then they would be prepared to take the ultimate steps which became them as men. What then did the rules do? The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Fiske), the other day, notwithstanding the rules, had taken up abolition papers, and read one after another to show the various abolition movements.

Mr. Underwood said the gentleman would do him justice, while making these remarks, and himself discussing the 21st rule on the subject of slavery as much as he. (Mr. W.) had done, to say that he, (Mr. W.) did all in his power in every form to keep off that discussion. After it began, and he was attacked, he was obliged to discuss this subject; and he hoped the gentleman would excuse him for doing what he was compelled to do against his own will.

Mr. Underwood said he had not censured the gentleman; far from it. He had no objections to his discussing it fully, and to northern men talking in the same way. His policy had been to ascertain what northern men intended. Let them all discuss as much as they pleased on this particular topic. They had attempted, by the 21st rule, to suppress debate on this subject; and that attempt at suppression, in failing to show who had the right to petition and who had not, and been the source of all agitation, alarm and apprehension on the part of the people he represented. He wanted this thing done away with.

One thing, he very well knew, that the state in part represented had a deeper stake in this matter than any other except Maryland and a small portion of Virginia. Separately the union, and slavery was done in Kentucky, Maryland, and a large portion of Virginia. It had been a common practice for southern men to say, "touch this subject and we will dissolve the union." Their remedy was the destruction of the thing they wished to save. He believed however that the people of the north and south were passionately in love with the union.

How could those people who fought together for their independence, for the establishment and maintenance of the union, kindred as they were, and endeared to each other, how could they bring themselves to split from each other; and in cases that might occur, how could the people of Ohio fold their arms and stand on the northern bank of the Ohio river as a boundary between the two divisions of the union, and do nothing to save the people of Kentucky from their doom? It was impossible. God never intended that this separation should take place; and all the fury, madness, and, he might say, crime, in any portion of the union, could not so far get the better of the feelings of this people as to allow this state of things to come to pass, and he would not, and a northern man before him said it should not be. He thanked him for the sentiment. He wanted to say to abolitionists on this floor that the doctrine of their creed, so far as he understood them, was this, that nothing would satisfy them short of emancipating their slaves and placing them then on an equality with themselves in regard to religious and moral rights. He would appeal to the gentleman, (Mr. Giddings), before him if this was not their doctrine.

Mr. Giddings said it gave him great pleasure to respond to the feelings which the honorable member before him expressed, and that those feelings had uttered he responded from his inmost heart. He would also say that he was an abolitionist to the full extent in which he understood that term. That he had conversed with hundreds, and perhaps he might say thousands, but he had never heard one intimate any intention or wish to interfere politically with the rights of slavery. Southern men or of any other sort. They claim no such right; nor do they ask any such privilege. Gentlemen may consider him speaking ex cathedra if they choose. He would then say that all imputations and charges of their desire to do so, were, so far as he was informed, unfounded. On the contrary, he wished to see that no such interference and taxation for the support of slavery. They ask that it should not interfere with them. Let us cease to appropriate the money of the free states for the support of slavery. Let congress cease to involve the free states in the disgrace or support of that institution, and they will be satisfied as to political action.

Mr. Underwood was happy to hear the gentleman say that Kentucky should not suffer under any emergency, and that he (Mr. G.) would stand by her as long as Mr. U. would stand by Ohio. There was one little qualification in the concluding sentence of the gentleman from Ohio which he did not wish to explain; that he wanted to be exempt from taxation and to be delivered from all connexion with the institution of slavery. The time might come—he hoped never to see it—when his northern brethren would have to be taxed a little in pursuance of the constitution, and only tax him, he thought, a little too; and if it is to be delivered from this march and taxes. My friend (Mr. Giddings) says "no." I hope he may have an opportunity to explain.

[Cries of "no," and "now!"]

Mr. J. Campbell objected, and Mr. Giddings was not allowed to explain.

Mr. Underwood said he would then go on and bring his remarks to a close. He repeated again that as the gentleman (Mr. Giddings) had said to him that he had no intention to refuse to discuss, and to march when necessary—having said that, when his future explanation came, there might be nothing so offensive in his course as this term carried the idea of—He (Mr. U.) was one of those who had never been governed by names; things, deeds, actions were all. If the gentleman would stand by him in action, that was all he wanted.

But he had risen to remark to that class, if there were any such here, whose intention it was to put the negro on the same political level with the white man—to tell the abolitionist, whoever he might be, you are attempting an utter impossibility; that never, as long as this world stood, did they intend to consent to any such thing. If they depicted this, they were attempting an impossibility. It was a death struggle for them south.

They (the north) had the power, and he wanted them to show their hand, so that he could understand them, and to show his constituents what they intended.

The constitution of the country had defined treason, that it should consist only in levying war against the United States or adhering to enemies thereof and giving them aid and countenance. What was the reason that it was put into the constitution itself? To get clear of this undefined definition, that looseness of construction which prevailed in the old country, and by which many men innocently were sent to the gallows. He wanted to see a more glorious constitution in giving the definition of treason. It was to consist in overt acts, and these to be proved by two witnesses.

He would attempt to show that this proceeding against the gentleman from Massachusetts was to punish him for an imputed motive, and when he had done that, he could conclude his remarks. He admitted that this was not treason; it was not treason, but a mere invitation to treason.

What had the gentleman from Massachusetts been guilty of? Had he invited them according to the petition to be guilty of treason? How did this turpitude attach to the gentleman? Had he sanctioned the institution of slavery? Had he admitted his motive was really agitation and mischief? He would tell, unless gifted with the spirit of omniscience to delve into the inmost recesses of his soul and discover what motive actuated him. How could they tell that he was influenced by base, improper, and treasonable motives? He would attempt to decide if they were arranged to themselves, and to each other.

He would close with a remark as to the consequence of this proceeding, if it was carried out. The people of this country, in framing this glorious constitution, had exempted them from being brought in question elsewhere than on this floor for any thing they might say here. Their object was to secure the most unbounded liberty of speech and action; but they had imposed on them a limit. They were to be brought before congress pass rules, and for a breach of those rules they might expel a member by the consent of two-thirds. But this was far violating the rules, and not for the mode of action which a man might conscientiously take here.

What was their action? Was it to get at the gentleman from Massachusetts for violating the rules of order? He simply rose in his place and presented a petition. Was it a disorderly proceeding, within the meaning of the constitution? No. What, then, were they attempting? It was to punish the gentleman under the declaration he had made, for the manner in which he had received his hand, and in duty bound, to represent a portion of the people of Massachusetts—erroneously as he (Mr. U.) thought. But could they punish him for that non-act? And suppose that they did it; they had already excited a considerable spirit of hostility by the 21st rule, judging from the petitions sent here. Now, in addition to that, if they inflicted punishment upon this man, who would go home and tell his constituents that he had incurred the liberty of petition co-extensive with that of speech, and he had thrown in every thing that had been forwarded to him, for which he had received this treatment at their hands, what would they say? If he, their representative, was compelled to associate with such men, they would cut loose the bonds of the union." He told them to be aware how they put into the power of the gentleman from Massachusetts to go home and tell his constituents that he was a martyr to the right of petition. He said to his southern brethren, beware how you do it, and remind him that no good could come out of it, and from the bottom of his soul he believed great harm would result. He, therefore, appealed to them to abstain from it.

The debate was further continued by Mr. Arnold and others. The house, at seven o'clock, adjourned.

CHRONICLE.

BANK TOPICS.—The Gerard bank at Philadelphia having failed two weeks since, the solvency of the bank of Pennsylvania became suspected and a run was made upon it last week, which resulted in an injunction by governor Porter. Their branch at Harrisburg was also closed. The Philadelphia Chronicle says: "Governor Porter, who had visited the city for the express purpose of insuring the payment of the interest on the state debt, to-day, yesterday morning caused an injunction to be issued against the Pennsylvania bank, compelling it to close its doors and suspend all kind of business for the present. Mr. Job Mann, ex-state treasurer, made affidavit setting forth that about eight hundred thousand dollars of the government money was deposited with that institution, for the purpose of paying said interest."

This bank was the agent of the state, and had provided funds to the amount of $800,000 for the payment of the interest due the state on the 1st inst. One-half of which they used in endeavoring to sustain the bank—and the interest remained unpaid.

The other banks of Philadelphia have adopted a kind of safety fund project, and are about to issue new notes upon that basis. Meantime a bill has passed the house of representatives at Harrisburg by a vote of 15 requiring the banks of the state to resume specie payments without delay, and it is said it will pass the senate also.

NEW JERSEY BANKS. Of 25 banks in the state, 15 already pay specie. The 10 suspended are connected in business with Philadelphia. The suspended banks had in Jan. 1841, a circulation of $1,322,931, and specie $201,332; in Jan. 1842, they have in circulation $556,342, in specie $265,573. The specie payments banks had in Jan. 1841 in circulation $2,322,931, and in Jan. 1842 in circulation $732,901, and in specie $295,709. Aggregate capital of suspended banks is $1,351,028, of specie banks is $2,472,805.

NEW YORK BANKS. The bank commissioners of N. York on Jan. 26, made their annual report to the legislature of that state of the condition of the banks on the 1st of January instant. From the tables accompanying that report we extract (says the New York Commercial Advertiser) the following leading items:

Aggregate amount of loans and discounts, specie, circulation and deposits in all the chartered banks in the state being 90 in number:

Loans and discounts	$49,611,251
Specie	4,785,232
Circulation	12,372,764
Deposits	11,620,365

Aggregate amount of loans and discounts, specie, circulation and deposits in 43 banks, under the general law, being all that have made returns to the commissioners:

Loans and discounts	$7,306,925
Specie	636,170
Circulation	2,487,229
Deposits	2,803,328

Total of all the banks embraced in the report:

Loans and discounts	$56,918,176
Specie	5,421,402
Circulation	14,859,993
Deposits	17,423,223

Aggregate amount of loans and discounts, specie, circulation and deposits in 25 chartered and free banks in the city of New York and Brooklyn:

Loans and discounts	$32,183,026
Specie	4,305,095
Circulation	3,528,273
Deposits	12,478,464

Amount of funds on deposit in New York and Albany to the credit of the country banks: $2,127,212.

It is believed that there has been a considerable reduction in the circulation since the 1st inst., and it is understood that there has been considerable increase in the amount of specie in the city of New York during the same period.

The aggregate amount of loans, discounts, specie, circulation and deposits of all the chartered banks in the state, is $11,399,403; of the free banks under the general banking law, 43 in number the amount is $12,958,712. The aggregate amount of the banks in the city of New York and Brooklyn, including as above 25 in number $55,248,334, of which $4,305,095 is specie. This report, however, only comes down to the 1st inst., and since that time there has been considerable increase in the amount of specie in that city. The amount of funds on deposit in Albany and New York to the credit of the country banks is $2,427,512.

The State Bank of Illinois announces its readiness to join the banks of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Kentucky, in resumption, on the 1st of August next.

Ohio Banks. The official statement of the banks of Ohio gives the following results:

Circulation	$1,566,511
Specie	1,018,611
Notes of banks	1,146,737
Deposits	8,879,675
Discounts	11,177,466

Michigan and her banks. It is stated in the northern press—that the trial of the suspension law by the legislature of Michigan has forced the Bank of Michigan to make an assignment of its effects.

New York. The reports of the canal and bank commissioners were presented on Jan. 37. The total amount of contracts on all the canals for work finished and unfinished, is $20,125,575, on which they have been paid up to Jan. 1842, $15,624,257, leaving a balance of $5,502,621. Of this balance the work done is $478,236, and the work yet to be done $4,624,385. The total amount of all contracts for enlarging the Erie canal is $13,769,550, of which was made by former commissioners, $12,685,513, by the present, $1,084,037. Of the whole sum, $8,666,242 have been paid since Oct. 1839, and before that time only $1,884,537, leaving a balance unpaid of $3,198,769. The number of boats which have passed the lock near Schenectady during the past year was 30,320, being 3,333 more than any other year. The tolls during the last season where, as has been stated before, $2,034,882.

GEN. BRISCOE G. BALDWIN, of Stamford, was on Friday elected judge of the court of appeals of Virginia, after fourteen ballottings. Gen. B. is now a delegate from Augusta.

BRITISH STEAM PACKETS. The Forth and Solway belonging to the West India line of 14 steamers started from Southampton, England, on the 17th and 18th inst. They are bound for and will call at several distinct islands and ports of our continent. Forty-nine distinct ports are designated as places to which mails may be directly forwarded, and landed by the steamers. There will be a steam packet twice a month from Havana to Halifax, calling and delivering letters at Savannah, Charleston and New York; and so on, and so on, with the Company's line from Boston to Halifax, and returning to Havana, will convey letters to all parts of the West Indies, South America, &c. The New Orleans papers of the 21st announce the arrival of the Forth at the Balize with 6 days earlier European news than had then been received at New York. The Solway has arrived at Barbadoes.

CROTON AGREEMENT. The great work by which copious supplies of pure, fresh water are to be poured into the city of New York, is expected to be finished by the 4th of July next. The expenditures on the aqueduct during the past year have been $1,118,843 44. The total amount expended thus far is $7,107,463 03. The sum yet required to complete the work to Murray bill is estimated at $1,328,394 55.

The comptroller of the city advertises for a loan of $900,000, for the purpose of introducing the Croton water by the 4th July next. The loan is payable in 10 or 15 years, at the option of the purchaser, and to bear an interest of 7 per cent.

DEATHS. In Philadelphia during the past week there were 11 deaths; of which 36 were under two years of age—11 died of consumption and 13 of small pox.

We regret to be obliged to announce the sudden death this morning, from an affection of the heart, of colonel Alexander S. Cummings, colonel of the 4th regiment of United States infantry.

Col. Cummings was one of the oldest officers of the service.

He entered the army in 1806, as an officer of dragoons, soon passed into the infantry, served with credit in the Mexican war and died enjoying the respect and affection of his brother soldiers.

ELECTION IN GEORGIA. The governor has issued his proclamation, declaring the election of Messrs. Cooper, Colquitt and Black. The following is the complete return, except the county of Glynn, in which no legal election was held:

Black	31,772	Dougherty	30,668
Colquitt	32,199	Gilmer	30,410
Cooper	32,425	Wright	30,336

The majority of Mr. Cooper over Judge Dougherty (the highest on each ticket) is 1,527 and Mr. Black, (the lowest on the ticket) 1,204 over Judge D.

FIRE ARMS. The average number of small fire arms manufactured at Harper's Ferry and Springfield annually, for the last ten years is—25,073 muskets, and 2,423 rifles and carbines.

HOGS. There were thirty-five thousand hogs killed and packed in Alton, Illinois, this season.

KINGSTON, JAMAICA, DATES to the 12th instant, have been closed by Chas. Clayton. His papers contain accounts of two or three fires, which did some damage. They also state that the house of assembly have pronounced European emigration to be a failure.

LETTERS. The Britannia brought 415,000 letters, the postage on which amounts to about $7,000. The number of letters for New York was $900, on which the postage amounted to $2,700; Philadelphia, 1,489, on which $500; Baltimore 600, postage $175; Albany 273, postage $65; Charleston 503, postage $181; Mobile 320, postage $125; New Orleans 560, postage $194.

MARYLAND SLAVEHOLDERS' CONVENTION. The proceedings of the recent slaveholders' convention, do not meet the approbation of the entire people of the state. A meeting opposed to the leading measures has been held in Queen Anne's county, and another is called for Kent county.

MISSISSIPPI. Gov. McNutt's term of office having expired on the 9th ult., (Sunday) the governor elect, W. M. Tucker, could not be inaugurated until Monday, the 10th ult., consequently general Jesse Spaight, president of the senate, became by the constitutional law, governor, ad interim, of the state of Mississippi.

MORTALITY IN BOSTON for 1841. The whole number of deaths in Boston during last year was nineteen hundred and nineteen—under one year of age there were 362, and under two years 532. Deaths by consumption 256.

POST OFFICE MOVEMENT. We learn from the Cincinnati Times, that the post master general has appointed Mr. Lyttleton Quinton, P. O. agent for that city. His duties are to board all steamboats that may land or touch at that port, and receive from the officers the letters directed to citizens of Cincinnati. These letters will then be placed in the Cincinnati office, and charged with the usual postage. It is also made the duty of the agent to report to the department any steamboat that may refuse to comply with this demand.

SALVAGES. The Comptroller of the New York Customs has exhibited and caused to be published, the wages decreed at Key West for the last eleven years, viz: 1831, $39,487; 1832, $46,535; 1833, $39,124; 1834, $32,012; 1835, $87,497; 1836, $174,132; 1837, $107,495; 1838, $31,573; 1839, $90,797; 1840, $85,113; 1841, $56,973. The amount awarded by arbitrators was $15,906. The above amounts are not entirely correct in kind, as salvages are sometimes given in kind.

THE TARIFF OF SWEDEN. The New York American says, commercial letters, received by the Britannia, state that a change would be made in the tariff of Sweden on the 1st of January, whereby cotton would therefor be exempt from duty.

SLAVE TRADE. Captain, Oct. 27. H. M. S. Fantome returned to Simon's bay 24th ult. after a 16 months' cruise on the coast of Angola, for the suppression of the slave trade, having had the Frisk and Waterwich under her orders; during which period they have captured 33 slave vessels and liberated 3,427 negroes; viz:

Fantome	16 vessels	1,310 negroes
Frisk	10 do.	1,166 do.
Waterwich	7 do.	951 do.

TENNESSEE. The house has passed a bill compelling the banks to resume specie payments on the 1st July next, under penalty of a forfeiture of their charters.

TEXAS. Accounts to the 13th inst. state that the Texan captives had arrived at Mexico and were to undergo a trial and meanwhile were treated with all humanity. Two Mexican steamers were expected at Vera Cruz from Liverpool to operate against Texas. Rumors of preparations were afloat of another invasion from Mexico. Difficulties with France were expected to be accomplished. Two French sloops, and one schooner were cruising off the coast. The reunion of Yucatan to Mexico is confirmed. Gen. Hamilton arrived at the Balize on the 20th Jan. in the British royal mail steamer Forth. He informs the editor of the Bee, that the dispositions of the new British ministry, are equally favorable with that of Lord Melbourne's cabinet towards the republic of Texas, and that the evening before he left London, he signed, with Lord Aberdeen, the minister of foreign affairs, a protocol strongly indicative of these friendly feelings. He is hastening to Texas with the least possible delay, to obtain the confirmation by its government, of some important international and financial measures he has arranged in Europe.

CONGRESS. The debate in the house of representatives on the question of privilege in the case of Mr. Adams has been disposed of. On Monday the 7th the whole subject was laid on the table by a vote of ayes 106, nays 93. The reception of the petition itself was then refused by nays 166, to ayes 40. On Tuesday Mr. Cushing moved to reconsider the last vote, which motion lies over. On Wednesday the 9th, Messrs. Gilmer, Ellis, Hunter and Proffit and also Mr. H. C. Johnson asked to be excused from serving on the committee of foreign relations and were excused. On Thursday the 10th, Messrs. M. J. Cooper, E. D. White, Chapman, Sheppard and J. E. Holmes were substituted in their places.

So the committee, as now organized, consists of the following members:

Mr. John Q. Adams, of Massachusetts; Mr. Caleb Cushing, of Massachusetts; Mr. H. Everett, of Vermont; Mr. Francis Granger, of New York; Mr. E. D. White, of Louisiana; Mr. J. H. Sheppard, of North Carolina; Mr. Isaac J. Holmes, of South Carolina; Mr. R. Chapman, of Alabama; and Mr. M. J. Cooper, of Georgia.

UNITED STATES SENATOR. WM. SPRAGUE (whig) has been elected senator to congress from the state of Rhode Island, in the place of Mr. Dixon, recently deceased. On the third and last balloting, the votes stood, SPRAGUE 44, ARNOLD (opp.) 24, POTTER 9, scattering 3.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

MEXICO.

The N. O. Bee of Feb. 1 says:—“We yesterday had an interview with a gentleman, just from the city of Mexico, who informs us that ninety of the Texan captives had reached that place some days before his departure. They were brought in in a most wretched condition, having been marched bare-footed and almost naked from the place of their capture. Amongst the prisoners was the son of Gen. Leslie Cooombs. The charity of the foreigners in the city furnished them some necessary apparel.”

So far from receiving humane treatment from Santa Anna, as reported, they were chained in pairs, and were compelled to work in the streets as common felons. Our informant assures us that the resident ministers of foreign countries had interfered in an improper manner to arrest this disgraceful and barbarous treatment without success. Young Cooombs was extremely ill; his constitution had proved too frail to endure the cruelties to which he had been subjected.

The accounts of the treachery resorted to to capture the expedition are confirmed. Mr. Kendall had not reached Mexico, when he was expected daily, in company with about 200 Texans.

Mr. Ellis, our minister at Mexico, had demanded young Cooombs as a citizen of the United States; but that a week had elapsed without his receiving any response from the government.

We have read a number of private letters that speak of the sufferings of the captives as most appalling. There has been no clemency shown to the citizens of the United States. The general belief in the city was that nothing short of force would ameliorate the condition of the prisoners, and that all would be treated alike.

The Bee suggests a meeting of the citizens of New Orleans, and legislative action on the part of the state, to stimulate the general government to protect its citizens. The same paper of the 2d inst says:

Vol. XI.—Sta. 24.

From an official document we have been favored with the perusal of, we give some further particulars of the capture of the Santa Fe Expedition. After encountering innumerable hardships and privations, the expedition reached Palo Duro, a tributary of the Red river, on the 29th of August. At this time there were only five days rations of beef alone in the camp, the other provisions having been exhausted. The country beyond seemed to be impassable for wagons. Indians in large parties were hovering around the camp. Under these circumstances it was agreed that Col. Cooke and Mr. Brenham, two of the commissioners, should go in advance, with a third of the military escort, to procure supplies and a guide for the expedition—the Mexican guide having deserted them a few days before, in company with an Indian named Brignoli. On the 31st of August this division left the camp; the military escort was under the command of captain Sutton. It consisted of 75 men, which together with the traders and guests accompanying it, amounted to 97 souls.

The division marched forward to the Moro, another branch of Red river, without meeting a human being, or seeing any signs of a settlement. At the Moro they fell in with a party of Mexican traders, who informed them that they were within eighty miles of San Miguel. After despatching two messengers to General McLeod, who was in command of the remaining forces, to deliver the baggage wagons and follow on with all possible haste, the advanced party pursued their journey, and reached a Ranch called Las Galenas, on the 13th of September.

The next day Mr. Vanness, the secretary of the commissioners, was sent on to San Miguel, accompanied by major Howard, captain Lewis, a Mr. Fitzgerald, and George W. Kendall. On the 15th the division arrived at a Ranch on the Pecos, twenty miles distant from San Miguel. Shortly after they reached this place, they were waited upon by a Mexican officer, who with seventy armed men had occupied a Ranch on the opposite side of the river. He informed them that the governor was approaching with a large force, and that he had been despatched to ascertain their purpose, intercept their march, and require them to lay down their arms. The commissioners assured him of the pacific intentions of the expedition, but refused to surrender their arms.—They consented, however, to remain where they were, until intelligence was received from Mr. Vanness.

On the 16th another interview was had with the officer, who was informed that unless some intelligence was received from Mr. Vanness, the division would proceed to San Miguel the next morning. The officer said that he would send a courier to have Mr. Vanness brought to the camp, and that next day he would cross the river with his men, and camp in the neighborhood of the Texans, as an evidence that he was friendly disposed towards them.

Up to this period the Texans had treated every Mexican whom they met with every civility, paying what was procured for the expedition, at double prices.

On the 17th the same officer called upon the commissioner accompanied by an express, who requested them to remain where they were until the arrival of the governor who would arrive within the day with several thousand men. At one o'clock the officer commenced crossing the river with his men, about half a mile below the Texian camp. The command consisting of three hundred men, took up position in the front and left flank of the Texans. About an hour afterwards another body of Mexicans crossed the river above and formed a junction with the first force. There was then no doubt of the purposes of the Texans. The Texans occupied a strong position, where they could have defended themselves from a thousand men; and an engagement would have occurred in ten minutes, had not the arrival of Capt. Lewis with Don Manuel Chavis, kinsman and confidential agent of Governor Armitage prevented it.

Mr. Chavis demanded the surrender of the Texans, in the name of the governor and by his authority on the terms:

“That the Texans should immediately give up their arms and remain where they were as prisoners on parole, until such time as supplies could be obtained sufficient for the subsistence of the troops in returning to Texas.

“The arms and private property should be properly labelled with the names of the owners, and returned to them upon their arrival on the frontier.”

These terms were offered with the most solemn assurance of their being fulfilled. Capt. Lewis then informed the Texans that the party accompanying Mr. Vanness were all captured by Rancheros and were tied and would have been shot, but for some explanations made by him. They were then taken to the governor, who had sent all of them but himself to Santa Fe. He magnified the military force and discipline of the Mexicans, and assured the Texans that unless they immediately surrendered, they would be surrounded by a well armed and disciplined force of 4,000 men. These representations, so far as the military preparations of the country were concerned, proved to be false; and the document observes that Capt. Lewis obtained his liberty and the privilege of importing goods duty free into New Mexico, as a reward for his treachery.

Under these circumstances, with an enemy of more than five times the number of Texans before them, and an immense force expected to arrive hourly when no aid could be anticipated from the main body; without provisions, and their horses worn down, and with special instructions from the Texian government to avoid hostilities if the people of the country were opposed to them, the division surrendered.

All the conditions of the surrender were of course violated by their treacherous enemies. It was after a deliberation of many hours that their lives were even spared. On the 19th, they were hurried off on their journey to Mexico. Capt. Lewis, accompanied the governor in search of the rest of the Texans, and it was supposed used the same artifices to get them to surrender.

The Texans now in chains in the city of Mexico, are those who composed the escort of Cooke and Brenham. The main body under McLeod, had not reached that city at the last dates.

Since writing the above, a letter has been received from G. W. Kendall, dated Chihuahua, 22d November, in which he speaks of himself as being in good health and spirits, and expects to be in the city of Mexico on the 1st of February. He states further, that his treatment had been rather humane than otherwise. It is more than probable that this letter was written in the expectation of its being intercepted by the Mexican authorities. Mr. K. is in company with the party of 200 Texans, under the command of Gen. McLeod. We infer from it that Mr. K. was sent from San Miguel to Santa Fe as stated by Captain Lewis.

by weight, is from the official report of D. H. Beardsley, esq. the collector at Cleveland. There arrived at Cleveland, by way of the canal, during the year 1841, 275,556,683 pounds. The following constitute the chief articles that arrived:

Wheat, 1,569,976 bushels; corn, 244,749 do. cists, 32,851 do. mineral coal, 479,411 do. flour, 414,848 barrels; pork, 29,886 do.; whiskey, 12,345 do.; butter, 1,464,935 pounds; cheese, 58,148 do. lard, 961,421 do.; bacon, 1,878,530 do.; pig iron, 988,160 do.; merchandise, 677,245 do. iron and nails, 3,442,430 do. tobacco, 912 hogheads; staves and heading, 968,904 pieces wood, 1,879 cords.

Of property on which tolls is charged by weight, there were cleared from Cleveland, by way of the canal, during 1841, 44,017,480 pounds.

TO THE TOBACCO PLANTERS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Gentlemen: Having been again appointed by the president of the United States, at the express and unanimous desire of the select committee of the house on the tobacco trade, and of the general convention of tobacco planters held last May in Washington, as a special agent to attend to the interests of the tobacco trade of the United States with Europe, I embarked on the 13th ultimo from New York, to proceed via England, to my destination in Germany.

Permit me, gentlemen, to express my grateful and sincere thanks for the repeated marks of confidence with which the tobacco interest has honored me, and to again assure you, gentlemen, that my devoted, my utmost exertions shall be continued, in order to bring your cause to a successful issue in Europe. I was in hopes that this address would have reached the United States in time to have been distributed among you at the general tobacco convention to be held next month in Washington, but my long passage to England has rendered it impossible. But, believing that the following remarks, which I take the liberty of addressing to your series of consideration, may, although too late for the general tobacco convention, still be useful to you, I have prepared, and shall forward them to the hon. Mr. JEXIER, chairman of the select committee on the tobacco trade.

The following will show the actual consumption of our tobacco in Europe, and the estimated amount of revenue derived by each government from the same:

	Hogheads.	Revenue.
Russia	358	$64,000
Holland	3,300	5,200
Belgium	4,000	12,000
France	18,000	17,275,000
Spain	10,000	5,500,000
Portugal	363	540,000
Italy, say Sardinia	1,200
Parma	130
Tuscany	125	2,000,000
Roman States	300
Naples	400
Austria and its dominions	4,000	3,400,000
Germany, (not including Austria)	38,000	1,300,000
Sweden and Norway	1,500	70,000
Denmark	1,800	5,630
	86,396	$35,071,820

The annual average exportations of our tobacco from the United States from 1st October, 1835, to 30th September, 1838, according to the statistical statement which had the honor of presenting to the hon. Mr. JEXIER, under date of April 27, 1840, was 103,422 hogheads, costing in the United States $7,748,772; of which 97,651, costing $7,267,794, were exported to Europe. The difference between the 97,651 hogheads and the quantity mentioned above as consumed, say 86,396 hogheads, (after deducting the small quantity consumed in Gibraltar and Malta, free ports), has unquestionably been smuggled from those countries of Europe where a low duty is charged into those countries where a different policy is pursued, say into England, France, Spain, Portugal and Italy; and there is also no doubt but that a large proportion of that which I have mentioned as consumed in Germany is smuggled into the great German union of customs, and also into Austria, from the other states where the duty is low. However, one thing is certain, that on 86,396 hogheads of American tobacco, costing in the U. States $6,450,820, and legally introduced into Europe, a revenue is derived of about $35,000,000, being nearly six times more than its original cost.

To bring this question home to each individual planter, the following will show to what extent each one, according to the quantity he grows for exportation, contributes to the revenue of Europe.

Supposing, in the round numbers, our exportations to Europe to be 100,000 hogheads, and the revenue derived therefrom to be $35,000,000—

An American who raises	5 hlds.	contributes	$1,750
"	"	10 "	" 3,500
"	"	25 "	" 8,750
"	"	50 "	" 17,500
"	"	75 "	" 26,250

Now, can it be supposed by any reasonable man that you will any longer submit to such a state of things? The legislation of, and the duties levied, and monopolies existing in Europe on our tobacco, appear to have the double object of obtaining an immense revenue from the smallest possible quantity of material, and consequently deeply injurious to the prosperity of our agricultural interests, by preventing a greater quantity from being cultivated. These high rates of duties and monopolies in Europe cripple your industry, preventing you from usefully and profitably extending the cultivation of your lands, which a more liberal hand, with a more liberal hand, provided for you.

The following will show what would be the probable consumption of American tobacco in Europe if those high duties and monopolies were abolished:

Taking the population of the U. States at 17,000,000, and its consumption at 75,000 hogheads, (which, I believe is far below the quantity), as the criterion of what the consumption would be in Europe, and considering its population (not including European Turkey) at 320,000,000 this would make the Hhds. consumption of tobacco in Europe, say 970,588

From which the following should be deducted:

The quantity grown in Europe, estimated from correct sources, as follows:
Russia	Bs. 21,000,000
Denmark	225,000
Holland	5,800,000
Belgium	1,140,000
France	26,000,000
Germany, not including Austria	40,000,000
Spain and its dominions	35,000,000
Island of Sardinia	375,000
Roman States	1,215,000
Naples	1,125,000
Switzerland	297,000
Wallachia	1,350,000
Poland	3,150,000
	136,650,000

Which, at 1,200 pounds per hoghead, would be hlds. 113,900

2. I estimate the growth of Cuba at	lbs. 18,760,000
Porto Rico at	3,700,000
South America at	3,000,000
	lbs. 17,460,000
Equal, at 1,200 lbs. per hld. to 14,553 hlds. of which the greater proportion is probably sent to Europe, say	hlds. 12,000
	125,900

Making the possible consumption of American tobacco in Europe 844,088

But, taking into consideration the want of means among the population of many of the countries of Europe to purchase our tobacco, I will suppose that the probable consumption of American tobacco in Europe would be only about one-half of the above mentioned quantity, say 422,344 hlds.; this would be more than four times our actual exportations to the various countries of Europe, and we require at least 251,250 tons of extra shipping to export it to market, and would increase the pecuniary means of our country more than twenty millions of dollars annually, adding an increased value to the state and other stocks of our country in foreign markets, and greatly augmenting the revenues of our government by affording us the means of greater exportations, and consequently a low tariff, if the revenue should be found to be more than sufficient for the economical wants of our government.

The annual average importations into the United States from the various countries of Europe, from 1st October, 1835, to 30th September, 1838, amounting to $97,251,320, of which $4,853,877, equal to 44 per cent. on the total average importations, were admitted free of duty; and, as the average exportations of our domestic produce of all kinds to the same countries of Europe, during the same period amounted to $79,201,860, it will be seen that we have admitted, free of duty from Europe, an amount of our domestic produce to one-half of the exports of our domestic produce to the same countries.

The average amount imported into the U. States from Europe, during the above mentioned period, which was subject to duty, was $54,337,477; and as the total average amount of revenue obtained by the American government, for the two years ending 31st December, 1838, by the importations from all parts of the world, was $16,866,017, it may safely be estimated that, as a large proportion of the articles coming from Europe were admitted free of duty, the revenue which the United States has derived from the importations from Europe has not exceeded ten millions of dollars annually; so that if this revenue should be equalized on the total average importations from Europe, say $97,251,324, it would only amount to a duty of about 10 per cent. while Europe is obtaining a revenue of at least thirty-five millions of dollars from 86,396 hlds. of our tobacco, costing, in the United States, $6,450,820.

Fellow citizens: Is this the reciprocity, is this the even-handed justice, we have a right to look for, and to expect from foreign countries, whose industry, whose prosperity, and, it may also be said, whose tranquility, depend upon our great and annually increasing markets for the sale of their produce? Let me, therefore, respectfully recommend to you to be firm in your determination, and united in your efforts, to obtain justice, and you will certainly succeed in every country of Europe in obtaining a diminution of the high duties, and the abolishing of the shameful monopolies which exist on your industry. I have, gentlemen, the honor to remain, with sentiments of the highest consideration and respect, your most obedient servant, JOSIAH DODGE.

London, November 16, 1840.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

FEBRUARY 1. The members of the senate attended the funeral of the hon. Mr. F. Dixon late senator from Rhode Island.

FEBRUARY 2. Petitions in favor of the bankrupt law continued to be presented.

Mr. White presented a joint resolution of the legislature of Indiana praying an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of St. Joseph in Michigan. Mr. W. expressed his views of its importance and gave reasons why congress should make appropriations.

Mr. Preston denied the constitutionality of making appropriations for harbors; he was opposed to any such tariff of protection as would regulate the industry of the country. He was in favor of a firm system of taxation adequate to the appropriations of congress and if in doing this any branch of industry were incidentally benefited he should not be opposed to it.

Mr. Clay said that the general government had made appropriations for the harbor of Charleston in South Carolina which had been asked for. What are the lakes but great inland seas. Is their commerce not to be looked after? The let alone policy contended for by the senator of South Carolina would carry us back to the old confederation, and fear we are going back to that old point of our history. Congress had the power to make harbors as well as light houses when the safety of navigation required it.

Mr. Preston thought congress could as well build Gadsby's hotel because there were lamp posts, as to erect harbors because they could build light houses. The powers of congress must stop at the high water indicated by the constitution.

Mr. Graham said that at the proper time he would endeavor to show that it was the duty of the general government to reopen the old channel of Albemarle sound.

The memorial was referred to the committee on commerce.

The senate then proceeded to the order of the day, being the resolution submitted by Mr. Clay restricting and limiting the veto power and Mr. Buchanan addressed the senate, and believed the veto power to be one of the strongest and staunchest in the constitution and if removed from it might lead to the destruction of the constitution. He took up and referred to the address of some of the whig members of congress adopted in September last, which expressed an anxiety to establish a navy yard, and depot or naval station on the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. Prentiss presented a petition for appropriation for a harbor at Milwaukee in Wisconsin.

FEBRUARY 3. The president of the senate presented a report, in compliance with the resolution of July 21, 1841, from the secretary of the navy, on the necessity and expediency of establishing a navy yard, and depot or naval station on the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. Prentiss presented a petition for appropriation for a harbor at Milwaukee in Wisconsin.

Mr. Calhoun arose to move the reconsideration of the report of the committee of the Senate presented a few days since. He thought it the most important subject of difference with England and believed that a vessel should have been despatched at once after its occurrence in order to obtain redress. He thought that were the facts properly represented to the British government they would not fail to do justice, and government that they were not to us. He had seen with pleasure that a special minister was to come to adjust our differences. Before he came, he hoped the committee on foreign relations would present this subject in its true light before the country and the world.

Mr. Preston regretted the absence of the chairman of the committee on foreign relations who had been deferred for several days, and assured the senate in his absence, that the committee would give the due consideration which the importance of the subject demanded.

The report was then referred to the committee on foreign relations.

Mr. Simmons asked the other day for liberty to employ a clerk to the committee on manufactures, and now renewed the motion.

Mr. King was opposed to it, because the practice of committees employing clerks was a new one, having sprung up the last few years, and ought to be abandoned.

Mr. Calhoun expressed his opposition and also stated that the price for revenue laws was the foreign invoice price and the expense of importation. He warned senators that the appointment of a clerk would be the prelude to a tariff.

Mr. Clay said that they had had at the south free trade upon more than a moiety of the imports of the world, and what was the consequence? Its great staple was selling at a price lower than ever before since the war. He would sooner lay duties to the extent of 100 per cent. than impose direct taxes for this government. There were often frauds in the foreign invoices and therefore foreign valuation with expense of importation was not the proper basis for laying duties. It was perfectly practicable to make a more valuation upon prices at home, from New Orleans to Boston.

Mr. Calhoun contended that prices would vary at home at different places and duties would vary. Cotton was low in consequence of the embarrassments in England and not of the free trade. South Carolina was infinitely better off than under the tariff of '28; negroes and labor were less in price, our foreign trade and domestic trade had increased with the free trade; this trade moreover was only partially free; its course was onward and could not be stayed. Mr. C. was glad the senator from Kentucky had denounced the extravagance of the government estimates and hoped he would aid in bringing down their expenditures.

Mr. Clay said that in regard to government expenditures he had prepared a resolution to present at the first favorable opportunity.

Mr. Simmons contended that the frauds of foreign invoices had driven American merchants from the market. We had no control over those who committed them. When the committee reported that it had been seen that 20 per cent. was actually levied, we would afford a better protection than such as we have had for the two years past.

Mr. Linn would vote for a clerk, and thought the committee on manufactures should never have been appointed but that all these matters should have belonged to the committee on agriculture.

Mr. Mangum, in reference to the subject of economy, remarked that if no other senator would do so he intended to bring in a bill to reduce the expenses of government, one-third, beginning with the per diem of the members of congress, but he feared he should meet with no encouragement save from a few whig friends.

On motion on the motion to appoint a clerk was then taken and decided 25 yeas to 14 nays.

The senate then adjourned.

FEBRUARY 4. Petitions and memorials were presented and referred relating to the bankrupt law, to fortifying Sackett's harbor, against annexation of Texas, &c.

On motion of Mr. Smith, of Indiana, Resolved, That the committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting, by penal enactments, the vending of lottery tickets in the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. Merrick, Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to the senate, in his opinion, it be incompatible with the public interest, and the honor of the United States, that he has taken place between this government, or its diplomatic agents, and the government of Belgium, relative to the claims of our citizens to indemnities for losses sustained during the bombardment of Antwerp, in the year 1835; and also copies of the most exact and full statement of the losses sustained by our citizens in Belgium, in consequence of the bombardment of Antwerp.

Mr. Benton submitted a resolution inquiring of the secretary of the navy information respecting the navy yard at Pensacola, and its comparative neglect with the other and more northern naval stations.

Mr. Benton said that, after the morning business was over, if it did not interfere with the speech of any senator he would call the senate to take up the bill to discontinue the operation of the bankrupt law. Before he did so, however, he would beg leave to introduce a resolution, bottomed on a protest which he had seen, and which he read.

Mr. Benton said that he had brought the consideration of the subject to the senate from no political or party feeling whatever. The state of things, which were pretty well stated on the face of the paper, were of the most deplorable and disgraceful character. They were the result of the first year of whig measures, of the repeal of the independent treasury bill, of throwing away the land revenue, of making forced loans. He was not going to have his pay reduced by these whig measures, and he would not consent less than to the consequence of the folly and extravagance of this administration. The currency of lamp black and rags was not a currency he would receive. Others might submit to it; he would not. The land revenue had been taken from the treasury, and that act and forced loans must be paid. The government must be paid. As the Whigs resisted the payment of ship money, so he would resist the payment of paper money.

Mr. B. referred to the gold bill, passed by its instrumentality in June, 1834. He wished to know if, from that time until the present, gold had ever been refused until now for the payment of members. By Mr. B. said he should go into all the matters named in the resolution which he would now offer.

Resolved, That the committee on finance be instructed to inquire into the nature of the payments now made or offered to be made by the federal government to its creditors, and what the same are made in hard money or in paper money; whether the creditors have their option; whether the government paper is at a discount; and what remedy, if any, is necessary to enable the government to keep its faith with the public creditors, and to save the credit of the government from violation, and the country from disgrace.

The resolution being read—

Mr. Mangum said that, after having been referred to by the senator from Missouri, he would say a word on the subject. After sleeping one night upon the proposition he had referred to, to curtail the expenses of the general government, the senator from Missouri, the file-leader of his party, came here to oppose this retrenchment. He feared, from such demonstrations, that his project would not meet with little encouragement. And what was the question before the senate? The senator from Missouri had protested the government of the United States, and for what reason? Because a draft of his to the amount of $40 was not paid in specie, and was proposed to be paid in treasury notes, the very currency which kept the late administration in power for four years past.

Mr. M. said, further, he did not hold himself or his friends responsible for the acts of the president. In regard to the New York commission, which had been alluded to, it was the act of the president. The majority here were not responsible for it, and would have opposed it, no doubt, had the question been submitted to them.

On motion of the senate said the debate was not in order, no subject being properly before the senate in order.

The subject was then passed over for the present. Mr. Merrick submitted a resolution calling for information respecting American claims against Belgium. Adopted. And after the transaction of several little business, the senate adjourned till Monday.

FEBRUARY 7. Memorials were presented and referred in relation to the bankrupt law, interference of government to obtain the release of American prisoners in Van Diemen's land, protection for glass and iron manufactures, and the recommendation of the Congesta as a suitable site for a national foundry, &c.

Mr. Calhoun presented from the executive of S. Carolina, a report from the committee on federal relations of that state, in relation to the public lands, also a memorial from the same source in relation to the controversy between Virginia and New York.

Mr. C. thought it obvious that abolition was a subject that would lead to disunion. The whites and colored were about equally numerous in the south and could exist together only in the relation of master and slave. As a matter of safety the institution should be kept as it is. One or the other race must rule when they are together, and to attempt to change it would be the expulsion of one or the other. There was now no safety in intercourse with the north. Virginia with exonerate judgment had led off in the protection of her rights in resorting to her police laws. South Carolina had resolved to stand by her. The south would stand by her in a body, and the intercourse with the north would become more and more restricted, until it absolutely ceased. He appealed to the gentlemen of the north, whether it was desirable that this state of things should exist. Mr. C. then alluded to the late abolition convention at Peterboro, New York and the address they had put before to excite the slaves to run away from their masters. No class had a greater amount of their earnings appropriated to their own benefit than the slaves. If persisted in, abolition movements would lead to the destruction of one third of the union and in the end to the union itself. Mr. C. moved the printing of the report and resolutions, which was ordered.

Mr. Clay's resolution, directing the committee on public lands to enquire into the expediency of providing by law, that any quota of the land sales, that may be refused by any state, shall be distributed among the assessed states, was taken up.

Mr. C. expressed his views on the subject of the resolution. If any state refused to receive its quota, its people might not acquiesce with their legislative action, their refusal might be but factions and afterwards reversed and therefore he was for no hasty disposition of its refused quota. But after a state persisted in refusing to receive its quota, it was a settled policy the rejection of its quota, it would prevent Congress to make other disposition thereof.

Mr. King said that if the senator regarded the land as belonging to the states, and any one of them should regard as a common fund and decline to receive it would be to appropriate it to those states, to whom it did not belong.

Mr. Clay compared the case to a father and his children. If one child refused to receive a portion of property dispensed to it, could the father not distribute it to the others. If Alabama or South Carolina refused to receive their portions, let it be given to others. What was to be gained by such examinations as called for resolutions? What was the question? It was one of distribution involving indirect taxation to the extent of supplying the treasury the means withdrawn from it by its operation, and proposing to carry on the government without relying upon the land fund which belonged to the states.

Mr. King said that the senator from Kentucky showed profound ignorance if he expected South Carolina could be bribed by this fund. Nineteen twentieths of the people were opposed to this bill. This distribution was a great question, and if a bold man were to desire a dissolution of the union he could meet with a stronger means to accomplish it. As a measure of revenue it made one third of the union pay the tax which was created by the withdrawal of the fund. He saw light ahead and in two years all the measures of the party which had made the law would be swept away.

Mr. Smith of Indiana stated that he would vote for the proposed inquiry as a matter of courtesy.

Mr. Allen said the true question was, shall the states tax themselves for their own purposes, or shall the taxing power of this general government be exerted to tax itself for their (the states') purposes.

Mr. Clay said that he had over and over declared that there was no power in the constitution to levy taxes for the purpose of distribution. The nearest approximation we had ever had to it, was made by the senator's friend, General Jackson, who recommended a distribution after taxes had been levied. The public land was the property of the states, and the whigs proposed only to give to the states, that which they could own. He had never been in South Carolina and did not profess to know much of its people. In regard to the question he neither knew nor, with respect he said it, cared whether the state would receive the money or not. Instead of leading to disunion, he thought the measure one of the strongest ever given to the union.

Mr. Frothingbury said that the title of the land was with the general government. It was a trust fund. A quota if refused would go into the treasury and be confiscated to the general purposes of the union. Its effect on the taxes was that the non-indebted states would have to submit to an indirect taxation for the general purposes of the union.

Mr. Ingham would not vote for the inquiry. If this land belonged to the states, where was the right to withhold it from them? Did the refusal of, say, Alabama, even if factions, make the money ours? The money should be in the treasury for the use of the government, before it should touch it. As to the distribution being a motive for severance of union, it was a new doctrine, for it had heretofore been contended by its opponents that it was a doctrine to the states bringing them to the foot of the general government.

Mr. Calhoun did not regard the measure as possessing the seeds of disunion, but he regarded it as the maximum of all unconstitutional resolutions.

Mr. Benton said that one or more of the beneficiaries refused to receive the fund, and as the general government were its trustees, it became necessary to know what should be done with it. The resolution proposed no specific appropriation of it and he should vote for the inquiry.

Mr. Wright said a sovereign state had refused to receive this money, and it went to the treasury subject to any demands on the treasury. If the state hereafter calls for its money, it would be entitled to draw upon such means as should be in the treasury. The inquiry was unimportant unless to obtain information of the disposition of the land which the two states refused to receive. The reasons for not adopting the resolution had already been sufficiently stated by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. Clay said the proposition was whether we should leave the money in the treasury or appropriate it. The money did not belong to Alabama or to the United States. His resolution contemplated any disposition of it. There was no criminality, he admitted, in a state's refusal; but was there no offence in disobeying a law of the general government. Did the senator mean to countenance nullification in this sneaking and cowardly form of refusing to carry out a law of the United States? His resolution proposed no mode assumed by South Carolina, when she put her hand upon her sword to nullify the laws of the land.

Mr. Preston said that something must be done with the money refused, and the question was, what shall be done? He advocated that by supporting the resolution he countenanced that by supporting the appropriation to other states. He desired to see the land distribution bill repealed.

At five o'clock on motion of Mr. Mangum, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, JAN. 27—CONTINUED. Mr. Batts said he had listened with very great pleasure to the warm and patriotic remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Calhoun), and should have been perfectly content to have submitted the question to the house at this time, but that he differed so widely from the views of the majority of this house, as indicated by the votes taken, and so widely from a large majority of his colleagues upon this floor, and in consequence of this, he did not feel himself at liberty to have the question taken without submitting his views on this important subject; and, in doing this, he did not mean to be deemed pledged to defend the general course of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The gentleman had said and done many things on this floor which did not appear to him to be in accordance with this mean; no disrespect to the gentleman from Massachusetts. To most lose all respect for himself before he could bring himself to wound the feelings of that venerable gentleman, and he meant no imputation on any other gentleman. He had given some evidence of these things. When the gentleman had said that he intended to defend himself from the charge of immaturity, he had voted to grant permission. When he thought the gentleman had trespassed on and abused the courtesy of the house, he withdrew that leave; and yet he was prepared to make very apologetic for his course. From what he had seen of that gentleman on this floor, he was inclined to believe that he expressed very many sentiments in the irritability of the weight of years that hung on him, which his own calm reflection would condemn. There was enough on this floor passing under his immediate observation to provoke the gentleman, and, if he might use the expression, to "devilish" him.

What was the question before the house? And what was the offence committed by the gentleman from Massachusetts? The gentleman had presented to this house a petition, not asking that congress should dissolve this union by an act of legislation, but that congress should devise measures by which the peaceful dissolution of the union should be effected. The gentleman from Massachusetts, standing here as one of the patriots of the land, after having been in the service of the country for half a century, with one foot standing—he would say, if the gentleman would pardon him—on the verge of the grave, asked the petition. It is not to be denied that he was, when he made that course, in common courtesy, he placed at the head, that he might have an opportunity of doing—what? Of appealing to his fellow citizens, and remonstrating with them against the horrors of a dissolution of the union. He had told them that this was a feeling not confined to the forty-six individuals who had signed that petition; that it is a growing and increasing evil; and that the sentiment is widely spread throughout the commonwealth of which he is a representative. And he asked them to permit him, as a member of this house, to present a remonstrance, and appeal to these gentlemen against the folly of their course. (Mr. Adams bowed his head to the table in assent to Mr. B's suggestion as to his motives.) That was his (Mr. B's) understanding of the subject. And on that question the proposition was submitted: first, that the gentleman should be censured; and then, should deem it a mark of great civility, if they could, to permit that he was not expelled.

The question of the dissolution of the union did not sound for the first time on his ear, or upon the ear of the house. If he mistook not, some three or four years ago a member from S. Carolina, and a gentleman now a member of this body, prepared a resolution—whether he submitted it or not, or asked leave to present it, he was not within his recollection—but he knew that there was a letter published, which he believed the gentleman had afterwards avowed himself to be the author of, in which he said that he had had in his draw for some time a resolution asking congress for the appointment of a committee consisting of one member from each of the southern states to decide the measures of the dissolution of the union.

Mr. William Butler here requested the gentleman from Virginia to state what member from South Carolina he referred to.

Mr. Batts said he had referred to Mr. Rhett. Mr. Rhett said, explaining this (a laugh) he had brought the document containing the facts. He held in his hand a pamphlet from which he requested leave to read a single page. It was a pamphlet containing an address to his constituents, containing the resolutions alluded to, with a narration of the circumstances under which they were prepared. It was read; and they were written at his seat, but not added to the house, during a speech delivered by the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. Stedman), who was discussing the subject of slavery in Virginia. It was on that memorable occasion when the southern members left their seats and went down stairs to deliberate together on this wanton aggression of their compeers. He then read the following extracts:

Before entering upon the merits of the resolutions, however, permit me to remark, (what I suppose might be apparent to all, that I had no expectation of passing them, or of even taking a vote upon them. They were intended as amendments to resolutions intended to remove the bill abolishing slavery from the District of Columbia. I expected them to share the fate which inevitably awaited the original motion, so soon as the floor could have been obtained, viz. to be laid upon the table. My design in presenting them was, to place before congress and the people what, in my opinion, was the true issue upon the question of slavery; and to point out to the course of policy by which it should be met by the southern states. The resolutions are as follows:

"And the constitution of the United States having proved inadequate to protect the southern states in the peaceful enjoyment of their rights and property, it is expedient that the said constitution should be amended, or the union of the states be dissolved."

Resolved, That a committee of two members from each state in the union be appointed, to report upon the expediency and practicability of amending the constitution, or the best means of peaceably dissolving the union.

"If, then, fellow-citizens, the south is no longer in the peaceable enjoyment of its rights and peculiar institutions, under the constitution of the U. States, the question arises upon the second proposition in the resolution: Is it expedient that the constitution should be amended, or the union be dissolved?"

"Those, of course, who design using the union and the constitution for the purpose of prolonging the institution of slavery in the south, will recognise no distinction of slavery in the north, and will, therefore, be disposed to deny the constitution. [The extract then entered into an argument to demonstrate the necessity of amending the constitution so as to define the fact which is doubted at the north, that congress has no power whatever to legislate on the subject of slavery, and that the topic would thus be "out from its halls altogether."—denied thus.] "But I have no doubt altogether, that the constitution, if proposed in time, before the spirit of abolition has infected the public mind, will be adopted. They take nothing from the north, while they are necessary to the south."

Mr. Batts was very willing to hear from the gentleman his arguments. For it was enough for him to know that a member of the house had prepared and was ready to offer a resolution to effect a dissolution of the union. He did not understand him whether he asked leave to offer it.

[Mr. Rhett. I did not.]

[Mr. Batts. Yet the gentleman himself who had prepared a resolution, and was ready and waiting only the opportunity to present it to the house, that the house should proceed to dissolve the union, that gentleman voted against laying on the table the proposition to censure or expel the gentleman from Massachusetts. It was not only the doctrine of the gentleman from South Carolina, but of his whole state, or a majority of that state. They held that they had a right to secede from the union.—If one state had a right to secede, thirteen had. The general principle was, that if one state had a right to secede, it was a piece of the moment one state is taken from the hoop. Gentlemen would excuse him for saying, with his knowledge of what had transpired in this house, that this had appeared to him a great farce from the beginning—a perfect storm in a teacup.—Talk about censuring the gentleman from Massachusetts to ensure or expel the gentleman from Massachusetts. They found a man standing at the head of the right arm of the defence of this nation—he meant the secretary of the navy—who, the last time he had had a conversation with him on the subject, was an open, avowed, undisguised, advocate of the immediate dissolution of the union.

Mr. Wise. I deny it.

Mr. Batts. What authority have you? Do you keep a record of the conversations of the secretary of the navy?

[Cries of "order," "order."]

Mr. Wise said he hoped his colleague would not fly into a flame. He did not mean to offend him; but to show that he was not a man of great authority, from conversation, from reading, or any other source, for saying that the present secretary of the navy ever went for the unqualified dissolution of the union. If he ever advanced this idea of dissolution, he (Mr. W.) undertook to say now in his place, and would do it, if he was wrong, that he ever avowed such a doctrine, it was not on a qualification, conditions, and reasons which the secretary could defend.

Mr. Batts said he had been induced, for some time, to regard his colleague as the keeper of the conscience of the king, but had not considered him the keeper of the consciences of all connected with the king. Nor did he recognise his right to say what was the opinion expressed by one of the secretaries of Mr. Tyler's cabinet. He (Mr. B.) asserted on his own responsibility that he had expressed such an idea. He had talked with him for hours, and when the secretary of the navy denied it, he (Mr. B.) would prove his statement. You said (Mr. B. addressing himself to Mr. Wise) have no right to deny it.

The speaker said the gentleman had no right to address a member on this floor.

Mr. Batts repeated that, when the secretary of the navy denied it, he would undertake to prove his statement. He challenged him to the proof. If it were to be any charges for high treason, he demanded that the secretary of the navy should be put on his trial. He was the man. Do not talk about expelling the venerable gentleman from this hall who was discharging his duty. He called the gentleman would proceed to action. He was but discharging his duty, he regarded as a constitutional and conscientious obligation by presenting the petition here. For his part, if he were not afraid the gentleman would abuse this courtesy, he should be most happy to afford him the opportunity of presenting that paper to the American people. He would not do so, but he would not be afraid to result from a dissolution of the union, and he had no doubt but it would operate as a corrective. He (Mr. B.) had been looking for this for some years past. He had been predicting that it would result in an application from the northern states of this kind, and he was not at all surprised that rule had been made for putting a wedge to that excitement of the gentleman from Massachusetts had said was increasing. When the northern states got the power of denying the right to the southern states of presenting any petition which they might consider a grievance, he ventured to say that they would have such petitions from the south. He regarded that as a great misapprehension had been imputed to the gentleman from Massachusetts on this floor. His course had been dictated from the purest considerations of patriotism. He regarded the gentleman as having been treated with cruel severity by the representatives in this body, and he hoped the question would have been taken without an angry debate. If he had not received the floor from the gentleman from Tennessee, he would himself have moved to lay the whole subject on the table. He hoped the gentleman would follow up his remarks with this motion.

Mr. Arnold, of Tennessee, said that he had truly "fallen on evil days." When a spectacle had that hour passed before for four or four days he might say the last five days, and, indeed, since its first assembling at the extra session. He might even go back further than that; for the last seven years scenes of this kind had been occurring, and with increasing frequency, and growing worse and worse, till now a stranger could not contemplate that house from the gallery without being reminded of the bloody French revolution. It was impossible to restore or to preserve order; the speaker had done everything in his power, but in vain. What could the puny arm of any speaker effect when gentlemen could so bravely disregard the authority of the speaker and of the house? Mr. A. went on to allude to some particulars of disorder which had recently occurred, during which he was several times interrupted, and explanations passed; but Mr. A. proclaimed himself as belonging to the peace party, and desired to avoid coming into personal collision with the other party. He wished to bully and fight, he begged them not to come to him; there were still a few of the Seminoles left; let them go and show their valor upon them. He appealed to gentlemen in behalf of the order of the house, and in the name of that country for which his and their fathers had fought and bled. [A laugh.] Could gentlemen laugh at that? If they did, he asked if banditti could behave worse? He was entirely serious, and nothing was further from his purpose than to provoke merriment; jokes were now out of time as well as out of place.

Mr. A. went on to argue the necessity of observing order. If gentlemen were determined to resist the authority of the body, they ought to leave it. He alluded to a contest during the called session, in which his life had been in imminent peril from personal violence; and during the present session, and within a few days, he had been bullied, apparently by concert and understanding, by a member who, he was told, came from Louisiana, and, according to the democratic version coming to his seat, told him "he was a d—d coward" and "a d—d blackguard," and that, if he did not behave better, "he would cut his throat from ear to ear." He would not condescend to either admit or deny this demonstration. He would not condescend to coming into the difficulty, and leave gentlemen fair notice that he belonged to the peace party. If the democracy employed persons to bully members here, he hoped that if any of them came to cut his throat he would make a mistake and cut his own, which would be a great deal better than his.

Mr. A. then rose to call Mr. A. to order for irrelevancy.

Mr. A. said he was speaking of the disorders of this house, and if there could be a case more directly relevant to that subject on the face of God Almighty's globe, he should be glad to hear it. If the democracy were to do these things to him, he thought they were better calculated to make a man's blood curdle in his veins. Was a man's life to be threatened because he endeavored to support the chair in enforcing the order of a legislative body? But let gentlemen take their course; neither pistols nor knives should ever be drawn, and he would never have a hair's breadth from the path of his duty. If they chose for this to murder him, let him try it; "a coward died many deaths, a brave man could die but once." These frequent scenes of uproar and disorder had operated as impediments, as chevaux de frise, in the channel of legislation, and the people observed and complained of it.

Mr. A. said he had a word or two to the aged gentleman from Massachusetts and the young gentleman from Virginia. In offering them he meant no offence. The gentleman's locks were bleached by the snows of four score years; his palsied hand might daily be witnessed by every gentleman who observed him in his seat, or when addressing the house; his feeble hand could scarcely hold a paper, and he knew that him that was near that bourne from which no traveller returns. He could say nothing willingly to wound the feelings of such a man. And he confessed that it gave him pain to see him bearded and assailed, again and again, from day to day, by those who were, in comparison, but bearded boys; nor did it cause him to retract his venerable opinion, which, when provoked, giving vent to his passions in the manner that was too often witnessed here. True, it was very natural, but yet it was greatly to be regretted. The gentleman's indomitable spirit was perfectly known to those who vexed him, and that no opposition could stand before him in the least degree, and he supposed himself to be in the right; and, therefore the more regretted to see these boys getting up and rasping and chafing and bullying him. Yes, boys—who were but of yesterday, in comparison to him, and who were not out of their swaddling clothes when that gentleman was serving his country in the highest station he had long known to be the chief order of the gentleman as a politician; he was among the boldest and most fearless; he never fought under a false flag, but "wore his heart upon the sleeve for every day to pick at." Mr. A. adverted to the days in which the gentleman from Massachusetts, the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise), and himself, had fought side by side under the same flag, and though he did not approve of all the gentleman did, he was still disposed to "Be to his faults a little blind,

Be to his virtues every kind."

He had hoped these disgraceful scenes had now reached their crisis. He had been amazed—, or, in a western phrase, he had been "stumped" at the proceedings of these gentlemen, and he felt that the gentleman from Massachusetts and the young gentleman from Virginia—to see two members of this house attacking each other as if they were ready to tear each other's eyes out! and yet, while they were thus assailing each other with the utmost vehemence, he had seen all the while the course, in effect, tended to the very same point, that the gentleman from Massachusetts was, in the sense charged by his opponent, an abolitionist, (but this Mr. A. denied). He hoped he should not offend the young gentleman from Virginia if he said that his efforts yesterday and the day before—his violent, furious, heated, and unbecomingly personal remarks, and his readings by the hour from abolition documents, were all so many more potent instruments in the hands of the abolitionists than anything else on the face of the globe; it would do more to advance their cause than any thing that had ever yet been done in this country. The gentleman had told him and told the country that they were backed by the mighty power of England, and that of all the crowned heads of Europe; they were all in a general combination to push on this cause; and, superadded to all, that they had the aid of a powerful English party in this country. He asked, which was the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, or his gentleman power and abilities he had dwelt in the very highest terms, and had sent forth this from this hall of congress to the four winds of heaven. Was any thing, could any thing be better calculated to stir up every abolitionist in the land to fresh activity, and to make him feel that now was the accepted time? Had the gentleman from Massachusetts been an abolitionist in the most exceptionable sense of that term, he might have struggled for years, ay till the grave had covered him, and not done as much to aid the designs of those men as would be accomplished by these unfortunate admissions of the gentleman from Virginia. He had said that there were millions of slaves ready at the first sound of the tocsin, at the first gleam of the torch of the incendiary, to leap forth and strike for emancipation, and there was a powerful army levied in the West Indies, and another in Canada, ready to aid them. But as to what the gentleman had said of the English party in this country, it was a column of smoke, an abolitionist in Mr. A. denied it: there was no such British party; he said it sounded very much like the remnant of an old stump speech [a laugh] prepared for some obscure neighborhood where the people did not read much; and it put Mr. A. in mind of a speech he had once made, and which with the concurrence by a stump orator in the west before an election, when he got down from the stump, said to Mr. A. with a laugh, "did I not put it into them about a British party? I know they hate Adams, and I thought that more likely to go down with them than any thing else I could say." Mr. A. had seen the same farce played off more than once; but it was now most unimply.

Mr. A. next proceeded to notice some very extraordinary points of coincidence between the aged and venerable gentleman from Massachusetts and the young gentleman from Virginia. The young gentleman had charged Mr. A. with being a federalist, and a descendant of the federal aristocracy; and then made a great flourish about his own descent from the old federalists of Virginia, and of his family being associated with the Marshalls. Nay, he had not a relative, living or dead, on the ground or under it, who was not a federalist; and he did not intend to let them abuse here. Here, then, were a couple tended one way, that a system of federalism was a sham fight—that they were, in reality, kith and kin, and allies, leagued together to help up the cause of abolition.

[Here some explanations passed, in which Mr. A. denied his having ever admitted that he was or ever had been a federalist.]

Mr. A. admitted this, but his family were; and what was bred in the bone was hard to get out of the flesh. [A laugh.] All his fathers had lived and died federalists; he, alone, was a democrat. That circumstance, alone, was enough to subject him to suspicion. He and the gentleman from Massachusetts were very often voted together on a number of occasions, and he believed they were both what were called "Tyler whigs," and supporters of the present administration. Mr. A. understood such to be the sentiments of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and that he was opposed to restricting the veto, as proposed by a distinguished senator in the other house.

The gentleman from Virginia was a Tyler whig, of course; but Mr. A. must say he thought that he had observed of late that the gentleman was shifting his sails a little. Probably he perceived that Captain Tyler was likely to get nothing more than a corporal's guard, and that at the same time he noticed with satisfaction the very loving attachment and loyalty manifested toward himself by that modern "democracy" which nobody living had so exorciated for years as that very gentleman. Oh, if any thing was to come of this, it would be a great loss to the country. These men, on whom he had once the most vituperative epithets that the language afforded, now consulting him on all occasions, and ready to fawn and lick his very feet! But a whipped cur was ever the most fawning dog.

According to appearances, Mr. A. rather suspected that "Captain Tyler" would before very long be left his own weight, and the corporal's guard would now adhere to him. The country, it would seem, was to be divided between a great whig party on the one hand, and on the other the old locofoco party headed by the gentleman from Virginia. [A laugh.] Coming events were said to cast their shadows before; and it might be like that the redoubtable Captain Tyler, in attempting to sit upon two stools, would soon fall flat on the ground—a fate he well deserved, as every traitor did.

Such being the coincidences between those two brother federalists, Mr. A. thought that they ought to make up and meet as friends. Indeed, they seemed made for it, like that the redoubtable Captain Tyler, in their tempers and passions. Both were of the genuine federal stock—both were opposed to abolition—and they were pretempore at least, both supporters of the present administration. Clearly, then, they ought to shake hands. They were both ruling spirits of disorganization and confusion in this house; and they were, in the respect, such a complete match, that Mr. A. had more than once remarked that if they were put in a bag together, and well shaken, he did not know which would fall out first. [Laughter.]

Having said thus much to the young gentleman from Virginia, who he hoped would take occasion to say for he had a terrible horror of coming in contact with that gentleman. [Laugh.]

Mr. Wise. The gentleman can't offend me.

Mr. Arnold. I am glad, indeed, to hear that I can't make the gentleman mad. Indeed, I think he is in a much better humor to-day than I have seen him for a long time. He does not look near so cross and fiery as he did yesterday. I am in hopes that the advice I have given him has done him good; and were it not that "die democracy" have so much stronger temptations for him than I can pretend to have, I should really begin to hope that I had made a convert of him.

Mr. A. said he had pursued a different course from that of many of his colleagues on the subject of politics. He felt enmity to none of them. On the contrary, he was actuated by a very friendly feeling, and he had wrestled with himself and had tried his best to join them—he did not say to satisfy his conscience, for, since a certain event, that word had become a strange thing.

After some remarks in which Mr. A. referred to his course at the opening of the present session, his endeavors to enforce order and his determination to do his opponents ample justice, and the feelings of disappointment he had experienced, he said that he now wished to address a word to his southern neighbors and colleagues. It had been a painful thing to him to separate from them, and in hopes that the reading to be pursued towards enforcing the 21st rule and towards the right of petition generally. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Underwood) had anticipated much of what he had intended to say on that subject, and he said much better than Mr. A. could pretend to do, and he was glad to see that the reading his friends were well to that gentleman as to the gentleman from Virginia near him (Mr. Botts) for the exhibition they had this day made of that rare virtue among politicians, moral courage. Yes, it was a rare virtue, and the want of it was the greatest evil that had long afflicted the political condition of the country. He continually consulted and inquired, and whatever might be their convictions of right, would go for nothing unless all their friends went with them. If he were asked what was the greatest calamity that exhibited itself in our public affairs, his answer would be, a want of sufficient moral courage in politicians to do what they saw and believed to be right.

He would now address a few words to his friend from Virginia, (Mr. Wise). We had now reached a eris on this matter of petition from one side or the other must give way, or the union be dissolved and its destruction be followed by all the horrors of civil war. What good result could arise from keeping open the question on this 21st rule? When a petition was sent to a member in that house, no member would sign it, and the petition would be destroyed for want of reluctance was it that he refused to present the petition, particularly if he was pretty hard run in his district, and had been elected but by a small majority.

Mr. A. would take the broad ground, and affirm that to maintain that the people have no right to petition in all cases was tantamount to saying that they were not capable of self-government, than which no greater heresy could be uttered against the fundamental principles of free democratic government.—The people were the rightful sovereigns of the land; their hands were the issues of power, life, and death. To refuse them the right of expressing their wishes to their own representatives was rank aristocracy; it was the doctrine of the few governing the many.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Underwood) had said it down as a principle that in a case where Congress had no jurisdiction, the petition could not be received. Now, the gentleman from Kentucky was a cool, deliberate and judicious man, and his authority had weight on the one hand, but on the other, the gentleman from Massachusetts, whom even his opponent from Virginia had admitted to be the first in the country in the study of the constitution, and the best judge of international law at present living, and whose original intellect, though he now approached four score, still sparkled in all its brilliancy, and threw its light on every thing he touched, this gentleman maintained that the right of petition stood on equal ground with the freedom of speech of the people. Who would dispute this? The doctors disagreed? Mr. A. confessed that he was afraid to vote against the right of petition, because he did not know how soon the south might come here as a petitioner herself. It was a constitutional right, and he thought that petitions had better, in all cases, be received. He thanked the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Bells) for the judicious views he had expressed on that subject.

On this principle the gentleman from Massachusetts had acted, and for this it was proposed to censure him. Was it possible that that gentleman could desire the dissolution of the union? What conceivable motive could he have to attempt such a thing?—Stronger motives were urged than this. He was under no expectation of a higher station than he now occupied, being past the era of aspiring and grasping ambition, his name was all he now possessed, and that he wished to leave to his descendants bright and shining as the noon day sun. Should he succeed in dissolving or even attempt to dissolve the union of these states, he well knew that it must, than his name, all posterity; and, instead of going down in a blaze of glory, it would sink in darkness, shame and lasting contempt. Was it likely that the son of old John Adams, that man whose independent mind preferred Washington, though a Virginian, as the commander-in-chief of the armies of the revolution, and whose voice had first raised the sound of independence and delivered us from a foreign yoke, was it his son who would plot treason? No, he never could believe it. He had presented this petition because he wanted, as the last and most glorious act of a long life, to send forth in these times of general confusion and political degeneracy, a paper with lessons to be learned, and report directly adverse to the prayer of the petition, and which should state in a luminous and convincing manner all the strong arguments in favor of union.—Mr. A. wanted to see such a paper from his hand. If it should even squint toward dissolving the union, or recommending war, or union with any foreign states or in the District of Columbia, he should be greatly disappointed and astonished. But he should like to see in letters of light living, from the able pen of that venerable patriot, an argument for the perpetuity of this union. Such a paper he should be ready to esteem next to that farewell address which had been read on the present occasion, and he would say that, when that paper should be submitted to the public eye, all doubts as to the purity and patriotism of its author would forever vanish, and he would stand before this nation and before all posterity as a patriot alone.

On the crime of presenting a petition with such an object in view, the house was to put on record against him a charge of aiding in high treason, and in suborning the members of that house to the commission of perjury; and he was to consider it as a great favor that the house did not expel him, but contented itself with giving him a reprimand. Mr. A. should like to see that expectation of a small reward to see that gentleman standing at the bar, with his paled hand, his bare head, and whitened locks, to be rebuked by the speaker, comparatively a mere boy, after having been visited with the vituperation and vindictive persecution of another, as much a boy in comparison. What a spectacle! Mr. A. turned from the thought with loathing and disgust, and would the nation? So far from helping the cause of the south, it would kindle up against her a blaze high as the very heavens. He was against it—utterly and totally against it—from principle and from policy too.

Now, there was a little fact which had come to his knowledge, and which he wanted to state on this matter. He was told that the leading man among the signers of that treasonable petition was himself a modern loco loco, a Van Buren man, who ran on the loco loco ticket as a candidate for the senate of Massachusetts. The man was a disunionist, and that very fact probably had constituted one of the reasons why the whigs refused to receive him. This fact showed the villainy of the farce which it was here attempted to play. Who were the men that were thirsting for the blood of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and crying out "crucify, crucify?" They were the political associates of the man who had just been elected to the senate of his country. His name was Nathan Webster; no relation of Daniel, although as to Daniel himself Mr. A. did not know exactly how he was now figuring before the nation. He greatly feared that he would turn out a real New Hampshire man, and that was but another name for a man of the same kind and the same heart. Daniel, however, had at least this praise, that he had never set himself against this union. And now what was the house going to do? To punish the gentleman from Massachusetts for presenting here a petition which their own political friends had sent to him. Was this a proof that the wanted the union dissolved, and the locos to rule? Or, were they the political friends of the gentleman here were enemies of the union. All the gentlemen from Massachusetts desired was to have an opportunity of replying to these petitioners, and, if he once got that opportunity, Mr. Arnold would become security that Mr. Nathan Webster would never send another such petition here.

What a farce was this whole matter of the 21st rule! What a perfect failure? The house had been more perplexed with it than it would have been without it, because, from the nature of the case, no rule could be adopted that would not have that effect. Gentlemen might as well attempt to dam up the waters of the Niagara as to attempt to stay this right of petition. It was a vain thing, and the locos were on by this rule! Its only effect was to combine with abolitionists all the multitudes who contend for the right of petition. It gained them converts by the hundred, by the thousand. It exasperated the minds of the people, disgusted them with their government, made men care less and less for the union, and prepared them for its dissolution. The free states had now a majority of forty-four in that house. Under the new census they would have fifty-three. The cause of the slaveholding states was getting weaker and weaker, and what were they to do? Gentlemen preached to them that they must rely on the modern democracy of the north. God deliver them from such an alliance! A gentleman from N. Hampshire had called that state the Switzerland of America, and he spoke truly, for her inhabitants were Swiss. [A laugh.] They always fought for those who paid most. There was but one way to keep their friendship, and that was to bait the dogs with the same bait. They were to be allies, trusted to a broken staff, they trod upon ground covered with deceitful ashes. As soon as the south should attempt to do justice between man and man, these mercenary Swiss would instantly desert them; ay, and would be ready to turn round and aid the blacks in cutting their throats.

Mr. A. was ready to concede the right of petition, but he would never yield the right to interfere with slavery within the states, where it had been recognised by the constitution. This had been done in three distinct articles of that sacred covenant. The south stood upon her rights, and insisted upon them, and would not be coerced by their doings, let them alone. If they had a cancer which was eating into their vitals, they did not want the northern probe rudely thrust in to take what little life they had left. All such interference only riveted the chains of the slave. The north might enrich their cities, and improve their dwellings, but such conflagration, such forcible emancipation never would be submitted to so long as life and breath remained. A political and civil equality between whites and blacks never could be established in those states. The thought of it was vain; slavery was their misfortune, not their crime. There was here no remedy, and there was no remedy. The northern remedies were worse than the disease. Did gentlemen suppose that southern men would ever suffer their daughters to be the associates of Quashimpo or enter into alliance with negro husbands? Did they themselves desire to sit in this house chuck-by-jowl with a woolly headed number, who used in ten years to give him no perturbation? He had confidence in his northern brethren; he could not believe that they wanted to invade the south and help the slaves to cut the throats of their wives and children. They could not desire to see the flames of their habitations quenched by human blood.

His friend before him, (Mr. Slade), was said to be an abolitionist; but he had lived six months in the house before he had seen a man who gave him no perturbation on familiar terms with him, and had never heard the subject of abolition mentioned. Would that man lend his aid in effecting such a result? No; it was contrary to the Christian religion—it was against all the better feelings of our nature. The pretext for opposing slavery was a Christian feeling, and a feeling, and could humanity, could Christianity, lead men to abet insurrection, devastation and bloodshed? Mr. A. had supported a northern president, and that when the billows of Jacksonism were rolling in a flood over the land. He had voted for a Massachusetts man in spite of every objection; and he had turned to the north and said to his northern brethren, "Let us alone." He was willing to receive their petitions under the constitution; they must be willing to surrender up fugitive slaves, and to resist a servile war, under the provisions of the same sacred instrument.

And now he would add one word to his northern friends, and that was, that he would not rely on if the union were dissolved? Suppose the dissolution could be peaceably effected, (if that did involve a contradiction in terms), what had the south to depend upon? All the crowned heads were against her. A million of slaves were ready to rise, and tap for freedom, and then the drums would be taken up, they to cut loose from their friends at the north, (friends they ought to be, and without them the south had no friends), whither were they to look for protection? How were they to sustain an assault from England or France, with that cancer at their vitals? The more the south reflected, the more warily she must see that she had a deep and vital interest in maintaining the union.

Mr. A. had been gratified to hear the farewell address of the father of his country read in that hall. He loved to hear it. He ever made Washington his model, considering as he did that purity and integrity were the two leading virtues of his character, and he had ever believed that purity and integrity were also the two leading virtues of his country.

The young gentleman from Virginia had told the house that he was not descended from the aristocracy of the land; neither was Mr. A. As a celebrated democratic orator in a certain western legislature had said when defending Captain Tyler, "he was descended from the Pilgrim family that landed on Plymouth Rock in the Old Dominion, commonly called the state of Virginia." His father had been no federalist but a Jeffersonian democrat. He would as lief have been called a mad dog as called a federalist. At the very sound of the word he laid his hand on his broad axe. He must say that he thought his young friend had been particularly unfortunate in a reference to the philosopher of Monticello in alluding to his "domestic relations." None were without their follies, and Mr. Jefferson had his; but no friend of his memory acted prudently in referring to that part of his character. Mr. A. here related some anecdotes of his own early history, illustrating the character of his father, and then he related the particulars of a visit he made to Mount Vernon, the feelings of solemn veneration with which he had been led through apartments once familiar to General Washington, and the effect of a solitary visit to his tomb, where Mr. A. had solemnly vowed, in the presence of God and man, to be as true to the principles of Jefferson as he was to the principles of his own father. He had never broken his vow. He afterwards made a similar visit to Monticello, and, in inquiring in the vicinity as to the private character and deportment of Mr. Jefferson, had become abundantly satisfied that the lovers of his country were to be proud in never alluding again to his "domestic relations."

This led him to speak of the condition of Virginia, which he compared to the ruins of ancient Thebes, on which nothing was to be seen but the vulture, or the carrion crow, and at whose base no inhabitants were to be found but the fox and the jackal. She could boast of having given birth to some of the great names of her kind. Her sons were the names of Washington, and Jefferson, and Madison, and Marshall, but there, with a few bright exceptions, her boast must for the present stop.

Before he resumed his seat, he must be allowed one word to his young friend from Virginia. That gentleman was quite ferocious towards abolitionists, but who were to my own allies at this moment in the other end of the Capitol.

In Ohio, there had once been a man who was familiarly called Ben Tappan, a brother to the great abolitionist of that name in the north—to that Arthur Tappan who had, by the power of his money, recently gotten up an abolition convention and nominated a governor, perhaps a president, and who had appointed a committee to advise the negroes of the south to run away, burn their masters' houses, and cut their throats. Now, with regard to this Benjamin Tappan, with whom the gentleman was now in intimate alliance, it was very commonly said, and universally believed in Ohio, that he was a hypocrite, and that if he came to the northern bank of the Ohio and saw across the river the slaves burning the plantations and cutting the throats of women and children, he would fold his arms, and not lift a finger to stop the massacre; and that if his son attempted to go to the rescue of the unfortunate whites and blacks of the South, he would shoot him, and could act in concert with a blood thirsty wretch like this, could get up here and lecture that house on abolition; and if men from the south would not agree with him, and go the entire length that he did, they were to be denounced by some Clement C. Clay, or by the gentleman himself, as abolitionists, while, at the same moment, he could take to his bosom one who had avowed feelings so odious and damnable!

Mr. A. here alluding to the late hour and the fatigued condition of the house, said that he thought it quite time to close this debate, and with a view to do so, he would move to lay the whole subject on the table.

At this moment many gentlemen rose to their feet desirous to address the chair, and the remonstrances were so loud and numerous that Mr. A. said that he would not set himself up in opposition to the wishes of the house, and should not, therefore, insist upon his motion.

And the speaker gave the floor to Mr. M. Mr. Saltonstall, who went into a statement of the facts relating to the obnoxious petition presented by Mr. Adams, upon which all the present difficulties had arisen. He gave a history of the rise and progress of the idea of dissolving the union, beginning with the various threats from the south, and the great efforts of the union for its preservation, and the passage of the tariff, from the nullification party, &c. This petition was from his own native town, Haverhill, and he felt much surprised and distressed at the circumstance.

Mr. S. then went into a vigorous reply to Mr. Hise, and eloquently defended his friends, and charged against him in the long speech of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. Thompson, of Indiana, rose and said he thought this debate had proceeded far enough, and that no good end could be obtained by letting it go on; he therefore moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

After several motions for calls of the house yeas and nays, and motion to adjourn, the house, at seven o'clock, adjourned.

FRIDAY, JAN. 28. Mr. Marshall having appeared to Mr. Thompson to withdraw his motion, and promised to renew it if withdrawn, Mr. T. thereupon withdrew it.

Mr. Marshall said he had risen for the purpose of endeavoring, at least, to extricate the proposition he had offered to the house from all those matters extraneous to it which had so assiduously been attempted to be connected with it, as well by those who were its avowed enemies, as by those who had professed, in addressing the friends of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and those who had addressed the house in his defence, had pressed on its consideration the situation in which he was placed before this house, by the charges said to be contained in the resolutions Mr. M. had had the honor to propose. But it ought to be remembered that the motion was made before the introduction of any party opinion, in which Mr. M. must appear as the accused party. He had been well aware of the past services, of the weight of character, of the dignity, of the learning, and of the important position of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts in that house and before the world. He was well aware that the gentleman was infinitely distant from him in age, reputation, and personal importance and standing before that house; yet, notwithstanding all this, operated upon as he was by motives which he considered adequate, he had deliberately chosen the course he had pursued, under all the circumstances which attended it. He had been accused Mr. M. of having charged the gentleman from Mass. with subornation of perjury and with high treason. How was it possible but that even the most cursory and hasty reading of the resolutions he had offered was not of itself sufficient to show to any man that they contained no such charge against a member from Massachusetts? He should not abuse the patience of the house by introducing what was irrelevant to the subject; but, before he came to what was the real question, he must be permitted to take some little notice of what had yesterday fallen from his friend from Virginia, over the way, (Mr. Hise.) He entertained the highest respect for that gentleman, and for the friends of the north from him politically as widely as do the poles, and he would be the last to allow his views on the present subject to go before the country on the grounds on which they had been placed by that gentleman.

Mr. Hise interposed, and said that he never had intended to say in any way, in his address, that resolutions offered by the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. M.) in what he had said yesterday and the day before, he had spoken on the question of printing them, and of printing alone—not to advocate the resolutions, but to excuse himself from voting on the case of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman from Kentucky said that he had printed his speech by disavowing his willingness to leave his proposition to rest on any grounds taken by Mr. W., for he had not intended that what he said on that occasion should be understood as having anything to do with it whatever.

Mr. Marshall resumed. He was glad to hear this disclaimer on the part of his friend, and was very thankful that the first story was not told; for the gentleman indeed intended his speech as friendly to Mr. M.'s proposition, he should have been tempted to exclaim, in the words of the Spanish proverb, "God deliver me from my friends, and I will take care of my enemies." Mr. M. had read the report of the gentleman's speech with great attention, and should he, in the process of condensation, reduce the speech of the gentleman to the form of distinct resolutions, they would amount to about these: 1. Resolved, That the existence of slavery as an institution is essential to the preservation of liberty and equality. [A laugh.] 2. Resolved, That there has been, from the very foundation of this government, an English and an American party, led and headed by the house of Brintine, its object being to bring back this country under the dominion of England, and that this is northern policy and northern principle. 3. Resolved, That this language was once uttered by Mr. Jefferson; that, being afterwards somewhat revived, it was again carried by General Jackson; but that it still retaining the principle of vitality, and now appearing under the gentleman from Massachusetts, it will again be crushed, if the whole south will unite and rally against the entire north, in this attack against liberty and equality, and in favor of England, led on by John Tyler, A. Reel, that one Mr. Hise, schemes of this English party, to destroy this confederacy of this English party, by which English commerce is to be established, by which English commerce is to be curtailed, by which a threatening rival to her is to be raised up in the north—the right arm of England, viz. her manufacturing industry, and the power of her machinery, is to be palsied, and the north to be cut out of the world, and the great customer, not only of our own country, but of the rest of the world. And this is to be the means by which England is to be conciliated, and with her consequent aid this union is to be dissolved! [Loud laughter.]

Now, against both this last statement of fact, and the conclusion drawn upon it, Mr. M. begged leave to enter his dissent. He said that the gentleman might or might not have had in view in offering the resolutions which he had submitted to the house, the very last was to revive here, and at a time like this, the bitter and venomous animosities of 1801. Those unhappy enemies grew out of a state of the world which had been the cause of the country, which existed no longer, and never could exist again.

He entered his unqualified denial that the federalists whatever might have been their mistakes had been traitors to the country. Friends of England, to the injury or dishonor of their own country, they never were. In the then existing state of the world, and in the then existing state of the country, they were not only not traitors, but they were patriotically and dangerously disturbed, when one vast military power was rising over the subjected and afflicted kingdoms around, and when one gigantic and commanding mind was wielding that entire mass of military force with as much ease as if it were a willow wand, and when he felt that it was not for the State to abandon her neutral position, but to be assailing that power whose navy alone prevented the establishment of a despotism such as none of the Caesars ever equalled in power, and which would very speedily have overshadowed the world. This had been his honest belief; but public opinion condemned him. He had been charged with treason, and the friends of Washington and had entered his family at 19 years of age and had been appointed by him second in command, had treason in his heart, it would be hard to convince him of it. His positions in regard to a navy, to a bank of the United States and other kindred measures were formed in the school of that democratic sacred dust now reposed on the banks of the Potomac.

Mr. M. said he had not brought forward the measure proposed in the resolutions he had offered as being peculiarly a southern measure—neither had he proposed it as peculiarly a northern measure. It had been a measure of a general nature, a measure in any sense, but purely as an American measure—a test of how much American feeling existed in that body, and as according to all who were actuated by it an opportunity of subscribing hereto what he deemed the true doctrine of the constitution, in which all good and true hearted patriots could unite, and which would secure the peace and happiness of this country.

Thus much for what might be considered as in some sort foreign to the subject immediately before the house. He came now to the matter in hand.

And first he had a word to say on the nature of the defence which had been here set up.

The defence had been made that the true design of the movement had been, that Mr. Adams might have an opportunity to seal the lips of the petitioners by a triumphant report against them. This had, in substance, been the defence set up, not by the gentleman from Massachusetts, but by the ablest of his advocates. Now, if that defence had been urged before this house by the accused himself, if he had so much as breathed such a wish, as had been ascribed to him by his eloquent champion from Virginia, (Mr. Bolls,) it would have had such an effect on the feelings of Mr. M. as might possibly have prevailed with him at that moment to withdraw his resolutions. But Mr. M. could not consent to overlook the defence set up by the gentleman himself, and be thus turned over to the defences advanced for him by others. What had the gentleman said? As to what he might have uttered in the irritation of the moment against Mr. M. himself, it had gone by; his mind was occupied by things so much higher, and in which he felt so much deeper interest, that things of this kind could make but little impression upon him. And, although the judgment of the gentleman from Massachusetts could not but have great weight in that house; and although the gentleman had denounced Mr. M. as not possessing a mind enough to judge of the meaning of the constitution, and that he was guilty of the heinous crime of high treason, and as one who had suffered so deeply from habits of intemperance that it would take him three years to recover sufficiently to be fit to go to a law school; and though the gentleman had said that Mr. M. had admitted to him in private conversation that he was under the great oppression under a refusal to receive their petitions—

Mr. Adams observed that what he had said was, that the gentleman from Kentucky had admitted to him, in private conversation, that he was a friend to the right of petition, and believed abolition petitions ought to be received.

Mr. Marshall expressed himself as happy in being thus corrected, and true that he had taken the ground that abolition memorials ought to be received, but not as a matter of right, but purely as a matter of expediency. He still thought so; he believed it would be expedient to repeal the 21st rule, to receive all those memorials, and to refer them to a select committee, with the gentleman from Massachusetts at its head; that he might have an opportunity of telling that house, the south, and the world, what it was that northern men really thought on that subject, and what they would be at.

But to proceed, Mr. M. had been actuated in this whole proceeding by no personal feeling hostile to the gentleman from Kentucky, but by the great humanitarian thought, by those irritating aunts which no man better understood than himself, to sting Mr. M. into a want of propriety in his deportment in that hall, he misunderstood the character of the man, intemperate as he might deem him to be.

The petition which had given rise to this proceeding was a petition of a general nature. It traversed the national legislature to take the preliminary steps to a dissolution of this union. What was the defence which had been set up for such a document? Two points had been made: first, the gentleman insisted upon the right of these petitioners to do this thing. And then, in the second place, doing this right,atory act of no value unless they might petition congress to effect such dissolution. What did this argument prove? That the American government cannot be abolished by the American people without their asking congress to do it. This was the body which must destroy the union, if it was to destroy it at all.

And then the gentleman, as the next step of his argument, has gone on to enumerate the grievances which led these people to desire a dissolution of the union, and the grievances were almost without num-and the other at the other end! [Laughter, loud and long.]

Oh, sir, "tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon." If the doctrine is true, then these two great political leaders have combined together once more; they are in common consultation to overthrow the constitution, and I suppose that I, as a good whig, am bound to follow them. The devil take me if I do. [Convulsions of laughter.] That is running the game into the ground with a vengeance.

I did indeed vote for the repeal of the 21st rule, but I never have seen what it is. I believe the real object of the gentleman from Massachusetts—after he has avowed himself to be an alarmist, and his friend has warned us to remember that he is a descendant of an English band of government overthrowers—I cannot consent to trust him with any thing in which the existence of this government is at stake, or shall I act inconsistently. The 21st rule still remains in force, and I will not lend the gentleman my aid in surreptitiously getting into this house what that rule forbids.

The gentleman has charged me with being an enemy of the north, and with a purpose to oppose her. Mr. M. discourses in a manner that I cannot be a friend to the north and a friend to American labor. We are warned not to censure this the first proposition ever yet heard in this land to break down the fair fabric of the union! What is it come to this! This proposition goes a whole stone's cast beyond any thing that has been said in this chamber since the late Mr. W. made his famous English brains want a hint straightway to improve on it. The convention that sat at Columbia never took the ground that congress had power to dissolve the union, nor did they so much as pretend that they were themselves overthrowing the constitution. I know what they thought, though I differed from them, and shall forever differ. They said that they were maintaining the constitution. They insisted that they had a right, though I never could see where they got it from, to arrest the execution of what they deemed an unconstitutional law, until there was time for the voice of all the other states to be heard upon it; but they never pretended that their rights were nullified unless they could come to congress and pray this vote to dissolve the union. If I vote for any such measure—for a measure which professes to be preparatory to it—I am guilty of perjury; for I have been sworn, over and over, not to destroy, but to support the constitution on its principles, and the instrument of my support, and I am bound by my oath to uphold it now and forever.

But we are told that the gentleman is an old man, and that therefore we must not censure him; it would be an ungracious act to pass a vote of censure on one so venerable. Are we to treat him as some old imbecile, whom it is not worth while to notice? No, sir, far from it. His friends have arrayed him in the armor of civility that can make a man at once great and terrible. They have conceded to his hand every instrument of mighty mischief—gifts of understanding, of eloquence, of knowledge, of dignity, of power, to move the public mind; and yet, after painting him thus, the same gentleman turns round and tells us that he is no fit subject for the action of this house. Sir, I have listened to that gentleman most attentively whenever he has risen to address this house. I have placed myself near his seat and listened with profound attention to every word which has proceeded from his venerable lips. I wanted to see what was really the course he designed to pursue; for one who has so much power.

If the gentleman's own declarations and action are to be trusted as true exponents of his purpose, his purpose is that which is expressed in the petition he has offered; it is the ultimate and utter ruin of southern institutions; and I now call upon northern men to say whether they are willing to pass such a law. I ask them to tell me whether they are the views of the able and honorable men who represent northern interests on this floor. Does the north really mean this, and do they put this gentleman forward by way of feeler, because his age and dignity, and past services, and venerable appearance are such as will suspend the act of this house to punish him? Do they seek to escape personal responsibility? When the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Giddings) the other day shook hands with tears in his eyes with my colleague over the way, and my colleague, with scarce less emotion, shook hands with him, he talked much of friendly understanding and sympathy, and of the friendship of my colleague and all southern gentlemen that he had no thought of such a thing as interfering with slavery within the states where it existed; but he and his friends wanted to be free from the expense of maintaining it, and he was fast going on to explain himself further, when, at that moment, southern gentlemen rose and stopped him. I entertained them not to do so; I implored them to let him talk on. The gentleman is a neighbor of mine; we are separated but by a narrow river; the views of him and his friends are of deep and vital interest to our section of the country, and we never were so near getting at what his views actually are. I wanted to hear him; I wanted to hear what he would say under this new born alliance between himself and my colleague.

This is the first time that any man has been bold enough to introduce on this floor a paper proposing a dissolution of the union. He ought to be boldly met. If we meet him and his proposition with as decided a resolution as he meets us with, we will show the infamous proposal to us to break our oaths in tones of that indignant thunder which it justly merits; it will have a healthful effect throughout this land; it will gladden the heart and strengthen the hands of every loyal true-hearted American citizen, of whom I well know there are millions at this day in the north; and it will have the novel effect of checking this gentleman and his associates in any further proceedings they may now meditate in this line of policy.

For all the bitter and venomous things he has said against me, I forgive him. He said that I boasted of my aristocratic blood. I will not characterize that assertion as it deserves. I forgive him that too; and I will in my power to exercise from this point that civility that denotes a gentleman, which threatens all that is dear to me—if it were possible that he could be brought, in any good degree, to recant what he has here declared—if I could see any gleaming of that spirit of pacification, that love for the constitution, and that zeal for the union, which it is my duty according to him by others would instantly and joyfully retract all that I have said.

I am the last man on this earth who would wish to strike at that venerable head, whose past history, whose advanced age, whose distinguished talents, all whose associations plead so strongly to spare the blood.

Mr. Marshall renewed the motion to lay the whole subject on the table, at the same time expressing his earnest hope that the motion he was thus compelled by promise to make would not prevail.

And by yeas 96, nays 110, the house refused to lay the subject on the table.

A question recurring on the substitute amendment of Mr. Adams.

Mr. Adams rose and said: I have heard it said by a person acquainted with Warren Hastings—

Mr. Gilmer rose to a point of order. He said that he had made four or five efforts to obtain the floor.—And all that he desired to know was, whether, before he could be entitled to the floor, he would be required by parliamentary courtesy, to say a few words not in relation to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, but that which he (Mr. G.) had himself offered?

The speaker said that unless the whole subject should be laid on the table, or the previous question should be demanded, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Gilmer) would be entitled, by the rule, to close the debate.

Mr. Gilmer explained that he had not risen to any point of order in relation to the personal right to the floor of the gentleman from Massachusetts, or with any personal or political reference to the subject, so far as that gentleman was concerned. The point is laid entirely to himself, (Mr. G.) and he begged the pardon of the gentleman from Massachusetts for interrupting him.

Mr. Adams said there was no occasion to ask his pardon for taking the floor from him. He did not feel that he was not of the same rank with the gentleman that gentleman, (Mr. Gilmer). If he (Mr. A.) was to answer for one crime, he might as well be called to answer for half a dozen, or ten, or twenty. The proposition of the gentleman from Virginia was one which would materially enrich and make more narrow the defence. That charge he should have been willing to have met once.

Mr. A. alluded to the distress which, he could not deny, the propositions, both of the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Kentucky, had given him, and said that the most poignant part of that distress arose from the fact that the house would be under the necessity of consuming a large portion of its time in its defence, if he was to be held to answer the charges of the gentleman from Kentucky. And the first proposition that he should make was, what he had already insisted upon, as would appear by the journal, namely, that he should be entitled to the house for a trial before his peers upon the charges of malice and calumny and perjury and treason, and these charges were contained in the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, whatever injury the gentleman might have used in his remarks to-day to explain them away.

Amongst other things, the gentleman had stated that it was not him (Mr. A.) that he charged, but that, if any body, it was the petitioners; and the gentleman had made a speech of upwards of two hours duration, to prove that he (Mr. A.) was responsible for the very same things as those who had signed the petition. He (Mr. M.) had represented him (Mr. A.) in his speech as in favor of the petition, in the face of his express declaration to the contrary; had not the gentleman from Kentucky logic enough (if he had not law) to see that the very proposition that this house should instruct the committee to report against the petition, was a declaration on the part of this house, at the very first instant, that they held no such right as to change the views of those who had signed it, and only in defence of the sacred right of the petitioners to present their grievances here, would they answer the petition and assign reasons why the prayer of it should not be granted.

He had heard it said by a person acquainted with Warren Hastings that when he was brought before the judicial tribunals of his country for the commission of high crimes, upon the trial which lasted (Mr. A. believed) seven years; when the thunders of eloquence of Edmund Burke and Robert Brindley Sheridan were poured upon his head, he almost thought that he was guilty of the crimes with which he had been charged. He thought that he was in a position in which he was assailed. The eloquence which the gentleman from Kentucky had now exercised personally against him, under the profession of having no personal feeling, was equal to that of Burke and Sheridan combined. But he (Mr. A.) did assure the gentleman and the house that, under the circumstances, he thought the idea deeply improper upon his mind that he was guilty of any part of the charges brought against him. Not for one moment had he been driven from that sense of conscious innocence with which he met this charge, coming, as it did, from the most extraordinary combination of parties that had ever before formed in this house, a combination of men of formidable character. What was that combination? It came in the first place from the state of Georgia. The first attack upon him here had been from Georgia whigs. [Mr. A. recapitulated the circumstances attending the presentation of the petition and letter from Clarksville, Georgia, so postmarked and mailed to the Virginia Convention, by Mr. (John) A. Adams.] To the opinions expressed by the members from Georgia that that petition was a hoax, had added a fact unknown to him (Mr. A.) that the petition and letter were written on congressional paper. Did the gentleman mean to say that he was privy to the composition of these papers?

Mr. A. said that he had not examined the paper, but he had been told that it was the same kind—that it was gilt-edged, and that the signatures were all in one handwriting. The impression of all was that it was a hoax. He had never seen the paper till he had seen it at the clerk's desk. The representatives from the state of Georgia disclaimed any knowledge of it. And if the gentleman from Massachusetts had taken the same precaution, in reference to that petition, as he had done in reference to the petition now pending—written home to see if the paper was genuine—he would have found out whether the signatures were true or not.

Mr. Adams said he did not feel himself bound to send to Georgia to do so. If it was a hoax, the injury was the greater to his rights and to the rights of his constituents, and the breach of privilege to him was greater than if the paper had been genuine. If, therefore, the gentleman's information was correct, and if the petition was on congress paper, what was the inference? That it was a fabrication on the part of some of the members of the Georgia Convention, and that it was a fabrication of the kind which had been brought into the difficulty into which he had been brought.—It might be so. In the usual simplicity of his heart, he had received the paper as a genuine paper, and he believed it to be so.

Mr. Habersham disclaimed any knowledge whether the document was disingenuous or not, and said that he could disclaim a belief of himself and his colleagues, to say a word in denial of the charge or insinuation (which ever it might be) of this kind; yet he felt bound to say, that the gentleman from Massachusetts ought to have known, that he did know, that he had good reason to know, or, at all events, to believe, that the petition came from no meeting of citizens of Habersham county, and must, if it came from them at all, have come from a single individual. The gentleman must either have disbelieved what the (Mr. H.) had stated to him, or at least have doubted the fact.

Mr. Adams, after protesting against the constant interruptions to which he was liable, and recurring to the manner in which he had been cut off at the very moment he was entering upon his defence, stood here, he said, upon the accusation of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Gilmer), on the one hand, and the gentleman from Kentucky on the other, both of them being apparently anxious to have the question taken; so that if he should be acquitted on the charge of the gentleman from Kentucky, there yet remained the other, upon which he was to defend himself, upon other grounds, against the gentleman from Virginia. Who on this floor could fail to be surprised to see the gentlemen from Kentucky and Virginia united together in this purpose of casting censure upon him—the gentleman from Kentucky, the head of the home squadron, and the gentleman from Virginia the chief of the navy?—The gentleman from Virginia exercised as late governor of Virginia, of the Tyler party. There was a coalition for you! [Laughter.] Pointed against whom? Against one single individual, a member of this house, charged with half a dozen capital crimes; and this house was called upon to cast its vote upon his present position? [Laughter.] For, come to the real point of the matter, that, and that alone for which he had really to answer before this house, as he conceived, was for the crime of presenting a petition.

Now in what part of the constitution of the United States was this declared to be a crime? He would like the gentleman from Kentucky to look into his deep researches of law, common or national, and to define where the law was which constituted it a crime to present a petition, under what title it might. Where was the gentleman's law? He was a great and profound lawyer, and he, (Mr. A.) asked him to state where should he find his law? Let him look into the constitution of the United States and show where the law was by which he would punish, in any shape or form, a member of this house for presenting a petition. No; in the first place, the gentleman had made the law; he had then gone on and accused an associate member of violating the law—to sit as a judge upon him, and then to turn executioner. And, to crown all, had declared that it was a great mercy and favor that the punishment was not much more severe.

Long as the gentleman's speech had been, under a provision of personal explanation, he (Mr. A.) was willing he should make another speech as long as there should be time for him to find his law. Was this republican? Was there a government on the face of the earth that would punish a man for a crime, when there was no law which constituted that crime? He should like to hear the gentleman on that subject.—He, (Mr. A.) on the contrary, declared that there was a law expressed against it. Was this republican? In the constitution of the United States, he declared that no ex post facto law should be passed; and that provision was declared to apply to all criminal and penal laws. The provision was the dictate of justice and humanity; and he trusted he should have the benefit of it before the house came to decide upon the question.

The gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. A. repeated, had first made the law, had next charged him with a violation of that law—in what Mr. A. must be permitted to call blackguard language—and, in addition to this, had proceeded to punish him. We read scriptures, that when Michael, the Archangel, had quarrelled with the devil, [great laughter,] he used no railing accusation against him. He advised the gentleman, who was so profound a lawyer, to read a little of the Bible; and there learn, that if he meant to attack a man—to ruin his character, to ruin his usefulness to the country, and to deprive him of the services of his house, he should use no railing accusation. The gentleman's accusation against him, (Mr. A.) in addition to all its other defects, was a railing accusation.

He had spoken of the extraordinary position of the gentleman from Kentucky combined with the chief of the navy, the head of the home squadron, the marshal of the army, the present administration. When he saw that combination in the first instance, he could not help asking, What is this? Misery, it was said, makes strange bed-fellows. And he thought to himself, was the gentleman from Kentucky of such misfortune, that he was compelled to seek such companions? [Laughter.] Then came the Georgia whigs, who, after endeavoring to produce an impression unfavorable to him for having presented a petition, on the ground that it was a hoax, and had gone on voting against him, for the purpose of bringing censure upon him.

The third part of this combination was a large portion of the Virginia whigs, who were neither Tylerites nor Kentuckians. And then, the great democracy of the free states—the auxiliaries of the "peculiar institutions." [Laughter.] Was a coalition of these parties, who were called the "Union men," to maintain the right as a member of this house, to present petitions complaining of grievances. A very strange composition! And already he found that in the operation of that great party there was a radical difference of opinion on some things extremely important and vital in all this controversy between the commander-in-chief from Aconae and the admiral of the Kentucky squadron from Kentucky. [A laugh.] The gentleman from Aconae, in a five hours' speech, had considered this as a question of abolition from beginning to end. And how did his friend, rival and opponent, (for he bore all those characters), brave that most preposterous charge ever made in this house, that all the movements of his, (Mr. A.'s) were under English influence. Among his speech, he had considered this as a question of man from Kentucky, he was happy to find that he disclaimed as totally false any such imputation. He also thanked him for another part of his speech, for every word he had used to show what horrors this country in every part would endure in the event of a dissolution of the union. And he hoped his friend would confer the honor of it to the gentleman from Kentucky, that he should have no more such resolutions as were prepared by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Rhett), and kept in his drawer to be presented to this house. He should have hoped that, out of mere sympathy, the gentleman, if he had thought him, (Mr. A.) guilty of the crime of perjury or high treason, as he would be necessarily included in it, would have given him, (Mr. A.) the benefit of his vote upon this occasion. [A laugh.] But no, he was a part of the party. He now voted that he, (Mr. A.) was guilty of subornation of perjury or high treason, and that he was a traitor to his country and his views! [A laugh.] That gentleman and the rest of the representatives from South Carolina—that land of nullification against whom Andrew Jackson himself was reduced to the necessity of issuing a proclamation threatening them with the second secession—were profuse as to what they effected against presentation from that state ready to endorse the charges of the gentleman from Kentucky, of high treason because forty-five of his fellow citizens thought on the particular point of the dissolution of the union just as they did!

He said this was a formidable combination. He should certainly belie his feelings if he could say that he was not sensible of the fact that there existed a combination of parties might be in this house. But as it was concluded, and the house had thought proper to determine that this proposition should not be laid on the table, he was obliged to meet it, and he now repeated here, what he was afraid his own countrymen and constituents would not fully understand, that it was probable as to what he effected against presentation from that state ready to endorse the charges of the gentleman from Kentucky, without asking to say a word on this subject, if the house had thought proper to lay it on the table. He would have nothing to say, if it, the house had said they would have nothing further to do with this accusation. What was it, after all, that the gentlemen from Virginia, Kentucky and Georgia were all pushing? It was to make him, (Mr. A.) sit here, hour after hour, and hear invective from the most eloquent members from this house against him, and to see that all their grievances, public and private, were to be detailed here, in the face of the nation, and the time of the country to be consumed. He was willing to submit to it, but he had thought proper not to be accountable himself for this consumption of the time of the house.

He said, that he would have been to act on him—on the position assumed that he had been guilty by act or thought of the charges contained in the gentleman's preamble and resolutions—he had demanded a trial by his peers, as secured to him by the constitution of the United States. And he demanded now that before the house came to the final conclusion that he was guilty of all their grievances, they should send him out to be tried before a tribunal of the country. It was in the power of the house to issue an order to the attorney general of the United States to prosecute him for this crime before the proper courts. Then he should have the benefit secured by the constitution of the United States, and he demanded this still, if the house was to proceed and act on the resolutions. They were bound, before they came to any such resolution, to have the act established, and established in the judicial court. The house had no right whatever to act without first having established the fact on which they themselves undertook to censure him. That was the case pursued in the case of John Smith; into the particulars of which he briefly entered.

But he was going to say, that, after having done with that, and if the house thought proper to proceed with this matter, he should wish to have two or three days more to demand the resolutions and information which would be necessary for his defence. He would send a list of the resolutions to the chair.

It was as an accused person before a criminal court trying him on this charge that he claimed the right to offer them. He wanted the information which they asked for, for the purpose of his defence. He further said, that he should ask for a postponement. He wanted this trial, and those documents, of which he asked; before the house acted upon the resolutions.

The clerk then read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to this house, if not incompatible with the public interest, the correspondence between the department of the state and the ministers of Great Britain; also with the governor of the state of South Carolina and with the late William Johnston, a late member of the senate of the United States, relating to an act or acts of the legislature of South Carolina, directing the imprisonment of colored persons arriving from abroad in the ports of that state; also, of the late Judge Johnston, and those documents of which he asked; before the house acted upon the resolutions of the said acts.

Resolved, That the secretary of the navy be requested to communicate to this house, if not incompatible with the public interest, the proceedings of the naval court martial, recently held for the trial of captain William Compton Bolton, and of the preceding court of inquiry upon whose report the said naval court martial was ordered. Also, copies of all despatches received at the department from Isaac Hull, late commander of the squadron of the United States in the Mediterranean, reporting the proceedings of that squadron consistent upon the receipt of a letter or letters of the said commander of the squadron from Andrew Stevenson, late master of the United States at the court of Great Britain, together with copies of any such letter or letters. Also, copies of all despatches of the navy department to the said commander of the squadron, or his superior in the command, consequent upon and relating to these transactions.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house, if not incompatible with the public interest, a copy of any letter or letters written by him to William Cost Johnson, relating to the rule of the house excluding from reception papers of any kind, or relating to any other business of the United States, or to any agency of the said William Cost Johnson in the introduction and establishment of that rule.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform this house whether he ever authorized Henry A. Wise to affirm in his place that he knew the president was in favor of the rules or any rule of the house including and relating to the rule of the house excluding papers, including resolutions of state legislatures, from reception.

Mr. Adams continued. He would want the adoption of all these resolutions by the house. They were all extremely essential to his defence. But there was further going to say that before the house had decided to adopt the resolution before them, he should insist upon their decision whether they would turn him over to the criminal court to establish the facts on which this resolution was founded; and then he would ask the house to refer him to the criminal court, where he hoped he should be able to stand up and defend himself before a jury of his countrymen against these enormous charges, and where he hoped he should have an impartial trial. If not, if it was the pleasure of the house to proceed and to presume that he had been guilty of this crime, in order to pass this vote of censure on him, then he should have nothing but his country to appeal to. And then he hoped he should have it in his power to send out to the country not only the nature and extent of the accusation, but the manner in which it had been conducted by this house.

If he so called to answer the accusation made by Mr. Gilmer, of contempt of the house it would occupy much less time than the other, but still it would require some time—a good deal of time. He hoped that members of this house, if they could not be operated upon by public considerations, would consider that such an event as one of themselves would be subjected to if they understood the facts of the case, and on one of their friends the act of which he was accused—presenting a petition in this house. He hoped the house would take occasion to consult the precedents of what had been done heretofore on charges of a similar kind. The most apposite case (and that which he understood to be the case) was a privilege, about four years ago, in this house, upon a charge of cold-blooded deliberate murder of one of the members of this house. He had alluded to that case from absolute necessity heretofore. He now alluded to it in order that the house, before they came to decide upon him, would inform themselves what were the proceedings in that case; he knew of none that so clearly resembled it.

[Here a message was received from the senate, by its secretary, A. Dickens, esc. announcing that that body had rejected the bill from the house repealing the bankrupt law.]

Mr. A. said he hoped this was a good omen for the decision of another of the favorite projects of the gentleman from Kentucky. [A laugh.] About four years ago, he continued, a deliberate cold-blooded murder was committed on a member of this house,

On leave given, Mr. Elliott, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill making an appropriation for the relief and protection of African seamen in forced contract service. It was committed to a committee of the whole on the state of the union. Mr. Elliott offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That in addition to the information required of the secretary of state by the resolution of this house of September 3, 1841, he be required to give the exhibiting nations a statement between the affairs of other nations a duty of the United States.

A message was received from the senate, by A. Dickinson, esq. secretary, informing the house that the hon. Mr. Dixon, from the state of Rhode Island, had departed this life in this city on the 29th instant, and that his funeral would take place to-morrow, the 1st day of February, at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Tillinghast thereupon rose and addressed the house in reference to the character and services of the deceased and submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the house has received with deep sensibility the communication from the senate announcing the death of the hon. Nathan Folsom Dixon, a senator from Rhode Island.

Resolved, That, in token of sincere and high respect for the memory of the deceased, this house will attend his funeral obsequies to-morrow, at the hour appointed by the senate, and will wear crepe upon the left arm as mourning for thirty days; and, as a further mark of respect,

Resolved, That the house do now adjourn.

And then the house adjourned. The members of the house attended the funeral of the hon. N. F. Dixon, late senator from Rhode Island.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 2. Mr. Hobersham, of Georgia, introduced to the house the hon. M. J. Cooper and the hon. Mr. Colquitt, members elect from that state, and they both took their seats.

The house resumed the consideration of the question of privilege, and the first of the series of resolutions offered by Mr. Adams having been read.

Mr. Gilmer (addressing Mr. Adams), inquired whether, if the house adopted the resolutions, that gentleman intended to move a postponement of the question.

Mr. Adams. I do not admit the gentleman from Virginia to demand of me—

[Mr. Gilmer. I do not claim it as a right.]

Mr. Adams, (continuing)—of me, standing in the position of a criminal before the house, what I shall say will be heard with the same respect and regard for justice to me, by granting me evidence which I may deem indispensable to my defence. I claim no privilege of him as prosecutor, and want him to ask none of me as criminal.

Mr. Gilmer said he did not profess to be a prosecutor in the case; and it struck him as somewhat singular that the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Adams, should insist on regarding himself as a criminal.

He moved that the resolution of Mr. A. be laid on the table.

Mr. Jones, of Maryland, moved that the whole subject be laid on the table.

Mr. Adams was understood to request the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Jones), to withdraw his motion to lay the whole subject on the table; and he, (Mr. A.) would say that no friend to his rights as a member of this house, no friend to the rights of the people, and the right of the whole corpus, which was sacred to the people of the United States—no friend to the right of trial by jury—

The speaker here interrupted Mr. A. and said that these remarks were not in order, pending the motion to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. Adams continued simply request every such person to obtain hereafter from any motion to postpone or to lay the subject on the table, or from any other thing by which a direct vote, ay or no, on the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Marshall), will be evaded.

Mr. Jones, of Maryland, briefly explained. The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), had many times in the course of proceedings in this case, declared that he would not be responsible for the time which might be consumed therein. He, (Mr. J.) for his part, was not willing to be responsible for it, and therefore he had made the motion to lay the whole subject on the table, in order to test the sense of the house.

Mr. Adams. The gentleman has done me the honor to refer to a proposition which I have again and again made, to yield to any motion by which this subject should be dismissed. If the house think proper to do so, I am willing to submit. But I give notice to the house that I have done with all propositions of that kind on my part; and that I now claim the time of this nation for that defence which these gentlemen have forced upon me. I claim a decision ay or no, upon the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky.

And the question was taken, on the motion of Mr. Jones, of Maryland to lay the whole subject on the table; and it was decided in the negative by yeas 29, nays 10.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Gilmer to lay Mr. Adams's resolution on the table, and was decided in the negative: yeas 29, nays 107. So the resolution was not laid on the table.

And the question recurring on the adoption thereof.

Mr. Pickens desired to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams) whether he embraced in this resolution the opinion of the attorney general of the United States in the case. If that was to be embraced, he (Mr. P.) had no objection to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. Adams replied, no—because that opinion was a public document which he should use without calling for it.

Mr. Holmes objected to the call, because he was not willing, as a member from the state of South Carolina, and as a citizen of the confederacy, again to be the embler over which ashes were now lying. He well knew that a call of this kind, so far from harmonizing, would again produce an excitement which every citizen desirous of peace and harmony in the republic must deprecate. Still, if these papers were essential to the defence of the gentleman from Massachusetts, he (Mr. H.) would be willing to vote in favor of it. But he did not believe it to be so. The case therein referred to was one over which the union had no jurisdiction.

Mr. H. went into a brief statement of the case, and of the course which the state of South Carolina, in the mere exercise, he said, of a police regulation, had pursued in relation to it. They (Mr. H.) And now, when commerce had gone on, when the state of South Carolina had been trying to throw oil on the troubled waters, the gentleman from Massachusetts was throwing a firebrand into this house which was to create a conflagration that might engulf the republic and not only so, but he was calling upon this union to come in conflict with the states, to trample upon those rights which the states deemed most essential, and which they would not yield even if the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) should, like Samson, throw his giant strength round the pillars of the constitution, and crush the whole republic. He thought the house would not consent to information which he pledged himself would not be yielded.

Mr. Holmes, after expressing obligation to Mr. Holmes for the statement he had made, remarked that that statement was but made verbally by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Holmes). He, (Mr. A.) declared, as an accused person, put on his defence, that these papers were necessary for him in his defence before the house, and if the house required it, he was ready to do what was done in courts of justice in such cases—to support the declaration by oath. He did not think that the house could take the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Holmes) as one of his judges; and however unwilling he (Mr. A.) might be to raise any question as to the accuracy of that statement, yet he called for the papers themselves, for the proof.

But the gentleman had said that if the call was made, it would be denied. If it were made on the governor, he would not consent to it. Mr. A. thought it possible that it might be denied.

But the call was not made on the governor of South Carolina. It was a call on the president of the United States for papers in the department, which were essential to his (Mr. A.) defence. He therefore, hoped that the objection of the gentleman from South Carolina would not prevail, and that the house would do him the favor to let these papers, which he again declared to be essential to his clerical and perfect defence, be produced.

Mr. Smith, of Virginia, said that the whole question was one of evidence. It was the duty of the party to be defended to exhibit evidence, and if it was pertinent to the inquiry. Mr. S. proceeded to contend that this testimony was not relevant to the inquiry, and that the resolution ought not to be agreed to. And he asked the yeas and nays on its adoption; which were ordered.

And the question was taken on the call for the papers which the gentleman from Massachusetts had placed it; then upon these grounds every paper or document which the gentleman might choose to say was necessary to his defence, must be called for. Upon that ground alone he (Mr. P.) should vote no.

Mr. Warren declared that this whole proceeding, from beginning to end, in all its aspects, and under all its circumstances, had taken place against his express wish; and against his express wish it was that he was called upon as a trier here. He had no disposition to defend the gentleman from Mass. as hisetics or man what a spect him (Mr. W.) or sympathizing with that gentleman. He washed his hands of the proceeding; and he gave notice that from this moment he would vote to give the gentleman from Massachusetts the amplest means for his defence, that he (Mr. W.) should vote hereafter under higher obligations than those of mere association of friends, and that he should consult only the obligations of public duty in those votes. He could not hereafter countenance the proceeding, nor vote to do it.

Mr. Jerome demanded the previous question to do it.

And the main question was ordered to be taken. And the question "shall the resolution be adopted?" was then taken and decided in the affirmative: yeas 107, nays 96.

Mr. Adams's second resolution was then read, and by yeas 95, nays 84, was adopted.

Mr. Adams's third and fourth resolutions were then read.

Mr. Wise then offered the following as an amendment to these resolutions:

"And that the president of the United States furnish to this house the information on the executive files, or in any of the executive departments, or wherever the same may be had and obtained, touching the charge which John Quincy Adams is said at one time to have preferred, to Mr. Jefferson and others, against the federalists of New England, imputing that they had designed and acted to dissolve the union of these states."

Mr. Adams submitted to the speaker whether any amendment was to be made to a resolution calling for information which he had declared to be necessary for his defence.

At the same time he declared that he had no objection, at any time, to the reading of the amendment, if the gentleman would offer it as a separate resolution.

The speaker declared the amendment to be out of order, as being incongruous with the resolutions, and not relevant with the information demanded by the gentleman from Massachusetts for his defence.

Mr. Adams then said that the speaker that there could be no doubt that congress had no right to call for a correspondence of the president before he was president of the United States; and he moved to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. Adams said that these two resolutions were most important to his defence, because they related to the establishment of the 21st rule, which was the foundation of his present grounds.

The question on the motion of Mr. Getty was taken, and by yeas 111, nays 64, was decided in the affirmative; and so the resolutions were laid on the table.

Mr. Adams said the evidence was exceedingly important, and must confess, when he saw the votes on the resolutions asking for that information, which would not be denied to the vilest villain in the land, that it bore on him in a heavy manner as to what he was to expect from the votes of the same party hereafter. He thanked again the house for allowing him a portion of that information which he had requested.

One of the grounds he should take for his own defence would be, that he had been, neither by himself nor by the petitioners whose petition he had presented, guilty of any offence against the laws of the land whatsoever; and that, so far as related to this, he was under no responsibility, having declared at the time he presented the petition, and repeating now, that their petition was the petition of his God, he did it, would ever vote to grant. And he hoped that he should be able to show that, for attachment to this union, he might put sixty or seventy years of public life before almost all mankind in proof. If there was one member of this house who had given more strong, more clear and unequivocal proofs of attachment to the union of these states than the man who now stood charged with crime before this house, he did not know who that man was. He would be allowed to prove that to this house.

He said, then, so far as respected his own act, he was under no responsibility for the petition, here, before this house, and in presence of his God, he did it, under a sense of irremissible duty. At the last session of congress he heard a great deal on the subject of what was to be allowed to the conscience of the president of the United States. He was one of those who fully appreciated the benefit of the dictates of his conscience in every thing he did, and he now remained, before this house and the country, the right to have a conscience as well as he.

He said, further, that this was no new thing to this house and this country. He had been now ten years incessantly a representative of a portion of the people of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and while in the very first week of his holding a seat in this house, he had presented fifteen petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and at and vote with him in his conclusions, there might not be any two who would agree with him in his process of reasoning in arriving at those conclusions. While he took the responsibility of declaring that he did not regard the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky as too harsh a censure, and while he was willing to vote for it, he must persist in saying he preferred that the vote should be taken directly upon his original proposition.

What do I ask the house to do? Not to denounce the gentleman from Massachusetts as a traitor; not to convict him of subornation of perjury, but to inflict on him the punishment which the people of this State in opinion of this house. I maintain it is a duty solemnly incumbent upon us to express a censure on his conduct, though I would do it in the mildest terms the nature of the case will justify. I insist that the act of Mr. Lincoln is a crime against the people of this State, but that it is an act imperatively due to ourselves and to the American people, in vindication of this house and of them. It is as much an act of self-vindication as it is a censure on the gentleman from Massachusetts. What punishment do you think it proper to ask? An expression of opinion. And of what opinion? That the gentleman, in presenting a petition praying for a dissolution of the union, has justly incurred the censure of this house. And has he done so individually and collectively, or has he done so individually and collectively; and I will, before I have done, make that appeal to the gentleman himself, and the only witness I will ask shall be that gentleman himself, and his action on this occasion. The resolution of this house is to censure him for the crime of treason and penalties other than such as may ensue from the power of public opinion. And we are to hold that it is not constitutional for the house to express such an opinion—to censure him or to punish him, if necessary, by the words of the constitution itself on this subject.

"Each house may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member."

Here we find that not only the power to express opinion, but the power of punishment, is vested in this house under the constitution. So that, had my resolution asked the house to inflict on him a signal reprimand, or to suspend him for a long period, the limits of our constitutional authority would have felt warranted in going much further; but I preferred putting the resolution in the very simplest form necessary to the house's vindication of itself from reproach, and the preservation of its constitution both on this head and the nation at large. Now, from motives of patriotism, the gentleman is constrained to disclaim any concurrence in the object prayed for, by what motives of patriotism was he actuated in agitating this house by such a resolution? Is it proper for him to say that would have been comparatively a trifling matter; but in agitating this entire nation, to its very centre? I do maintain that the rejection of such a resolution, after such an act, will involve—will not say a reproach on this house, but a decided censure on the gentleman; and, further, that it will impair and weaken the powers of the house itself. The time may come when the exercise of the powers which this house, by such an act, will virtually discard, may be necessary to the preservation of its privileges not only, but of our American union.

Is precluded wanting? I call the house to the proceedings in the case of John Smith, a senator, once charged with a participation in Burr's conspiracy; an occasion on which the gentleman from Massachusetts was himself in the very situation on which he now complains, and in which the posture of this house in his own case—that of prosecutor, judge, juror and executioner—all that the gentleman himself then was, as a member of the United States senate, acting on the case of John Smith. Let me read from a report drawn up by him as chairman of a committee to whom the subject was referred. "The committee are of opinion that the propriety of the course in which it was maintained that the forms of judicial proceedings by the courts of justice did not interfere with the censorial authority of the senate over its own members, and that the power to punish, by expulsion or otherwise, must be discretionary in the senate, and its exercise must, of course, be subject to the summary and then the tardy process of the judicial tribunals."

At this point Mr. Gilmer yielded for a motion, by Mr. Mallory, to adjourn; which motion prevailing, the house adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEB. 3. Mr. Gilmer continued his speech against Mr. Adams, and urged the adoption of his original resolution of censure. He offered in the first instance to withdraw it, if Mr. Adams would withdraw the petition. Mr. Adams declined so doing. Mr. G. having concluded his speech.

Mr. Adams commenced his defence and endeavored to show that there was a conspiracy to remove him from the chair of the committee of ways and means, and indicated Mr. G. as having tampered with Mr. Cushing for that purpose. This was denied by both Mr. C. and Mr. G. At a late hour, the house adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEB. 4. Mr. Adams resumed his defence and having again alluded to the conspiracy against himself.

Mr. Rhett announced that it was himself who had conversed with Mr. Cushing on the subject of his Mr. Cushing's becoming chairman of the committee, in case Mr. Gilmer's motion should eventuate in the election of a new chairman.

Mr. Adams then continued his defence at large.—
At a late hour the house adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEB. 5. Mr. Adams continued his defence, until on motion the house adjourned.

MONDAY, FEB. 7. The house resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. Gilmer, proposing a censure on Mr. Adams, for the presentation of a petition praying for a dissolution of the union, together with the amendment of Mr. Marshall thereto, and the substitute amendment of Mr. Summers for both the said propositions.

Mr. Jones said that, during the course of the day on Saturday, he thought he perceived an impatience prevailing in the house to get rid of this subject. Mr. A. had been charged by the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) who had introduced one of the resolutions against him, with having consumed an unreasonable time in his defence thus far. It appeared to that gentleman that a consumption of six days by a man in Mr. A's situation was an extravagant use of time, although a portion of that space of time had been consumed by the gentleman himself in his occupation, as well as a considerable portion of it by another member. Warren Hastings had occupied seven years in the trial of a charge not more heinous in its nature.

Mr. A. wished to retain the claim he had all along insisted on, to be free from responsibility for the time consumed. He had repeatedly offered to let the proceeding be brought to a close without even that defence which the house had insisted on requiring of him, and which he had partly made.

He wished now to say that if any of his accusers on this occasion were now willing that the whole question should be laid upon the table, Mr. A. was ready to assent to such a motion. He had a great deal of time still to require, if he should be forced to go on with his defence. He had laid out the platform which he proposed that defence to occupy, and had informed the house of all that it would be necessary for him to prove. But he was willing to forego it all, and dismiss the subject forever from the house, and, if possible, from the country, if that could by possibility be done without a sacrifice of his own rights and those of his constituents, and of the just defence of his own character.

He would do one thing further. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) had offered him his forgiveness for what he considered as injurious to the cause of the Union. He would not accept of that forgiveness in the present stage of the proceeding; but, if the house would agree to dismiss the subject without injury to Mr. A.'s character and without any reflection on the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Marshall), to the gentleman from Accomac, (Mr. Wise), and to the gentleman from Albemarle, (Mr. Gilmer), that he was ready to accept of that forgiveness, and to have the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) to testify for that, had he been asked to do so. He wished, however, to understand that he did not say this from any wish to shrink from the further prosecution of the defence of his character, or from the time and trouble it would cost him, but that he was ready to lay the subject on the table that it should never be taken up again. He was willing to acquiesce in such an arrangement. If the house was ready to do so, he would be glad to acquiesce. If the house should assent to the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Sumners) to refer the entire subject to a select committee, where Mr. A. would have the opportunity further to defend himself and his constituents.

Mr. Botts said that if he were to consult his own inclinations, he should prefer that a direct vote should be taken on the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Marshall). He (Mr. B.) presumed that every member had made up his mind on the subject; and the house and the country were exceedingly anxious to get rid of it. He would therefore move, against his own will, however, that the whole subject be laid on the table; that, in the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), it might be laid there forever.

The yeas and nays were asked and ordered; and, being taken, were as follows.

VYAS—Barnes, Allen, S. J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycock, B. Baird, Bartlett, Barlow, Barstow, Barron, Bassett, Bess, Bissell, Briggs, Brockway, Buck, C. C. Willard.

So the whole subject was laid on the table.

The question recurred on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the question of the reception of the petition had been laid on the table—and "shall the motion be reconsidered" was decided in the affirmative, yeas 144, nays 52.

Mr. Merrillweather then withdrew his motion to lay the question of reception on the table and demanded the previous question on the reception of the petition itself.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Ayer, Babcock, Barnard, Birdseye, Boies, Burcell, Calhoun, Childs, Chittenden, J. C. Clark, J. Cooper, Cranston, Cravens, R. D. Randall, Salmon, Shade, Stratton, Thilaghaast, Toland, Winthrop, John Youngs—40.

[illegible]

Mr. Adams stated that he had in his possession two other petitions of the same effect as that just disposed of—one from New York and the other from Pennsylvania; which (after a brief conversation) Mr. A. said he would not, in the present disposition of the house, offer, but that he would reserve them to a future period.

The call for petitions was continued until the house adjourned.

REPORT OF N. YORK WITH VIRGINIA AND S. CAROLINA.—Message of the governor of New York.
BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS.
DEBATE IN H. R. on Feb. 3d & 4th, on resolution to censure of Mr. Adams.
PERSONAL PROCEEDINGS.
CHRONICLE.

RELATIONS OF NEW YORK WITH VIRGINIA AND SOUTH CAROLINA.

Extract from the message of Lt. gov. J. Rutherford, transmitted to the legislature of Virginia at the commencement of its present session.

I have received, and submit herewith, copies of resolutions of the legislatures of several of our sister states, which have been communicated to this department.

Of the state of Maine, on the re-eligibility of the president of the United States.

Of Connecticut, on Rhode Island, on the same subject, and on the revenue laws of the U. States.

Of Massachusetts on the same subject, and concerning the northeastern boundary, and the public lands of the United States.

Of New York on the death of the late president of the United States.

And of Missouri, Delaware and Maryland, on the existing controversy between this state and the state of New York.

And a copy of an act of the legislature of Maryland entitled "an act for the completion of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to Cumberland."

I regret that nothing has transpired since the last session of the legislature, to encourage the belief that the unpleasant controversy so long depending between this state and the state of New York will be satisfactory adjusted. I submit herewith the correspondence between the executive authorities of the two states, heretofore communicated. It will display, it is believed, on the part of the executive of this commonwealth, an anxious desire to maintain unimpaired the most friendly relations with a state to which we have ever been bound by the ties of affection and interest. With a devoted loyalty to the union, we have manifested patience, forbearance and courtesy, earnestly hoping it possible to obviate the necessity of resorting to any measure of defence. Our just claim upon that state, under the solemn covenant of the constitution, and our reiterated appeals to her reason and justice have as yet been unavailing. The course of the executive has been fully sustained by her legislature, and under circumstances which aggravate the injuries we have received. I sincerely trust it may be possible for other counsels to prevail, and that a returning sense of justice will result in the recognition of our right and the perpetuation of the harmony, which, if not actually interrupted, is at least most seriously threatened.

Under present circumstances, the commonwealth owes it to herself to divide and to execute firmly proper measures to guard the rights and property of her citizens. If in the discharge of this duty, imposed by the most solemn considerations, unkind feelings or unpleasant conditions should unhappily arise, the responsibility must rest with those who have left us no alternative. A due regard for the peace of the union, and an anxious desire to remove as far as practicable, all cause of irritation, will no doubt dictate a sort of measure purely protective. With this view the inspection law of the last legislature was adopted; and the remote period to which its execution was deferred, rendered the evidence of the patient and forbearance of Virginia. As however, the first day of May next is the specified time when its provisions will become operative, unless the course of N. York shall in the mean time render it unnecessary, I respectfully recommend its careful revision and the adoption of such amendments as the patient and forbearance suggest, more effectually to accomplish its objects. The correspondence herewith submitted, so fully explains the views and course of the executive authorities of the two states, that I forbear further reference to the subject.

I cannot omit to notice here the undying perseverance with which a wild and blind fanaticism is urging on the consideration of congress, a subject of vital importance to the peace and tranquillity of the union. Year after year the tables of congress have been loaded with petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. This fanatical spirit rests not, tires not—and pursues its purpose with a zeal which, if not checked, may lead to consequences deeply to be deprecated. Its influence is already sufficient to cause it to be courted by those who are candidates for the popular favor in the north, and it too frequently ways, if it does not control their public action.— Its power is rendered manifest by the legislation of some of the states, indicating a policy not only to emancipate our slaves, but to take them forcibly from the possession of their masters against the consent of the slaves themselves. The result of the atrocious and horrible abduction of slaves from their masters cannot have escaped public observation.— These indications portending much future mischief, should deeply impress us with the importance of preparing for the crisis with which we are threatened. A successful interference with the rights of the whites in the District of Columbia, would be but the prelude to a similar effort in the sister states.— We should resist every such attempt as we would an invasion of our fire sides and altars. It is time that an issue be made with those who, reckless of consequences would dissolve this happy confederacy, tillerwise bound together in peace and friendship. It is the duty of peace and friendship. It is the duty of the peace and friendship of the public peace should be fully apprised of the consequences which must inevitably result from the accomplishment of their rash designs. It is due to the enlightened and patriotic portion of our fellow citizens of the north, who disapprove the mad schemes in agitation among them, and who place a proper estimate upon the value of the union. It is due to Virginia herself, plainly, unequivocally, and without delay, to announce to congress and to the members of the confederacy—not in a spirit of menace, but with a deep sense of the painful consequences which may ensue—that she cannot submit to the interference from any quarter of the slave trade. The deep importance of the subject entitles it to the serious consideration and to the prompt and decisive action of the general assembly.

JOHN RUTHERFORD.

Extract from the message of governor Seward transmitted to the legislature of New York at the opening of its present session.

I lay before you a law of Virginia, calculated to embarrass our commerce. The effect of the act is postponed until May next, and the governor is authorized further to suspend it whenever the executive authority of this state shall surrender three persons heretofore demanded by the Lieutenant Governor of that commonwealth as fugitives from justice, and the legislature shall repeal the law extending the trial by jury. I have respectfully informed the authorities of Virginia that my convictions of the illegality of that requisition are unchanged, and that although New York, from motives of self respect and devotion to the union, will not retaliate, nor even respond to the requisition, she will not permit a respondent, since Virginia has seen fit to transcend the sphere assigned her by the federal constitution, and to pass an aggressive law; but that this state will cheerfully return to a discussion of the subject, with a sincere desire to arrive at a conclusion mutually satisfactory and conducive to the maintenance of the union. However the effect of that unfortunate statute shall be removed by the action of our sister state, or by an overruling action of the supreme court of the United States.

The legislature will decide whether the trial by jury shall be relinquished, and whether a state which assigns her to the founders of the constitution, and no political inequality which may not ultimately be removed, shall wrest that precious shield from those only, whose freedom is assailed, not from any wrong doing of their own, but because the greatest of all crimes was committed against their ancestors. Taught as we have been by the founders of the constitution, and most emphatically by the statesmen of Virginia, we cannot renounce the principle, that all men are born free and equal, nor any of its legitimate consequences. But we can, nevertheless, give to Virginia and to the whole American family, pledges of peace, affection and fidelity to the union, by the adoption of a policy, and by waiting, until returning magnanimity of a state whose early and self-sacrificing vindication of the rights of man has entitled her to enduring veneration and gratitude.

I submit also, for your information, a correspondence between the governor of Georgia and myself, which my respected contemporary has made a subject of some moment in communications to the legislature of that state.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF N. YORK.

Executive chamber, Albany, Feb. 11, 1842.

To the legislature:
 In my annual message I informed the legislature that the state of Virginia had adopted a law calculated to embarrass our commerce, and which would go into effect on the first day of May next, unless this state should see fit to comply with any certain requirements made by our sister state.

It is now my duty to announce that the general assembly of South Carolina on the seventh day of December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, enacted a law declaring that it shall not be lawful for any vessel of any size or description, owned in whole or in part, or commanded or navigated by any other person than any citizen or resident of the state of New York, or any such vessel, owned in whole or in part, by an actual inhabitant and resident of South Carolina, and departing from any port in that commonwealth to any port in New York to leave the waters of South Carolina until the commandant of such vessel shall have submitted to search, and have complied with restrictions similar to those attempted to be imposed upon our vessels found in Virginia by the law of that state.

I submit a copy of the act of South Carolina, by which it will be seen that the law will take effect on the first of May next, but that the governor is authorized to suspend its operation on being officially informed that the executive of New York has consented to comply with the demand of the state of Virginia, hitherto disallowed, for a surrender of certain persons as fugitives from justice, and that the legislature of this state has repealed the act of 1840, extending the right of trial by jury.

We are indebted to the courtesy of the general assembly of South Carolina, for a report and resolutions setting forth the grounds of their very extraordinary proceeding. Since that proceeding contemplates certain specified action by the executive as well as by the legislature of this state, as a condition upon which the citizens of this state shall heretofore been unmolested in South Carolina, rights and immunities guaranteed to them by the constitution of the United States, I have respectfully communicated to the governor of South Carolina my decision upon the proposition thus submitted to me. That decision is in maintenance of the grounds heretofore assumed in my correspondence with the authorities of the state of Virginia.

The general assembly of South Carolina pronounces our law extending the right of trial by jury, an act which is the most abhorring and dangerous form in which fanaticism or folly has made its assaults on an ancient domestic institution, cherished in the hearts of the people of the south; and they very clearly and fully set forth the reasons for this opinion. I submit them in full confidence that they will receive that early and deliberate consideration which is due to them, and only from the magnitude of the subject and the shortness of the time which is to elapse before the rigorous measures of Virginia and South Carolina will take effect, but also from the respect toward South Carolina, which, I am sure, is entertained by the people of this state. My own views of the law in question, differing essentially from those presented to me, and only now submitted, have already been made known to the legislature.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Executive department, Feb. 10, 1842.

Sir: I have had the honor to receive your communication of December last, transmitting to me a copy of a law passed by the general assembly of South Carolina, entitled "an act to prevent the escape of New York from carrying slaves or persons held in service out of this state, and to prevent the escape of persons charged with the commission of any crime." The communication is accompanied by a pertinent report and by resolutions of the general assembly, explaining the reasons of the law, and the citizens of the act declares that it shall take effect from and after the first day of May next, and that the governor is authorized to suspend its operations, upon being officially informed that the executive of New York has bona fide consented to comply with a demand heretofore made by the authorities of Virginia for the surrender of Peter Johnson, Edward Smith, and Isaac Gansey as fugitives from justice; and that the Legislature of the Union, to make known to your excellency as I have uniformly and on all proper occasions informed the state of Virginia, that the executive of this state declined to comply with the requisition of the executive of Virginia, referred to in the act of South Carolina, upon the grounds that said act was declared by the Congress of the United States in the constitution of the United States, or in the laws and customs of this state, and that nothing has occurred since the decision was made to change the convictions then entertained.

It seems my duty, therefore, with the frankness of communication which ought to prevail between the sister states of the Union, to make known to your excellency as I have uniformly and on all proper occasions informed the state of Virginia, that the executive of this state declined to comply with the requisition of the executive of Virginia, referred to in the act of South Carolina, upon the grounds that said act was declared by the Congress of the United States in the constitution of the United States, or in the laws and customs of this state, and that nothing has occurred since the decision was made to change the convictions then entertained.

Whether the law of this state extending the trial by jury be unequal and unjust, or injurious to the state of South Carolina, or to any other state, is a question which properly belongs to the legislative representatives of the people, and has been commended to their respectful consideration. It also belongs to them to consider, at least in the first instance, whether the measure which the Senate of South Carolina has adopted calls for any action on the part of this state.

I have, therefore, very cheerfully complied with your excellency's request by submitting to the legislature the papers you have transmitted. I remain with very high consideration, your most obedient servant.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.
His excellency, John P. Richardson, gov. of S. Carolina.

FACTS OF THE BATTLE OF N. ORLEANS.

Major Daveaze, a brother-in-law of the late Edward Livingston, and who served as aid to General Jackson at the battle of New Orleans, and was for nine years at the Hague in the service of the general government, from which he returned upwards of two years ago, introduced on the 8th of January to the consideration of the New York legislature of which he is now a member, the following resolution and preamble.

Whereas, the salutary energy of General Jackson at New Orleans, during the campaign of 1814 and 1815, have repeatedly received the approbation of the American people,—

And whereas, congress, on the 25th day of February 1815, voted thanks to that illustrious citizen for his gallantry and good conduct at New Orleans, and conferred a gold medal to be struck and presented to him, in testimony of the high sense entertained by congress of events so memorable and services so eminent—

Resolved therefore (the senate concurring) that our senators and representatives in congress, be earnestly requested to use their best efforts to procure the passage of a law directing that the fine of one thousand dollars imposed on General Jackson, by Dominick A. Hall, then judge of the United States for the district of Louisiana, for an alleged contempt of his authority, and by him paid into the hands of the marshal said district, be refunded to Andrew Jackson, with costs and interest on the same, from the day of the payment thereof.

On February 1st its consideration being the order of the day, Mr. Daveaze arose and, as reported in the Albany Argus, said he should have permitted this resolution which had lain so long, to have passed at once to a vote without further remark from him; had he not felt under a moral obligation to prevent, on one former occasion, to explain the story of the "cotton bags," with a view to correct an error that had become prevalent, and had even crept into the history of the memorable campaign of New Orleans. It was not true that our army was sheltered by cotton bags, and even if it were, the fact could reflect no dishonor on the great commander in that campaign, in view of the overwhelming superiority in point of numbers and discipline, of the enemy he was called to deal with. But it was not true, and it was proper that the facts should be known, be the effect what it might.

The commanding general had taken the precaution— for he omitted no precaution which might contribute to the safety of the army— to prevent the boats from floating down, and thus falling into the enemy's hands, being determined, if they crossed the river, they should do it in their own boats. On the 26th Dec., a flat-boat was seen floating down the river, with no one on board, having evidently parted from its moorings at the wharf. Cotton was distributed there, and no one commanding a prize that was wanted its transportation and storage, and such as arrived was left in the boats. On board this boat was twenty-nine bales. General Jackson immediately ordered it to be towed ashore, to prevent it from drifting into the enemy's camp. The bales were rolled on shore, within our lines, but some thirty yards from the bastion, and in the rain and snow during the battle, and there they remained on the 8th of January, and were seen by the six hundred British prisoners, taken in the redoubt on our left, who, as some solace in their captivity, raised the story of our fighting behind cotton bags! But our ramparts were not made of cotton, and were not formed of bales, but because there were behind them that which was more solid than brass— more impervious than the diamond—the indomitable breasts of freemen, led by the old hero. This was the wall against which the pride of Britain rolled like the maddened waves stricken by a rock planted in the ocean, and sternly sunk into the bottom, and in the rain and snow during the battle, and there they remained on the 8th of January, and were seen by the six hundred British prisoners, taken in the redoubt on our left, who, as some solace in their captivity, raised the story of our fighting behind cotton bags!

A single fact, would suffice to show the height of this boasted bastion of soil, which British captives and British writers had transformed into a barricade of cotton bales. When Pakenham fell within three hundred yards of it, the horse he mounted, of high price, was killed, and the rider, with a shattered and frightened and ran directly towards our lines, and with a single leap, cleared the ditch and bastion, and became a captive too! The noble animal was brought, yet quivering in his fright, and presented as spolia opima to the commanding general.

This was one of the incidents of this great battle, and which we had deemed preferable to leave the question to the horse to deal with, as he had no doubt they would, by offering this tardy tribute of justice to patriotism and valor. Of the four chief officers in command of the British army on the 8th, two were killed on the field, and one was sent to the fleet severely wounded. Gen. Lambert was the only officer who escaped, and he was not engaged on that day. Gen. Keen, the wounded officer, when carried off the field, left his sword, and it was picked up by the brave Tennesseans who were scouring the field in search of muskets, and brought to General Jackson. We said then, not only the horse of the British general— but the sword of the general in command, and it was of great beauty and value. When Gen. Keen recovered his senses, his first thought was of his sword. Dennis Prieur, who had been taken prisoner in the battle of the night of the 23d— and well known since as mayor of the city and collector of the port, of New Orleans, was the victim of that persecuting spirit, that was sent out of court by the same elections, one way— had been paroled, and was the bearer of a letter to General Jackson, in which he requested him to return his sword, saying that it was the treasured gift of a friend, and barking the request by an appeal to those high and chivalrous feelings which we well know animated the American soldier. Nor did he appeal in vain. "Go," said Gen. Jackson to Mr. Livingston, "deliver this sword to Gen. Keen. God forbid that I should separate the weapon from him to whom his dying friend bequeathed it."

Mr. D. closed with the remark, that he awaited the action of the house upon this proposition, he could not say without anxiety, but without fear. It was true that Ohio, treading fast in the steps of New York, in population and wealth, and in indomitable patriotism, had stolen a march upon us. But he trusted that New York, the first to start in this movement, would not hesitate to respond, with her potency of love, to the voice of her western comrade.

The proposition of Mr. Daveaze was then moved to a letter addressed by General Jackson to Mr. Daveaze, and which having fallen into his (Mr. O'S.) possession, he had with difficulty obtained the reluctant consent of his colleague to read it in a few passages, in illustration of the feeling with which he would be glad to honor himself in speaking on this question. The extracts, as they stood, were very brief, and he only regretted that from the confidential character of portions of it, he could not read the whole. It was addressed to Major Daveaze upwards of two years ago, immediately on his return from that foreign mission in which it is well known he so bravely and efficiently served the honor of his country.

Mr. O'S. then proceeded to read:
"My health is much impaired; and I am for the most part of my time confined to my room, seldom able to visit my friends, and write with difficulty. I am trying to put my house in order to meet that call, which must soon come, to that other and better world from which no traveller returns. In doing this I pass my time in the study of the affairs of the world, but little to regret—and much to remember with satisfaction; and particularly all my acts and doings in the successful defence of N. Orleans my conscience fully approves. Still no one has ever brought to the view of congress the iniquity and injustice of the $1,000 fine which has been imposed upon me, and which has deprived me of my constitutional right of being heard in my own defence—and this for an act justified by the necessity of the case, and the only means by which the city of New Orleans, with all its 'Booby and Beauty,' could have been successfully defended. All most now acknowledge and do acknowledge this— that only by my order, clearing our lines, could the city have been saved. Without this, we might have gallantly sacrificed our lives, but lost our country, and the city must have been yielded to the brutality of an infuriated invading soldiery. It was for this act, and for enforcing it until the country was saved, that I was ordered to be tried, and the record of which still remains an imputation on my memory."

"Congress is the only body whose action could wipe this stain from my memory, by a joint resolution, ordering the fine, with costs and interest, to be refunded, it having been so unjustly, so unrighteously imposed, and without my being heard in my own defence— that only by my order, clearing our lines, could the city have been saved. Without this, we might have gallantly sacrificed our lives, but lost our country, and the city must have been yielded to the brutality of an infuriated invading soldiery. It was for this act, and for enforcing it until the country was saved, that I was ordered to be tried, and the record of which still remains an imputation on my memory."

"But be it so. I go hence with a clear conscience, that I did my duty faithfully; and although this act of justice has been withheld, still my continued prayers will be for my country's safety and prosperity; and that, if war should again come, the safety of a great city may not be imperiled from this precedent, which, starting the commanding officer in the face, may prevent him from assuming the responsibility with which alone it may be secured. For you must well know and remember, that it was martial law alone by which we were able successfully to defend the city; and that Judge Hall, who afterwards imposed that fine upon me, when the order was first read, exclaimed with uplifted hands, 'that by this the city might be saved, without it, it was lost.'"

"To you, my friend, for the first time have I unfolded my feelings, determined, if my country would not voluntarily do me this justice, I would pass to my grave in silence and without murmur. But this is perhaps the last letter I may write you, I could not refrain from expressing to you my feelings on a review of our privations and dangers together before New Orleans."

Mr. Hoffman repelled the right of any man to drag the name of General Jackson into controversy connected with the freedom of the gentleman in doing it. He considered the debt as having been long ago refunded by the American people and hoped the act would remain untouched as a lesson of the supremacy of the civil over the military power.

Mr. Simmons in the course of his speech, went into a minute review of the epoch in question—as he would it. He then proceeded to present the subject chiefly with a view to present the facts in the order of time. The first intelligence at New Orleans of the signing of the treaty of Ghent, he said, was communicated to Gen. Jackson, by Admiral Cochrane, on the 21st January, 1815. The next day, news was received at New Orleans from Charleston, of the ratification of the treaty by the prince regent—and on the 14th February, of the arrival of the treaty at Washington, but not of its confirmation. It was on the 28th February, he said, that Gen. Jackson issued the order banishing beyond Baton Rouge, the French residents, not naturalized at New Orleans—under the impression, which he said, was afterwards proved to be somewhat dangerous, and inclined to favor the enemy. It was after this, on the 3rd March, that a member of the Louisiana legislature (Mr. Levellier) ventured to complain of this sentence of banishment, through the Louisiana Gazette, and to indulge in perhaps severe expressions on the case, and the order, which Mr. Jackson had not pretended to justify. It was on the next day that Gen. Jackson caused to be published the second section of the articles of war, which denounced the penalty of death against foreign spies, and it was by virtue of that section, published on the 4th, that Mr. Levellier was on the 5th of March, arrested, and committed to the State Prison. Mr. S. went on to state the application to Judge Hall, by Mr. Morrill, (who Mr. S. said was attorney general or district attorney) for a habeas corpus in favor of Mr. Levellier—the issuing of the writ by Judge Hall—the arrest and imprisonment of Judge Hall, by order of Gen. Jackson (under a writ of habeas corpus, issued by the Louisiana court, on a charge of exciting mutiny—that this was on the 5th March—and that at this time news of peace had reached New Orleans from Washington, though, owing to the wrong papers having been sent by the special messenger from the war department, there was no official intelligence— that application was made to Judge Lewis, a state judge, by Mr. Morrill, for a habeas corpus in favor of Judge Hall, but that martial law being still continued in force, both the state judge and the U. S. attorney were arrested and imprisoned, by order of Gen. Jackson.

Mr. Daveaze denied that Mr. Morrill was U. S. attorney or district attorney, or that the gentleman was connected in regard to either facts stated—and advised him to adhere to the book—Judge Martin's book.

Mr. Simmons would not assert that the order was fully executed, but an order was made to the effect stated—at all events, Judge Hall was not delivered up on the habeas corpus.

Mr. Daveaze was understood to deny that any such order was issued.

Mr. Simmons went on to say that matters were prevented from coming to extremities solely by the influence of Edward Livingston, who, he added, appeared before the court martial and satisfied them that they had no jurisdiction to do so in the case—that Gen. Jackson was dissatisfied with the decision of the court martial, and banished Mr. Lewell into the country, as well as Judge Hull—that on the 13th March, a peremptory order was received from President Madison by express, for a declaration of martial law, and for ratifications, and a proclamation of amnesty for all offences.

Mr. Simmons said he was one of those that never had any doubt of the right of the commander-in-chief, to proclaim and enforce martial law at New Orleans, or of the necessity of it. For that, he said, he acted as he believed that it was by that means that the city probably was saved. At the same time, moderation was to be exercised in all things; and it would seem, even if Gen. J. was justified in continuing martial law two months after the treaty of peace was signed, still that he might have acted along without imposing the high judicial officers. That was what he could not vote to approve, but what he would vote to excuse. Mr. S. took the occasion here to enter his solemn protest against the propriety of the proceedings of Judge Hall against Gen. J.—and his repugnance to that doctrine of constructive contempt and non-resistance to the military power, which he had in his own case, a complainant before himself. He should have supposed that delicacy, at least, would have prevented that. Still there was nothing strictly illegal in it, so he admitted at the time—and instead of Gen. J. having no opportunity to defend himself, the result was that he was all over with now. It was enough that it was strictly conformable to the technical rules of law. Hence he thought the house should pause before adopting the resolution, as it could not do so without justifying an American general in trampling on the civil tribunals, two months after the treaty of peace, and imposing a judge on him which he regarded as directly in the face of the constitutional provision that the military shall be subject to the civil courts. If it was necessary however to do more than make a man president two or three times, and to excuse him for what he did on the occasion referred to, he went for that—but he could not go further.

Mr. Daveaze combated an idea thrown out in the course of the debate that it was now too late to act in this matter—because, to use that gentleman's language, it was all over with. He asked (with a rapidity and energy of manner that defies the power of the stenographer to record) allowing the gentleman to say that the late Mr. Marillon, after a period of half a century had elapsed, if it was then deemed too late to collect and bury in a common tomb all that remained of the brave men who fought and bled for their country on that sacred spot. And turning to our own history, Mr. D. asked, if it was too late to erect a monument to the heroic commission, which resulted in exhuming the sacred relics of Montgomery from an unhonored sepulchre in the very bastion where he fell, in a hostile land, and transferring them with imposing and solemn pageantry, to their final resting place in the state? No, said he, it is always opportunity for a man to do a nation to do a thing. Was it too late to erect a monument for a nation to do a thing? Was it too late, when in 1841, the congress of this union, passed a law directing the return to his heirs as a fine imposed on Matthew Lyon, by high judicial authority—higher even than that of Dominic A. Hall—for it was a judge of the supreme court—was it too late, he repeated, for the congress of the United States, twenty years after that time, was imposed under the inquisitorial edition law, to cause it to be refunded with interest to the heirs of the once Irish democrat? No! It was not too late—the law for repairing that injury—an injury that became enhanced in degree with time, for it was not every day that a man's heart with proud exultation. And yet that he was kept longer from the heirs of Matthew Lyon, than this $1,000 from Gen. Jackson.

Mr. D. here turned to Mr. Simmons' narrative of facts—saying that the gentleman was mistaken in almost every thing he had undertaken to state—probably from the fact that he had consulted almost entirely that most contemptible work—that book-making compilation, written with scissors by Judge Martin, and beaten throughout the impress of that vindictiveness which might have been looked for in one who, belonging to the judiciary, volunteered in its defence. Mr. D. said he was himself an historian of that epoch. He considered his oral testimony as strong as the written testimony of Judge Martin. Mr. D. denied that Mr. Morrill was attorney at law in General Jackson's army—but a lawyer who shouldered his musket and was at the lines with the rest. Mr. D. denied that Mr. Livingston appeared before a court martial in opposition to any proceeding there analogous to a case of slander. Mr. D. was himself Judge Advocate of the army. Mr. D. said to General Jackson, and he said that no man said to General Jackson, and he said that no man was ever brought before a court martial for slander. He stated further, as a set off to all that had been said and written of the imputed rashness of the commanding general, that although several persons were found guilty and sentenced by the court martial, not one was executed. He held that General Jackson continued a moment longer than was necessary and justifiable, the sway of martial law. He denied that at the time alluded to official intelligence had been received at New Orleans of the ratification of the treaty by Great Britain or the United States—or information of any kind that would have warranted a general retreat, still in the presence of the enemy, in relaxing his vigilance or means of defence. It was true that Mr. Livingston, on his return from the fleet whither he had been sent as the bearer of the sword, which he had given the history that morning, did bring a letter from Admiral Boscawen, announcing the signing of the treaty at Ghent; but it did not contain anything even semi official as to the ratifications having been exchanged, had reached the commanding general.

So also in regard to the order banishing, as the gentleman had termed it, certain aliens, he was obliged to assume the duty of the historian. That order was not issued in consequence of any mere newspaper publication, but of the attempts of the French consul to seduce from our ranks the Frenchmen, not naturalized, who had taken up the musket simply, as General J. remarked, because they were blue, and their adversaries red—and who themselves informed Gen. J. that they would not fight for the United States. He did not feel compelled to remain in the ranks. General J. called this mutiny in his camp—and, he remembered (said Mr. D.) his camp was then a besieged city—that the enemy, though defeated, shamefully defeated, and driven back into their ships, were yet three times more numerous than we, having been reinforced, by three more regiments; and that in a single night, they could again have encamped on the Mississippi. And Mr. D. asked if under these circumstances, and in the absence of official intelligence of the formal ratification of the treaty, Gen. J. would have been true to his duty had he suffered his army to have been converted to effect what the cannon of the enemy had failed to accomplish?

Mr. D. here passed to the facts connected with the arrest of Judge Hall—whom he characterised as the craven judge, who without the courage or patriotism of the women who remained at home, ran away when the enemy was before the city, and returned to the city with a broken heart. He said that the situation of his predictions of disaster to the American arms, but with a consciousness of not having acted as became him, and a determination to play the great man, and if possible to bring the old hero down to a level with himself. Under such unworthy impulses, he said Judge Hall did not hesitate to sign a proclamation, as he had been confessed by the gentleman from Essex, of acting as the complainant in his own court, against General J. and as the executor of his own vengeance. He fined the man whom a whole city hailed with gratitude as their deliverer, for a constructive contempt of his authority. It could scarcely be restrained, however, that he should speak thus of this man. He is dead, and I am willing he should sleep in peace and oblivion. But, sir, as he has been dug up here, and thrust between us and the living hero, as in his life time he was enabled officially to insult the conquering chief, I could scarcely restrain myself from saying that six years have elapsed since, the province of history has begun, and forbearance to surviving friends ceased.

Mr. O'Sullivan continued the debate and denied his having violated any confidence in reading the extracts he had read to the house. The very fact of his colleague having permitted him to read them—should have been taken as evidence that they were confidentially to be read before the public. Portions were confidential. Those he suppressed, as his colleague required they should be. Gen. J. used a word which implied injury—he called it a stain on his memory which he desired his country should wipe out. Far was it from General Jackson's thoughts to originate a movement to effect that object. The letter was one of a private nature, and which he had not at that time the slightest idea would lead to any species of legislative action. It was written two years ago.

Mr. O'S. had stated before, what it was unnecessary to state at all, that to Gen. Jackson the money was as nothing, that in all probability the charitable use would be made of it, as was suggested by Gen. J. when the amount was tendered to him by the citizens of New Orleans. Mr. O'S. would answer for it that when the object of this resolution should be consummated, no single dollar of this money would ever be converted to any other use. Mr. J. said to Gen. J. that a simple declaratory resolution, that the fine was improperly imposed, and should be refunded, would be enough to satisfy the wounded honor of the old soldier.

Mr. Daveaze repudiated the idea of its being the pecuniary consideration which impelled his urging the passage of the resolution in favor of the old general. He rejected it indignantly as being an insult to his name.

The resolution and preamble were then adopted by a vote of 63 to 24.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, THURSDAY, FEB. 3.

The question was on Mr. Sumner's amendment. Mr. Gilmer arose and said that after all that had been done, he was willing as the mover of the original proposition that had given rise to this debate, in withdrawal it provided the gentleman from Massachusetts would withdraw the petition he had offered proving a demand for redress.

Mr. Adams replied that, yesterday with a solemn appeal to his God, he had declared that in presenting this petition he had acted in a sense of duty from which he could not dispense himself. That is the answer I gave to the gentleman from a Virginia who heard it.

Mr. Gilmer. Then I feel constrained by a sense of duty as high as solemn and as sacred, to persevere in urging and supporting the proposition I have made to this house. Mr. G. here asked the reading of his resolution, and it was read. This resolution said Mr. G. contemplates no punishment save the public indignation which such an act merits and the expression of the censure of this house. The house has been put into a position in which it is compelled to give a public expression of its opinion. Why then the language of the gentleman about "pains and penalties" as if the Newgate calendar was haunting his dreams. The gentleman insists on his right to defend himself. Why has he not done it? Again and again with his usual dexterity he has arisen and defended himself. The gentleman has defied the house and its censure in so many words. He has said "the time for action has not yet come." He has referred to the interposition of the treaty making power, and has said that by it the government can emancipate the slaves of the south. He has referred to grievances to be redressed "peaceably if they can grow, if they must." I do not regard this question as involving merely the right of petition as he has contended for. It is a question that touches the union. Reference has been made to the course of South Carolina, and to the opinions avowed by one of its representatives. Mr. G. has asked if he has any references made? Do they not imply a consciousness of more or less of guilt. Does the avowal of others of hostility to the union excuse the gentleman from Massachusetts. I need not defend these gentlemen; they are abundantly capable of defending themselves. Is not the gentleman who has introduced this resolution, but it is the design and tendency of the proposition that I wish the house to consider. The spirit of '76 and '87 is not yet extinct. Is not this a fit occasion for its action. A proposition was made yesterday by my colleague [Mr. Sumners] to commit the whole subject to a committee. That would be gained by such a reference. Would a decision based on a report from any committee bring the subject any nearer to its determination? Not a whit. As to the question of privilege Mr. G. would refer again to the case of John Smith, and quote the language of the report on his case. It in one place repudiated the idea of "voluntary resignation." In another it repudiated as an apology for crippling the congressional power of expulsion. In another it argued that the power would be rendered "negatory by delay." The report concluded that the powers of congress to punish its own members was sustained by the constitution. The report also stated that the gentleman who was expelled was determined by a vote of 19 to 10. One vote more would have carried it. Mr. G. considered it as amounting to a virtual expulsion, one or two of the senators having left their seats as Mr. G. under-

Mr. A. next referred to the case of John Smith, and again admitted as he had done yesterday that the house had the discretionary power to try him on a question of privilege. But he claimed that the house must either send him before a court of justice to have his guilt first established, or that they should themselves first try him and establish his guilt. He said that as the house had already refused to send him to a court of justice, they must of course try him themselves before proceeding to their decision on his case, and he claimed a full and fair trial such as would be allowed to the vilest criminal. He had been charged, notwithstanding the ingenuity of the gentleman from Kentucky, to transpire from him the names of the persons who had conspired with Barratton in perjury and high treason, at least with being an accessory after the fact, and as it was shown by all the laws of England and of this country there were no necessities in treason, the position which would make him an accessory in common crime would make him a principal in treason. There was no such thing as high treason known in England, and he claimed that the laws of the United States which was defined in the constitution. There was not as in England any petty treason so there could not be any high treason. Mr. A. then criticised Mr. Marshall's recourse to English law for his charges of criminality against him. The gentleman from Albanee charged him with using something like wit. No man resorted to wit in more than one place, and he said that he resorted to it here, and that it always seemed to throw the house into bad humor.

and probably he had more occasion for that at present than any thing else.

But as one of the whimsicalities (so to speak) attending his present position, he was disposed to examine the consistency of the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Albemarle in their charges against him, and in order to show it he would be obliged again to go back to the petition from Georgia. That petition charged him with monomania—with insanity. And the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) had asked the house that he (Mr. A.) might be permitted to defend himself against it, because he (Mr. A.) was inclined to think that the charge was true. The gentleman from Albemarle, even before this present incendiary petition had been presented, had given notice to the house that he should move his (Mr. A.'s) expulsion, as chairman of the committee on foreign affairs, on the ground stated in the petition from Georgia—to wit, monomania. Both the gentlemen, then, had settled it on the petition from Georgia, that he was incompetent to act as chairman of that committee, from monomania. He had then presented the petition of forty-five citizens of Haverrhill, praying for a dissolution of the union, and at once these two gentlemen converted the petition into a petition for its own dissolution into an incendiary and a traitor. Was it customary to charge an insane man with the commission of crimes? [Laughter.] Not five minutes before he had presented this incendiary petition the gentleman had charged him as incompetent from weakness of sense; and no sooner had he offered the petition here, than he had turned round and charged him with subornation of perjury and high treason, and half a dozen other almost capital crimes. There would be some difficulty for the gentleman to prove his own consistency in these two classes of charges. If he (Mr. A.) was an insane man, he must plead that he deserved the compassion and not the severe punishment of the house; and if he was insane, was there was certainly as insane in presenting this petition to dissolve the union as he was insane in presenting this mock petition from Georgia.

And, by the way, he had further light thrown on that petition by the declaration of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Johnson), that he had been called upon congressional paper, from which he (Mr. A.) believed it had been commenced in this house. And he now called upon whoever might have originated that petition to stand up and avow it like a man. He believed it had been sent to Georgia, and that he had been called upon to receive him into the belief that it was a genuine petition. He could present it as such. He would not have presented it had he believed it to be a fabrication. He would have seen through its intent and purpose, and would have found a justification in his own mind for not presenting a forgery to the house, instead of what he believed it to be, a sincere and genuine paper.

He had already appealed to the good sense and to the feeling of this house to inquire whether, if such a petition did originate here—if it was what gentlemen had thought proper to denounce it, a hoax—he had appealed to them whether such an act was not such a breach of the privileges both of the members and of the house as would deserve the severest punishment the house could inflict.

The other day when he suggested the idea of the discovery made by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Johnson), he (Mr. A.) had said that he hoped that gentleman was not privy to it. One of the gentlemen from Ohio (Mr. Harshman) had said that immediately risen on that occasion, and that he, on that part, he would answer no such inquiry; that he would not suffer the possibility of such a thing to rest upon him. He (Mr. A.) believed the gentleman from Georgia. He believed that every member from that state who was then in the house was innocent entirely of any thing about it, but when he (Mr. A.) had called upon him to avow his disavowal, he had said that he would not, before the gentleman had made the discovery of its being written on congressional paper, he (Mr. A.) had observed that the disavowal was not so explicit as that of the gentleman from Georgia.

Would the gentleman from Maryland disavow all knowledge of this monomania?

Mr. B. C. Johnson rose and explained. He was very imperfectly heard, the reason of which was threefold: first, he was laboring; but he was understood to say that, at the time referred to, he had disclaimed any knowledge of the petition until he had seen it at the clerk's table. The remarks he had then made were reported in the "National Intelligencer," which paper the gentleman from Massachusetts had before him; and he (Mr. J.) must be permitted to say, that that gentleman ought to be the last to refer to him as being guilty of fraud or falsehood, when he (Mr. A.) has called him privately to his desk and had apologized to him for what he had then said, though he had not the magnanimity to do it on the floor. It was a sort of evadit unworthy of the gentleman, who thus himself committed a fraud.

Mr. Adams. The disavowal is not complete. Does the gentleman disavow any knowledge of the affair before he made that discovery at the clerk's table? I call upon him to answer.

Mr. Johnson. I did most imperfectly heard) was understood to say, that he had most distinctly made the disavowal. And no man with honorable feelings in his bosom would make such imputations upon honorable members of this house.

Mr. Adams. The gentleman from Maryland is a good tactician. I know him, and have known him long at this capacity. The gentleman at one time made a most unjustifiable use of the journals of this house and of my votes here in order to support the grounds he then assumed. I proved the fact to the house and to that gentleman, yet he never made an apology.

Mr. Johnson here made a remark, the purport of which was understood to be that he had proved the gentleman from Massachusetts to be guilty of error, and that the gentleman had never acknowledged it.

Mr. Adams remarked that the gentleman from Albemarle (Mr. G.) after insisting on trying him twice over, and after he had spent several days in that pleasant employment, had said, and after he (Mr. A.) had said that he presented the petition under the sense of duty to his oath and his conscience, that he (Mr. G.) was willing to withdraw his resolution of censure provided he (Mr. A.) would withdraw the petition. No, no—he could not do that. When he had said that he had given up his duty, he had bound to present it he was not speaking to the winds. The question involved the total suppression of the right of petition to the whole people of this union. Many modes and varieties of forms some too ridiculous to be adopted by any sensible house of representatives were made use of to exclude petitions and he was weary of them. He would not, he said, be bound if the gentleman could get a solemn vote of this house censuring members for presenting petitions, then, they thought, this question would be settled; they thought the freedom of the north would not send petitions on any subject they thought proper to oppose. He would not, he said, be bound if the members of the north—when the language was held to them, ay, present your petitions, but you do it under the penalty of violating the privileges of the house—then, they thought, the matter would be ended. But he promised them that it would not be ended; he promised them that they could have the protection here (to use the expression of a sublime and lofty poet of England) "besieging not beseeching."

If he had withdrawn the petition, he would consider himself as having sacrificed the right of petition, as having sacrificed the right of habeas corpus; as having sacrificed the right of trial by jury; as having sacrificed the sacred confidence of the post office; as having sacrificed the freedom of the press; as having sacrificed the freedom of speech; as having sacrificed every element of liberty that was enjoyed by his fellow citizens, because, if he had proved craven to his trust under the intimidation of the charges of the gentleman from Albemarle, and the gentleman from Kentucky, never would the house have seen a petition presented from the people of the union, expressing their grievances in a manner that might not be pleasing to the members of the "peculiar institutions," until at length the people should teach them the lesson that, however their representatives might be intimidated by the discharge of their duty, they (the people) would be their own champions, and the defenders of their own rights. There was the deadly character of the attempt made to put him down—to charge him as a criminal for presenting a petition. Did the gentleman from Albemarle think that that was the way to suppress the discharge of their duty to the people, to the public presses of the north upon this very transaction—from New York, or even from Philadelphia, northward—and see the opinions which he had already expressed as to the manner in which he had been persecuted. And if that gentleman and the gentleman from Kentucky thought that this course upon the part of Mr. A. produced as they were attempting to produce it, would appear discord and silence discussion, they would find very different sentences prevailing.

Mr. Gilmer here rose, and tendered to Mr. Adams a newspaper, (which the reporter understood to be the Essex Banner, Haverrhill, of date January 27.)

Mr. Adams. I can furnish the gentleman with twenty papers for his use.

Mr. Gilmer. The exchange, then, will be in my favor. [Laughter.]

The speaker interposed to order.

Mr. Adams said he did not wish to be diverted by any of these interruptions.

The gentleman had said that he had offered his resolution under a sense of duty without consultation in caucus, or convention, or otherwise; yet the gentleman had suffered the far more violent resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky to be before the house until this morning, without ever having declared whether he had accepted it or not as a substitute for his own resolution. He had not held a consultation after that resolution was offered.

Mr. Gilmer. Frequently.

Mr. Adams. I mean a caucus.

Mr. Gilmer. I do not know what the gentleman means by a caucus; but I—

Mr. Adams, (interrupting Mr. G.) The gentleman does not know what I mean by a caucus? That is enough. [Laughter.]

Mr. Gilmer said he did know what the gentleman meant by a caucus, but he wanted to know what the gentleman meant when he spoke of a caucus; and he (Mr. G.) would now, after the fashion of the Yankees, answer the gentleman's question by asking him another. Had the gentleman himself held no consultations, and had there not been another caucus at which he (Mr. G.) was not present?

The speaker again interposed.

Mr. Adams said, that as to any consultations or consultations, he did not know what that was a thing for which he was responsible to the house whenever called upon from a proper quarter.

Mr. Gilmer. So am I.

Mr. Adams. The gentleman equivocates. He dares not acknowledge that he was a party to that secret conference beneath this hall which followed immediately after the gentleman's question by asking him to know it, and he is trying to evade it by putting questions to me.

Mr. Gilmer, who had risen, took his seat, remarking (as the reporter thinks) that he would not reply to such language.

Mr. Adams proceeded. He took for granted that the gentleman was there; and he took it for granted that the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) was the result of that caucus.

But more. The gentleman from Albemarle had said that he brought forward this resolution upon his own ground, without consultation, under a sense of the indignation he felt at the presentation of the petition. Yet, mark; the gentleman had, before that time, notified this house that he was prepared to dismiss him (Mr. A.) as chairman of the committee on foreign relations, according to the prayer of the petition from Georgia. The gentleman had given notice of this to the house, and he (Mr. A.) Yes, the gentleman had tampered with a colleague of his (Mr. A.'s) own, to put him in the station of chairman of the committee on foreign affairs, in his (Mr. A.'s) place.

Mr. Gilmer and Mr. Cushing both denied this, and after some dispute between Mr. A. and Mr. C. Mr. Adams continued.

There was a design to remove him from his station as chairman of the committee on foreign affairs before he presented this petition. The attempt to carry this into execution had already been made in the committee on foreign affairs. Notice had been given by a member of this house and a member of that committee to remove him (Mr. A.) from his station before he had presented this petition. He hoped the house would notice that fact. He would read from the record of the proceedings of that committee.

He did not take it that the proceedings of the committees of this house were secret. Since he had been a member of the house, any person who chose had been permitted to attend them. He understood he was at liberty to read the proceedings of the committee. He then read the following record of the proceedings of the committee on foreign affairs, at its session on Tuesday, February 1, 1842:

In committee on foreign affairs of the house of representatives of the United States, Tuesday, 1st February, 1842:

Present—Adams, Gilmer, Everett, Hunter, Rhett, Cushing, Preble, Johnson, Granger.

The chairman presented a paper in writing, to the effect that Thomas W. Gilmer, a member of the house from Virginia and a member of this committee, having announced in the house his intention to move, without instructions from the house, that this committee do elect a chairman, the present chairman inquires whether Mr. Gilmer is now ready to make that motion; and moved that this inquiry, together with Mr. Gilmer's answer, be entered on the minutes of the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. Gilmer presented a paper in writing, in response to this inquiry.

pointment by president Monroe to the highest post held under him, Mr. A. continued:]

He had spoken of the confidence, the friendship, and the love of the children of Virginia, and his affection and gratitude to them and their memory. It would be impossible for him to withhold the affection for that state which he had held from a boy. But when he saw the treatment he was receiving from the children of that same state, who now presented—a part of them at least—what could be his feelings? What must they have been to find himself charged here with such a violation of public duties as a member of this house, as that the censure of this house should be invoked on him?—And with respect to one resolution, to find charges of such infamous crimes as subordination of perjury and high treason, attempted to be fastened upon him, and his good name to the end of time? There must be a great change in the feelings of Virginia. In all the intercourse he had with these men, from Washington down to Monroe, never, in the course of his life, was there a question between them and him on the subject of slavery. He knew that they all abhorred slavery, and he could prove it, if it was denied now, from the testimony of Jefferson, of Madison, and of Washington themselves. There was not an abolitionist of the wildest character in the northern states but might find in the writings of Jefferson at the time of his Declaration of Independence, and during his whole life down to the time of his death, a justification of every thing they say on the subject of slavery, and a description of the horrors of slavery greater than he had the power to express.

How was it now? He was to be held up by Virginia as it was the leader and head, not only of the abolition party, but of a disunion party, a British party, not only influenced by British feelings and assistance, but by British money.

He must close this part of his defence—for he had now for the first time entered on his defence—by saying that it was unexpected, most perfectly unexpected to him, that he knew what these great men of the revolutionary times, who were Virginia, thought of slavery—of the institution to which now every thing was to be sacrificed—when he now saw members from that state endeavoring to destroy him and his character, for the sole cause of presenting a petition. He should have hoped better things of Virginia, and of the representation of that state upon this floor would have felt something of.

"That holy shame which we're fearful

What care renown it used to wear,

Whose blush remain's when virtue soars

To show her sunshine has been there."

And he here yielded the floor.

The action of Mr. Thompson, of Indiana, the house adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEB. 4. Mr. Adams had been endeavoring to establish the existence of a conspiracy in the house and out of the house against himself, and through him, against the right of petition and all the rights and liberties of the free people of this union, against the right of habeas corpus; the right of trial by jury, the freedom of the press; against the sacred confidence of the post office; and he might, he said, have added, against the peace of this country with foreign powers, and most especially with Great Britain. Of this conspiracy he said he had furnished proof of so much as had reference to himself, his position in this house, and his franchises as a member of it, and his private position as chairman of the committee on foreign affairs. I proved, said Mr. A., that, before I had offered the petition, the presentation of which is the alleged ground of this proceeding against me, and before I was under any charge in reference to which it is proposed the house shall be so convened, the purpose of removing me from the position of the chairman of the committee on foreign affairs had been already disclosed by one of the members of the house, and that that member had tampered with my colleague, (Mr. Cushing), whom I regret not to see in his place, that he had tampered with my colleague appeared to be a little alarmed at the disclosure, and he had induced the member from Albemarle (Mr. Gilmer), with having equivocated in the answer he gave to the charge.

Mr. Gilmer called upon Mr. Cushing to state distinctly that he had had no communication with him direct or indirect.

Mr. Prentiss. I hope he (Mr. A.) will admit that I had no part in this tampering.

Mr. Cushing. My colleague saw fit, gratuitously and most unjustly to introduce on the floor of this house a reference to a private and personal conversation of mine with a gentleman, and to make an imputation on my character, and to make an imputation on me, when detailing private conversation, to substitute the understanding of the narrator for what was really said. I have before me a report of what my colleague said: he said that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Gilmer) had tampered with me on the subject of displacing my colleague from the chair of the committee on foreign affairs, and phrasing myself in his bill. I had seen nothing of the kind said to him. He further said that promises had been made to me. I denied the truth of the statement then, as I deny it now. I deny both that such a fact transpired, and that I made any such communication to my colleague. I said I denied it then; and yet my colleague reiterated the statement, and said I had added it to the report. I have now the opportunity of refuting what he said, and I do so.

(Mr. Adams. No, sir!)

My colleague has no right thus to interrupt me. Other gentlemen of the house have rights on this floor as well as he. My colleague, I say, reiterated the assertion, and in this form. (Here, Mr. C. quoted the report, and he said that he had added it to the report, but asserted that I admitted its truth, when again and again I denied it.)

What did occur was this. On the 25th of January, in the debate which occurred in relation to the memorial from Georgia presented in this house by my colleague, a conversation took place between the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Gilmer), the speaker of the house, and my colleague, (Mr. Adams), on the subject of the choice of a new chairman. The gentleman from Virginia interrogated the chair as to the powers and rights of a standing committee of this house over that matter. Whereupon my colleague declared that he had no authority to make a declaration and avowal of a contemplated purpose of a gentleman or of gentlemen of that committee; and that declaration was the cause and origin of what has since occurred. I, being second upon the list of the committee, felt a painful delay in my situation, and in consequence of that I engaged in conversation with my colleague, in which I stated to him the facts, so far as they were pertinent to the subject. I trust that while my colleague is engaged in defending himself, he will abstain from gratuitous and injurious assaults upon others, at least upon me.

Mr. Adams, resuming. My colleague has said every thing but what I asked of him, and what it imports this house to know. I asked him from whom he obtained the information that it was contemplated to appoint him to the chair of the committee, and what it was that made him feel himself in so very delicate a position, that he was induced to cherish a purpose to resign his seat in the committee, and at the same time to assume authority of a majority of the committee itself, that it was he who had presented to the mind of my colleague the prospect of his rise by my fall. I now ask him from whom that communication came? The member from Albemarle and the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Prentiss) have both stated that they do not have the least gain in mind from the motion of the member from Albemarle and the conversation about the streets; that from something stronger than that that my colleague had felt himself placed in a situation so embarrassing that he contemplated a resignation. As to a reference here to private conversations, I hold that in reference to conversations of this kind, I am in the same position now stand in, I am justified in repeating them for my own defence. The member from Albemarle has read here a letter written by me thirty years ago, and of the most private and confidential character. I do not complain of that—

Let anxious jealousy and envious spite

Prevent me to reveal and to disclose

And ask my open day or secret night."

No man shall find me shrinking from the disclosure. I say I do not complain of the member from Virginia for presenting to this house a private letter of mine, written in the most confidential manner and in very private terms. If the gentleman will send the letter, I will thank him, and in the meantime I have the opportunity of defending what I then wrote.

[A voice: "It has been printed in the report: it is in the paper."]

If my colleague thinks proper, after my disclaimer of all charge upon him, to take what I have said as offensive to himself, I cannot help it. I never charged him with having encouraged the tampering of which I spoke; but he said to me that he could not resist the temptation to make a declaration that he would have nothing to do with it. Is the gentleman resigned his seat, the next on the list of preferment would, I understand, be the member from Albemarle himself. I do not charge that my colleague was ready to resign in order to get the seat for that member, and when a private conversation takes place as to facts which are vital to my defence as an accused party, I hope my colleague will not consider me as intruding upon the house when I do refer to such conversation. I again ask him to name the man or men that did give him the information of which he spoke to me.

Mr. Cushing did not choose to be put in the position of a witness here. So far as I know there has been no tampering; no proposition was certainly ever made to me.

Mr. Rhett rose and said: I was not in the house when the facts alluded to took place, but I have since seen the report of them, as it is given in the Intelligence. No person making the imputation against the gentleman of detailing private and friendly conversation on this floor, I must ask the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Cushing) to narrate what occurred between us relative to this matter, especially as the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), after assailing so many others, seems now to have singled me out for a tonalawk, and the house knows with what remorselessness he goes to work on his victims.

(Mr. Cushing having expressed his assent)—

Mr. Rhett said: After the gentleman from Massachusetts had submitted his motion to the house, now pending, that the committee on foreign affairs should choose a new chairman, if they thought it proper to do so, I was passing near the clerk's table where the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Cushing) was standing, and I said to him: "Well, Mr. Cushing, as you stand upon the list of the committee, I suppose you shall have to elect you our chairman; to that that gentleman replied, 'No, sir; I neither can nor will serve.'—'But suppose,' I replied, 'we elect you, what can you do?' He answered, 'The house may appoint a chairman; I cannot and will not serve if elected.'"

And now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts can make any ad submission to this argument he or his colleague, or beneficial to himself, he is welcome to do so.

Mr. Adams. Will the gentleman be kind enough to hand me a pamphlet he quoted to us a day or two since?

Mr. Rhett. After assailing half a dozen other gentlemen on this floor, I suppose he means now to lift up a tonalawk upon me; every body knows the ferocity with which he makes his attack. I suppose I must prepare myself for the consequences. I now inform the gentleman that I sent the pamphlet, temporarily, to the public press, so that it is not now in my possession.

Mr. Adams. I shall be much obliged to the gentleman for the use of it. I do not know that I shall want it to-day. [A laugh.] But in the defence of my good name, and of all I hold dear, and all I have to leave to my children, I may possibly want to make use of that pamphlet.

Well, now all is disclosed. The facts are sufficient for me. I will bid the gentleman from South Carolina on what premises he founded the conclusion that if I was removed my colleague would be elected.

Mr. Rhett. I have already stated that his name stood second on the list.

Mr. Adams. That was nothing at all, if a chairman was to be elected. The gentleman himself might have been chosen to fill the vacancy, or the very last name on the list, just as well as the second. He is the man who tampered with my colleague; he has admitted it on this floor. Let it go to the country—let it go to the world. I am now satisfied. I ask pardon of the gentleman from Albemarle for thinking that he was so much interested in the result of this situation was made to my colleague. I will simply say that a gentleman of the standing of the gentleman from South Carolina would not have made such a proposition without some information to ground it upon. I rather think some little bird must have whispered in the ear of the gentleman that he was a majority of the committee, and he accordingly offered to substitute my colleague for myself. I do not ask for any further disclosure of private conversations; I will not ask him on what ground he proceeded when he put this little temptation into my colleague's mind.

Mr. Rhett again interposed. The gentleman infers that somebody must have had communication with me; and now I suppose another conclusion is being hatched up. I say that nobody did communicate with me at all on the subject; and my passing observation to his colleague was entirely the result of my own thoughts and opinion. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Cushing) stood second on the list of the members of the committee, and he accordingly, to courtesy, would give him the preference. Besides, he had been the former chairman, and if the house, according to the gentleman's own proposition, did refer it to the committee to choose a chairman, deeming his colleague (Mr. Cushing) a far superior man for the situation, I should be bound to accept of a sense of duty, to vote for his being the chairman of the committee. It required no counsel with any one to pursue a path so plain.

Mr. Adams. I am satisfied; and I here again say to my colleague that I disclaim all intention of making any charge upon him throughout the whole transaction; and I thought he would not be the man to lend himself to this sort of insinuation or conspiracy, as I denounce it. It now appears that he rejected it instantly, and then came to me and gave me the information of what had transpired. I had inferred from the motion here, made by the gentleman from Albemarle, that it was he who made the proposition. I am glad to be able to say to the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Preffitt, that I never did, and never intended having taken part in this league—not for a woman; and I now receive with the most undoubted confidence his disclaimer of participation in it. [A laugh.]

Mr. Preffitt. I am under very great obligations to the gentleman from Massachusetts. Two days after the gentleman's colleague informed me of what had been said to him, and of what was the general conversation of southern gentlemen on the subject, and implored me by every feeling of private friendship that I would do all I could to prevent such an event. There were four southern gentlemen and four northern gentlemen on the committee; and knowing that I held in my hand the balance of the committee, I answered him that I would.

Mr. Adams. I am happy to hear this testimony in confirmation of the honorable conduct of my colleague; and that the gentleman from Indiana was not part and parcel of the conspiracy against me; and that the proposition was made to my colleague with any certainty of its being supported by a majority of the committee.

In the course of this long, and to me most painful trial, among other charges in the papers, and which have been contumacious, in some respects by those who profess to be my friends, it is said that I have given ground to this persecution of the abolitionists, with which I have attempted to defend myself against it. Now, I do not know whether there be a member of this house who, if he had one of these mad dogs whom the mayor of Washington has proscribed by proclamation coming at him "full butt," would put his own head in the mill, putting it, it would say to him, in a very gentle tone, "my dear fellow, now pray don't hurt me." For my part, if I should find a real bad animal like that at the very point of biting me, and putting into the wound some of that slaver which kills, I should be very apt to use against him some indignation stronger than my bare hand, and make some demonstration a little more hostile than putting his head.

If there be no palliation—I do not say justification, for I put myself in this upon the indulgence of the house—for any improper acrimony in my words, directed as they have been against men whom I consider as wanting me with a day far beyond that of any mad dog—with a fury beyond that which any mad dog would be brought from Cuba to throttle the Florida Indians—I throw myself upon the indulgence of this house. I ask the house to consider my position; and, in indulgence to human frailty, to overlook the use of terms which may be unsuited, not to those who are attacking me, but for me to use.

I admit, I confess, that in charging the Georgia whigs, the South Union nullifiers, the Tyler corporals' guard and the squadron of Kentucky with most extraordinary combination and amalgamation to persecute me, I have, perhaps, made use of too general terms. I am under an eternal debt to that gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Warren) who came out here and declared that henceforward he should be engaged against the legislation of this house, and the responsibility to his constituents which he incurred by such an act. I appreciate most fully the intrepidity of soul which alone could have led him to such an avowal in the face of this house. I assure him, and this house, that the memory of what he has done will remain as a monument as long as that reason shall be left to me which some of his constituents may, such they be, or of his mock constituents, as is asserted by others, have publicly denied me to possess.

There are, besides, three or four gentlemen from Kentucky, the particular friends of the gentleman who has made the most violent attack upon me, but who have not, from the Legislature, been enabled him in that measure, and whom I would here notice were it not against the rules, whom I beg to understand that not one word I have said has been at any time directed against them; on the contrary, I feel myself under the greatest obligations to them for doing what they have done. I have no objection to their public duty, just as much as if it had been in their private and personal friendship to me. I make them some acknowledgment to several of the members from Maryland, a state to which I feel an attachment perhaps as strong as that I have avowed towards the state of Virginia. The children are half citizens of Maryland. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) some days ago, in one of the most powerful and eloquent speeches he has made here, amidst the most pathetic appeal which I think I ever have heard in my whole life, referred to the consequences of slander upon the relatives of the slandered party, and on the heart of a mother or of a sister. Does the gentleman suppose that I, the man who has a mother or a sister whose bosom is alive to charges of crime made against himself? By those who are aware of my intimate domestic connection with the state of Maryland, my position in this house can be better appreciated. If the gentleman could know how much I am concerned in every dearer and nearer than those of mother or sister have the friends of nations, I would ask him how he would himself feel were such accusations unjustly preferred against him!

I have apologized to some of the members from Maryland: I wish I could do the same thing to those who compose what is called the corporals' guard.—They are said to be in very intimate connection with a distinguished person, with whom I wish to stand in the most friendly relations possible; and I wish I could make that person an exception from the conspiracy which has been formed against me, and of which I have here presented the proofs. I wish he were not concerned in such a combination. I should have some comfort in seeing him in the ranks. There were there one single member of that body, which is called the guard, to whom I could address the same apology which I have addressed to gentlemen from Maryland and from Kentucky. [A voice: We want none.] As to that distinguished person, I think that at the close of his last session I manifested a disposition to support him and his administration, which ought to be remembered; and I will say further, that since I have been placed at the head of the committee on Foreign Affairs he has had positive assurance of my inclination to support him, which he had not before. The closer, therefore, does it come to my feelings, to his intimate, confidential friends in this house, at the close of his session, in his removal, in his engagement with some of the virulent members of the opposition against me. I called for a copy of the letter from the president, which the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. W. C. Johnson) declared here in his place that he had received.

[Mr. W. C. Johnson here rose, and, though very imperfectly heard, was understood to say that he never stated that he had received a letter from the president of the States.]

Well, then, from the vice-president; or from Mr. John Tyler. Whichever it came from, the gentleman introduced it here as one argument to induce this house to reverse its determination, three times expressed, to abolish the 21st rule. The gentleman said he had received a letter from a distinguished gentleman of Virginia, and knew from that letter that the president would not make it if they could not at least get the newspapers, and from them I get my information;—but some doubt was entertained whether that could be done, and so they left it to the gentleman from Kentucky to prepare a resolution in conformity with the deliberations which had been held, which should come as near expulsion as it is possible, and, I should think, declare that it is not expedient, might consist in an act of great mercy, for I richly deserved it.

Mr. Triplett here rose, and stated that he himself, without consultation with a human being, and without any reference to his having presented the last petition, and without any aid or assistance of the abolition petitions which he had previously presented, had commenced a conversation with gentlemen from the south, and asked a number of them whether it would not be right to get up a meeting with a view to the protection of their peculiar institutions. Some of the older and more experienced members had dissuaded him from such a proposal, and the journey of the house as he had at first proposed, and the caucus which did take place was induced by the presentation of the petition for the dissolution of the union. Mr. T. said that he would then state what had taken place in the caucus. It consisted of a good many more than forty men, and after the first proposal had been made, particularly as to a modification of the 21st rule, which might rid the house of petitions so framed as at present to avoid the rule. While the speaking was going on, a gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) had come in. Much was said as to the course of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but no actual action had been taken, and no course determined on. It was agreed that another meeting should be held, not for the purpose of consulting what should be done with the gentleman from Massachusetts—for that was a question respecting which every gentleman must consult his own breast—but what should be done to protect the south from the designs of northern abolitionists.

Mr. Marshall said that it had been correctly reported in the paper that he declared on the floor of that house that he offered the resolutions he proposed on his own responsibility. The original draught of them had been made at his own table, without consultation with any one. As he was about to leave the hall, he had called on the gentleman from Kentucky who was holding a meeting. He repaired to the place, and listened to the remarks of southern gentlemen there made, and never in his life had he witnessed greater discrepancy. In regard to most of the opinions expressed, Mr. Marshall differed from a great many of the committee on foreign affairs, with the promise held out to my colleague (Mr. George) that he should be appointed in my place; if he would consent to the movement, I think I have fully disclosed.

I now proceed further. All this took place before I presented the petition which is the foundation of the present proceeding against me. When I did present the petition, the member from Accomac, the neutral man, [a laugh]—the member from Virginia, who would be in order to introduce a vote of censure. Another very combustible member from Virginia proposed to burn the petition; and well was it for me that he did not include a motion to burn the petitions and the presenter of the petition himself.

And here I must do the speaker the justice to say the proposition to burn did not seem in the least agreeable to him. [A laugh.] He was not quite ready, it seems, for an auto de fe. I wish I could see that combustible gentleman in his place, but I fear he is not now in the house. He said that, for his part, he had made up his mind. He was quite ready to refer the subject to the committee on foreign affairs, and to have its chairman moved forthwith. He was ready for it. This did not much surprise me, because I knew that the gentleman had made much such a declaration three years ago in a printed letter addressed to the captain Piper—not a certainly the Peter Piper who picked up a box of papers ready for it, for it would have puzzled that Peter Piper to have found so much as a single grain of spice in that letter. He would have found filth and venom enough, but no spice; not a scrap, not a grain. And the gentleman had the kindness, at my request, to give me a copy of that pamphlet concluding that letter. I have preserved it with care among the monuments of glory which I should claim, if I am to reckon among the honors of my country the assault, the unprovoked assault, of the combustible gentleman from Virginia. I was not surprised that he proposed to burn the petition, and to support the resolutions which are of dissolution of the union was to be moved, that he was quite ready for it. And that gentleman is to be one of my judges!

And the member from Albemarle (Mr. Gilmer) caught at once at the hint thrown out by his colleague from Accomac and forthwith offered a resolution declaring that the member from Massachusetts, by presenting such a petition, had incurred the censure of this house. This resolution was very mild in comparison with that afterwards offered by the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall).

But it seems that this was not thought to be enough, and some thirty or forty members of this house—I wish they would all of them stand now in the hall, or would present us with a list of the years and days taken in that delicious caucus, (I hope the member from Albemarle will understand me without further explanation. Yesterday, if I remember right, he did not understand what a caucus meant)—agreed to meet, and a caucus was held. It was determined that if they could not at least get the newspapers, and from them I get my information;—but some doubt was entertained whether that could be done, and so they left it to the gentleman from Kentucky to prepare a resolution in conformity with the deliberations which had been held, which should come as near expulsion as it is possible, and, I should think, declare that it is not expedient, might consist in an act of great mercy, for I richly deserved it.

Mr. Triplett here rose, and stated that he himself, without consultation with a human being, and without any reference to his having presented the last petition, and without any aid or assistance of the abolition petitions which he had previously presented, had commenced a conversation with gentlemen from the south, and asked a number of them whether it would not be right to get up a meeting with a view to the protection of their peculiar institutions. Some of the older and more experienced members had dissuaded him from such a proposal, and the journey of the house as he had at first proposed, and the caucus which did take place was induced by the presentation of the petition for the dissolution of the union. Mr. T. said that he would then state what had taken place in the caucus. It consisted of a good many more than forty men, and after the first proposal had been made, particularly as to a modification of the 21st rule, which might rid the house of petitions so framed as at present to avoid the rule. While the speaking was going on, a gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) had come in. Much was said as to the course of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but no actual action had been taken, and no course determined on. It was agreed that another meeting should be held, not for the purpose of consulting what should be done with the gentleman from Massachusetts—for that was a question respecting which every gentleman must consult his own breast—but what should be done to protect the south from the designs of northern abolitionists.

Mr. Marshall said that it had been correctly reported in the paper that he declared on the floor of that house that he offered the resolutions he proposed on his own responsibility. The original draught of them had been made at his own table, without consultation with any one. As he was about to leave the hall, he had called on the gentleman from Kentucky who was holding a meeting. He repaired to the place, and listened to the remarks of southern gentlemen there made, and never in his life had he witnessed greater discrepancy. In regard to most of the opinions expressed, Mr. Marshall differed from a great many of those present. He himself then addressed the meeting, and read to it the resolution which he had previously prepared—apprising the gentleman that he had drawn them up on his own responsibility, and should offer them in the house without reference to what might be there agreed on. He had further expressed it as his own opinion, that the subject of abolition might not be connected with it; that he should not himself attempt any such association, nor did he mean or desire that it should be attempted by others. The resolutions were in no sense the result of that caucus. They had been drawn up before he had heard of it, and no vote was there taken upon them. He had read them to the gentleman assembled, but had not submitted them to their aid. He had at first intended to move the expulsion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and his intention to do so had been changed not by the views or conversations of his friends in the house, but of those who were out of the house. The gentleman from Massachusetts was perfectly ignorant of this admission. The gentleman himself had dared the house to expel him—had declared that he scorned its grace and mercy; that, if expelled, he would go back to his constituents; that they would send him here again. On reflection Mr. M. had thought it not unlikely that this would be the result, and he then offered the other resolutions, because he thought that peace and the dignity of the house alike required that the gentleman from Massachusetts should be stopped.

Mr. Adams. Yes I was to be stopped; and the member from Albemarle threatened to stop my music. I am happy that the facts have been disclosed. In consequence of the reference made to that caucus I am not at all surprised that the gentleman from Kentucky should have cherished an intention of moving to expel me; and I have no doubt that had a motion been made to cut me up into pieces of an ounce I should have been just as ready to vote for that. And I have demonstrated pretty clearly, I think, the fact that he has actually done that which to me is infinitely worse than putting me to death—a threat, however, which was actually made (as I showed from letters which I read here yesterday) by certain other auxiliaries of the member from Albemarle. I think he would have carried up these resolutions without consultation with any, and then read them to the caucus, and left those who composed it in full possession of all his views. I am not surprised. It was almost a justification, at least it was a great palliation of the act, that there existed such a discrepancy of views among those who composed the caucus. He could not, it seems, bring any of them, however exasperated, to follow in a crusade against abolition petitions. The gentleman tells us as he did not mean to connect his resolutions and the proceedings thereon with the subject of abolition at all. This is very extraordinary. The presentation of abolition petitions has never before been so much a part of the business of the house as it has been the very object respecting which the meeting was called, and it is pre-eminently the thing involved in the present proceedings here. If I am to be censured, it is for presenting abolition petitions; and if the petitioners are to be censured here, they are to be censured for having sent here an abolition petition.

Mr. A. here quoted from the Haverhill paper which expressed his feelings against the petition, and which demanded the names of those who signed it. I thought it was gross of the part of the editor of the whole argument of the gentleman from Kentucky, and the gentleman from Albemarle in support of this prosecution of the house against me; for, though they cannot, as this editor does, suppress the fact that I was for instructing the committee to report reasons against the petition, yet they both, throughout their whole argument, have gone on the principle that I am responsible as if I had instructed the committee to bring in a report favorable to the prayer of these petitioners. This is the whole substance of their argument. I do not know what effect it may have had upon the house. One gentleman, at least, declared that he would never refer the petition to me, and he is reported on, because he believed I was not so heartily in favor of what it asked for. That is the injustice which has been done me by these prosecutors from beginning to end.

There are other passages in the Haverhill paper which express strong feeling against the petition, and which demand the names of those who signed it. I thought it was gross of the part of the editor of the whole argument of the gentleman from Kentucky, and the gentleman from Albemarle in support of this prosecution of the house against me; for, though they cannot, as this editor does, suppress the fact that I was for instructing the committee to report reasons against the petition, yet they both, throughout their whole argument, have gone on the principle that I am responsible as if I had instructed the committee to bring in a report favorable to the prayer of these petitioners. This is the whole substance of their argument. I do not know what effect it may have had upon the house. One gentleman, at least, declared that he would never refer the petition to me, and he is reported on, because he believed I was not so heartily in favor of what it asked for. That is the injustice which has been done me by these prosecutors from beginning to end.

unpopular with a majority of the inhabitants of that county as it is against the opinions of any member from South Carolina in this house, and I am, at the point. The point is, the right of the people to be heard in petitioning here for a redress of grievances.

But now to come to the petitioners. A proposition has been moved here by a gentleman from Virginia, to suspend the gentleman who is the whole subject to a select committee, and, so far as the committee is concerned, I have no objection—reserving, however, to myself the right of defending myself before that committee. But I submit to that gentleman that his resolution places all these petitioners in the light of accessories. And I ask this house to consider me here as a witness, in case the committee, which he calls the representative, to an account, but the representative the constituent, and that for crimes of so great a magnitude. Should the subject go to a committee, the preliminary question will be, are the crimes of subornation of perjury and of high treason, in this petition, and if they are, will the committee come to a conclusion, without hearing the petitioners? Certainly not. I say again, that the usual state of things is here reversed. A representative calls his constituent to an account, and accuses him of high treason and subornation of perjury. Mr. Sumners here explained that his resolution did not contemplate an insertion of the preamble moved by Mr. Marshall, but was intended to exclude the preamble as well as the resolutions.

Mr. Adams. If that is the purpose of the gentleman, and if the adoption of his resolution will be equivalent to a rejection of the whole proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, then certainly the rejection will not apply so far as regards the petitioners. Yet if we are to come at the subject at all, I do not see how the committee can escape from the weighty charges which lie at the foundation of the whole matter. I say that the effect must be to put the gentleman from Kentucky in the place of a representative. Even the resolution of the gentleman from Albemarle does virtually include the constituent. It trenches on his right to petition, and I do not see how the committee can escape from that difficulty. So far, however, as I am concerned, I again declare that I am perfectly willing the gentleman's resolution should have been carried, and I have no objection to it. But what I wish in the present stage of the proceeding, and that which I insist upon is a direct vote, ay or no, on the propositions of the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Albemarle.

Among the proofs of this conspiracy against the rights of the people, and the rights of freedom in free states, I alluded to the auxiliaries of the member from Albemarle out of this house as well as in it. In regard to his auxiliaries in the house, I think the proof must have been perfectly satisfactory to the mind of every man. The gentleman has told us that the caucus consisted of more than forty members. Some of these members were more than forty judges, who had predetermined by sentence, meeting in conclave to consult how it could be carried into execution. I ask of every member here present whether he would be willing to be placed in the same circumstances?

As to the external auxiliaries of the member from Albemarle and the conspiracy, I will first speak of the members, which, as is well known, is done under the superintendence of what is called the south. It is well known that at the south there are committees of vigilance, who violate the post office, and who take out without scruple and burn whatever they consider as in its nature incendiary. What is the result? It is that the press is everywhere silent, that whenever a debate of this kind occurs, you never can get a fair report of it; and, in proof of this assertion, I give the report of yesterday in the National Intelligencer. There is no report of that debate which deserves the name of a report; and, as to the Globe, which is another of the papers, as the gentleman has said, there is scarcely a day in which it does not contain a column or a column and a half against me. For the truth of this I appeal to all who read the Globe. And not only that, but there is a paper at Alexandria, said to be a whig paper, which utters against me whole volumes of the bitterest invective, equal in violence to that of the member from Accouee or the member from Kentucky. And all this for what? For presenting a petition! And they charge me with a consumption of the time of this house, and with all the confusion arising out of these debates, though I can appeal to the members of the house whether I am responsible for one hour thus occupied! I have declined that responsibility from the beginning. Even after all the thunder and the lightnings of the gentleman from Accouee, and Kentucky, and from Albemarle, I have offered to sit down without one word of reply. But what I do I am bound to do, in defence of my own reputation, and in defence of my constituents. Here is the influence of the press, both positive and negative; negative in the failure to report truly the debates of the house, positive in the circulation of abuse against an accused man when not upon his trial. What would be the consequence if such a course should be pursued in regard to a court of justice before which I stood charged with subornation of perjury and high treason? Is not the practice of the courts of the country that during the course of a public trial the press should be excluded, that there may be a fair and impartial decision?

Mr. Adams proceeded to remark that the members of both houses of congress were not bound by oath to support the constitution. The gentleman from Kentucky maintained that they were not upon his trial for the proof. The oath to which they are sworn is to support the constitution of the United States.—Another gross assumption in that preamble was, that the dissolution of the union could only be effected by force. Washington and Madison were the men who took the first steps in dissolving the union of the confederacy; and the very first words of the constitution of the United States declare its object to be to form a more perfect union. It was dissolved in direct defiance of the constitution of the confederacy, which provided that no dissolution should take place unless it was unanimous of all the members of this house so young as not to know that the constitution was carried into execution by eleven states, and that, for two years, Rhode Island and North Carolina were not parties to the new compact, after that of the confederation was totally dissolved.

Why, then, should not charity admit that this petition was to dissolve this union into a more perfect one? This union had of them to consider in a social light, to show that the charge on him of a desire to dissolve this union was as false as those of high treason, or of subornation of perjury; but he would say to the house that, in consequence of the deep, deep questions pending between different portions of this union, more perfect union could be formed. There were questions pending between different portions of the country that ought to be agitated and discussed fully. If it was not done, the time was not far distant when it would threaten the dissolution of the union. He begged members from Kentucky to note that he desired members from the north and south to understand each other. He begged them to consider in a social light, and said that these questions could not be wicked out of sight. This petition opened the door for amiable discussion—for conciliatory adjustment of those conflicts of interest and opinion which were even now shaking the union to its centre. He referred to the objections of the gentlemen from Albemarle and Kentucky, that, if this petition was referred, he should be chairman of the committee. But, if the petition should be received, he should ask to have nothing to do with that committee, but that the petition should be referred to the ablest members of both parties, by which this question might be brought into friendly discussion, and placed at rest. And here, notwithstanding his disavowal, to charge him not only with being friendly to a dissolution of the union, but with being at the head of a party under British influence and British money for the dissolution of the union. He wished the gentleman from Albemarle to note that he had read yesterday. That letter was one of the strongest proofs of his attachment to the union. It was written in December, 1838, to Joseph Anderson, then a senator of the United States from the state of Tennessee. He (Mr. Adams) had resigned his seat in the senate in the preceding month of May, in consequence of instructions of the legislature of Massachusetts to the senators of that state in congress to support measures which he could not conscientiously approve. Let the extract the gentleman read be read again, that the house might see what his feelings were with respect to the union. Mr. Anderson was desirous to know what the state of feeling was in the house, and in consequence, he commenced with him this correspondence. Mr. Anderson had intimated to him a doubt whether a higher and loftier sense of duty would not have required that Mr. Adams should have retained his seat, and voted according to the dictates of his conscience, though at the expense of his connection with the union. Mr. W. wished to inform the gentleman of a fact which had come to his knowledge. A son of the late Judge Anderson, whom he never saw before this morning, had called on him, and had furnished him with the original letter, and he here notified the gentleman that he would publish it in full with his speech, and in defence of the gentleman of the fact as sound on the union, and then accused citizens of Boston of being unsound and under British influence.—He asked that letter be read.

Mr. Adams had no objection to its being read or published. If the gentleman proposed to prove that he was sound at that time, he hoped he should prove that he was sound now. The son of that gentleman had furnished that letter to the gentleman from Aecomme—the neutral gentleman. He did not complain of that, but in order to confirm his statement, he had the auxiliary to the gentleman on this subject, he asked what sort of confidence it was that the son of the man to whom the letter was directed, who had received this among the papers of his father, should deliver it to the bitterest of his foes, to bring such a case to the public notice. He made no complaint; he had never written a line which he was not willing to have produced here on his trial. He might have expressed opinions which he had since changed. In the course of thirty years he had changed some of his opinions with respect to the designs of persons in opposition to him. In times of deep party excitement that who was free from suspicions of being entertained by his enemies beyond their real purposes?

Mr. Stansly inquired if this Mr. Anderson held a public office under government? If this was a public office, it did prove the existence of a base conspiracy.

Mr. Wiles was about making a remark; but

Mr. Jdeus said he would not yield the floor to the neutral gentleman from Aecomme. If he wished to speak, he would have time enough after he (Mr. A.) had concluded. He was giving proof of external auxiliaries. There was an external interference, said he, in the determination of the committee to make the decision of this house, in the production of a letter written to his father thirty years ago. What objection was it to him that he produced private conversation as demonstration of a conspiracy? No doubt but at that time he entertained the opinion that very dangerous designs existed against the liberties of Massachusetts. In consequence he had resigned his seat, and had parted from dear friends, who had become his most bitter opponents. It was immediately after the mission of John Henry had taken place, and while he was under the displeasure of his constituents in consequence of the part he had taken in the embargo, that he wrote these letters. He had received none of those opinions, so far as respected himself; he was still ready to pursue the same system, and make the same sacrifices as respects the union and the country as at that time.

It was at that session of the legislature of Massachusetts that the first proposition was made which, several years afterwards, was amplified by a resolution under which the Hartford convention took place. Perhaps he did attribute to those who ruled in the legislature of Massachusetts at that time, intentions which they did not entertain, that they ruled in terrorem. Gentlemen might find a series of essays, written by him at that time, on the same topics, "American principles," a review of the works of Fisher Ames. In one of those papers—public papers, which they would find charges respecting the legislature of Massachusetts, as strong as the letter to Mr. Anderson. He wrote letters of the same purport to Mr. Wiles, then a senator from Virginia. It was singular that the letter to Mr. Jdeus should be so ungenerous; for when, some years since, more than twenty years after all these events had passed away, he (Mr. A.) was drawn into a controversy with several gentlemen who had been leading members in that legislature of 1808, and had referred to certain letters of Mr. A. to Giles and to the same topics, and in the same spirit with his letter to Mr. Anderson, Mr. Giles came out, and denied that he had ever written such letters to Mr. A. who was obliged to send to Boston, and hunt up Mr. Giles' old letters, and they were published in the National Intelligencer. Gentlemen who consumed much of the time of the house by endeavoring to rub up these old letters, to rekindle the embers of extinguished animosities to make a party at home against him. He hoped he should be able to satisfy the house and his constituents that his attachments to the union were just as true as he had professed this petition, as they were in the estimation of the neutral member from Aecomme when this letter to Mr. Anderson was written.

In the summer of the year 1837, shortly before the special session of congress called by president Van Buren, the inhabitants of the town of Newburyport, in the residence of his colleague, whom he deeply regretted, quite unintentionally, and without any design, displeased, and he believed at his suggestion, had invited Mr. A. to deliver before them an oration on the anniversary of our national independence. Just fifty years before that time, Mr. A. in early youth, had resided as a student at law in that same town, and he cheerfully accepted of the invitation; and on the 4th of July of that year he delivered an oration, a copy of which he now held in his hand, and from which he would read. There was in it a brief summary of the introduction and discussion of the articles of confederation contemporaneous with the Declaration of Independence. The first draught of the articles, prepared by a committee before, but reported after the declaration, is thus noted:

"The most remarkable characteristic of this paper is the indiscriminate use of the terms colonies and states, pervading the whole document, both words denoting the parties to the confederacy. The title declared a confederacy between colonies, but the first article of the draught was, 'The name of this confederacy shall be the United States of America.' In a passage of the 18th article, it was said: 'The United States assembled, shall never engage the United Colonies in a war, unless the delegates of nine colonies freely assent to the same.' The solution to this singularity was that the draught was in preparation before, and reported after, the Declaration of Independence. The principle upon which it was drawn up was, that the separate members of the confederacy should still continue colonies, and only in their united capacity constitute states. The idea of separate state sovereignty had evidently no part in the composition of this paper. It was not contained in the Declaration of Independence; but appears to have been introduced into the draught upon the draught of the articles of the confederation, between the twelfth of July and the ensuing twelfth of August, when it was reported by the committee of the whole in a new draught, from which the term colony, as applied to the contracting parties, was carefully and universally excluded. The revised draught, as reported by the committee of the whole, retained the general tenor of its articles, less of the spirit of union, and more of the separate and sectional feeling, than the draught prepared by the first committee; and far more than the Declaration of Independence."

This was, indeed, what most naturally have been expected, in the progress of a debate involving all the jarring interests and all the latent prejudices of the several contracting parties; each member now considering himself as the representative of a separate and corporate interest, and no longer acting and speaking as in the Declaration of Independence, in the name and by the authority of the people of the union. Yet in the revised draught itself, reported by the committee of the whole, and therefore exhibiting the deliberate mind of the majority of congress at that time, there was no assertion of sovereign power as of right intended to be reserved to the several colonies, but the original draught, reported by the select committee on the confederation, which the first words of the second article were: 'The said colonies unite themselves so as never to be divided by any act whatever.' Precious words!—words pronounced by the infant nation at the instant of her rising from the baptismal font of bondage, bursting from the hearts and uttered by lips yet glowing with the torch from the coal of the declaration!—why were ye stricken out at the revival of the draught, as reported by the committee of the whole? There was in the closing article, both of the original and of the revised draught, a provision in these words, following a stipulation that the articles of the confederation, when ratified, should be observed by the parties, 'And union is to be perpetual.' Words, which, considered as a mere repetition of the pledge, the sacred pledge, given in those first words of the contracting parties in the original draught, 'The said colonies unite themselves so as never to be divided by any act whatever,' discover only the true and the true spirit of union with which the draught had been prepared; but which, taken by themselves, and tripped of that precious pledge, given by the personification of the parties announcing their perpetual union to the world, 'The said colonies unite themselves so as never to be divided by any act whatever,'—and gold and lifeless do they sound!—'And the union is to be perpetual.' To have been, therefore, to guard against the conclusion that an union so loosely compacted was not even intended to be perpetual."

He asked of the house if he was not sound in deriving this? He had another evidence of a later date. The Historical Society of New York invited him to deliver a discourse on the 50th anniversary of the adoption, the 29th of April, 1839, the 50th anniversary of the inauguration of George Washington as president of the United States. He accepted the invitation. In that discourse he discussed the question of state sovereignty. He would read from the address:

"In the calm hours of self-possession, the right of a state to nullify an act of congress is too absurd for argument, and too odious for discussion. The right of a state to secede from the union is equally disowned by the principles of the declaration of independence, which acknowledge no judge between them upon earth, and their governments, and their citizens, in their intercourse with each other, to derive its authority, absolute the other from the reciprocal fulfillment of his own! But this last of earthly powers is not necessary to the freedom or independence of states, connected together by the immediate action of the people, of whom they consist. To the people alone is there reserved as well the dissolving as the consent power, and that power can be exercised by them only under the aid of conscience, binding to the retributive justice of Heaven."

"With these qualifications we may admit the same right as vested in the people of every state in the union, with reference to the general government, which was reserved by the people of the united States with reference to the supreme head of the British empire, of which the United States were under these limitations have the people of each state in the union a right to secede from the confederated union itself."

"Thus stands the right. But the indissoluble link of union between the people of the several states of this confederated nation, is, after all, not in the right, but in the heart. If the day should ever come (may Heaven avert it!) when the affections of the people of these states shall be alienated from each other—when the fraternal spirit shall give way to cold indifference—or collisions of interest shall fester into hatred, the bands of political association will not be long broken; and yet parties no longer attracted by the magnetism of consistent interest and kind sympathies; and far better will it be for the people of the disunited states to part in friendship from each other, than to be held together by constraint. Then will be the time for reverting to the precedents which occurred at the formation and adoption of the constitution, to the aid of which I now point, by dissolving that which could no longer bind; and to leave the separated parts to be reunited by the law of political gravitation to the centre."

He hoped there were states' rights enough in that. He would read, also, the conclusion of that discourse, where, after recapitulating the principles established by the adoption of the constitution, and their happy results after an experience of half a century, he said:

"And now the future is all before us, and Providence our guide."

"When the children of Israel, after forty years of wanderings in the wilderness, were about to enter upon the promised land, their leader, Moses, who was not permitted to cross the Jordan with them, just before he died, among them, commanded that when the Lord their God should have brought them into the land, they should put the curse upon Mount Ebal, and the blessing upon Mount Gerizim. This injunction was faithfully fulfilled by his successor, Joshua. Immediately after they had taken possession of the land, Joshua put an altar to the Lord, of whole stones, upon Mount Ebal. And there he wrote upon the stones a copy of the law of Moses, which he had written in the presence of the children of Israel; and all Israel, and their elders and officers, and their judges, stood on the two sides of the ark of the covenant, bane by the priests and Levites, six tribes upon Mount Gerizim, and six over against Mount Ebal. And he read all the words of the law, the blessings and cursings, according to all that was written in the book of the law."

"Fellow-citizens, the ark of your covenant is the declaration of independence. Your Mount Ebal is the confederacy of separate state sovereignties, and your Mount Gerizim is the constitution of the United States. In the solemn and sacred, and awful solemnity, narrated in the holy scriptures, there is not a curse pronounced against the people upon Mount Ebal, not a blessing promised them upon Mount Gerizim, which your posterity may not suffer or enjoy, from your and their adherence to or departure from the ark of the declaration of independence, practically interwoven in the constitution of the United States. Lay up these principles, then, in your hearts, and in your souls; bid them for signs upon your hands, that they may be as frontlets between your eyes; teach them to your children, speaking of them when sitting in your houses, when walking by the way, when you arise from the bed, and when you lie down, to the doxologies of your houses, and upon your gates; give to them as to the issues of life; adhere to them as to the cords of your eternal salvation. So may your children's children at the next dawn of this day of jubilee, after a full century of experience, when you are gathered in that institution, celebrate it again, in the full enjoyment of all the blessings recognized by you in the commemoration of this day, and of all the blessings promised to the children of Israel upon Mount Gerizim, as the reward of obedience to the law of God."

Was he sound on the union then? He had not changed his opinion since. The petitioners, he had no doubt, would be as gratified thus by the granting of their prayer if congress would take measures, not for the dissolution of the union, but for its those sources of discord, bringing too many, in both portions of the union, to look to the dissolution of the union, in despair of any other remedy for the redress of the grievances under which they are suffering, while congress refuse, even to listen to their petitions.

After having taken so much of the time of the house in showing that in every part of his life he had adhered in attachment to the union as to life itself—after that, if the people petitioning were to be charged with treason and subornation of perjury, he hoped these petitioners would be allowed to defend themselves, and be heard in their own defence.

His colleague, (Mr. Cushing), he hoped, would address the house, as he had announced his desire to do. Perhaps he might know some of the petitioners. One of them, he had been informed, had been a member of the legislature, and one of the candidates for the senate of Massachusetts at the election for this present year, and that all the democrats of that body had voted for him—a pure and unqualified democrat. He (Mr. Adams) was a little distrustful, however, of the purpose of his colleague, by his question whether the reconsideration of the vote by which the petition had been laid on the table would reopen the question whether the petition should be received; and inferred that his colleague would vote against its being received. He hoped he was mistaken, and that none of his colleagues would vote against it, and even his colleague from Virginia, (Mr. Parmenter), who is a democrat, that his colleague over the way. He intended to thank his colleague (Mr. Parmenter) for his uniform votes in favor of the right of petition and of the liberties of the country.

He would advise the gentlemen from Kentucky and from Alabama not to lay the flattering union on their souls, and in imagination to be carried so far. He desired, in the course of his defence, to speak of that more particularly. There was one member from New York who had stopped short, who had said thus far would he go and no further. Not one vote had he given to countenance this cruel persecution; though he believed, on every other political question, he was as wide apart from Mr. A. as the gentleman from Kentucky proclaimed himself to be from his associate from Arcadia. He felt bound to return to that member from New York (Mr. John G. Floyd) his thanks. He gave notice that his colleague over the way (Mr. Cushing) would address the house on the same day, in his crusade; perhaps he did not yet acknowledge himself a genuine woolly-headed democrat. The democracy of the north would not denounce the right of petition, except New Hampshire. How far they would go would be seen hereafter.

He would tell them they would have an account to settle with their constituents for their votes on this occasion. He stated yesterday, and now repeated, if those of the prosecution would look to public opinion they would find this course was not the right way to settle this agitation. If they would look into the leading papers of Boston and most of the New York papers, they would find that nothing like quiet or submission, on inquiry in this case, appeared in those quarters. One whig paper, indeed, at Boston had, at the first imperfect and incorrect reports of this conspiracy against him, expressed doubt as to the propriety of his course, supposing him responsible for the consummation of the time of the house. Perhaps the editor of that paper included in his opinion, that he was not a nomination of his relative to the mission to London, of the secretary of state, and of my friend from New York (Mr. Granger) as postmaster general, did, at the last session of the senate, run through that body in spite of that hopeful coalition of southern slavery and northern democracy so industriously recommended by the letter of Mr. Clement C. Clay to the legislature of Alabama, it would be the safest policy for the freedom of the north to hide the light of Mr. C. C. Clay's disclosure under a bushel, and say no more about it. But the editor of the Boston Daily Advertiser had neither approved himself to his fellow citizens, nor promoted the cause of submission to the joint tenancy of southern slavery and northern democracy, by his inadvertence upon the course of Mr. Adams. If the members from Kentucky, from Arcadia, and from Alabama, would look to the other luminaries of the whig press at Boston, the Courier and the Atlas, he wished those gentlemen would read what they would see there. He was more and more desirous to go to his constituents, because he knew the public opinion there, he wished to say all that could be said in defence of the petitioners, and to show that the whole charge against them was utterly groundless.

The next thing was to show that this conspiracy was personal to him, and through him was in operation in a far more extensive view, that throughout the house was designed to destroy the liberty of the free states, to take up the subject of the controversy between Virginia and New York, and Georgia and New York, and should take up and examine the controversy between Georgia and Maine, and hoped in that to be supported by the whole delegation from Maine. He might say now, to the honor of the governor of Maine, Mr. Allen, that he had been as firm in the support of the liberty of his people as a whig, although a democrat—he feared too deeply pledged to the confederation divulged by Clement C. Clay. And he would take this occasion to ask the members from Maine for the documents relating to this controversy, for he had already warned them and the people of the state of Maine heretofore, and he now solemnly repeated the warning, that as the navigating interests of the people of Maine have already been sacrificed by one treaty with Great Britain, under the scourge of which they are even now suffering, so will the defence of their territory depend upon their resistance or submission to this mutilate policy of southern slavery and northern democracy. Let them look to their boundary line—for if they suffer this government, by their tame submission to the slave-breeding policy, to multiply from Great Britain upon totally untenable grounds, for the protection of the slave trade, African or American, when the adjustment comes to be made, after a bloody and desolating war, the territory of the people of Maine will be sacrificed as an equivalent, a quid pro quo, for some paltry concessions of protection to the slave trade and indemnity to slave traders.

He would prove why the gentleman from Alabama was so anxious to dismiss him from his post as chairman of the committee on foreign affairs. It would involve the laws of nations with regard to the right of search upon the high seas in time of peace; to the self-consumption of slaves on the coast-guarding the cases of the Enterprise, Hermosa and Creole; to sundry unconstitutional state laws in the south; to the mediated war with Mexico and annexation of Texas to the United States; and to the purposes disclosed by the secretary of the navy in his recent celebrated and well known speech, in which Mr. Adams deigned to use as a part of the argument on which he will rest his defence.

Mr. A. here yielded to a motion by Mr. Everett, that the house adjourn, which motion prevailing, the house adjourned.

THIRTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

FEBRUARY 8. Mr. Benton presented a memorial from citizens of New York urging a repeal of the bankrupt law. He said the object of the memorial was to express the apprehensions of its opponents and in support of it, he read an extract from Bennett's Herald of New York. He hoped it would soon be repealed or amended.

Mr. Tallmadge presented memorials in opposition to any interference with the law. He then addressed himself to the course of the gentleman from Missouri who had said that he was not a democrat, and he conquered all things. There was to be no quiet—The senator had declared this to be a party question. It was not so, and its only party character had been given to it by the senator from Missouri. But for his opposition the law might before this have been introduced.

Mr. Adams, in a speech, in which he alluded to a sacrifice of the benefits of the union, and a dissolution of the union itself, Mr. Adams, we hear, is doing in reality, to verify the predictions which we made some years since, that one of the duties of government, and one which had dreamed could be accomplished by any man. It is seeking a vindication of its course to the public sentiment, as expressed through the public press. He had to try to create a public opinion, and his course of argument in any thing which may fall from us, and we shall not be driven from this course by any imputations of selfishness towards those whom his constituency term the "unholy combination of slaveholders."

proved or amended. The liabilities of those debtors who had already applied for its benefit had been stated by the senator as amounting to upwards of $5,000,000. Could any fact present a stronger argument in its favor? Had the senator no heart to feel for the distressed many men whom his own course had mainly contributed to their misfortunes and those of the country?

Mr. Benton here interrupted the debate by exclaiming, "it is false, sir," and a long discussion ensued upon the course proper to pursue for such violations of order. After the discussion had ended without the adoption of any proposition.

Mr. Tallmadge continued his remarks in order and concluded by hurling back the insult with contempt. Mr. Clay's resolution of enquiry as to the disposition of the rejected quotas of the land fund was taken up, and over an individual subject of Mr. S. Srivier to have it laid on the table, it was adopted as proposed by Mr. C. by a vote of 25 to 18.

Mr. Walker submitted a resolution calling for full information respecting the convention for the settlement of claims between the United States and Mexico.

Mr. Linn submitted the following:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to the senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, all the information in his possession in relation to the proposed outrages committed by the Mexican citizens or people on the persons and property of the American consul and other American citizens residing at Santa Fe and northern provinces of Mexico.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and, after some time spent therein, adjourned.

FEBRUARY 9. Mr. Tallmadge presented a memorial from citizens of St. Louis, Missouri, remonstrating against repeal or postponement of the bankrupt law, and expressed his gratification at this evidence in its favor from that section.

After some remarks of Mr. Linn expressing regret if it should be regarded as the opinion of his state, it was referred.

The resolution of Mr. Evans calling for information from the secretary of the treasury for the comparative tariffs of foreign nations, was taken up and adopted.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the amendments proposed to the constitution by Mr. Clay.

Mr. Archer delivered a speech in opposition thereto after which the senate adjourned.

FEBRUARY 10. Memorials in relation to bankrupt law continued to be presented.

The resolution, and the memorial submitted since by Mr. Prentiss, calling for information and relating to the commission appointed to investigate the affairs of the N. Y. custom house was taken up; when

Mr. Clay begged leave to say a word or two on this subject. If any commission was ever demanded in the government to discover the expenses of any office, it was that connected with the N. Y. custom house. He had heard that upon a revenue of less than eight millions of dollars there had been an expenditure of 8 per cent.—a sum greater by 3 or 4 per cent. than when the revenue was $16,000,000. The expense of collection at the New York custom house when John Adams Thompson was collector, was less than one-third what it was now. There was no reason for this increase.

Mr. Woodbury wished to correct the senator from Kentucky as to the expenses of collection. The goods imported into New York had increased from $100,000,000 to $180,000,000, and it was obvious that the increase of this importation led to an increase of the expenses of collection, and that the diminished receipts should have led to a corresponding reduction of expense. He did not hold himself responsible for this.

Mr. Clay did not mean to enter into this discussion now. There was no apology for the augmentation of officers, or such an increase of expenses as had been incurred. They had been augmented far beyond the increase of revenue. He wished the matter probed to the bottom.

The resolution of inquiry was then laid upon the table, on motion of Mr. Clay.

And the senate proceeded to consider the bill confirming certain land claims in Louisiana.

The bill, after having been explained by Mr. Benton, was ordered to be engrossed.

The senate then proceeded to an executive session; and, after some time spent therein, adjourned.

FEBRUARY 11. The president of the senate laid before the body resolutions of the citizens of Iowa territory, asking the survey and purchase of a tract of country owned by the Sac and Fox Indians.

Mr. Evans, from the committee on finance, reported the bill from the committee for the protection of American seamen, without amendment.

*From the Boston Advertiser of February 9th.

It is extremely curious also in Mr. Adams to be so ready to impute a personal motive, for the episode in the proceedings of the senate, to a public and political motive assigned as of course to be taken in an ironical sense, for no one can suppose that Mr. Adams intended to impute to us, seriously, a disposition to use more conciliatory measures towards the south in connection with the war to which he alludes. The real purpose of his remark, doubtless, was to reproach us, for not having manifested a proper degree of intonation and resentment at the insult as it was regarded by the southern people, and through him to the whole people of the north. But as we do not feel the force of the reproach, we have no inclination to reply to it. We do not reason as Mr. Adams does on these matters. We have no room for a personal or local feeling, to pursue a course which, without a pretext of the slightest local or national advantage to be gained, tends with the utmost certainty

Also, the bill making appropriations for the pensions of Is-12.

On motion of Mr. E. these bills were taken up, and, after being carried in committee of the whole, were read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent therein, adjourned to Monday next.

FEBRUARY 14. Mr. Pierce moved to take up the resolution submitted by him some eight or ten days since, calling for information in relation to the commission appointed to investigate the abuses said to have existed in the New York custom-house.

Mr. P. said it was intimated that he was opposed to obtaining information. Far from it. He had no desire to suppress information, and he did not doubt that investigation was needed at the New York custom-house. He was anxious that all corruption should be exposed, whether pertaining to the preceding administration or the present. The commission had been ten months in existence, and, if all the information could not be given, he hoped that such as was ready might be presented. If any partial information in the department, it would doubtless be withheld by the secretary of the treasury until it was full enough to do justice to all parties. He hoped no objection would be offered to the resolution, which was simply one of inquiry.

Mr. Clay was very glad to hear the senator from New Hampshire say that he was in favor of bringing all the light upon the abuses in the New York custom-house. With great deference to the senator, he must say that his resolution implied some objections to the investigation which had been ordered in the case of the New York custom-house. In regard to the authority by which this investigation was asked, he sought information. In regard to the authority to report upon the appointment of a commission, he did not concur with some that this authority was found in the power and duty to see the laws executed. He believed it to be upon the contrary, and he made the remark without any reference to the present executive; for there had long been a precedent for it—a great abuse of power. It was the thought, a gross abuse of power to allow the appointment of a commission, when the effect might lead, if there was a disposition to abuse power, to the worst consequences. He had learned last night, in a conversation with a friend, that a late secretary of war had sent some young gentlemen to improve themselves in the school of horsemanship. [Laughter.] If they had been sent among the Camanches he should not have been so much surprised, but to appoint young men to go to France to learn their style of horsemanship he thought was a stretch of power a little beyond anything he had before heard of. This very commission, now under consideration, he believed was instituted by a man whose memory was dear to us all, and who probably acted without sufficient reflection. What he said, therefore, had no particular reference to it. He spoke of the exercise of such a power as being unwarranted by the constitution, and that great abuse of congressional authority which he believed, and which he would wait awhile they would have the report, and, if he was not much mistaken in the information he had received, they would have more of it than their stomachs could bear.

Mr. Pierce said he was not acting with hot haste, nor was he the man to resist the inquiry to get at the information.

Mr. Clay. Nor am I.

Mr. Pierce continued. He had great respect for the vetoes of the president. But he was not the president of his friends. They had as much as they could do to be responsible for their own acts.

In regard to this subject, he had high objections. When a power is given, he thought it was proposed to him, was it not proper that such information should be given? He sought the truth, and nothing but the truth. If the report of the commission was to come, and was, as the senator said, in the course of preparation, what possible objection could there be to his constitution. He saw some what in it so strange to him, that he could not meet with opposition from any quarter whatever.

Mr. Mangum said in regard to the authority by which the commission was appointed, he thought there was no unnecessary exercise of power in the appointment. It was desirable that the commission should be continued until it could be heard of. He had understood that all the information desired had not been obtained by the commissioners. It might be that they had been thwarted in their investigation, and that it would be necessary to continue the investigation under the authority of the two houses of congress—authorized by any influence from any department whatever. He had no reflections to make upon the head of the treasury department. Further this document said not.

Mr. Buchanan said, in reply to the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay), that he concurred with him as to the authority of the commission, or any commissions. There was no such power vested in the president. After the exercise of his duty to see the laws executed, in regard to the New York custom-house, he believed for four months it had been a hot-bed of corruption, and he wished for information in regard to it. The New York custom house was now under the control of the friends of the senator from North Carolina, from Mr. Curtis down. What need, therefore, for an investigation, he would ask?

In regard to the statement of the senator from Kentucky, that the departments and offices were in the possession of the opponents of the administration, he thought that such was not the fact. He had called for information upon this point at the extra session of congress, but had not got the information which he desired. He had called for it upon the present session, and when the information was received, it would be known who held the offices. Mr. B. was in favor of the utmost latitude of inquiry in regard to the New York custom house, and he hoped the resolution would be adopted without delay.

Mr. Clay said before this time that a little of what Mr. Buchanan had been infused into the senator from Pennsylvania. He had, however, admitted something in admitting so much as that there was no authority in regard to the appointment of commissions to have been claimed for him. So far, he had become a good whig, and he looked forward with pleasure to the time when he would repudiate the religion and patriotism of true whig principles. Mr. C. then referred to the abuses of power under the color of being an executor of the laws, abuses put forth in the doctrines of the proclamation, in the act for the removal of the deposits, in the appointment of agents to travel abroad, and in kindred matters. Mr. C. proceeded to reply more particularly to the senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Buchanan). He was glad to avail himself of the concession of the senator from Pennsylvania, that there had been abuses in the New York custom house, and under the administration of Samuel Swartwout, when the senator from Pennsylvania said that he had before been a whig candidate for the vice presidency. The gentleman could not escape from the responsibilities which grew out of the administration of Mr. Swartwout. He was appointed by that man of iron will, General Jackson, against the request—and he was glad to do justice to a political opponent here—and Mr. Van Buren, who was the author of the appointment of Mr. Jesse Hoyt? He was appointed by Mr. Van Buren. And were we responsible for the administration of affairs under Mr. Hoyt?—or under Mr. Swartwout, before he became, as the senator said he did become, a candidate for the vice presidency? Mr. C. proceeded to comment upon the increase of expense and augmentation of officers under the administration of the different collectors of New York, and concluded that there had been a gross and intolerable abuse of power.

Mr. Buchanan would not consent that the great crime should be avoided, or that it should be brought down to Samuel Swartwout, or the custom house of New York. He would refer to Mr. Swartwout on two terms. Then Mr. Van Buren refused to reappoint him. General Jackson appointed him because he thought him an honest man. We were all, however, liable to be mistaken in regard to public men; and, once finding out our error, all that could be done was to remove the obnoxious officer. Mr. B. thought also, that he had not been convicted of inconsistency in regard to the authority by which this commission was appointed, or any commission. He believed the authority was not vested in the president, and that it must come from congress. His opinion was now, upon this subject, what it always had been, and no inconsistency had been pointed out.

Mr. Clay. In regard to the officers in the government, he would say that they had not been long enough in office to correct all the abuses of the government which had existed for so many years. They were not long enough in office to ferret them out. It was a long time to wait until the relations of the whig party had not been of that confidential character necessary to success. It was known, too, that the heads of the present departments had not been there for more than five months—that changes had been made growing out of a different administration. It was not surprising, then, that the animals of no country had exhibited such determined adherence to principle as had been main-tened by the whigs since November last. Had it been otherwise, they would not have refused terms with the executive. They seemed to abandon their principles, and would receive patronage for themselves and their friends upon so such terms. And yet gentlemen who visited the executive mansion in crowds, and were praising him every day, were calling upon us before there was time to make reforms, to correct abuses which had existed for years. This puffing and praising of the president, from whom the whigs in congress were most unfortunate, was a gross abuse of the purpose then to mislead the president. He would not impeach the motives of gentlemen who made these advances. He would not say what their motives were. He would state what was his conviction, and that was, that the gentlemen had no design of supporting the executive in any of his public measures.

Mr. Buchanan said in regard to the administration, he had done no more than to defend the head of it for his two vetoes. He believed the president to be a very honest or amiable—[laughter]—amiable and honest man, but nothing had been said in his defence by his opponents, except upon these two questions. Upon all other questions they had been in concurrence of opinion between the president and the whigs in congress. He regretted that there was not more unity of opinion between them, and that there seemed no party in the senate to defend the president.

Mr. Clay said he regretted also, and most deeply, the state of relations which unhappily existed between the executive and the legislative branches of the government. He could appeal to the senator and the senator's friends, that he had endeavored to avoid it. We found, as one inheritance, an empty treasury, a bankrupt government, embarrassment everywhere. Other complications there had been, the necessities, and how had we been aided in this state of embarrassment by the gentlemen interested as much as us in the preservation of the honor of the country? Gentlemen had opposed us in all our efforts to relieve the government in most of the measures of the extra session. He thought, in this opposition, gentlemen had not dealt with their opponents as they had been dealt by, when they were in power, and had a right to prescribe their own forms of measures.

The gentlemen with whom he acted here were disposed and would support the administration wherever they could, and in regard to the other things, which they hoped would result in good, particularly as the spirit of patriotism seemed to be invoked by men of all parties. Mr. C. referred to the acts of the extra session of congress, and particularly to the two bank bills, for the purpose of saying that he had been misunderstood in being understood to oppose the bills without any qualification. Much in the two bills he did oppose, and he had looked forward to improve them in supplementary bills.

Mr. Buchanan said he would say no more now to continue the discussion, but upon a future occasion he should show that the opponents of the administration had been justified in their opposition to the loan and other bills.

Mr. Clay. Very well, sir. "Come on Macduff." Mr. Calhoun said he would not have said a word, if the senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. Buchanan) had not accused him of defending the system of economy by a moral declamation.

Mr. Buchanan rose to explain, and said there was nothing in the world further from his intention than to reflect upon the senator from South Carolina. He had said so in public and private, and upon all occasions. All he meant to say was, that reform could never be accomplished by general discussion. Detail was necessary. Mr. Calhoun said he did not understand the senator from Pennsylvania. It was inferred that he had by general discussion sustained the reform proposed, when he had gone on, and at great personal labor, to show details for the accomplishment of reform. Mr. C. said he was for reform, and the only way to accomplish it was by correcting erroneous opinions in regard to the protective system, and the taxing power. We robbed the people in levying taxes. It was plunder and nothing more, and reform and retrenchment could be accomplished in no other way than by correcting the erroneous doctrines which had grown up here in regard to taxing. He had voted alone in the vote on the bank bill, and would have to go on and vote alone, as he certainly should.

Mr. Buchanan said he found himself between two fires—the senator of Kentucky on the right, and the senator from South Carolina on the left. He had not said that the senator from South Carolina had made a speech upon mere generalities. He only said that the reform could not be accomplished by general remedies. They pointed out the remedy only.

Mr. Woodbury explained the action of the opponents of the administration in opposing the loan bill of the extra session. These reasons were the same as before given—an objection to the mode, and the opinion that the money asked for was not wanted at the time. In regard to the increase of expense in the New York custom house, Mr. W. contended that the increase, from the administration of Jonathan Thompson, had not been more than the imports, which added proportionately to the labor. Mr. W. after commenting upon the land bill briefly, entered into some comparison and detail to sustain his position.

Mr. Clay hoped the fact that a new opponent had come into the field would be an excuse for his furthering the discussion. The senator had spoken of the land bill as a measure which had taken a large amount of revenue from the department—an amount equal to three millions of dollars—when, as the senator must know, and as he did know, there were not eight hundred thousand dollars which had been derived the last year from this source, or which could be derived from it. The facts of the senator existed but in his imagination. It was known, too, that the land bill did not go into operation, and the present year, therefore, the receipts of the revenue could not be by any possibility of means have affected the receipts in the treasury. Was there, therefore, any excuse on the part of the senator, that as a patriot, he could oppose measures necessary to keep the government alive? And did the senator say that all other matters would be neglected because the land bill had been sustained and carried through, after a ten years' consideration in both houses of congress and an ultimate approval by the people? Will he persist, too, in saying that the land bill extracted three millions from the treasury, when he knows that nothing like three millions can be realized this year, and next year, except the times altogether improved, and that any thing we have had here has a right to expect—and he would once more hint it to the senator from New Hampshire, if he could find excuse for withholding supplies by refusing, as he had, to vote for a bill even imposing a tax upon mere luxuries?

Mr. Woodbury contended, in reply to the senator, that the land bill had been in the market for the last ten months, and that thus no revenue had been put into the treasury from the sales of land.

After a few words further, the resolution was laid upon the table by yeas 19, nays 17.

FEBRUARY 15. The president of the senate laid before the body a communication from the war department, containing a report of the general in chief, instant, calling for a survey of the north and north-western lakes, submitting the survey of the topographical engineers.

Mr. Clay said that several days ago he intimated his intention of offering various resolutions upon various matters of public moment. It was not his intention to have them considered at this time, but merely to have them laid upon the table, and, as it was usual upon such occasions, he had consulted with his friends as to the resolutions. With most of them there was a concurrence of opinion. With two or three, in reference to one of the resolutions, there was a diversity of opinion, which he hoped would be reconciled during the discussion.

The resolutions are in the following words, viz: That the duty of the department of revenue, in connection with the treasury, in the management, for conducting its administration, to provide an adequate revenue within the year to meet the current expenses of the year; and that any expedient, either by loan or treasury notes, to supply, in time of peace, a deficiency of revenue, either at the present year, or hereafter, is unwise, and must lead to pernicious consequences.

2. Resolved, That such an adequate revenue cannot be obtained by duties on foreign imports without adopting a higher rate than twenty per cent, as provided for in the compromise act, which, at the time of its passage, was supposed and assumed as a rate that would supply a sufficient revenue for an economical administration of the tariff.

3. Resolved, therefore, That the rate of duties on foreign imports ought to be augmented beyond the rate of twenty per cent, so as to produce a net revenue of twenty-six millions of dollars—twenty-two for the ordinary expenses of government, two for the payment for an existing debt, and two millions as a reserved fund for contingencies.

4. Resolved, That in the adjustment of a tariff to raise an amount of twenty-six millions of revenue, the principles of the compromise act should generally be adhered to, and that especially a maximum rate of ad valorem duties should be established, from which there ought to be as little departure as possible.

5. Resolved, That the revenue in the act of the extra session, requiring the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, requiring the operation of that act to be suspended in the contingency of a higher rate of duty than twenty per cent, ought to be repealed.

6. Resolved, That it is the duty of government, at all times, but more especially in a season such as now exists, of general embarrassment and pecuniary distress, to abolish all useless institutions and offices, to curtail all unnecessary expenses, and to practice rigid economy.

7. Resolved, That the contingent expenses of the two houses of congress ought to be greatly reduced, and the mileage of members of congress ought to be regulated and more clearly defined.

8. Resolved, That the expenses of the judicial department, and of late years, have been greatly increased, and ought to be diminished.

9. Resolved, That the diplomatic relations of the United States with foreign powers have been unnecessarily extended during the last twelve years, and ought to be reduced.

10. Resolved, That the franking privilege ought to be further restricted, the abusive use of it restrained and curtailed, and the postage on letters reduced, the great estimating distances more clearly defined, and the pre-paid, and a small addition to postage made on books, pamphlets and packages transmitted by the mail, to be graduated and increased according to their respective weights.

11. Resolved, That the secretaries of state, of the treasury, of war, and of the navy departments, and the postmaster general, be severally directed, as soon as practicable, to reduce the offices which can be abolished, and the last reinforcements of public expenditure can be made, without public detriment, in the respective branches of the public service, to the least possible charge.

Mr. Clay named Thursday week for their consideration, if there were no objections.

Mr. Calhoun suggested that on that day the senate should resolve itself into committee of the whole on the status of the union. The resolutions proposed a committee of compromise and, and another of the various measures, all of which were most important.

Mr. Clay had no objection to the suggestion if the senator from South Carolina desired it. He did not mean to anticipate discussion, but, when the subject came up, he should endeavor to show that the measure was the chief of the committee, and that it was sure he could show this, or at any rate should make the effort. When the resolutions came up, the senate could then act upon the motion, to go into committee of the whole.

The resolutions were then ordered to be printed.

Mr. Merrick's resolution to the following effect was then taken up:

Resolved, That the following be added to the 20th rule of the two houses: "No amendment which proposes to appropriate money not called for by some pre-existing law, shall be made in either house by any general appropriation bill."

The resolution was opposed by Mr. Smith, of Indiana, and advocated by Messrs. King and Merrick, when Mr. Clay said he was in favor of the principle of the resolution, and thought it necessary to make the objection, and therefore moved to lay it on the table; which motion was agreed to.

The resolution submitted a few days since by Mr. King, fixing the day of adjournment, was taken up, discussed, and laid on the table by a vote of 21 to 16.

On motion of Mr. Benton, the bill to postpone the operation of the bankrupt law to the 1st of March, 1843, was taken up for consideration, and considered as in committee of the whole; and there being no motion to amend, it was reported to the senate.

Mr. Rives very briefly stated his reasons for opposing the bill. These reasons were that the action of the senate had been given upon a question which he had voted against the bill originally, and voted for the repeal of the bill at this session. He now held himself ready to vote for any amendments which might be introduced, or for a repeal of the bill; he had not been convinced of the propriety of the law by any thing he had heard in its favor, but it was time the public mind was quieted in reference to this question; and that it might be so he should vote against postponement. The yeas and nays were then ordered upon the engrossment, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Callahan, Fulton, Graham, King, Linn, McKelvey, Perce, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Thayer, Waller, Woodbury, Wright, Young—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Chase, Clay, Clayton, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, McKim, Morris, of New York, Norcross, Plattsburgh, Prentiss, Rives, Smith, of Ind., Soudland, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—23.

And so the bill was lost.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the order of the day, being the resolutions of Mr. Clay proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States.

Mr. Morehead, of Ky. addressed the senate in reply to the arguments of Mr. Preston and Mr. Buchanan, both of whom had advocated the existence of the veto power and opposed the proposed amendments of the constitution. He discussed the question in general terms, in detail, and endeavored to confute the idea of the senators from Pennsylvania that the veto power was a democratic power, and that there had been no abuse of it against the people.

The precedents in Roman and in our own history were cited for the purpose of showing that the veto power had been exercised with no respect or regard for the people. The idea that the power was democratic was ridiculed, after showing that the power was federal, and had been always so regarded.

Mr. Morehead then stated the power which Alexander Hamilton advocated, and had been shown to this that a democratic senator, par excellence, was found side by side with the strongest advocate of ancient federalism.

The views of Gerry, Franklin and Mason were quoted, all of whom were opposed to the exercise of this power as in no way harmonising with our government.

Mr. M. having concluded, the senate proceeded to executive business, after which the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, FEB. 8. The speaker resumed the call for petitions.

When the house adjourned last evening, Mr. Fessenden had presented a memorial from the town of Portland, in relation to the trade with the British colonies, and had moved its reference to the committee on foreign affairs, and that it be printed. (Pending which motion, the house, for want of a quorum, had adjourned.)

And the question now recurring on printing the said memorial.

Mr. Fessenden remarked that it was at first his intention to move that it be committed with instructions; but, on further consideration, he was satisfied that it should receive the careful investigation of a committee. He would state briefly the substance of the memorial, in support of his motion to print.

The subject was one of great importance, and the memorial was exceedingly well drawn, and stated many important facts. It was predicated upon the arrangement entered into between this country and Great Britain in 1830, in reference to our trade with the colonies of that country. Before that arrangement was made, we were in the enjoyment of a valuable, though indirect, trade with the British West Indies. The effect of the present arrangement had been to cripple our own commerce, and to increase the commerce with Great Britain, employed in British colonial intercourse, in a remarkable degree. He would mention, as a fact, that whereas, at the time the arrangement referred to was made, nine-tenths of that intercourse was carried on in American vessels; the amount of British and American tonnage employed in it was now about equal. The trade between New England and the British colonies and possessions has now become of little or no value. Upon his own state the effect of this arrangement had been peculiarly disastrous. Before it went into operation, Maine had ten thousand tons of shipping employed in the trade with the British North American colonies; and it was now reduced to a third of it entirely, while the shipping of the colonies has been increased four-fold, and they have all the advantage of a direct and unembarrassed trade with this country.

He would not now go into an examination of the particulars of this bill, but would leave that to a future and more proper opportunity. His design was to give an outline of its contents, with a view that the house might order it to be printed.

The petition was then ordered to be printed, and was referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

Mr. Fessenden gave notice that he would, at the earliest opportunity, offer a resolution to repeal the 21st rule; which is in the following words:

"No petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or any state or territory, or the slave trade between the states or territories of the United States in which the resolution has been received by this house, or entertained in any way whatever."

Mr. Cushing moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday by which the house had refused to receive the petition from citizens of Haverrill praying a dissolution of the union.

The speaker said that the petition itself could not be debated, neither could the motion now made to reconsider.

Mr. Cushing wished now to debate the question of reception, but was overruled by the speaker, and having appealed, the speaker's decision was sustained by the house.

The motion to reconsider will come up in its regular order when Mr. C. will be entitled to the floor.

The unfinished business of the morning was the following resolution, heretofore introduced by Mr. Selden, from the committee on manufactures:

Resolved, That the committee on manufactures be authorized to send for witnesses and take testimony on the press at tariff laws, their operation upon the interests of the country, and the alteration which those interests may require.

Mr. Tidlingham addressed the house in support of the resolution.

Mr. J. F. Brown offered the following amendment to the resolution:

"Provided said committee shall not take the testimony of any person or persons interested in the subjects about which they may be examined."

Messrs. Brown, Wood, and Saltstall successively addressed the house, and Mr. Wood was in the course of additional remarks when—

Mr. Fillmore rose and inquired of the speaker whether the morning hour had not expired?

The speaker said it had expired.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Briggs, of Massachusetts, in the chair.)

Mr. Fillmore moved that the committee take up the bill for the relief and protection of American seamen.

Having been read it was laid aside to be reported to the house.

The committee then took up the bill for the appropriation of pensions for 1842, which after being read was laid aside to be reported to the house.

The bill for civil and diplomatic appropriations for 1842 was then taken up after some consideration the committee rose, and the chairman reported the two said bills to the house, and also reported progress on the general appropriation bill.

On motion of Mr. F, it was then ordered that the pension bill and the bill for the protection of American seamen abroad be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. McKen, on leave given, offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house any correspondence it may deem inexpedient with the public interest, between his government and the governments of Great Britain, and this government and the executive of the state of New York, in relation to the colonial history of the state of New York.

Mr. Cross, on leave given, offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the clerk of the house be directed to cause the report of the boundary line of Texas, with the survey of the same, to be printed, as recommended by the committee on the subject.

The speaker laid before the house the following communications:

A message from the president of the U. States, transmitting a report and letter from the commissioners appointed for the exploration and survey of the boundary line between the states of Maine and New Hampshire, and the contiguous provinces. Referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

Also, a message from the president of the United States, transmitting a report of the director of the mail, showing the operations of the same for the year 1841.

A letter from the secretary of war, transmitting an abstract of the returns of the militia of the several states and territories, with their arms, accoutrements, &c. up to the latest returns. Referred to the committee on the militia.

A letter from the commissioner of patents, transmitting the annual list of patents.

And, on motion of Mr. J. T. Mason, the house adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 9. Mr. Gilmer sent to the speaker's table two papers, or letters, which he desired to present, having reference to a question of privilege, involving the reading of the two letters was called for, and they were read.

The first is as follows:

To the hon. speaker of the house of representatives:

The undersigned, members of the committee on foreign affairs, respectfully ask the house to excuse them from further service on that committee. Recent occurrences induce them to doubt whether the removal of the present chairman by the committee would meet the approbation of the house, and they are unwilling to serve with a chairman who has avowed opinions and persevered in a system of conduct which, in the estimation of that committee, has shown him to be an unsafe depository of this public trust, or of that confidence which is necessary to the relations between a chairman and the members of such a committee.

THOMAS W. GILMER,
R. T. H. VIGOR,
J. B. BARNWELL, ALBERT,
GEORGE H. PROFFITT.

February 8, 1842.

Mr. Gilmer called for the reading of the second letter which was read as follows:

Tuesday Morning, Feb. 8, 1842.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with the request of the committee on foreign affairs this morning. But if it should be of the slightest importance to know what would be my course upon the vote for electing a chairman, after the remarks of Mr. Adams in the house, and after his course in the committee in himself urging a member to move an election of chairman, and the member of his disclosing and using the minutes of the committee, I will say that for me to vote for him would be, after these circumstances, to endorse his sentiments, and to sanction his conduct, which I cannot do. Therefore, I should be bound in my sense of public duty to vote for some other person as chairman.

It would have been agreeable to my feelings if I could have been relieved from serving on the committee for several weeks past.

You are at liberty to make known the contents of this communication. Very respectfully, yours,

W. C. COST JOHNSON.

HON. T. W. GILMER.

The speaker. The chair understands that the four gentlemen whose names are appended to the communication first read wish to be excused from further service.

Mr. Gilmer nodded assent.

Mr. Stanly suggested that the question should be taken on all the four names.

Which proposition was acceded to, and the question being put, the four gentlemen above named were excused from further service as members of the committee on foreign affairs.

Mr. H. C. Johnson then asked that he also might be excused.

Which motion being agreed to, Mr. J, was excused.

Mr. Jones, at a subsequent period of the day, moved that five members be appointed on the committee of foreign affairs, in place of those excused this day.

Mr. Briggs was understood to say that that, of course, could be done on the suggestion made.

The speaker said he so understood.

Mr. Wise, from the committee on naval affairs, reported a bill to authorize the appointment of a board for the preparation of rules and laws for the regulation and government of the navy, and a bill to recognize the navy department of the United States.

Mr. Wood resumed his remarks of yesterday upon the resolution of the committee on manufactures asking power to send for persons and papers. He repeated that the committee were so constituted that it was impossible to expect an impartial report, but even if it were not so, there was not time, although the session had been prolonged to the dog-days, for the investigation as proposed.

Mr. W, then referred to a tariff report in the British house of commons, made under the circumstances which the committee desired, which was not completed after a sitting from April to August.

Mr. W then said that he would say that Mr. Hume, stated, in giving in their report, that it had not been perfected from want of time. Again, he objected to the proposition, because, if any investigation of the sort was to take place, it ought to be made by a joint committee of both houses.

Mr. L. Williams, with a view to end debate upon this proposition, moved to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. Fillmore moved to postpone the further consideration of the question, which was agreed to and the pension appropriation bill was taken up and passed.

The bill for the relief of American seamen in foreign countries was passed.

At three o'clock the house adjourned.

During the adjourning a man in the gallery addressed the assembly, and was removed by the sergeant.

THURSDAY, FEB. 10. The speaker announced the following members of the committee on foreign affairs, in the place of those named yesterday, who were excused from further service to-day:

Mr. E. D. White, of Louisiana; Mr. J. H. Shepherd, of North Carolina; Mr. Lucas E. Holmes, of S. Carolina; Mr. R. Chapman, of Alabama; and Mr. J. Cooper, of Georgia.

The adjourned business of the morning hour was the following resolution, heretofore reported from the committee on manufactures:

Resolved, That the committee on manufactures be authorized to send for witnesses and take testimony on the subject of the present tariff laws, their operation upon the interests of the country, and the alteration which those interests may require.

To which resolution Mr. Brown, of Tennessee, had heretofore offered the following amendment:

"Provided said committee shall not take the testimony of any person or persons interested in the subjects about which they may be examined."

And the question immediately pending was on the motion of Mr. Lewis Williams to lay the whole subject on the table, and was taken and decided in the affirmative yeas 108, nays 79.

Mr. Thompson, of Mississippi, the house took up the bill entitled "an act to provide for the early disposition of the lands lying in the state of Alabama, acquired from the Cherokee Indians by the treaty of 29th December, 1835."

Which was read a third time and passed.

The resolution reported yesterday by the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Stanly) from the committee on public expenditures authorising that committee to employ a clerk, was then adopted by yeas 113, nays 58.

The house then resolved itself into committee of the whole and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for civil and diplomatic expenses for 1842, and after some time spent in its consideration, the committee rose and reported the bill to the house. After which the house adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEB. 11. Mr. Boardman, on leave given, offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a system of Electro Magnetic Telegraphs for the use of the government of the United States.

Mr. Medit asked leave to offer a resolution calling for information concerning the commission of inquiry instituted on the public buildings of this city last spring. Ordered to be read and be printed.

The resolution reported by Mr. Saltstall, from the committee on manufactures, authorising that committee to employ a clerk was taken up. Mr. Saltstall advocated it. Mr. Brown, of Tennessee, opposed it.

Mr. Randolph said that yesterday the house had refused to give the committee on manufactures power to send for witnesses and take testimony, and now the power to appoint a clerk was assailed. This course of proceeding was certainly strange, after the house had committed to the committee on manufactures that portion of the president's message relating to discriminating duties. Why, what were the committee to do this without practical information? Great Britain; in that ten articles produced nine-tenths of the revenue arising from customs, but our tariff embraced over thirty-seven hundred varieties of articles, on which the committee were required by the house to report a bill for discriminating duties. How were they to do this without practical information? The refusal yesterday to grant the power to take evidence, so far from being an argument against this resolution, as was supposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Brown), is an argument in its favor. They needed light. But he, when it is proposed to authorise the committee to take evidence, whether the expense is ten groats to that also, yes, the expense of hundreds, when millions, nay, the interests of the whole country, are at stake? He objects to the power to send for and examine witnesses under oath, because the information can be obtained otherwise; and when a clerk is asked for to obtain testimony, he objects to that also, because the house refused to authorise the committee to send for witnesses. This was certainly strange, but perhaps not more so than the objection of the gentleman to the composition of the committee—that a majority of them were in favor of protection.

If any persons are distinguished with the committee, the manufacturers themselves might be; for he believed there was not a single manufacturer, or person engaged in manufactures, on the committee, and not above one member who represented a decidedly manufacturing constituency. The chairman came from a commercial district, and six or seven members represented agricultural districts.

Mr. Thuray moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

The yeas and nays on that motion were ordered; and, being taken, were: yeas 88, nays 88, (a tie vote.)

The speaker then voted in the negative; whereby the vote stood yeas 88, nays 89.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

Mr. Brainerd then offered a motion that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. Brainerd asked the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered; and, being taken, were: yeas 97, nays 89.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

The house adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEB. 12. Petitions and memorials were presented and referred. The resolution heretofore offered, asking that the committee on private land claims be allowed a clerk, after some debate, was laid on the table.

Mr. Ewerd asked leave to offer a resolution providing that the committee of the whole be discharged from the consideration of the bill relating to the apportionment of representatives. Also, that the bill be made the special order for Tuesday next, at 12 o'clock, and every day thereafter until finally disposed of. Likewise, that on Tuesday the 22d inst, all debate shall cease, and the question taken on all amendments shall be decided by the order of objection being made, the resolution was not entertained.

A motion was then made to reconsider the vote by which the resolution assigning a clerk for the committee on private land claims, had been laid on the table. It was urged that the claims are now in wards of four hundred cases before the committee, many of which grow out of French and Spanish grants; and the papers of course being in those languages, render it impossible for the committee to examine them. Hence, the services of a clerk understanding the languages is necessary. The motion to reconsider was carried, when a motion was again made to lay the resolution on the table. A division being had, the motion to lay on the table was carried by a majority of three.

The speaker, who had before the house the following executive communication:

Washington, Feb. 9, 1842.

To the house of representatives:

In answer to the resolution of the house of representatives of the 7th of February, 1842, in the following words: "Resolved, That the president of the United States inform this house under what authority the commission, consisting of George Fendexter and others, for the investigation of the concerns of the New York custom-house, was raised, &c." I have to state that the authority for instituting the commission mentioned in said resolution, is the authority vested in the president of the United States to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and to give to congress from time to time information on the state of the union; and to recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

It is a well known principle, and the necessity of inquiries into the transactions of our custom-houses, especially in cases where abuses and malpractices are alleged, must be obvious to congress; and that investigations of this kind were expected to be made, appears from the provision in the 21st section of the Statute of 1793, which enjoins collectors of the customs to submit their books, papers, and accounts to the inspection of such persons as shall be appointed for that purpose.

The purposes and objects of the commission will be explained by the commission itself, a copy of which, together with information on the other subjects mentioned in the resolution, will at the proper time be laid before congress.

Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The senate bill entitled "an act confirming certain land claims in Louisiana," was taken up, read twice, and referred to the committee on private land claims. Several other senate bills, and a private name, were also read twice and appropriately referred.

On motion of Mr. Gilchrist, the house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of private bills. At half past two the committee rose and the house adjourned.

City of Washington, February 13, 1842.

To the hon. John White, speaker of the house of representatives:

Sir: Having been appointed a member of the committee on foreign affairs, the undersigned desires to be excused from the service for the following reasons:

The appointment was made in consequence of the resignation of honorable members, distinguished for their ability and experience, who represent similar interests with himself. They doubtless had every disposition to maintain their position on the committee, and long to see us; but we are so pressed by the country of honor and credit to themselves. They have retired, after being excused by the house, upon grounds stated before the house, and made known to us all. They are grounds which apply more or less to every member who represents the peculiar interests of the south, and regards the good order, peace, and harmony of the union.

These grounds are laid in the conduct and speeches of the venerable chairman of that committee, as well in committee as in this house. By these he has evinced, on all occasions, a wild and deliberate purpose, with great perseverance, to use his position on the floor, and his elevation as chairman, as points of attack for foreign ideas, unmanly and unwarranted obligations by the constitution, to assail the property and interests of a large portion of these U. States, and wantonly to defame and traduce the character of its citizens and their representatives on this floor.

Under these circumstances, whilst the undersigned disclaims any improper feelings of regard for the chairman as a representative of the people, he does not perceive how he could aid the investigations of this committee, or partake in its deliberations, without deserting those he came here to represent. He, therefore, respectfully requests you to present to the house this application to be excused. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

MARK A. COOPER.

Mr. Cooper's letter having been read by the clerk—Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, made the following points of order:

1. A member of the house should, from his place, make whatever statement he may wish to address to its consideration.

2. No member of the house has the right to spread upon its journal opinions that he may entertain of the conduct of another member.

The speaker having stated that the letter would not appear on the journal, Mr. C. withdrew his points of order.

The question on excusing Mr. Cooper was then taken, and decided in the affirmative by a vote almost unanimous. So Mr. C. was excused.

The letter of Mr. Chapman was then read as follows:

House of representatives, Feb. 13, 1842.

To the speaker of the house of representatives:

Sir: I find that I have been appointed a member of the committee on foreign affairs, recently, to fill one of several vacancies that occurred in that committee by the resignation of members whose resignations were publicly made known, and deemed by the house sufficient to excuse them.

I deeply regret the necessity that I feel myself under to decline serving on that committee, and respectfully ask that the house will excuse me.

I have carefully examined the grounds on which the late members of the committee have placed their justification before the country for retiring from it, and fully sustain their views. The reasons they assign being altogether applicable to myself, I ask to be excused. With great respect, your obedient servant,

W. C. CHAPMAN.

And the question on excusing Mr. Chapman was then taken, and decided in the affirmative by a vote unanimous, with the exception of one or two negatives.

So Mr. C. was excused.

The letter of Mr. Basil E. Holmes was then read as follows:

To the hon. speaker of the house of representatives:

Sir: I respectfully beg to be excused from serving as a member of the committee on foreign affairs. The reasons assigned by those gentlemen whose resignations occasioned the vacancies recently filled by the appointment of southern members, are equally applicable to all representatives of slaveholding states, and were deemed satisfactory by the house, as evinced in the unhesitating acceptance of the aforesaid resignations. I would further observe that the chairman of said committee having applied to the committee on southern members, and I charged all the delegation from South Carolina with having banded in a base conspiracy to destroy his good name, I feel convinced that the public service would not be advanced, or the harmony of the committee promoted, by the counsels of your obedient servant.

And the question being taken, Mr. H. was also excused by a vote almost unanimous.

And, in reply to a suggestion or motion of Mr. Adams the speaker replied that three members would, as a matter of course, be designated to fill the places of the members thus excused.

Mr. Everett moved a suspension of the rules in order to effect a resolution in order to make bill No. 73, for the appointment of representatives the order of every day from to-morrow until disposed of. It was decided in the negative—yeas 58, nays 124.

Resolution and memorial were then called for, and another member of the delegation presented a resolution of the state of Massachusetts, respecting its claim on the United States for military services, and urging the action of its representatives and senators; the first of which was as follows:

Resolved, That the claim of the commonwealth of Massachusetts rendered in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty, and for years, having been provided for by laws, and partly paid in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty; and the balance acknowledged to be due under provisions of act not having since, in order of congress, been ascertained and reported by the secretary of war, the payment cannot longer be delayed without great injustice and disregard of the acknowledged rights of this commonwealth.

Mr. Adams (among many others) presented a petition from citizens of Concord, New Hampshire, praying congress to consider the safety and integrity of the union and nation by reconsidering and reversing the action by which the house resolved to consider the resolution of Mr. Marshall ensuring Mr. Adams for presenting a petition; and to confine themselves to the legitimate purposes for which they were created.

Mr. Turner raised the question of reception. And the question being taken, the petition was rejected.

Mr. Thomson, of Ky. presented two sets of resolutions from the state of Kentucky; the first the "preamble and resolutions of the state of Kentucky, concerning the repudiation of state debts." The second were "resolutions concerning the soldiers of the revolution." Having accompanied them with remarks indicative of the adherence of the state to her good faith, and of gratitude and compensation due to the revolutionary soldier; he moved their printing, and that the latter be referred to the military committee, Granted.

Petitions continued to be called for, until the entire roll, from Maine to Iowa, having (for the first time in a long period) not been called through in the course of one day, the house adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEB. 15. On motion of Mr. McClelland 5,000, amended on motion of Mr. Thompson, of Indiana, to 10,000 copies of the report of the commissioner of patents containing valuable agricultural statistics by the late census, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Sumner called for the consideration of his report upon the organization of the officers of the house, and aid the expenditures connected with the police and other regulations of the house. The alteration which the report proposes in the present arrangement is to strike off two clerks, who each have $1,500 per annum.

Mr. Gordon moved an amendment to the report, so as to provide that the clerk continue the services of three assistant clerks, as authorized by the resolution of the house of 1826, and of two assistant clerks now employed in his office, who have been engaged therein since 1828.

Mr. W. C. Johnson, declared, that the duties of the clerks of this house were more onerous than those of any persons employed by this government.

The debate was continued, until the expiration of the morning hour, by Messrs. Wise, Briggs, Cushing and Fillmore.

Mr. Everett submitted a resolution with regard to considering the appropriation bill, which was read for information only.

The speaker then laid before the house the following executive communications:

A message from the president of the U. States, transmitting copies of letters written by the minister of the United States at the court of Great Britain in 1841, to the commodore of the squadron of the U. States in the Mediterranean. Read and laid on the table.

Also, a letter from the secretary of war, communicating the information called for by the house, on the 18th inst. in relation to the state of a military road to Fort Fairfield and Keokuk, in the state of Maine. Referred to the committee on military affairs.

A bill to allow the banks of this District another year of suspension was taken up, and a motion made to lay it on the table. The yeas and nays were called, and were yeas 79, nays 107; and the main question ordered upon the passage of the bill the yeas and nays were called, and stood yeas 97, nays 73.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. Gearty moved, when the general appropriation bill comes up, that it be recommitted with instructions to report it again, omitting every item of appropriation not authorized by law. Mr. G. said that it would appear that the committee who reported this bill (the committee of ways and means) had asserted the propriety of the principle which he maintained, but had shrunk from carrying out this principle; and it was for the purpose of having it fully executed, that he made this motion. Mr. G. remarked upon the danger and impropriety of allowing the creation of officers in the loose and irresponsible manner which had heretofore prevailed.

Mr. Fillmore said it had been at first the intention of the committee to report no appropriation which was not called for by a specific law. But, upon examination, the committee had found a number of indispensable officers, whose appointment was originally for a limited time, and had been continued only through the annual appropriations. He said, one half the clerks of the senate, one third of the eleven clerks of the house, the reporter of the supreme court, several of the messengers of the house, the assistant librarian and his associate, would be excused by the rule proposed.

Mr. Wise made a few remarks, contending that the resolutions of the house, in matters connected with its own officers, were, in fact, law—recognized as such by the constitution. The previous question was then put, and the motion was ordered, and, upon the motion itself the yeas and nays were taken, and resulted in yeas 144 nays 22.

So the motion was agreed to; and, accordingly, the committee of the whole on the state of the union was instructed to strike out from the said bill every item of appropriation that was not authorized by law. And the house adjourned.

CONGRESS. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. A report from Mr. Cushing chairman of the select committee on the currency was presented on the 17th instant. Mr. Davis of Kentucky, of the same committee presented on the same day a counter report. Mr. Kennedy of Maryland, of the same committee presented a report on the 21st, and Mr. Barnard offered a bill as a substitute for that accompanying the report of Mr. Cushing on the 23d.

The committee on foreign affairs is now reorganized as will be seen by reference to the proceedings of the 18th on page 415.

SENATE. The committee on currency presented a report by its chairman Mr. Tallmadge of N. York on the 21st.

The hon. LEWIS WILLIAMS, representative from N. Carolina, departed this life at Washington, on the 23d, and his remains were interred yesterday in the national cemetery with all due honors.

Mr. W. entered congress, a representative from his native state in December, 1815, and continued such, by repeated elections, to the day of his death, making an unbroken service of more than twenty-six years; a proof at once of his own fidelity to his trust and of the confidence of his constituents very rarely equalled in the history of our government. He had long been what is termed "the father of the house;" but notwithstanding that venerable title and the length of service it implied, he had reached the age of only fifty-six years. A sincere Christian, he was a man of the strictest morals, and one of the most conscientious and unswerving public servants whom we have ever known. Such, indeed, were his merits, public and personal, and such his eminent value as a representative, that we look upon his death as a serious loss to the whole country, as well as to his immediate constituents.

[Natl. Int.]

RESIGNATION OF U. S. SENATOR. The hon. Henry Clay is said to have sent to the governor of Kentucky his resignation to take effect on the 31st March. It is supposed that Mr. Crittenden will succeed him.

Mr. Van Buren and Mr. Paulding were to leave town this morning on their journey southward. It is understood that before their return, they will visit General Jackson at the Hermitage. Mr. Van Buren is in excellent health and never looked better.

[Phil. Pennsylvania.]

Mr. Van Buren and Mr. Paulding reached Baltimore on Thursday afternoon from Philadelphia.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION. The United States ship Vincennes was at St. Francisco, Upper California, on the 31st October, with the Porpoise, Flying Fish, and brig Oregon. They were to sail the next day for the United States, via Manila, Singapore, and Cape of Good Hope. This squadron will probably arrive home in June.

By the arrival of a whale ship at Lahaina from Vol. XI—Sec. 26.

St. Francisco, where the Vincennes then was (Sept. 20,) we learn more particulars of the loss of the Peacock. She was lost about mid-day, of the 11th of July, on the north bar of the Columbia river, in smooth water. Soon after the breakers began to form, and for half a mile round them the river was one sheet of foam. The ship thumped heavily, and they momentarily expected the spars would go by the board, crush their boats, and thus cut off all chance of escape. By day-light the next morning, they were able to get out the boats, but lost two in the attempt. The water had then risen to her birth deck. The passage to the shore was perilous in the extreme, but through the coolness and skill of the officers it was effected without the loss of life. Pursor Speiden saved his books and papers, and the naturalists their journals. A few hours afterwards no trace of the ill-fated ship was to be seen. Captain Wilkes, in the Porpoise, with the Flying Fish, were employed in surveying the Columbia. The Vincennes was employed at St. Francisco, and a party had been exploring the Rio Sacramento. The brig Thomas Perkins was employed by capt. Wilkes, and it was supposed that she would touch here, to land the supernumeraries.

U. S. BANK. The adjourned general meeting of the stockholders of the U. S. bank was held at the banking house in Philadelphia on the 21st inst. Henry C. Corbet esq. presided, and Joseph R. Chandler officiated as secretary.

Charles Gibbons, esq. offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the assignments made by the president and directors of the bank of the United States, on the 7th of June, and 4th and 6th of September, 1841, were made in pursuance of authority vested in them, were for the best interest of the bank, and are hereby ratified and confirmed by this meeting.

This resolution was adopted by a vote of 204 to 129.

Joshiah Randall, esq. then offered a resolution: Resolved, That it is expedient for the bank of the United States to make a general assignment of the real and personal estate, goods, chattels, rights and credits, whatsoever and wheresoever, of the said corporation, to five persons, for the payment or securing the debts of the said bank of the United States, agreeably to the provisions of the acts of assembly of this commonwealth respectively passed the 4th and 5th days of May, 1841.

While this resolution was pending, a motion to adjourn was made and on division it resulted as follows: ayes 178, nays 119.

So the chairman declared the meeting adjourned.

After the above meeting was dissolved, a new one was organized, and it was decided to call another meeting of the stockholders on second Monday in April, to vote then as provided by the provisions of the charter.

Mr. JACOB. We learn from the Philadelphia papers, that Judge Randall has discharged Mr. S. Jaudon, who was brought before him on a writ of habeas corpus touching the affairs of the United States bank, the judge declaring that there appeared no cause for sending the case to the grand jury.

FOREIGN ARTICLES

GREAT BRITAIN.

By the Burgundy, at New York, from Havre, papers have been received from London to the 5th inst. and from Paris to the 7th inst. The India mail arrived at Paris on the 6th, with no later news from China than has been received here.

The Conway, from China, entered the sound on the 26th of December. Her destination was Portsmouth. She had on board two millions of dollars, and some invalids from the squadron in the China seas.

FRANCE.

On the 3d of January, the members of the chambers of deputies assembled for the purpose of electing the committee to draw up the address in answer to the speech from the throne. On this occasion there was a discussion on the foreign and domestic policy of the government. The ministry were attacked for the convention of July, for its policy as regards Spain, for the reduction of the navy, and several members, in passing in review the acts of the government, bestowed on them unqualified censure. Mr. L. Herbetie spoke with great animosity against the attacks upon the press, and blamed, with much severity, the recognition of the right of maritime search, demanded by the British government.

Details have been received from Odessa of the autumn campaign of the Russians against the Circassians and of their defeat at Jatache, where some 500 were slain. It is believed that the Russians have lost some 8,000 men, mostly by disease. The Crimean hospitals are filled with the sick. This is the division under General Aurepp, and it is said that Gen. Zast has not been more fortunate.

La Presse of the 6th has a letter from Vienna, which says that the three great powers, England, Russia, and France, which had stipulated the independence of Greece, are seriously giving their attention to the difference between that country and the Sublime Porte, and that they have applied to the cabinets at Berlin and Vienna for their co-operation.

Baron Rothschild has been seized with sudden and dangerous illness. The operations on the bourse were seriously affected by this intelligence.

A London morning paper, the Morning Herald, mentions a current report that the British government has resolved to establish a line of steam communication between the Pacific coast of South America and New Zealand, and the Australian colonies. It is added, that the authorities of Panama have invited an engineer to survey a line of rail road across the Isthmus, and are most desirous that the line should be executed by an English company to which they are prepared to grant extensive privileges.

The Observateur of Brussels says: "The ill humor of the king of Prussia towards Holland continues. The Prussian monarch, going to London, will not pass through Holland, the king of which country is his near relation, but through Belgium. The Prussian Government has decided that he will visit Ellinburg, and the Highlands of Scotland."

M. de Kisseloff, the Russian charge d'affaires, did not go with the diplomatic corps to the king, on New Year's day.

At four o'clock, on the 1st instant, says the Gazette de France, M. de Kisseloff entered the circle of the Rue de Grammont, and, on being asked how he was, replied, "Je suis indisposé par ordre."

The Duke de Bordeaux is to pass the winter at Vienna.

The government of the Swiss canton of Tessino, imitating that of Argau, has just repressed a convent of Cisterciens.

"The king," says the Debats, "has commuted the sentence against Quenisset into transportation, and against Colombarier and Brazier into hard labor at the hulks for life."

Stock exchange, Jan. 6, two o'clock.—Five per cents opened at 117 1/4, four at 117 1/2, five at 118.

SPAIN.

Espartaco, the regent of Spain, has positively refused to accede to the pretensions of the French ambassador to be allowed to present his credentials to Queen Isabella, unless he were present. The Journal des Debats thinks that this misunderstanding, on a question of mere etiquette, will inevitably lead to a war between France and Spain.

By royal decree of the 9th December, 1840, all the buildings that were used as monasteries or convents of the suppressed religious communities of both sexes, are directed to be sold, to be paid for in coupons for interest overdue on the consolidated debt, without any difference between the foreign and internal, "for their full nominal value;" and a project of a law will be brought forward in the Cortes to give effect to the heads of a decree, dated the 21st of January last, for the sale and payment of the properties of the secular clergy. The whole of their property, equal to about £31,200,000, but at public sales these properties, it is expected, will fetch at least 3,000,000,000, equal to £31,875,000.

HAVANA. The New Orleans Bulletin acknowledges the receipt of Havana dates to the 3d. inst.

There had been two important arrivals, which caused no little sensation in the emporium of Cuba, viz.—President Bustamante, in his second exile from Mexico; and Madlle. Fanny Elssler, the danseuse, from Philadelphia.

TARIFF. The new tariff which took effect on the 20th inst., levies the following duties on imports, all payable in gold or silver:

On flour, 1 dollar per barrel; corn and corn meal, 20 cents per bushel; oats, 15 cents per bushel, other grains, 20 cents per bushel; brown sugar, 1 cent per pound; tallow candles, 4 cents; lard, 3 cents; butter, 6 cents; cheese, 3 cents; beef, 2 cents; rice, 2 cents; whiskey, 25 to 75 cents per gallon—according to proof; manufactured tobacco, 30 per cent. ad valorem; American segars, 3 dollars per thousand; beef in barrels or otherwise, 3 dollars per 200 pounds; pork, 3 dollars per barrel, peas and beans, 50 cents per bushel; cabinet wares and all other manufactures of wood, 10 per cent. ad valorem; iron, ready made, clothing, hats and saddlery, 30 per cent. ad valorem; hats, shoes and boots of all kinds, 25 per cent.; pleasure carriages and harness of all kinds, 35 per cent.; bagging, bale rope and twine, 10 per cent.

MEXICO.

The New Orleans Bulletin has the following letter from Mr. Lunsden, one of its editors, now in the city of Mexico, January 25, 1842.

Good news!—Mr. Mayer secretary of legation to the American minister, has just called at my room and informed me that young Combs is liberated. Santa Ana this morning sent for him, and gave him his liberty, quite unexpectedly to every body here. He was conducted to the minister's apartments and placed under his protection, by Santa Ana's orders, and in his own carriage.

The other prisoners are yet in chains, and are all made to work in the streets.

There is no great life here till when Mr. Kendall arrives, which must certainly be in a few days, he will also be released. I look upon the liberation of Combs as a favorable omen.

The barque Ana Louisa, at New York, brings Vera Cruz dates to the 30th ultimo.

The United States consular agent, Jackson, Capt. Day, arrived at Vera Cruz on the 23d January from New Orleans, and landed Mr. McKee, bearer of despatches from the government of the United States, to Mr. Ellis our minister at Mexico. On the 30th she sailed again for New Orleans.

TEXAS.

Galveston dates to the 21st inst. have been received at New Orleans.

The Galveston Civilian of the 1st says:—A letter has been received from on board the ship Austin, at Sisal, dated January 15th, stating that Commodore Moore had gone to Merida, and while there the lieutenant in command of the ship became acquainted with the fact of the reunion of Yucatan with the central government. The Commodore, it is said, Commodore Moore might be detained as a prisoner, he seized the Mexican commissioners as they were returning, and determined to detain them as hostages, until the arrival of the commodore. He however shortly after received a letter from him (Com. M.) stating that he would return to the ship in a day or two, and ordered the release of the commissioners, among whom, on the part of Santa Ana, were Gens. Llamas and Anaya, hitherto supposed to be the most honest men among the federalists.

Accounts from Austin were up to the 28th ult.—Congress was to have adjourned on the 31st, but it was supposed that the expression of Gen. Hamilton's dissent previous to that time, and caused a postponement of the day, as the general and Belgian minister are said to have had important pecuniary efforts to make to that body in behalf of the Belgian government.

BURNING AND LOSS OF LIFE. The New Orleans Bulletin of the 12th ultimo, says: We were informed by an officer of the Texian navy, that the crew of the Texas schooner-of-war San Antonio, (now lying off Slaughter House Point), mutinied—killed the second lieutenant, Mr. C. F. Fuller, wounded two midshipmen, Messrs. Allen and Oakes, seized outlaws and pistols, and left the vessel. The sailing master escaped by jumping overboard. Some of the mutineers have since been taken.

AN ANCIENT WRONG REDRESSED.

A remarkable, and certainly decisive statement as to a very memorable political accusation, has been placed in our hands. Its publication seems clearly due, not only to the eminent man whom it greatly injured, not to the country at large, still possessed, in such numbers, with the idea that the charge in question was well grounded, and had been substantiated. The letter which we subjoin must forever disabuse our men of any such impression, and vindicate the injured, and all future possibility of doubt.

The lapse of fifteen or sixteen years has, of course, left us almost wholly ignorant of the nearly unanimous conclusions of which we have just spoken, rather than any certain memory of the facts (exceedingly slight in themselves) which were alleged, and never proved. To revive them in our own mind, we have returned to the following summary, which was given at the time, by Mr. Niles, in his Register. [See vol. 32, p. 162.] It is a brief history of the case, and presents the main facts and proofs.

POLITICS. As it is probable that interesting political events will grow out of the matters stated below, we give them an insertion at this time, and we commend them to the consideration of our readers.

The Fayetteville (N. C.) Observer published the following letter, said to be written by a highly respectable Virginian, then in Tennessee:

Nashville, 8th March, 1827.

"I have just returned from General Jackson's. I found a crowd of company with him; seven Virginians were of the number. He gave me a most friendly reception and urged me to stay some days longer with him. He told me this morning, before all his company, in reply to a question I put to him concerning the election of J. Q. Adams to the presidency, that Mr. Clay's friends made a proposition to his friends, that if they would promise, for him, not to put Mr. Adams into the seat of secretary of state, Clay and his friends would, in one hour, make him, Jackson, the president. He most indignantly rejected the proposition, and declared he would not compromise himself; and, unless most openly and fairly made the president, by the people, he would never receive it. He declared that he said to them, he would see the whole earth sink under him, before he would bargain or intrigue for it."

A correspondent of the Democratic Press, under date of Washington, 13th April, 1827, having quoted the preceding letter, says—

"After reading this extraordinary declaration of General Jackson, before all his company," called on him, and inquired if he knew any thing about it. He replied without hesitation, and with his accustomed frankness, that the statement that his friends had made such a proposition as the letter describes, to the friends of General Jackson, was, as far as he knew or believed, utterly destitute of foundation; that he was not conversant with the matter, and that he never made any such statement; but that no matter with whom it had originated, he was fully persuaded it was a gross fabrication, of the same calumnious character with the Kramer story, put forth for the double purpose of injuring his public character, and propagating the cause of General Jackson; and that, for himself and friends, he never entertained the idea of the charge before any fair tribunal whatever."

[The writer goes on and offers arguments why the declaration ascribed to General Jackson could not be true; but we shall not copy them just now.]

The Washington Telegraph of the 26th ult. asserts that General Jackson, in March, 1825, heard General Jackson make the same statement as is contained in the letter published in the Fayetteville Observer.

The "National Journal" of the 28th, speaking of the "Fayetteville letter" and Mr. Green's endorsement of its veracity, says—

"He [General Jackson] now stands before the nation as the direct public accuser of 'Mr. Clay and his friends,' and, by inference, of Mr. Adams also. The accusation has been deliberately denied. And if Gen. Jackson should not sustain it by competent and credible proof, the American public will not be reluctant to show the grateful respect which they have hitherto cherished for him, by rejecting his charge, as, in that event, it will deserve to be considered."

So things stand at present—and their condition has been rendered such, we suppose, they cannot well stop where they are. If these declarations have been made by General Jackson, he will not suffer them to remain impeached, but come forward and sustain them—if, on the other hand, he has been misrepresented or misunderstood, he, doubtless will say so. It would seem to us that the affair has reached a point where one or the other is due to the public intelligence and public reason.

Letter from Beverly Carter to Mr. Clay.

Virginia, Middlesex county, Urbana, 8th Feb. 1842.

DEAR SIR: It will be no doubt a matter of some astonishment to you, in receiving from me the present address. I will not preface it with any kind of apology, because in doing so I join my mind in the discharge of an act of conscience and a duty, that I feel the utmost pleasure in performing.

Although the time is quite far gone, still I therefore very innocently instrument in the abundant thought out the country a very great attack upon your character and virtue as a gentleman, and certainly a very heavy one as a public man, I feel exceedingly desirous to retract, and to clear me, from the slander, and my own feelings from the severe consequences that is within me, of having been, though neither directly or indirectly, your personal accuser; yet, that I was drawn indelicately into the representation of an attack upon you.

It is altogether unnecessary to enter into the minute circumstances of so distant a period, of how it happened and the particulars of it all. The public were at the time sufficiently informed why, and wherefore, I became the relater of the assaults, to which I specially allude.

I did not solicit the account that gave the gross abominable scandal of you, but merely asked if it was true, and possibly he was, had long before heard of it, and was the object of government when it was represented to have occurred. The reason of my having mentioned it, upon which the answer was given to me, was that I thought it an infelicitous scandal upon the country if true; and if not true, it would give you a fair opportunity of expiating yourself. I had, therefore, two objects in view, which are easily seen; and, from either or both, I conceive that I ought to be exonerated, at least from any design to do you injustice. Imagine yourself what motives I could possibly have had to injure you, a gentleman with whom I had no difference, and with whom I had never carried any enmity, and never intimately so, yet there was always an urbanity and an interchange of civilities between us, that never failed to make quite a favorable impression upon me, and if it was not reciprocal, it was my misfortune. To strew difficulty in your way with design, was utterly improbable at least. You, a distinguished man in the eyes of the nation, what advantage could I have expected from a derision of you? Surely it was very improbable. I most assuredly and most certainly never entertained the smallest prejudice or unfavorable idea of you, until the affair of the Fayetteville letter, that appeared under my signature, upon which was founded, I am quite sorry to say, the charge which galloped through the union against you.

Your memorable pamphlet, and some letters that came out in your defence, were entirely expressive of the whole transaction; and although I thought at the time, that you had not properly conceived me, I studiously forebore to say more than had been expressed in my correspondence at Wheeling, which Mr. Neal has since published.

My entire object now is, a desire I have to be exonerated from the belief of any special design to injure you; for I again declare, that I never felt the smallest degree of unkindness towards you, other than what was at the time, impressed upon me, by what had been communicated. I have never since the affair, fallen in company with you but once; and that was in company with you, and it was for the hall of the house of representatives, when a ballot was going on, for a public printer—I was standing alongside of Governor Branch, then a senator of the United States, when you passed on at my back, and without perceiving who I was, before you got up to us, you asked, how the ballot had gone, and Mr. Branch had not attended to it, and I had just taken it down with a pencil—I handed it to you the paper; and after looking at it, you returned it, bowed, and passed on. Mr. Branch then asked me, if that was the first time you and I had met since the affair of the Fayetteville letter—I said yes; the matter then vanished, and I have never since seen you once.

This letter is intended to show you that the long lapse of time, and the many changing circumstances of the country and government, have long ago convinced me that the very greatest injustice was done you in the charge made. I had, too, an opportunity lately of reading over very calmly and dispassionately a file of newspapers containing the whole affair, and without dissenting from Mr. Bushrod, and the proof whatever against you; and he even denied having ever made the charge upon you. I have discharged my mind in addressing myself so fully to you, and can only add that, if a publication of this letter redress you any essential service, (though I do not deserve it), you have full liberty from me to let the public see it.

One circumstance, I beg to assure you of, that whatever my verbal and written expressions of you were, (and I suppose I must have given much scope to both, though I recollect, now, nothing of what I said), I again say that I am most thoroughly convinced, and I have never seen any person, and therefore, unjustly treated, for I have never seen any person, to substantiate all the allegations. And very likely I take final leave of you, (as it may be, and very likely will be, the last time that any intercourse will take place between us), I must be allowed to make a few more observations, though I am quite sensible that my letter has already exceeded the propriety; yet I hazard, with a gentleman of liberality, nothing, I am sure, in asking a little further indulgence. From the temper of the nation, and the peculiar state of things, it is presumable that you are to be the witness of the next election of president of the United States. You have, I am sure, too high respect for public opinion, as you have too much veneration for the high dignity of that situation, to be negligent of it.

The greatest objection that has been yet started against you for that high post, I am concerned to say, hinges upon the old affair—which has been the subject of this letter. I am sure, as far as I bore any influence, or the representation I made against you, I sincerely hope will be perfectly removed by what I have already expressed to you. I know a great many most respectable, independent, high-minded politicians of the country, now extending to a great distance in the nation, that would have sought you through the thickest vapour that has hitherto cast a blind upon the nation, but for the circumstances referred to. It can surely be now no longer a matter of doubt upon their minds for he who was generally believed to be the circulator of the egregious slanders against you, hereby confesses that he did it, and unequivocally declares that it is unproved, and stands utterly unsupported to this time, a period of 15 or 16 years. But, like all spirited malice, it will be still said by some, that, even in this explanation I have given you of the part I bore in it, there is an understanding between us, and that it is all designed for political effect. You and I can most readily meet the charge, I am sure. I have had no intercourse or interview (as is expressed in my letter) with you for at least ten or eleven years—and there has been no sort of interchange between us.

But you and I have become old enough to expect all matters to arrive, and are therefore prepared to dare say, for the coming of them. Then, let it be so—I am sure we shall neither of us regard it.

I sincerely wish you health and happiness, and remain, dear sir, most respectfully, your obed't servant,
CARTER BEVERLY.

To the hon. HENRY CLAY.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. WEBSTER TO MR. EVERETT.

Department of State, Jan. 29th, 1842.

Edward Everett, Esq. &c. &c.

SIR: I regret to be obliged to acquaint you with a very serious occurrence, which recently took place in a port of one of the Bahama Islands.

It appears that the brig "Creole," of Richmond, Virginia, bound to New Orleans, sailed from Hampton Roads on the 27th of October last, with a cargo of merchandise, principally tobacco, and slaves, (about 135 in number); that on the evening of the 7th of November some of the slaves rose upon the crew of the vessel, murdered a passenger, named Hewell, who wounded some of the negroes, wounded the captain dangerously, and the first mate and two of the crew severely; that the slaves soon obtained complete possession of the brig, which under their direction was taken into the port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, where she arrived on the morning of the 9th of the same month; that at the request of the British authorities, the governor ordered a guard on board, to prevent the escape of the mutineers, and with a view to an investigation of the circumstances of the case, that such investigation was accordingly made by two British magistrates, and that an examination also took place by English consuls, the result of which was, that 130 of the slaves were imprisoned by the local authorities as having been concerned in the mutiny and murder, and their surrender to the consul, to be sent to the United States for trial for these crimes, was refused, on the ground that the governor wished first to communicate with the government in England on the subject of the mutiny and interference of the colonial authorities, and even before the military guard was removed, the greater number of the remaining slaves were liberated, and encouraged to go beyond the power of the master of the vessel, or the American consul, by proceedings which neither could nor should control. This is the substance of the case, as stated in two protests, one made at Nassau and one at New Orleans, and the consul's letters, together with sundry depositions taken by him, copies of all which papers are herewith transmitted.

The British government cannot but see that this case, as presented in these papers, is one calling loudly for redress. The "Creole" was passing from one port of the United States to another, in a voyage perfectly lawful, with merchandise on board, and also with slaves, or persons bound to service, natives of America, and belonging to American citizens, and which are recognised as property by the constitution of the United States in those states in which slavery exists. In the course of the voyage some of the slaves rose upon the master and crew, subdued them, murdered one man, and caused the vessel to be carried into Nassau. The vessel was thus taken to a British port, not voluntarily, by those who had the lawful authority over her, but forcibly and violently, against the wishes of all with the control of the vessel, and the mutineers and murderers; for there is no evidence that these outrages were committed with the concurrence of any of the slaves, except those actually engaged in them. Under these circumstances, it would seem to have been the plain and obvious duty of the authorities at Nassau, the port of a friendly power, to assist the American consul in putting an end to the captivity of the master and crew, restoring to them the control of the vessel, and enabling them to resume their voyage, and to take the mutineers and murderers to their own country to answer for their crimes. The proper trial of the offenders is a question now any other course could justly be adopted, or how the duties imposed by that part of the code regulating the intercourse of friendly states, which is generally called the comity of nations, could otherwise be fulfilled. Here was no violation of British law attempted to be intended on the part of the master of the vessel, or of the mutineers, or of the infringers of the law of nations. The vessel was lawfully engaged in passing from port to port, in the United States. By violence and crime she was carried, against the master's will, out of her course, into the port of a friendly power. All was the result of force, and of the forcible and unprovoked seizure, entitled him to such assistance from the authorities of the place as should enable him to resume and prosecute his voyage and bring the offenders to justice. But, instead of this, if the facts be as represented in these papers, not only did the authorities give no aid for any such purpose, but they did actually interfere to set free the slaves, and to enable them to disperse themselves beyond the reach of the master of the vessel or their owners. A proceeding like this cannot but cause deep feeling in the United States. It has been my purpose to write you at length upon this subject, in order that you might lay before the government of her majesty full, and without reserve, the facts of the case, upon which the law of the United States, and the grounds on which these views are taken. But the early return of the packet precludes the opportunity of going into this case in this despatch; and as Lord Ashburton may shortly be expected here, it may be better to enter fully into it to him, than to do so in a despatch. Some knowledge of the case will have reached England before his departure, and very probably his government may have given him instructions. But I request, nevertheless, that you lose no time in calling Lord Aberdeen's attention to it in a general manner, and giving him a narrative of the transaction, such as may be framed from the papers now communicated, with a distinct declaration that if the facts turn out as stated, this government think it a clear case for indemnification.

You will see that in his letter of the 7th January, 1837, to Mr. Stevenson, respecting the claim for compensation in the cases of the "Comet," "Economica," and "Enterprise," Lord Palmerston says that "the British government is of opinion that the rule by which these claims should be decided, is, that those claimants must be considered entitled to compensation who were lawfully in possession of their slaves within the British territory, and who were disturbed in their legal possession of those slaves by functionaries of the British government." This is the broad principle, and the case of the "Creole," if its circumstances are correctly stated. But it does not extend to what we consider the free doctrine, according to the laws and usages of nations; and, therefore, cannot be acquiesced in as the exact correct general rule. It appears to this government that not only is no right of interference of the local authorities to be allowed, but that aid and support should be extended to these, as in other cases which may arise, affecting the interests of citizens of friendly states.

We know no ground on which it is just to say that these colored people had come within, and were within the reach of such such such such such such such of England affecting and regulating the conditions of persons could properly act upon them. As has been already said, they were not there voluntarily; no human being belonging to the vessel was within British territory of his own accord, except the mutineers—these being on board, and the rest of the population of the vessel, and the British authorities, to secure into the cargo of the vessel, or the condition of persons on board? These persons might be slaves for life; they might be slaves for a term of years, under a system of apprenticeship; they might be bound to service by their own voluntary act; they might be in confinement for crimes committed; they might be prisoners of war; they might be fugitives, and the British authorities look into and decide any of these questions? Or, indeed, what duty or power, according to the principles of national intercourse, had they to inquire at all? If, indeed, without unfriendly interference, and notwithstanding the fulfilment of all their duties, and assistance, by these authorities, the master of the vessel could not retain the persons, nor prevent their escape, then it would be a different question altogether, whether resort could be had to British tribunals, or the power of the government in any of its branches, to compel their appearance, and to subject them to trial. Now, it claims that English law shall decide the condition of all persons actually incorporated with British population, unless there be treaty stipulation making other provision for special cases. But in the case of the "Creole" the colored persons were still on board an American vessel, and the British authorities were out of the course of her voyage by mutiny; the master desiring still to resume it, and calling upon the consul of his government resident at the place and upon the local authorities to enable him so to do, by freeing him from the imprisonment to which mutiny and murder had subjected him, and furnishing him with such necessary aid and assistance as are usual in ordinary cases of disaster at sea. These persons, then, cannot be regarded as being mixed with the British people, or as having changed their character at all, either in regard to country or personal condition. It was no more than just to consider the vessel as still on her voyage, and entitled to the assistance due to other cases of distress, whether arising from accident or outrage. And that no other view of the subject can be true is evident from the very awkward position in which the local authorities have placed their government in respect to the mutineers still held in imprisonment. What is to be done with them? How are they to be punished? The English government will probably not undertake their trial or punishment; and of what use would it be to send them to the United States, separated from their ship, and at a period so late as that, if they should be sent, before proceedings could be instituted against them the wind would have so scattered them as to be lost.

One of the highest offences known to human law is thus likely to go altogether unpunished.

In the note of Lord Palmerston to Mr. Stevenson, above referred to, his lordship said "that, slavery being now abolished throughout the British empire, there can be no well-founded claim for compensation in respect of slaves who, under any circumstances, have come within the jurisdiction of the British empire, there would be with respect to slaves who might be brought into the kingdom." I have only to remark upon this that the government of the United States uses no ground for any distinction founded on an alteration of British law in the colonies. We do not consider that the question depends at all on the state of British law. It is not that in each case the active agency of British law is intoked and refused; it is, that unfriendly interference is deprecated, and those good offices and friendly assistances expected which a government usually affords to citizens of a friendly power when instances occur of disaster and distress. All that is to be considered is, whether in any case we would expect in the ports of England, as well as in those of her colonies. Surely, the influence of local law cannot affect the relations of nations in any such matter as this. Suppose an American vessel, with slaves lawfully on board, were to be captured by a British cruiser, as belonging to some belligerent, while the United States were at peace; suppose such vessel carried into England, and the neutrality of the vessel fully made out in the proceedings in admiralty, and a restoration consequently decreed—in such case, must not the slaves be restored exactly in the condition in which they were when the capture was made? Would any one suppose that such a vessel, having been carried into England by force set them free?

No alteration of her own local laws can either increase or diminish, or any way affect, the duty of the English government and its colonial authorities in such cases, as such duty exists according to the law, the comity, and the usages of nations. The law, the comity, and the usages of nations, are the same on board the "Creole" could only have been regarded as Americans passing from one part of the United States to another, within the reach of British authority only for the moment, and this only by force and violence. To seek to give either to persons or property this kind of a law, as it is called, and to subject either to English burdens or liabilities, cannot, in the opinion of the government of the United States, be justified. Suppose that by the law of England all blacks were slaves, and incapable of any other condition; if persons of that color, free in the United States, should, in attempting to pass from one port to another, their own names, cargo, or the stress of weather within British jurisdiction, and there detained for an hour or a day, would it be reasonable that British authority should be made to act upon their condition, and to make them slaves? Or suppose that an article of merchandise, opium for instance, should be declared by the laws of the United States to be a nuisance, a poison, a thing in which no property could lawfully exist or be asserted; and suppose that an English ship with such a cargo on board, bound from one English port to another, should be driven by stress of weather, or by mutiny of the crew, into the ports of the United States, would it be reasonable that such a cargo should be seized, held just and reasonable that such a cargo should receive its character from American law, and be thrown overboard and destroyed by the American authorities? It is in vain that any attempt is made to answer these suggestions by appealing to general principles of humanity. This is a point in regard to which nations must be permitted to act upon different views, if they entertain different views, under their actually existing condition, and yet hold commercial intercourse with one another, or not hold any such intercourse at all. It may be added, that all attempts by the government of one nation to force the industry of its laws on that of another, for any object whatever, generally, defeat their own purposes, by producing dissatisfaction, resentment and exasperation. Better is it, far better in all respects, that each nation should be left without interference or annoyance, direct or indirect, to its undoubted right of exercising its own judgment in regard to all things belonging to its domestic interests and domestic duties.

There are two general considerations, of the highest practical importance, to which you will, in the proper manner, invite the attention of her majesty's government.

The first is, that, as civilization has made progress in the world, the intercourse of nations has become more and more independent of different forms of government and different systems of law and religion. It is not now, as it was in ancient times, that every foreigner is considered as therefore an enemy; and that, as soon as he comes into the country, he may be lawfully treated as a slave; nor is the modern intercourse of nations, on mainly, or at all, for the purpose of imposing by the laws of one nation, new forms of civil government, new rules of property, or new modes of domestic regulation. The great communities of the world are regarded as wholly independent, each entitled to maintain its own system of law and government, while all, in their intercourse, are understood to submit to the established rules and principles governing such intercourse. And the perfecting of this system of communication among nations requires the strictest application of the doctrine of non-interference of any with the domestic concerns of others.

The other is, that the United States and England, nearly by far the two greatest commercial nations in the world, touch each other both by sea and land at almost innumerable points, and with systems of general jurisprudence essentially alike, yet differing in the forms of their government and in their laws respecting personal servitude; and that so widely does this mutual interference extend its influence, that without the exercise to the full of the doctrine of non-interference and mutual abstinence from any thing affecting each other's domestic regulations, the peace of the two countries, and therefore the peace of the world, always will be endangered.

The Bahamas (British possessions) push their selves near to the shores of the United States, and their almost directly in the track of that great part of our air and sea commerce, which, doubling the Cape of Florida, connects the cities of the Atlantic with the ports and harbors on the Gulf of Mexico, and the great commercial emporium on the Mississippi. The seas in which these British possessions are situated, are seas of shallow waters, full of reefs and shoals, subject to violent action of the winds, and to the agitations caused by the Gulf Stream. It can, must always, therefore, be of dangerous navigation, and accidents must be expected frequently to occur, such as will cause American vessels to be wrecked on British islands, or compel them to seek shelter in British ports. It is quite essential that the manner in which such vessels, their crews, and their cargo, in whatever such vessels consist, are to be treated in these cases of misfortune and distress, should be clearly and fully known.

You are acquainted with the correspondence which has taken place in the few years ago, between the American and English governments, respecting the cases of the Enterprise, the Comet, and the Economist. I call your attention to the journal of the senate of the United States, containing resolutions unanimously adopted by that body respecting those cases. These resolutions, I believe, have already been brought to the notice of her majesty's government, but it may be that, with the resolutions themselves and the debates upon them, should be again directed to you will find the resolutions, of course, among the documents regularly transmitted to the legation, and the debates in the newspapers with which it has been supplied from this department.

You will avail yourself of an early opportunity of communicating to Lord Aberdeen, in the manner which you may deem most expedient, the contents of this despatch; and you will receive further instructions respecting the case of the Creole, unless it shall become the subject of discussion at Washington.

All your communications with her majesty's government, will be subject to inspection, with a full conviction of the dangerous importance to the peace of the two countries of occurrences of this kind, and the delicate nature of the questions to which they give rise.

CURRENCY REPORT.

REPORT PRESENTED BY MR. CUSHING, CHAIRMAN OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES ON THE CURRENCY.

The select committee to whom was referred so much of the message of the president as relates to the plan of finance therein recommended to consider the same, from the secretary of the treasury accompanied by a distinguished member of the establishment of a board of exchequer at the seat of government—report, in part—

The committee have bestowed, on the subjects committed to them, all the deliberation and anxious consideration, which the importance of those subjects demands.

It became their duty to inquire as to the wisest and best method of keeping the public moneys of the United States; the material in which the same should be collected and disbursed, and the power and obligation of the federal government in regard to the currency and exchanges of the union.

They entered upon the discharge of this duty at a period, when, in consequence of the magnitude and pressure of the public debts of many of the states of the union, the condition of their banking institutions, and other causes, the currency and exchanges of a large part of the United States were involved in calamitous disorder; at a period, when the pecuniary distress of the country—the extreme difficulty of so long existing among eminent statesmen as to the nature and causes of those disasters and the proper remedy for them—and the uncertainty and instability of the federal government—had conspired to render a sort of anarchy of opinion characteristic of the time.

Under these circumstances, the committee felt themselves called on by the highest claims of patriotism and of honor, to endeavor to look steadily and calmly at the facts surrounding them—to emancipate their minds, so far as possible, from the dominion of all pre-conceived opinions—to bring the solution of the great questions before them, to the benefit at least of uncommitted judgments and unsharped freedom of decision—to inquire, not merely what might be best in the past and present view of each, but also what was the best of things now practicable; and having thus without fear or favor, fully discharged to their own duty to their country and themselves, to submit, unbiassedly, the result of their deliberations to the candor and wisdom of the house.

They were more strongly impelled to the adoption of these principles of action, in consideration, that the duty they were to perform was one imposed upon them by the command of the house, not sought nor derived from the result of their deliberations; that, in their relations, for the success of the measure, might prove, they must, of necessity, rely on its intrinsic propriety and the impartial sense of the legislature.

The constitution of the United States empowers congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties and imposts and excises, to pay the debts and to provide for the common defence and welfare of the United States." And it recognises the existence of "the treasury of the United States." But it does not prescribe the organization of that treasury, nor set forth the mode in which its personnel shall be constituted, or its business to be conducted, or otherwise than as it provides that the president, with the advice and consent of the senate, shall appoint the principal officers of the U. S. But the constitution further provides that congress shall have power to make all laws "necessary and proper for carrying into execution" all other powers vested by it in the federal government. And under these constitutional provisions is the treasury of the United States to be organized by legislation, and its concerns conducted; the president being empowered and enjoined to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

Besides this, congress has power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states; power to "coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures," and power "to borrow money on the credit of the United States."

And, on the other hand, while conferring these powers on the federal government, the states have expressly forbidden to themselves and to each other to emit bills of credit, to make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, or to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

By the act to establish the treasury department, passed on the second day of September, 1789, it was provided that it shall be the duty of the treasurer to receive and keep the moneys of the United States, and to disburse the same upon warrants drawn by the secretary of the treasury; but the plan and mode of so keeping the moneys of the United States were not specifically prescribed; unlimited scope of choice being left to the treasurer in this respect, subject always to the authority of the president, to see to the due execution of the laws, and in his executive capacity to guard the interests of the government.

Under these provisions of law the fiscal operations of the federal government, as now constituted, commenced, and so proceeded until the 25th of February, 1791, when the bank of the United States was incorporated by the act of the 24th of March of that year.

Prior to which, there existed in the United States three incorporated banks, namely—that of North America, in Philadelphia; that of New York, in the city of New York; and that of Massachusetts, in Boston; all of them established before the adoption of the constitution. Each of these banks was a state corporation; for, though the Bank of New York was originally established by congress in 1791; yet it had since acquired and now acted under a charter from Pennsylvania.

These banks it was thought were unfit, or incompetent, to perform the fiscal business of the government; and, under which, they could not absorb any amount of the public debt, nor be relied on for advances of money to the United States.

The incorporation of the bank of the United States originated in an order of congress calling on the secretary of the treasury to prepare and report a proper plan for establishing the public credit; in obedience to which, the secretary created two committees; in one of them, recommending that the public debt be funded, and additional taxes raised to pay the interest on it; and in the other, recommending the incorporation of a National Bank as being of "primary importance to the proper administration of the finances." One of the greatest utilities in the operations connected with the support of public credit, was set forth in the preamble of the act, "as tending to give facility to the obtaining of loans for the use of the government;" to which, in the same preamble, was added the further reason of "advantages to trade and industry."

This bank answered immediately three purposes of the government, namely: 1. Of its capital of ten million dollars, three-fourths was composed of funded debt; 2. It was made the fiscal agent of the United States; and 3. Its notes were a legalized currency, being receivable in all payments at the treasury.

And the system of the government was completed by the act of the 22d of February, 1792, which created the mint, and regulating the coin of the United States, upon the basis of the dollar-unit prescribed by the continental congress.

The incorporation of this bank was resisted in the outset on considerations of expediency and of constitutionality, and considerations led to the renewal of congress to renew its charter. On the expiration of its charter it does not appear to have been deemed necessary or expedient to legislate further, either as to the means of collecting or the mode of keeping the public moneys; but this was left to stand on the authority vested in the treasury, by the act of 1789, to receive and keep the moneys of the United States.

Meanwhile, the number of banks, incorporated by the several states, had been increased previous to, or at this time, to one hundred, and in 1812 about twenty more were incorporated, with an aggregate capital in the whole of upwards of 77,000,000 dollars; and the business of the treasury was conducted in their notes, and by deposits with them. In the progress of the war of 1812, and in the year 1813, the Bank of the South of New England ceased to pay coin for their bills, in 1814, as the United States bank would in all probability have done, if it had continued to exist, as this suspension was chiefly in consequence of advances made by them to the government; but notwithstanding the non-redeemability of their bills,

If the duty of the federal government consisted only in doing what is absolutely necessary for the benefit of a few persons, it would be a simple question, and might be more easily answered. But, in the opinion of the committee, the federal government should consider, not only what is for the convenience of itself, but also, incidentally, what is for the convenience and welfare of the people of the United States.

In the first place, then, what course should the federal government at this time take to remedy and relieve the currency difficulties of the United States?

It cannot assume and pay that great mass of individual indebtedness of the people of the United States, which now weighs them down, and is one primary cause of the present condition; debts contracted when the currency was excessive, far things having a factiously large or wholly unvalued value, and the possession of which by the debtor, owing to their present depreciated value, affords to him no adequate means of payment. What alone congress can directly do in this respect it has done, by the passage of a bankrupt law, which, whether rightful or not in its provisions, yet enables the insolvent debtor to settle these debts with such means of payment as he possesses. For the rest, and so far as this indebtedness is a general evil affecting the whole country, "therein the patient must minister to himself." The country is in a state of industry, economy, and prudence, and a return to proper principles of trade; by means of which and with the immense and various productive resources of the country, and the productive energy of its people, with no extraneous cause of war or the like to waste and exhaust them, the steadily returned and continued prosperity is as certain as anything in human affairs can be.

It cannot, by any direct legislation, prevent unwise extension of credit in time or amount, overtrading, speculation, the excessive importation and consumption of foreign luxuries, and the consequent excess of imports over exports, and displacements of coin to pay foreign balances. What alone it can do in this respect, besides itself setting an example of integrity and frugality in its own affairs, is to regulate its own system of taxation and finance so as at any rate not to injure the domestic production of the country, and if it may, incidentally to foster it impartially in all its forms, and do equal justice to the rights and interests of all parts of the union.

It cannot pay the debts which the individual states have contracted on their own account. All that in this relation it can assume to do it has (whether rightfully or not) done, by ceding to the states the annual net proceeds of the public lands.—For the rest, the people of the United States, who are also the people of the states, have the remedy for this evil in their own hands by the better regulation of their own finances, and the imposition of taxes to pay the interest of their public debts.

It cannot command and compel the state legislatures to cease to authorize the suspension of cash payments, by their charters, or prevent the states from issuing bills of credit to accommodate the present wants and postpone the final day of individual debtors or the states. It cannot, by its own direct act, retire from circulation their depreciated bills, the currency of which is the greatest evil of the times. But it can act on the subject matter by its own use any and every kind of bill, or an equivalent paper in its own dealings, and if it receive bank bills, by exacting payment of them at frequent specified periods. And in the opinion of many, who are conversant with the subject, and whose experience and judgment are entitled to consideration, it can, to some degree, remedy the distribution of the means for applying to legal or artificial means the same laws for the immediate distribution of their assets and discharge of their debts, which apply to natural persons.

It cannot give to the country a paper currency in the bills of an incorporated joint stock bank of private property, or constitute a national bank, or, in the opinion of the president, and of a considerable part of the members of the two houses, and of the people at large, constitute at present an insuperable impediment to the incorporation of a national bank; and if it could be incorporated, it would be impossible, and if possible, would be unwise, whether that bank should be authorized to collect the stock of such an institution. It can, however, provide a national paper currency of adequate quantity, and of better quality, by other means.

It cannot equalize the exchanges throughout the country, so long as the currency is in more or less degrees of depreciation, and the business of buying and selling is transacted in one part of the country by means of specie values, and in another by paper values. Most of the existing rate of exchange between different parts of the country is not the difference in price between legal coin in one place and in another, or of the cost of transporting it to settle balances; but the difference between the price of the coin currency and of the paper currency at the same place. This congress cannot prevent.—But it may provide a safe and economical medium of exchanges, correspondent to the true value of exchange as regulated by the course of business, and adapted to supply and demand, in a specie medium of payment.

It cannot, by any act of its own whatever, proceed immediately to fill the channels of commerce with a paper currency equal in rate of value to gold and silver, neither by means of a national bank nor by any other instrumentality whatever. For the same reason that, in the market of a depreciated paper currency, coin cannot be kept in circulation, but becomes at once an article of merchandise, and is bought up as such, and disappears, just so will it always be with a specie value paper currency alongside of a depreciated paper currency. Until state governments cease to authorize or sanction the issue of irredeemable bank paper in a given community, that community cannot have any better currency. But the federal government can adopt the means to furnish a paper currency of par value, to be ready to take the place of the depreciated paper currency, so soon as that shall be driven or withdrawn from circulation by the direct action of the state governments, or by the indirect action of the federal government.

What, then, shall congress do? What ought it to do? To reach the answer to these questions, let us consider the advantages and the disadvantages of the plans heretofore used in the fiscal business of the treasury.

Leaving out of the case all debatable constitutional questions involved in it, and regarding it as a practical matter only, the considerations alleged in favor of a national bank are—

1. Its convenience in the collection, safe keeping and disbursement of the revenue.
2. Its utility (to a certain degree) as an agent of exchange.
3. Its being the means of furnishing a paper currency to circulate in all parts of the United States.
4. Its instrumentality, by the periodical settlement of balances, in regulating the paper currency of the states.

5. Its being the means of utilizing the public deposits by discounting on them.

On the other hand, the practical objections to it are, in substance—

1. The peril to the public welfare of taking from the government itself, appointed to be the people and responsible to them, all this vast power over the public funds and the currency and exchanges, and placing it for a long period of years in the hands of a private corporation, and of bank directors, having interests of their own, and irresponsible and inaccessible to the people themselves.

2. The chances of mismanagement and corruption on the part of such a corporation, in the ratio of its power.

3. The possibility that it may itself make excessive issues, or suspend payments in specie, and, instead of aiding to regulate the currency of the states, become itself the great cause of its augmentation.
4. The chances of its not doing the proper business of the federal government to carry on (directly or indirectly) the business of discounting notes or bills, or otherwise lending money, or to furnish funds to be so lent.

Concerning the adoption of the state banks as the fiscal agents and depositories of the federal government, the main consideration for it is

That, if there be no national bank, it is necessary to employ the banks of the states, unless the government choose to discard all bank agency.

And the main considerations against it are—

1. That the state governments ought not to be dependent on the legislation of the state governments for the means of conducting the business of the treasury.

2. The perpetual liability of the state banks to excess of issues, and to suspension of specie payments.

3. The difficulty of giving a national utility of active circulation, to agencies which are essentially local in their nature and uses, and in their currency.

4. The liability of the system to political abuse.

The system of an independent treasury is recommended—

1. Because of its independence of all agency not the government's, and especially because independent of the banks.

2. Because it holds the public funds for the public use only.

3. Because, by the use of coin only in the dealings of the treasury, it tends to bring back the country to the money standard of the constitution.

And it is opposed—

1. Because, by the exclusive use of coin, it rejects the time-saving and lessening instrumentality of paper, which, so it be of specie value, is in many respects preferable in use to coin.

2. Because, it locks up the public funds from all employment, either directly or as the basis of paper issues.

3. Because, under it, the U. States has no paper currency of national circulation.

4. Because it separates the government from the people, and disavows all incidental duty towards the latter in the business of the treasury.

Which of these three systems is the cheapest and safest, that is, involves the least expense and loss to the treasury, is no otherwise important than as it may be a question of charge on the revenue; and which of them is most convenient, in a fiscal point of view, is a matter of no interest except to the government.

The committee do not believe that the wit of man can devise any scheme of finance which will satisfy every mind, and which, shall combine the whole of the advantages and shun the whole of the disadvantages of the different plans, on which, at successive periods, the government has hitherto acted. All human institutions are mixed of good and evil. It is our duty, if we cannot do all the good we would, to attempt at least to do no evil. The committee are of opinion that many of the advantages of the different systems heretofore adopted and successively rejected by the government, are to be found, and many of the disadvantages are not found, in the plan of a board of exchequer recommended by the president, and which, with sundry modifications, they report to the house.

In common with a bank of the United States, the exchequer provides and secures—

1. A safe and convenient agency for the custody and management of the public funds.
2. A useful agent of exchanges and collections.
3. A national paper currency.

4. The regulation of the bank paper currency of the states, by receiving it in payment of public debts, and presenting it for redemption at short intervals of time.

5. The utilization of the public deposits and of the specie funds of individuals, by rendering them the basis of a national paper circulation.

6. The best security, incidentally to the business of the treasury, and within the letter of the constitution, of benefits on the people of the U. States.

In common with the independent treasury—

1. It does not entrust the control of the public funds or of the currency to an irresponsible private corporation.

2. It does not loan out the public money to individuals.

3. It makes and can make no excessive issues, and cannot suspend cash payments. For every paper eagle on the wing, it has a gold eagle in hand.

4. It is independent of all banks.

5. It conducts the business of the treasury without the necessity of recurring for aid to the creatures of the legislation of the states.

6. By the use either of coin only, or of paper always equivalent to coin, it follows the true spirit of the constitution in the maintenance of the legal money standard.

7. It is at all times within the control of congress to repeal or amend it at pleasure.

The president of the United States, in presenting this plan to congress, has obeyed the injunction of the constitution, which requires him to recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he has fully redeemed the engagements in this respect which he had previously made to congress; and thus he has faithfully discharged his whole duty to the constitution and the union.

The committee, while animated by the highest respect for his views, have yet deemed it due to him, to themselves, to the occasion, and to the country, to give to those views a free and unbiased examination. They have done so; and in so doing, they have also discharged their duty. They respectfully submit the result to the house in the bill herewith returned. They believe this measure to contain the elements of usefulness and public good; and, as such, they recommend it to the house.—But they feel no pride of opinion concerning it, if in error, they are ready to follow the lead of better lights, if better there be, from other quarters; being anxious only to minister to the welfare of the people whom they represent. It remains now for congress to act in the matter: the country demands that in some way we shall act; and the times appeal to us to act with decision, with moderation, with impartiality, with independence.—Long enough, the question of the national finances has been the sport of passion and the battle-roy of party. Foremost of all things, the country, in order to recover itself, needs repose and order for its material interest, and a settled purpose in that respect (what it shall be is of less moment, but at any rate some purpose) on the part of the federal government. If, careless of names and solicitous only for things, aiming beyond all intermediate objects to the visible mark of the practicable and attainable good—if congress shall in its wisdom concur at length in some equitable adjustment of the public debt, it cannot fail to deserve and secure the lasting gratitude of the people of the U. States.

Mr. Cushing then read the bill, as follows:

A BILL AMENDATORY OF THE SEVERAL ACTS ESTABLISHING THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That there shall be, and hereby is, created and established in the treasury department at the seat of government of the United States, a board to be called the exchequer board of the United States, to be composed of the secretary of the treasury for the time being, and the treasurer of the United States for the time being, and one commissioner to be appointed by the president of the United States, with the advice and consent of the senate; the said commissioner to be appointed for four years; and neither he nor the treasurer of the United States shall be removed from office, except for physical disability, incompetency, or neglect of duty; and, in case of any such removal, it shall be the duty of the president to lay the reasons therefor before the senate; and the said commissioner shall receive an annual salary of three thousand dollars; and the secretary of the treasury shall preside over the board.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That said board may establish agencies or offices in the United States, not exceeding ten in the whole; and one of said agencies or offices shall be established at the city of Boston, in the state of Massachusetts, one at the city of New York, in the state of New York, one at the city of Philadelphia, in the state of Pennsylvania, one at the city of Charleston, in the state of South Carolina, and one at the city of New Orleans, in the state of Louisiana, and one or more of all the other five agencies or offices, if necessary for the public service, may be established, from time to time, at such one place or places as said board may deem expedient; and it shall be the duty of the board to change the location thereof at intervals of twelve months, as the public service may require for the transfer of safe keeping and disbursement of public money.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That for the said board there shall be a principal clerk with a salary of ——— dollars per annum, and a register with a salary of ——— dollars per annum; and if the said agency or office of said board, to be established as aforesaid, there shall be one superintendent with a salary of ——— dollars per annum, and a register with a salary of ——— dollars per annum; and if the business of such agency or office require it, a clerk for each superintendent with a salary of ——— dollars per annum, and a clerk for each register with a salary of ——— dollars per annum; and the said superintendent and register shall be appointed by the president of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the senate; and the secretary of the treasury shall have power to appoint said clerks; and the said superintendent and register shall be appointed for four years, and may be removed by the president of the United States for physical disability, or incompetency, or neglect, or violation of duty; but in all cases of removal, the reasons therefor shall be laid before the senate of the United States. And the seal shall be found necessary at each of the agencies, to appoint temporary clerks, not exceeding ten in the whole, for the transaction of the business of said agency and its agencies, subject to the supervision of congress, with salaries at a rate not exceeding ——— dollars per annum.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the exchequer and its officers shall be the general agents of the government of the United States for receiving, safekeeping, and disbursing the public moneys, and transferring and transmitting the same, under the direction of the secretary of the treasury; and all public moneys received from whatever sources, shall, under the same direction, be paid into the exchequer, or its agencies, or to the order of the treasury of the United States. And the said board of exchequer and its several agencies shall pay all warrants, drafts, or orders made having by the treasurer of the U. States, and by all disbursing officers and agents of the government, leaving authority to make such drafts or orders. And the said exchequer and its officers shall perform the duties of commissioners of loans, in receiving subscriptions, transferring stock, and paying dividends and interest thereon under the directions of the secretary of the treasury; and shall render to the treasurer of the United States all necessary facilities for transferring and disbursing the public moneys as shall be required by him; and shall perform all the duties of public agents, under the regulations prescribed by the secretary of war; and shall render and perform all other duties and services in relation to the collecting, keeping, and disbursing of the public funds, as shall be prescribed by law, or by the secretary of the treasury.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the exchequer and its agencies, and its several agencies, to receive on private deposit gold or silver coin or bullion, the property of individuals, to be held as in other cases of deposit made by individuals for convenience and security, and to issue certificates of such deposit having been made; and the amount so deposited shall never exceed in the whole ten millions of dollars, unless otherwise provided by law, to be received on deposit as may be apportioned by the board among its several agencies according to the extent of their business respectively.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the board and its agencies or officers, or any one of them, authorized and directed, in all cases where the public creditors may prefer the same, to issue to them certificates of deposit for the amount or amounts of debts due to them by the United States; but the amount of such certificates to be issued to said public creditors shall not exceed the sum of ——— millions of dollars, issued and outstanding at any one time, unless otherwise provided by law. And it shall be the duty of the said board of exchequer and each of its several agencies at all times so to limit the amount of certificates so issued that its gold and silver on hand shall be equal to the amount thereof outstanding.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the proper officers of Philadelphia and of the branch mints at New Orleans, in the state of Louisiana, Dahlonega, in the state of Georgia, and Charlotte, in the state of North Carolina, respectively, instead of the receipts now by them given, shall have power to issue like certificates of deposit to individuals or bullion, or to the government for the amount of all deposits of gold or silver coin or bullion, and to issue such mint or its branches for the purpose of receiving under such regulations and checks for the security thereof as the secretary of the treasury shall prescribe.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all the said certificates of deposit shall be redeemable on presentation at the office of the agency in which each mint where issued; they shall be receivable every month in payment of the public dues; no premium shall be demanded for issuing the same; and they shall be issued in such denominations not less than five nor more than one hundred dollars, as the depositor or public creditor may desire; and the secretary of the treasury shall cause to be prepared and issued certificates as aforesaid, in such form as he shall prescribe, to be signed by the treasurer of the United States, and countersigned by the commissioner of exchequer. And the amount of all such certificates of deposit, public or private, outstanding at the end of every quarter shall so soon thereafter as the same may be ascertained, be published by the secretary of the treasury.

*Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the said board of exchequer may draw bills or drafts on any of its agencies, and may authorize any agency to draw bills or drafts on any other agency, or on the treasury, and may sell, and authorize any agency to sell, such bills or drafts for a premium not exceeding the fair cost of remitting specie to the place of payment, and in no case to exceed two per centum on the amount of such bill or draft: Provided, That no bill or draft shall be so sold except for cash paid in funds receivable in payment of public dues, as hereinafter prescribed.*

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for said board of exchequer, and each of its agencies, when ordered or required so to do by the secretary of the treasury, to purchase domestic or foreign exchange, for the purpose of transmitting the public moneys of the government to pay its creditors, or for public use, and for no other purpose whatever. And it shall not be lawful for the board of exchequer, or any agency, to purchase or sell any bill or draft drawn by or upon any member or officer thereof, or in which such member or officer shall be interested, nor to receive any deposit of any money belonging to such member or officer; and no bill shall be purchased, or draft sold at any agency, without the assent of two of its members.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That all payments made by the said board of exchequer, or of its agencies or offices, or any disbursing officer of the United States, shall be made in gold or silver coin, or, with consent of the public creditor, in treasury notes, or certificates of deposit to public creditors as heretofore provided, and in no other medium of payment whatever. And all dues to the United States, or any officer or department thereof, may be paid in gold or silver coin, in certificates of deposit issued under this act, or in treasury notes, or in the notes of banks which shall be immediately convertible into specie at the place where received. And the board of exchequer at the seat of government, and each of its agencies, shall settle weekly accounts with all banks in their neighborhood whose papers they may be required to pay or receive; and, in the case may be, all balances between it and said banks; and no individual shall be allowed at any time, as debtor to the exchequer, or any of its agencies, in account.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That no agency established in any state under the provisions of this act, contrary to any law which such state may enact, receive any other deposits than those of the United States, or make or sell drafts, or purchase bills other than such as shall be necessary in the collection, transfer and disbursement of the public funds.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the said board shall have power to provide regulations for the government of the agencies aforesaid, the transaction of their business, and the rendering accounts of all their proceedings; and, in such regulations, they shall so assign and arrange the duties of the superintendents, registers, and clerks herein provided, as that the said superintendents and registers shall be charged upon each other; and for that purpose, they shall require that the accounts and proceedings of each shall be entered by them, or by their respective clerks aforesaid, in separate and proper books; and the said board shall require of all the principal officers employed in such agencies bonds to the United States for such an amount, and in such form as the secretary of the treasury shall prescribe for the faithful performance of their duties, to be renewed annually, or oftener, if the secretary of the treasury shall require. And full and exact accounts of the proceedings of the board and its several agencies shall be rendered to the secretary of the treasury, in such form as he may prescribe; and it shall be the duty of the said secretary to lay abstracts of the same before congress, at the commencement of each annual session, with an account of all regulations made for the government of said agencies, and to furnish full and particular accounts and statements of the transactions of the board and its agencies when required by congress.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the board of exchequer and its several agencies shall keep separate and distinct sets of books, for the purpose of entering and recording in one set all transactions respecting the receipt, safekeeping, and disbursing of public revenue, and transmitting the public moneys from place to place for the service of the government, and in another all transactions and accounts arising from dealings in exchange and other transactions not on government account. And all profits accruing from dealing in exchange on individual account shall be applied, in the first place, to pay all salaries and compensations, and to defray all expenses incurred under the authority of this act, and the residue thereof shall be placed semi-annually to the credit of the treasurer of the United States.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That if it shall at any time happen, owing to any law, or to any exchange or other debt or liability arising out of any transactions under the provisions of this act, such suit may be brought in the name of the U. States, in any circuit court of the United States or any state court having competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That the necessary rooms and vaults for the safe keeping of the public moneys, and for the transaction of the business of the board of exchequer and its agencies, shall be provided by the treasury department at the city of Washington, and in the custom houses, mint, branch mints, and other public buildings belonging to the U. States, or far or near, as the secretary of the treasury may deem to be for the public service, and when the same cannot be so furnished, the said board may provide others.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That the gross amount of public moneys of the United States, by whomsoever it may be received or kept, and wherever it may be placed or transferred, shall be deemed and considered in the treasury of the U. States to the credit of the treasury of the United States, and no part of the same shall, as heretofore, be taken to pay any expenses whatever in collecting or receiving the same before it is brought into the treasury; but the said gross amount shall be accounted for, and all the said expenses of collecting and receiving the same shall be appropriated by law out of the treasury, as in other cases of appropriations. Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the transfer of public moneys from one place, or office, or officer to another; nor to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law relative to the post office department.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That if any member of the exchequer board, or any officer, clerk, or employed in its business, or of any of its agencies, or any collecting, receiving or disbursing officer or agent of the United States whatever, in any manner concerned in the collection, safe-keeping, transfer or disbursement of the public moneys of the United States, shall convert to his own use, or in any way, or by way of investment in any kind or property or merchandise, or shall loan, with or without interest, any money or security deposited with or belonging to the said board or any of its agencies, or belonging to any other person or persons dealing or depositing with the said board or any agency, or shall so convert to his own use, appropriate or loan any money or security belonging to the United States, or shall make any discount or exchange of funds other than an exchange for gold and silver, or shall make payments on account of the public service in any currency other than the United States, or shall in any manner, or by every such transaction of such person is hereby declared to be felony, and, on conviction thereof before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, every such officer or agent of the United States, and all the persons participating in such acts, shall be deemed to be imprisoned for a term not less than one year nor more than seven years, and to a fine equal to twice the amount or value of the property so embezzled.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That if any officer or member of the board of exchequer, or of any of its agencies established under the provisions of this act, or if any of its officers or members, shall give or sign a false certificate of a deposit having been made with any agency, mint, or branch mint, or shall issue or deliver any certificate, draft or bill of exchange without having received the full value thereof, and caused the receipt of the same to be duly countersigned by the principal agency, mint or branch mint, or shall be guilty of any such offence, or shall give or sign any responsibility of the said agency or of the board of exchequer, or of the United States, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and on conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a term not less than one year nor more than seven years, and to a fine equal to the amount of the false certificate so given, or of the bill or draft so issued or delivered, or to the amount of the responsibility so created or increased.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall falsely make, forge or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged or counterfeited, or willingly aid and assist in falsely making, forging or counterfeiting any certificate in imitation of, or purporting to be, a certificate of deposit aforesaid, or shall falsely alter, or cause or procure to be falsely altered, or willingly aid and assist in falsely altering, any certificate of deposit issued as aforesaid, or shall pass, utter or publish, or attempt to pass, utter or publish as true any falsely altered certificate of deposit issued as aforesaid, knowing the same to be falsely altered, every such person shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of felony, and being thereof convicted, any such person shall be sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labor for a period not less than one year nor more than seven years, and be fined in a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars.

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall make or engrave, or cause or procure to be made or engraved, or shall have in his custody, or under his control, or shall have in his custody, any metallic plate, engraved after the similitude of any plate from which any certificates issued as aforesaid shall have been printed, with intent to use such plate, or to cause or suffer the same to be used in forging or counterfeiting any of the certificates issued as aforesaid, or shall have in his custody or possession any plate, or any image of certificate of deposit similar to the paper upon which any such certificates shall have been issued, with intent to use such paper, or cause or suffer the same to be used in forging or counterfeiting any of the certificates issued as aforesaid, every such person, being thereof convicted, by any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced, and kept to hard labor for a term not less than one year nor more than seven years, and fined in a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SATURDAY, FEB. 5.

Mr. Adams commenced by commenting on what he considered the "extraordinary" course of the editors of the Intelligencer in declining to publish his remarks unless authenticated by himself. Sir, I do not wish to look into motives, but I say that a state of things exists in this city, wherever a discussion of this occurs, bearing directly or remotely on the subject of abolition, which is itself among the strongest of demonstrations that congress ought to sit where an influence exists. I say that the press here is under an influence which ought not to prevail, especially where a criminal prosecution is going on against a member of this house.

In the first place, there has existed a ranted prejudice against me for years past, in consequence of the course I felt it my duty to pursue in defence of the rights of petition. Witness the letter which I read to the house some days ago, threatening my life if I did not abstain from my "villainous course." Sir, it is a slavery prejudice; it is a prejudice entertained by all slaveholders, who conceive that I am engaged in doing injury to their interests. These galleries and every other section of the hall are full of descriptions. And this state of the public mind ought to hold to be altogether unsuited to the grave and solemn nature of a public trial, which I ought to be impartially conducted.

I say, in the next place, that the public press in this District is under the same influence—an influence both positive and negative. The editors of the press and utter misrepresentation of one press against me, and negative in the refusal of the other to do me justice. And the press is further under other influences from the organized suppression at the South. All sorts of publications in anywise connected with the subject of abolition. The editors of newspapers here know full well that if they send, for instance, to the city of Charleston, any thing which a committee of incendiaries may choose to think infected with abolition sentiments—a committee which, contrary to the constitution and in defiance of the laws of the Federal Government, and the freedom of the press, seize upon and pillage the public mails, and burn, without scruple, whatsoever they are pleased to consider as tainted with abolition: these editors, I say, know full well that if they send any such matter in their reports to that quarter, they do it at their peril. And this consideration operates not only here, but in the large cities of the union, where papers are published which have large numbers of subscribers at the south. Some three or four years ago, there was a meeting held in the city of Charleston, South Carolina, assuming a control over the position of the press, and I assumed the right of pilfering from the post office; all papers which did not suit their own views; which meeting appointed a committee to seize upon and burn all documents, coming to that city through the mails, which they might please to consider as being, in any degree, tainted with abolition. And the printed proceedings of that meeting here, and should be glad to have them read at the clerk's table.

[A very long extract from the proceedings of such a meeting was here read by the clerk, and then statements of the fulfilment of their resolutions. There were also read the correspondence of James Randall the postmaster of the city, with J. J. Caldwell, chairman of a meeting of the citizens of Petersburg, Va. in Aug. 1835, and also a letter from Mr. Kendall of Aug. 1835, to S. L. Gouverneur, post-master at N. York, after which,

Mr. Adams resumed. I have been induced to call for the reading of this document, in order to show the influence of the views, arbitrary and discretionary, of a department of this government, under no other law or pretence of law than necessity—the tyrant's law. Here is an officer of the United States government, who unequivocally admits of retaining papers, without distribution in any way, or delivery to law, who expressly says that he does not and will not authorize it, and yet tells the postmaster that he applied to him for directions in the case that he must act in the matter upon his own discretion. I denounce it as a violation of the freedom of the press, as a violation of the sacred law of slavery contrary to the rights and liberties of all the free people of the United States. It is but one of a numerous class of facts which I intend to adduce as proof that there is a regularly organized system on the part of the south, not merely to sustain their own views, but to keep the law of slavery through the free portion of this union.

As another illustration of this assumption of tyrannical power over the press and over the post office, I desire that this paper from John Jay may now be read.

[The clerk here read a paper from John Jay vindicating the opinions of his father John Jay, from the tenor they are made to assume on the subject of slavery, in a biography of him published in the Library of Harper's district school library, written by Mr. James Renwick, professor of chemistry in Columbia college, and varied from the correct memoirs originally written by Wm. Jay in a mode to accommodate them to more to southern feelings.]

Mr. Adams resumed. Here is a case of the wilful falsification of the published life of one of the most illustrious patriots of the revolution, by the expurgation from its pages of that which is called offensive matter, being offensive to the feelings of the south.—Under this same influence, the printers, even of school-books have acted. There have published upwards of a hundred volumes of books for the use of schools, which books have been confessedly expurgated of all those original portions and passages which was supposed by the publisher would be deemed offensive at the south. This I charge as having the effect of this course of organized and disciplined violation of the post office department. It results in a suppression of the freedom of the press and in the actual falsification of the truth. I say that it furnishes one of the strongest proofs of a great combination of the slaveholders of the south, to keep the portion of this union to extend the law of slavery through the free states.

But all this is not to be reported. Oh no. The Intelligencer goes to the south, and it must be expurgated of all I have now read, and of all that I said yesterday. It must be expurgated of the exposure which I then made of the editors of the Intelligencer, a committee of this house, and it is to be expurgated of all that I now say, and all I can hereafter say, in my defence, because, forsooth, the reporters of the National Intelligencer have not thought proper to report what I said. And now this house and the nation are warned that the editors of the Intelligencer will publish no report of my defence but such as shall be authenticated by myself. Under these circumstances, I am unwilling now to proceed further, and I therefore propose a postponement of the residue of my defence until answers shall have been received from the calls which I have made, at my instance, made on the president and two of our members of the cabinet. I deem this in my defence, and I deem necessary and essential to my defence, and until time shall have been afforded for such preparation as shall enable me to furnish an authentic report of my defence.

I therefore propose that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until answers to those calls shall have been received.

I will propose next Thursday week.

Mr. T. F. Marshall said. I think this is the sixth day during which the attention of this house has been occupied by what that gentleman calls his defence. He has been here for six days, and he has been talking of defence as was occupied in the erection of the world, which took, I think, just six days.—[a laugh]—and yet it must appear on the most cursory view of this proceeding that there are but two questions, a first and one question of law and a second. Has a petition been presented to congress, and is it proper to take steps to dissolve the union? Did the members from Massachusetts present such a petition? And on these two facts does there arise a contempt of this house? This comprises the whole matter. Now, as to the facts, there are both in the knowledge of the house. We have the petition presented to congress. He proposes to get certain information from the executive departments, which, in connexion with what he has already advanced, shall enable him to make out a justification both for his constituents and for himself. He has already apprized us that the southern portion of this union is under the direct action of slavery into the free states of the north: he has already announced, in his argument, that the south was for a war with Great Britain, for the purpose of reviving the African slave trade: he has warned the people of the north that the south are endeavoring to repeal the laws of the land, and the trial by jury, he has announced further to this house and to the world, he being at the time chairman of the committee of this house on foreign relations, and announced it in the presence of a British nobleman, who was a listener to the debate, that Great Britain is endeavoring to send the mail to such American vessels; he has defended the claim of Great Britain on that subject, to the condemnation of his own government.

[Mr. Adams. No, sir; I deny it.]

I have already referred to the report of the gentleman's speech: I heard nothing of that speech. The report of his speech in the papers, and the gentleman here denies that he took any such ground. Now it does not happen that the report of that speech is twofold. There is one report of it in the Intelligencer and another in the Globe. Between these two reports there are discrepancies quite sufficient to show that there has been nothing like collusion on the part of those who made the resolutions. The language is often different, but the substance is the same; and the declaration of the gentleman that he introduced the petition which has given rise to this proceeding for the purpose of alarm, is precisely the same in both the reports.

Now what is the question? It is on a motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject. The speaker gave him time to make out his case. He says that he is charged by me with subornation of perjury and of high treason; that we are sitting as a court to try him on that charge; and, if he is condemned, the consequence is, I suppose, to be death. I will now say nothing on that; but, I ask, what charge can it make on the question before us, if the gentleman shall succeed in proving all he has undertaken to prove? Congress has no more right to act on such a prayer, and he has no more right to bring such a prayer before it, if the alleged case be true, than if it be false.

But these things, when obtained, are to go before the country, and a new issue is to be made not springing from the record. Bitter, bitter appeals are to be made to northern prejudice. Every feeling of hostility to the south is to be kept alive, and stimulated and irritated by agitation, and the question is to be taken up by the nation. The motion which was introduced for a case of grievance has been made out sufficient to warrant a dissolution of the government, and on that question the whole floodgates of angry declamation are to be opened wide upon the peace of the country. The gentleman himself is to be allowed to lead the column of the six days through which all those treasures of wrath and fury which have been accumulating in his own bosom on an issue which he is trying to make, and which is not before this house.

I have carefully marked the various charges, the successive phases which the gentleman's defence has assumed, the course of the six days through which it has continued. One day we were entertained during almost the whole time by the gentleman's biography, by anecdotes of the emperor Alexander and Calneinco, and Napoleon and the British indemnities, and fourth of July speeches, and these were relied on as a defence for presenting a memorial to Congress, and for supporting the prayer of the petition of his attachment to that which his constituents ask us to destroy. But the next day, emboldened by the course which the sympathy of this house for the gentleman's years and standing induced it to pursue towards him, the gentleman goes back on his old ground, and he is going to the very heart of the matter, the unionist, but he returns to the point and endeavors to prove the most deadly designs on the part of the south, and asks us to enable him to get documents to produce that alarm which he from the first avowed it to be his object to excite. Is this house prepared to aid in such a design? I ask northern gentlemen here whether they are ready to strengthen the hands of the gentleman from Massachusetts in such an endeavor? Will they connect the abolitionists of the north with the tremendous proposition to dissolve this union? I have already declared that I am prepared to resist to the last such a proposition to this house to the union of these states. The gentleman was not always so ready to ask to consume the time of this house. Oh, no! there was a period during these transactions in which he was the tenderest man alive in his regard for the time of the people. He was the first to get up and to ask that he might gather materials for a further defence, which it is to consume the Lord knows how much more of the time of this house. I do trust that, for the sake of obtaining matter not only entirely irrelevant, but deeply mischievous, the house will consent to no such thing.

Mr. Wood said that he had from the very beginning resolved to make a test of the subject of the resolution. He had some experience, from the fact that he had witnessed in past times in this house, and from the effect of such proceedings on the country. He had seen many such questions raised here, and had seen them all end in snare and fury. This had induced him to make a test of the subject as fast as possible. He knew that the country was suffering, and that the house was disgraced in the eyes of the country. He concurred with the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) that there were wild fanatics to be found at the south as well as the north, and that the house ought to lend no countenance to either. Believing, as he did, that the time asked for by the gentleman from Massachusetts might be got by adopting the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Sumners) to refer the whole subject to a select committee, he hoped that course would be adopted. He believed that the gentleman was an opportunity to escape from a dilemma which he believed was agreeable to neither. He was opposed to granting the postponement now asked for. He feared the house would refuse it, and that all further action on the resolutions, either of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) or the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Gilmer) would be superseded by adopting the amendment of the other gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Sumners) to send the whole matter to a select committee. Under this impression he would now move the previous question.

Mr. Sumners said that the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Arnold) withdrew that motion.

The speaker (addressing Mr. Arnold) inquired if he withdrew the motion for the previous question?

Mr. Arnold said that, if the gentleman from Massachusetts withdrew his motion to postpone, he (Mr. A.) could not, of course, insist on the motion for the previous question.

Mr. Arnold withdrew the motion to postpone.

Mr. Sumners resumed. When I made my proposition to postpone, I was under the impression that it would meet with no opposition in any quarter. I did not make the motion from any desire to postpone my own rights, nor did I suppose that there was any man, not even the author of the resolution, in which he so tenderly informed me that I might consider it merely in the house that I was not expelled, and in which he charged me with the crimes of high treason and subornation of perjury—that even he would evince that he could not defend the resolution, his victim, by which he is to appear that he is actuated.

This gentleman, with the alteration of the member from Accomac and the gentleman from Albemarle, (for they speak by turns), is determined to resist and oppose every thing that I can say in my defence. He now complains that I have occupied six days of the time of this house. Well, sir, if I have, he and his two auxiliaries—I will say his two accomplices—have occupied among them six days in their vituperations. Surely a man at the bar of the house, and under trial here, may be entitled to at least as much time as this combination and accumulation of three of the most influential members of the house against him. I shall want more time, for it is impossible to shut and finish to-day; and I appeal to the sense of justice in this house, not to close this procedure before they suffer me to get those items of evidence which the house, by its own vote, has declared me entitled to. I claim more time, especially if each individual of this house is to be considered as a party to the charge, and they are to use their combined influence to precipitate this house into a decision.

The gentleman from Kentucky, in the argument he has just submitted to the house, has totally misrepresented me. He has argued as if, in my defence, I had favored and countenanced the objects of the petition; as if, in presenting it, I had not expressly disclaimed all concurrence in the prayer of the petitioners. My open disclaimer made here at the time is of no use as regards him. He persists in charging me with what I explicitly contradicted by the very words I presented to the house. He has said that I am to impeach men. No such person, as he has brought to conclude that I am or have been in favor of the petition. Such an assumption is false in relation to any petition which a gentleman may present. Even if he says not a word against the prayer it may contain, he is to be inferred that he is himself in favor of the object of the prayer, but in my opinion there was an open disclaimer; I expressly declared myself opposed to the prayer of the petitioners, and said that I presented it only out of my regard to the right of the people to petition here for a redress of grievances.

But has the gentleman responded to my call to show his own disclaimer when he has so reviled the relations established by the constitution, that the constituent shall be responsible to his representative, and the representative shall have the power of declaring him guilty of high treason and subornation of perjury for sending a petition to this house? Where, then, did he get up this? The right of petition is expressly guaranteed to the constituent without any such limitation as is attempted to be imposed upon it here. I ask, where are the rights of a constituent if the house is to proceed on the principles laid down by that gentleman? It is the quintessence of tyranny, of a tyranny not equalled by Caligula or Nero, of which the gentleman has spoken. One of those celebrated tyrants of antiquity was charged with writing his laws in such small characters, and hanging them up so high above the reach of the people, that they could not be read; but he never was allowed to punish the violation of a law that never was read. Will the gentleman send this petition to his house into a tribunal before which its constituents are to be tried for high treason and subornation of perjury for exercising their right of petition. His doctrine makes the representative the judge, instead of the constituent. That is the first law of the kind ever heard of. According to the report of Mr. Elmore, in the Gilfer case, that is in the law which the house will have made that is adopted the report of the majority of the committee in that case. It reverses every principle of the constitution. Where, I ask again, does the gentleman get his right to do this? Where is his law for charging a constituent with high crimes and misdemeanors for exercising the constitutional right of petition? Where in law is one such word to be found?

But if it is so, do assume such a power—if they claim such an authority in this case—they assume it in reference to every petition presented here. They assert a discretionary power in this house to punish a constituent for presenting any petition. If you can punish him for presenting a petition peaceably to dissolve this union, then you can punish for the presentation of every abolition petition. If the alleged right shall ever once be exercised, that will come next. Every member here who presents an abolition petition will be told he has incurred the censures of this house; and, if so, how can a constituent ever bring an abolition petition before this house? If they offer you a petition to recognise the independence of the republic of Hayti, they will be told this is an abolition petition—is its presentation a criminal thing? It is an act of treason. Why? Because it is possible some Quasimampo may come here as a public minister; and that would be high treason, according to the gentleman's doctrine. He will then call to the gentleman to resign and again for his law. He cannot show any. And I say he falsifies my purposes by assuming that I am in favor of the object of the petition.

The gentleman from Kentucky supposes there is some inconsistency in my course, if, after being borne down by the weight of the eloquence of the gentleman himself, and his coadjutors from Accomac and from Albemarle, and of the extensive conspiracy against me in this house and out of it, I offered to dismiss the whole subject without defending myself, and now, after that offer has been refused, I insist upon occupying sufficient time to do good my defence. I ask him what sort of reasoning is this? But the gentleman goes a great way further. He assumes that, even admitting the truth of all the positions I take, there is a conspiracy in the south to destroy the right of petition—to destroy the right of habeas corpus—to destroy the right of trial by jury—to destroy the freedom of the press—to violate the sacred trust of the post office—to get up a war with Great Britain on false pretences, but really for the protection of the slave trade;—even, if all this is true, still it is high treason and subornation of perjury in the people, if they are suffered to come to this point, and say that their offering under this state of things is intolerable that, in their opinion, a dissolution of the union is better than its continuance and increase. I put it to the reasoning power of every gentleman in this house, if the conclusion is not far from being a correct one. If all this oppression is really endured by the people, how can they be expected to come to this point, and here and petition for redress? The people, I admit, may have mistaken their own power and the power of this house as to the means of redress. But will this house constitute itself a criminal court, and say that whoever presents such a petition is guilty of high treason and subornation of perjury? Will the man who presents it be guilty of a contempt of this house? Is there a man here, besides the author of these resolutions, who will draw such a conclusion? I appeal to the Declaration of Independence. There I find a very different doctrine. The doctrine that whoever presents such a petition is guilty of high treason and subornation of perjury, is a doctrine which government which inflicts it upon them. It was on that very principle that the declaration itself was issued. It enumerates the various oppressions under which the colonies were laboring, and it says that they constitute a case where the people have a right to revolt.

The gentleman from Kentucky tells us that even if all the oppressions I undertake to prove be true, still it is high treason to make a movement towards overturning the government. I make myself at liberty not only to claim for the people of the free states a right to present the grievances under which they suffer, but to take up the whole subject of slavery in this house, and to demand its abolition, without being or a curse. And if I shall argue that it is a curse, I hold in my hand and claim to read a parallel which will show the opinions of at least one man on that subject. The pamphlet contains a comparison between the progress of the two states of New York and Virginia, from the time of their becoming free and of free labor. It shows that under the effects of slavery, Virginia has declined in property, prosperity, and population; while, on the contrary, New York has risen from being the third or fourth state to be the most powerful and prosperous in the union, while

Virginia, whose chief loss is greatly the decrease of the freedom and fair risk. That is the doctrine of the pamphlet from which I shall now read. Here is a pretty considerable statistical argument. He refers to the census of the two states at different periods and says:

"Statesmen may differ about policy, or the means to be employed in the promotion of public good, but surely they ought to be agreed as to new remedies. I think that there can be no dispute that New York is a greater, a richer, a more thriving, prosperous, and powerful state than Virginia. What has occasioned this difference? We have already seen that, as to advantages merely physical, as to soil, climate, extent of granary, and power, Virginia was unsurpassed. What accident or misfortune operated in this case? Has a despot government bowed the spirit and cramped the efforts of Virginia? Has she suffered under the desolations of war, or the scourge of pestilence? Over this land of a balmy atmosphere and pure air, smile health and cheerfulness. Hunting grounds of mineral and medicinal waters burst from her mountains.

"The most delicious baths, the most salubrious springs, tempt from every land the pilgrims of affliction and disease. With war she has nothing to do, against its dangers, its horrors, or its burdens, she has no mission to make. Her government and people are not charged with the care or expense incident to defence. The broad shield of the union is spread before her. The potent arm of that government, which combines the strength and revenues of twenty-six states, and wields the whole for the protection of each, is pledged to maintain her rights and her safety against all the world. There is but one cause, commensurate with the effects produced. The evil which has stayed the march of her people, the incus which has weighed down her enterprise, strangled her commerce, kept sealed her exhaustless mines, paralyzed her arts, and paralyzed her manufactures, and improvements, is SLAVERY. This is the cancer which has corroded her revenues, laid waste her lowlands, banished her citizens, and swallowed up her productions. This is the magazine the least approach to which fills her with terror. This is the smoldering volcano which will bear no hiding. This is the breath which will blow the threat to stir its sleeping but unextinguished fires, drives her to madness. Oh! well might she curse the tyrant who planted this dark plague-spot upon her virgin bosom!"

Mr. Adams was called to order by Mr. Saunders, who asked the speaker that the reading of articles in opposition to, or in support of the right of slavery, or of the conduct of the abolitionists, was not pertinent to the question.

The speaker said that the proposition to commit to a select committee was offered as an entire substitute for the resolution, and that the merits of the whole merits of the subject-matter to which the had reference were laid open, and by years '37, nos 26, the house affirmed the decision of the speaker.

Mr. Adams continued. That is irrelevant, is it? But did the petition presented call for the abolition of that execrable crime? No—it asked such things. Did the petition ask that the oppressor should suffer from that curse, and from the attempts of a majority here to establish and confirm that "plague-spot on the virgin bosom" of the state of Virginia, should be considered by this house, and that the house will determine whether they shall continue to be considered as it now is, and as it has been, all that oppression which those who sustain it are obliged to exercise over the rest of this union.

And now who is the author of these glorious sentiments?—of these words of fire? Can you imagine a man who, after he had exposed himself in his native state by the production to the world of such a pamphlet as this, and be charged with the crime of libel? He no longer held that language, should rise on this floor and charge another with high treason and subornation of perjury for language infinitely weaker? I say, can you imagine a man who, finding himself involved in the odious and horrible charge of abolitionism, and aware that noble sentiments which are embodied in this pamphlet, and who supposed he might somewhat restore the broken reputation under which he labored in his own part of the country for uttering these words of glory, turning like a tiger on another man with charges equally false and atrocious, and then, finding himself sufficiently satisfied, and thinking that thereby he may again be restored as an orthodox not believe in the slavery creed in his own native state?

In the outline of the defence which I propose to make, I enumerated, in general terms, a series of charges against the domestic, which the free people in a part of the union I come from suffer from that "plague-spot" of which this pamphlet so elo-quently speaks, and from its consequences; and in order to prove that that enumeration was supported by fact, I asked for the time which should be necessary for that end; for it may well be supposed that it will require time to collect such a variety of facts, and to examine principles of so extensive a bearing.

Mr. Marshall here put some query to Mr. Adams, whether he asked for that pamphlet as proving his fact, or as being an abolitionist?

Mr. Adams replied, no, sir; he was proving that you had been charged with abolitionism in your own state, and as being, as I supposed, ready to turn on me with the fury of a tiger, in order to satisfy your constituents in Kentucky that no such charge could now rest upon your name.

Mr. Marshall made a reply, inadvisable to the reporter.

Mr. Adams. I meant no personal attack upon the gentleman. I read with the highest commendation passages from a pamphlet which he himself put into circulation. I did not consider it as in any sense confidential.

Mr. Marshall. Nor is; not at all; I knew my man.

Mr. Adams. I do not know what he means by that; if he thought he knew his man. * * * [Here the rest was partially lost to the reporter—it was, he believes, something about knowing him better before these proceedings were ended.]

Mr. Marshall. I knew that the gentleman respected nobody.

Mr. Adams. Ah! the gentleman is touched, is he? He makes a personal matter where I intended none. These are glorious sentiments: would to God I had powers of eloquence equal to the utterance of such sentiments.

I hold that it is no perjury, that it is no high treason; but the exercise of a sacred right to offer such a petition; and that it is as false in morals as it is inhuman to fasten that charge on men who, under the countenance of such declarations as I have here quoted, come and ask of this house a redress of grievances. I undertake to prove that the consequences in the free states from this "curse," justify them in such a course. And if they do mistake their remedy, this government should not turn them away, and charge them with high treason and subornation of perjury; but ought to take it up—to watch the conduct of the slaveholders—to elucidate the facts in the pamphlet I have quoted, these should be considered. If they have mistaken their remedy, the house should do as the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) told us he was ready to do, admit the facts, and tell these men that their grievances are not to be remedied by a dissolution of the union; that there are other remedies within their power, either by obtaining an amendment of the constitution, or in some other constitutional mode; and that, although congress cannot grant the prayer of their petition, they will take upon themselves to remove, so far as they can, their just causes of complaint.

These sentiments in the pamphlet from which I have read, are the sentiments of the great patriots and fathers of the revolution—of Washington, of Jefferson, of Madison, of Monroe. They were the sentiments of Mr. Jefferson throughout his whole life. He proclaimed them in the Declaration of Independence; he proclaimed them before he entered the legislature of his own state; he had even proposed in that legislature the abolition of slavery. And these continued to be his sentiments down to the last day of his life. I will not read the eloquent passage so often quoted by his Notes of Virginia—a passage dependent upon the fact that he trembled at the consequences of an instruction of the slaves, and admitted that in such a contest "the Almighty had not one attribute which could take sides with the master." I refer those who charge me with crime to the latter itself. In one short passage of the autobiography of his own life, he proclaimed it close, in the seventy-fourth year of his age, and shortly before his death, in giving an account of his movements in favor of a revision of the laws of Virginia, he speaks of a bill proposed by him to be introduced for the abolition of slavery; and he there says, "I am of those of life—with eternity perhaps before his eyes."

"The bill on the subject of slaves: was a mere digest of the existing laws respecting them, without any intimation of a plan for a future and general emancipation. It was thought better that this should be left to the future; that he trembled at the prospect, whenever the bill should be brought on. The principles of the amendment, however, were agreed on; that is to say, the freedom of all born after a certain day, and deportation at a proper age. But it was found that the public mind would not yet bear the measure. It was therefore dropped. Yet the day is not distant when it must be adopted, or, worse will follow. Nothing is more certainly written in the book of fate than that these people are to be free men; it is but certain that the two races, equally free, cannot live in the same government."

Yes, sir, and he adds, "the day is not far distant when this must be done, or worse will follow." These were among the last words of Jefferson; and I ask what worse than this was there in the memorial I presented, and which so deeply affected the sensibility of the gentleman from Kentucky, that he charged me with high treason and subornation of perjury for introducing any thing that even equaled towards such a thing? I say it was no crime to present such a petition here. And I hope my colleague, (Mr. Cushing), from whose immediate constituents this petition came, will vindicate himself and them from the charge he put forth against both. I say it was no crime. It was only the exercise of a right, although they who exercised it may have mistaken their remedy. I believe their complaints to be just; and I hold that this house, instead of turning them out of doors, and charging them with crimes, is bound to consider their petition, and to return them answers which will contribute to the removal of their grievances, and reconcile them to the continuance of the union, which, under a state of irritated feeling, they may have, for a moment, been ready to depart from.

Sir, the dissolution of the union! high treason! subornation of perjury! Why, sir, what is the whole of the high treason and subornation of perjury in the last ten years? What are the two resolutions in the pamphlet from which the gentleman from that state (Mr. Batts) read to us on this floor? Was that gentleman ever charged with high treason for having prepared such resolutions to be offered here? Was charged with subornation of perjury for putting his own person? If there be any foundation for the charges now made against me, then the gentleman from South Carolina is guilty of actual perjury in his own person; for, like the rest of us, has sworn to support the constitution. Sir, dissolution of the union! high treason! subornation of perjury! Why, sir, it is but a few days since one of the gentlemen from Virginia (Mr. Batts) rose in his place and declared that one of the high officers of the government—the secretary of the navy department—was of opinion that it is high time the union should be dissolved, and that he was in favor of it. The gentleman from Academy instantly denied it, and then wrote to that high dignity, calling upon him for his own disclaimer of such a charge; but he showed nearly the same sort of courtesy to the gentleman from Virginia as the gentleman from Kentucky has shown to me. The high dignity, it seems, is far above any association with a member from Richmond. Oh! yes! he is very far superior to him; so much so, that he calls upon the public to disavow that any conversation could have been supposed to pass between them. He moves in a higher sphere! [A laugh.] A member of this house, placed here by the constituents, is to be found in this country—the man of forty-seven thousand—was a character far too low ever to be found in conversation at all with so elevated a dignity! [Laughter.] But does he deny that he entertained the opinion charged upon him? Oh, no, he admits it all. But does it vex him, does it offend him, does it offend him, and what were they? After asserting the high superiority of his personal dignity over a mere common member of congress—I say a common member—but I might have said, and all here will bear me out in saying, a very distinguished member of congress; but he declared that he was very far above any association in a higher region, [a laugh] perhaps above the clouds—perhaps in them. [Loud laughter.] After stating this, he goes on to say:

"I will not pretend to say what Mr. Batts can give, but I assert, in the most direct and unequivocal manner, that he cannot prove the truth of his charge against me, by any witness who is himself a man of truth. I understand that charge to be that I am, or have been, the advocate of an immediate dissolution of the union, without qualifications or conditions. I have never, at any time during my life, entertained any such opinion or feeling. On the contrary, I have on all occasions advocated union upon the true principles of the constitution, and have sought to recommend my own principles, upon the ground that they were conservative of the constitution and the union. This is the only ground upon which you can find any basis for your charge upon this very subject. You say correctly that I have printed and published my opinions under almost every form of address, essay, pamphlet and book; and if any thing can be found in any of these publications to justify the charge of Mr. Batts, I will surrender to the point."

Now we shall see hereafter whether he "surrenders the point" or not. Mr. A. further read as follows:

"I think it almost certain, although I cannot recall any other occasion on which it occurred, that I have expressed a decided preference for a dissolution of the union over the establishment of systems of policy which I regarded as fatal to all true liberty. I avow the same opinion now. I would sooner see the union dissolved than witness the establishment of any principle which I hold to be true character and destroy its legitimate objects." These opinions I am very certain that I have often expressed, and I shall often express them hereafter. But that I am, or ever have been, a disunionist, in any other sense than is here expressed, is utterly untrue."

His "decided preference"—for what? For high treason? [A laugh.] No. For subornation of perjury? No. "For a dissolution of the union?" [Laughter.] He thinks he has. [Laughter.] Now I say, give me the benefit of that condition, and I will show that the men of Hayti will be most interested persons in the union. I am going to prove that the oppressions they suffer come within the very condition on which the honorable secretary says he should prefer a dissolution of the union. To be sure they would not be the same. The secretary says he would sooner witness a dissolution of the union than witness the success of this abolition movement. What does he mean? I suppose the Haytian petition is the "abolition movement." If so, what is its "success"? That must be, its reception by this house. Not the grant of what it prays for—but only that it shall be received. And does this high dignitary—the secretary of the union—think that the only way in which he should prefer a dissolution of the union to the reception of this petition by this house? Perhaps the member from Accomac or the gentleman from Kentucky may be of that opinion. But suppose he is not, what does it mean? What is the "abolition movement" as before you now? Suppose the abolition of slavery in this District of Columbia—and perhaps the abolition of the slave trade—the recognition of the black republic of Hayti, and the reception of Quashponpo as a foreign minister—does the secretary say he would prefer to this the dissolution of the union? Does the gentleman from Kentucky say that? I do not ask the member from Accomac—but ask the gentleman from Alabama, who offered the first of these resolutions against me? Does he mean to say that if a petition which has been received by the house, and referred to a standing committee of this house, and on which a report is presented, should be granted—and in consequence our commerce with Hayti shall be doubled and quadrupled, and the claims of our citizens on that government (suspended now, on the simple condition of our acknowledgment of Haytian independence) shall be allowed and paid, this house, and such a report as I have presented, should be rejected? Will he instantly give up the dissolution of the union? Or does it mean more? I charge on the secretary's answer indefinite language: there is an evasion of the question: he may stretch the terms he has used, or not; but contract them, when it comes to an answer to the question, "are you or are you are not for a dissolution of the union?"

Again: He says he should prefer a dissolution of the union to the establishment of "a consolidated government." And what is "a consolidated government?" Many say that "this government is now a consolidated government." They are vague terms.—They have no specific meaning. They are terms used to escape by a vague qualification like this? But he should prefer a dissolution of the union to the establishment of principles "which violate its true character, or its legitimate objects." And again, I ask, what are they? Most assuredly to this secretary they are the union, and the rights of the people, and the rights of the nation. What is the "true character" of the government? What are its "legitimate objects?" Here is a wide range for every member of this house to judge for himself. If one man has a right to say what they are, another man has the same right, unless the true character and legitimate objects are defined. On this ground, every man in this house, as soon as in his opinion, the true and legitimate purposes of this government are violated, may take steps to dissolve the union. Here, in this house, is a body of us, who think that a protective tariff is among the "legitimate objects" of the federal government, and not only so, but that its establishment is one of the most sacred duties of congress. We hold that the constitution is extended over this wide empire for the protection of all our great interests—for the protection, if you please, of the interests of slavery. I do not deny that. I admit it. For the protection of the people against the Indian tribes, and my constituents have paid by the million for such protection. We think this government was established for the protection of commerce, of navigation, of agriculture, of manufactures; and that if you put out of that protection any one class of our citizens, you do, in fact, dissolve the union, in so far. Yes. I think that so help me God! Is that the creed of either of the gentlemen before me from Alabama, (Mr. Houston and Mr. Payne?) I throw not. They may think it is for the purpose of the slave trade, African or American; but I say it is for the protection of slavery in the states where slavery exists. Yes. I think that the government is for that, and I am willing, to the extent of the constitution, to carry that protection into execution. But I will not, under color of doing this, go for the protection of the slave trade, or for depriving the people of the habeas corpus, or of the trial by jury, or of the freedom of the press. I am not for that; perhaps the gentleman from Kentucky is.—That is a difference of opinion. It is a fair subject for discussion in this house, for mutual compromise, for friendly consultation, and mutual accommodation after proper discussion had.

Now I will merely take the platform laid down to us by the honorable secretary of the navy of his purposes, wishes, and opinions, as expressed in private and in public, and claim the benefit of them for these petitioners. I will take his ground, and say that these petitioners are entitled to do the same. I believe the grounds are mistaken by them and by him. I have no faith in the doctrine. I hold that the secretary is more responsible to his country for the avowals he has made in that letter, than the petitioners are for the language used in their petition. I claim for them the benefit of these opinions, as I do of the pamphlet quoted to us here by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Rhett.) I insist, I demand that this house shall not assume to be the accusers and the judges of its constituents as well as of myself.—They have no authority over them. They have no right to charge them, for the exercise of their franchises as freemen, with high treason and subornation of perjury. Me the house has in its power, but not my constituents; and I say it is insolent presumption and a violation of the house to arrogate to itself this supervision over the constituent body. I say further, that, if this charge is to be referred to a select committee, I demand that these petitioners shall be heard before that committee; or, if it is to be sent to a court of justice, that they shall be heard before that court, by themselves or their counsel, with all the benefit of witnesses and of the attendance of all before this house charge me with any offence in having presented their petition. The gentleman from Kentucky contends that no charge of treason or of subornation of perjury is made against me, because, in my opinions, I direct that charge against them; but I say that he has no right to bring such a charge against me before they shall have first been proved guilty before the courts of the country.

At this point Mr. Adams gave way for a motion by Mr. Batts to adjourn; which motion prevailing, the house thereupon adjourned.

This debate was not further carried on; the house having, at the next day's sitting, disposed of the question by laying the whole subject on the table.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

FEBRUARY 16. The president laid before the body communication from the department of state in relation to the sixth census, distribution of the copies printed, &c.

The following memorials and petitions were presented and appropriately referred:

By Mr. Buchanan, from citizens of Warren county, Pennsylvania, in relation to the treaty with the Seneca Indians.

The following memorials from citizens of Pittsburg and its vicinity, asking congress to repeal the tariff laws and grant protection to home industry.

Also, from the manufacturers of window and flint glass, asking additional duties on that manufacture.

Also, from citizens of Columbia county, against the admission of any new slave state into the union, and against the annexation of Texas. Motion to receive laid on the table.

Mr. Walker submitted a resolution calling on the executive for information as to what proceedings, if any, had been had in the case of the Creole since the transmission of his last communication to this body.

Mr. Benton submitted a resolution instructing the judiciary to bring in a bill to amend the bankrupt law in certain particulars.

Mr. Barrow's resolution hitherto submitted for information on navy yard expenditures, Pensacola navy yard, &c. was taken up and adopted.

Mr. Woodbury's resolution for information on expenditures on public buildings in the city of Washington was taken up, amended and adopted.

Mr. Mangum submitted a resolution for detailed information of expenditures on treasury building and inland navigation.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. Walker on the 4th instant, was taken up:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the senate all papers addressed to the president by the United States or department of state from citizens of the United States having claims upon Mexico, relating to the terms of the convention between the U. States and Mexico, prior or subsequent to the execution of the same, stating objections to its execution, and the answers thereto; also, copies of the minutes of the board appointed under said convention up to the period when they proceeded to act on individual cases; also, copies of any notification from the state department, or from any other quarter, of the time and place of first meeting of said board; also, copies of any communications which may have been addressed to the members of the board from any of the members of either of them, touching the organization of the board or its mode of proceeding; also, copies of the commissions of all the members of said board, and of the instructions, if any, given to them by the president; also, copies of all communications, if any, from the late American consul at Santa Fe to the department of state touching any violation of the rights of American citizens.

Mr. Adams moved to amend the resolution so that it should be requested to be communicated to the senate a tabular statement of the names of the claimants whose claims have been presented to the Mexican commission and acted upon by the board of commissioners, and the amount of the claims actually claimed in each case, principal and interest, if any; the amount reported and allowed by the board of commissioners, and the date and amount of the award, designating the interest, principal and total, and showing in cases where the award has been made by the empire, the amount allowed by the American or Mexican commissioners and by the said empire.

Mr. Adams moved to amend the resolution so that it should be requested to be communicated to the senate a tabular statement of the names of the claimants whose claims have been presented to the Mexican commission and acted upon by the board of commissioners, and the amount of the claims actually claimed in each case, principal and interest, if any; the amount reported and allowed by the board of commissioners, and the date and amount of the award, designating the interest, principal and total, and showing in cases where the award has been made by the empire, the amount allowed by the American or Mexican commissioners and by the said empire.

Mr. Clay said the resolution called for a great volume of papers. From what he had heard, he believed that the committee would be able to get up a list of some of the claims. But what he would ask, would be gained from the adoption of the resolution? The executive, it seemed to him, was the proper authority to remedy the defect growing out of a neglect of claims. The power to negotiate and treat was left to him, and he should act after, and not before, the result would be made manifest to the country, rather to embarrass than to diminish difficulties. The same was true in regard to the Creole case.—Difficulties were multiplied by the action.

Mr. Calhoun said he concurred with the senator from Kentucky generally in regard to what was said respecting our foreign relations. The executive would be obliged to be guided by the senate in regard to the Creole case, as he would be in regard to the others. But he had partial information on this subject, and it was desirable that we should have fuller information.—Mr. C. made some reference to the British parliament, as affording a precedent for the kind of information to be obtained in reference to the Creole.

Mr. Clay said, in regard to the practice of the British parliament, in regard to the Creole case, giving pending a negotiation. In regard to the northern question, the publication of information had threatened the worst consequences, and two of his colleagues had feared a rupture in England and here, that communications had been published pending negotiations.

Mr. Fries said, that while there had been too much latitude in the regulation of information here pending negotiations, there had been too much strictness in the governments of Europe.

He believed that there was a disposition abroad to relax in this matter, and to conform more to the American usage. Nothing, he believed, had yet been published in relation to the Creole case, but all calculated to affect the interests of the parties in the case. No interference to the case now under consideration, he thought it should be referred to the committee on foreign relations, who had the subject under their consideration. He thought with the senator from New York, (Mr. Briggs,) that the subject might as well be put over until the committee should report, that commission was now under a full sail of business. If the resolution was to be considered at this time, he would ask for the adoption of an amendment, which he presumed the senator from Mississippi, (Mr. Walker), who had moved the resolution, would have no hesitation in adopting as a part of his own resolution, to wit:

"Copies of any communications or representations not heretofore communicated to the senate, which may have been adopted by the department of state by any portion of the said claimants in relation to the proceedings and progress of the Mexican commissioners under the said commission; also, any correspondence which may have taken place between Mexican commissioners and the secretary of state touching the execution of proceedings under the said commission, if not of such a character as to reflect upon the opinion of the president, to be improper to be communicated."

The amendment was accepted and incorporated in the original resolution.

Mr. Buchanan said he should move to refer the resolution to the committee on foreign affairs.

Mr. Walker had no objection to the reference to the committee on foreign relations, and would agree to the postponement to Monday week, and to consider the subject as a special order for that day. But he protested in the name of the American citizens interested in this subject against withholding information from the subject. He asked that all information upon this subject had before the American senate.

Mr. Buchanan. Undoubtedly information should be given upon this subject.

Mr. Walker. Why, then, oppose the resolution, or the committee on foreign relations, before its closing. Mr. W. said he would give the facts connected with the trade of Mexico and this country, for the purpose of showing the extent of the diminution of trade with Mexico, while it had increased with other governments. The reasons of this diminution, the extent of which was stated by the senator from Mississippi, were stated to be the abandonment of the rights of American citizens. Our flag had been torn down there; the government had neglected the rights of our citizens; and our commerce, in consequence, with Mexico, had been reduced almost to nothing, while the commerce with France, a government which protected its citizens, had greatly increased.

Mr. Buchanan thought the senator from Mississippi had not done justice to his government. The facts connected with the commission were briefly stated by the senator, for the purpose of showing that the government was not responsible for any improper conduct on the part of the Mexican commissioners. It was well known to all that General Jackson had brought the subject to the attention of the senate, and that the commission now in force was the result.

Mr. Walker said if justice had been done to American citizens, it would not have been so. He asked why it was that our commerce had fallen off as it had? In regard to General Jackson, he acquitted him of all blame. He recommended that the rights of our citizens should be maintained at the mouth of the cannon; and if his advice had been carried out, there would have been no war, and the rights of our citizens would have been maintained.

After a word or two from Mr. Buchanan connected with the appointment and progress of the commission, the whole subject was postponed to Monday week.

On motion of Mr. Linn,

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to the senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, all the information in his possession which may relate to the recent outrages committed by the Mexican citizens or people on the persons of American citizens residing at Santa Fe and the northern provinces of Mexico.

Mr. Benton submitted the following:

Resolved, That the executive be instructed to inquire into the nature of the payments now made or offered to be made by the federal government to its creditors; whether the same are made in hard money or paper money; whether the creditors have their option whether the government will pay in a discount; and what remedy, if any, is necessary to enable the government to keep its faith with the public creditors, so as to save them from losses, the consequence from violation, and the contrary.

The bill from the house of representatives in relation to the banks of the District of Columbia was read a first and second time by its title, and was, on motion of Mr. King, referred to the committee for the District of Columbia.

The bill to provide for the payment of the claim of the state of Georgia, for money advanced by that state on account of expenses incurred by calling out militia in cases of emergency, to aid in the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida and Alabama, was ordered to be engrossed; and the senate adjourned.

February 17. The committee on claims reported adversely to the claims of the heirs of Albert Fulton.

Mr. Morehead submitted a resolution for establishing a standing committee on retrenchment.

Mr. Simmons a resolution for the postponement of the bankrupt law for one year. The chair decided it to be out of order. Several bills of private claims, &c. were passed and the senate adjourned.

FEBRUARY 18. Mr. Clay presented a memorial from citizens of Pennsylvania, in relation to the tariff, and in opposition to the compromise act. The memorialists were opposed to this act, and asked the senator to present the petition, to express his views in regard to it. Mr. Clay took occasion to do so, and in a few words.

Two motives had operated upon his (Mr. Clay's) mind, and he believed on the minds of others; to induce them to concur in the passage of the law. The first was to avert the calamity of civil war, the fear of which having been lighted up in South Carolina, threatened to kindle the flame of civil war; the second was to preserve from utter destruction, the system of protection which Pennsylvania favored when the law was passed; and he would repeat here, although it would not be long before he would have an opportunity to go into an examination of the whole subject, that if the compromise act had not been adopted, the whole system of protection would have been swept by the board by the preponderating influence of the illustrious man then at the head of the government, (General Jackson), at the very next session after its enactment. With regard to the operation of this law, it was not necessary to say that any portion of the embarrassments of the country had resulted from it. Other causes had contributed to this result, and it was to be attributed to the experiments which had been made upon the currency. The embarrassments were also to be attributed to the operation of the tariff, which, by plunging into schemes of internal improvement, had increased the debts abroad, and thereby given a false and fictitious appearance to the prosperity of the country; and, when their bonds depreciated, the evils under which we now suffered, as a consequence, ensued. As to the compromise, he had already said that it was his purpose, so long as he should remain in the senate, to maintain that the original principles of the act should be carried out faithfully and honestly; and, if in providing for an adequate revenue for an economical administration of the government, they could at the same time afford incidental protection, he would be happy to look to those objects, and to be accomplished; but if it should be necessary for the interests of Pennsylvania, to go beyond a revenue tariff, for the purpose of obtaining protection, then he hoped that every senator and representative from that state, and those of other states and other interests, who were in the senate, would be induced to give up, and would take up this subject of protection and carry it to the point which their local interests demanded.

Mr. Calhoun said that South Carolina opposed the tariff of 1828 because it was a palpable violation of the constitution, destructive of her interests, and threatening to overthrow the government itself; that when he yielded to the compromise act, he conceived that the protective principle was surrendered in toto; and that it was only in this view that he acted in yielding his assent to the bill. Any duty which transcended twenty per cent was a violation of the compromise, and more especially if it were caused by a surrender of any branch of the revenue.

He then said that, from Kentucky, that General Jackson could have protested the protective system if the compromise act had not passed. He thought it would have been beyond his power. Mr. Calhoun regarded the smallness of the reduction of duties by the compromise act as one of the great evils of the tariff. If the tariff, the low price of cotton had now made the manufacturers more prosperous than ever before.

Mr. Clay combatted the idea of the senator from South Carolina, that the tariff had created the embarrassments which existed for a long time in the country. He referred the senator to the discussions upon the tariff acts, for the purpose of showing that the tariff was not the cause of the distress.

If the senator would look to the tariff acts of '24, '28, '32, and the compromise act of 1833, he would find that the revenues of the country had never been more from these acts than the expenditures of government. The whole surplus revenue, about which so much had been heard, and which was attributed to the protective policy, originated exclusively in the extensive land sales, which had swelled in one year to the enormous amount of twenty-six millions of dollars. These excessive sales alone had exceeded the amount of the surplus revenue which had ever been brought into the treasury.

Hereafter, he said, he should be able to show that it would be impossible to stand by the twenty per cent, even by withdrawing the whole of the land fund from its appropriated purpose of distribution, and placing it in the treasury.

Mr. Calhoun said he regretted that the senator had felt himself called upon to reply to what he had said. The senator, in expressing his impressions, and he felt called upon to state his in reply to the tariff and fund was replaced in the treasury, and the limitation of 20 per cent duty adhered to, the receipts would be ample for the ordinary wants of the government.— This might not be the case at once, because there was a public debt upon the country, but with the land fund and 20 per cent duty, the treasury would be sufficient for the expenditures, and to create a sinking fund for the gradual extinction of the public debt.

Mr. Preston believed the compromise act a wise and humane law, conceived in a wise and generous spirit, and that it would be a rallying point, it would be well. If not, he feared the country would be in a state of alarm, the extent of which could not be foreseen. He did not say we could not, or should not go beyond twenty per cent, in providing a revenue sufficient for the economical administration of the government. If more was wanted for the welfare of the country, he should say grant it. He said the imposts be equal to the fair and legitimate expenditures of government; but nothing more than this, though to this extent he would go. The duty of twenty per cent wisely imposed, he believed would be equal to the public wants, and he would not yield one cent beyond this until the land revenue was brought back into the treasury, as it ought to be.

Mr. Preston, in closing his remarks, denied that disunion was ever, even at the moment of the greatest excitement, designed by the state of South Carolina. No such thing was contemplated except as the last resort and as the only means of getting rid of a great and unbearable oppression.

The memorial was then referred.

Mr. Clay presented a memorial, which, he said, was well written, being from a naturalized citizen of the United States, and that the measures might be taken to protect those citizens in case of war. Mr. C. said the memorialist was an Irishman by birth, and full of the generous and ardent devotion which belongs so peculiarly to his countrymen, where his adopted country was concerned. Although he (Mr. C.) did not appear to be a native, yet he expressed his entire readiness to defend the country, and to do the same extent he would the native. He moved the reference of the memorial to the committee on foreign affairs.

Mr. Buchanan presented a memorial from Huntington county, Pennsylvania, asking protection for the iron trade and manufacture of the country, and stating that the tariff of 1833 was not adequate as a means of protection against foreign competition.

Mr. B. said he felt it to be a duty which he owed to the venerable ex-president of the United States to refer the senate and the country to his expressed opinions on the subject of the tariff, about the same time when the compromise act passed. These opinions were now matters of history; and he thought the senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) was mistaken in supposing that he intended to prostrate the whole protective system.

In his message to congress of the 4th December, 1832, he says: "Those who take an enlarged view of the condition of our country must be satisfied that the policy of protection must be ultimately limited to those articles of domestic manufacture which are indispensable to our safety in time of war. Within this scope, on a reasonable scale, it is recommended, by every consideration of patriotism and duty, which will doubtless always secure to it a liberal and efficient support." And, again, in the same message: "In effecting this adjustment, [of the tariff,] it is due, in justice to the interests of the different states, and even to the preservation of the union, that the protection afforded by existing laws to any branches of the national industry should not exceed what may be necessary to counteract the regulations of foreign nations, and to secure a supply of those articles of manufacture essential to the national independence and safety in time of war."

In his celebrated anti-nullification message to congress of the 16th January, 1833, he came out decidedly against the principle of the compromise act establishing the same rate of ad valorem duty on all articles, whether they had been protected or unprotected. In reply to the address to the people of the United States, by the convention of South Carolina, he says: "The majority of the states, and of the people, will certainly not consent that the protecting duties shall be wholly abrogated, never to be re-enacted at any future time, or, in any possible case, to be practically so treated as to provide that the same rate of duty shall be imposed upon the protected articles that shall be imposed upon the unprotected;" which, moreover, would be severely oppressive to the poor, and in time of war, would add greatly to the rigors.

Mr. Williams moved to lay the whole subject on the table.
